should at least not seem better than the peace which follows work well done, and the sight of which, well-enjoyed as well-earned, is an aid, and would be sufficient if it were the only one, which Mr. Whittier is now rendering all the good causes he ever fought for.

A MAINE REGIMENT IN THE WAR.*

When the Army of the Potomac was advancing up the Peninsula, under McClellan, now a long time ago, we remember to have seen in the early morning, at a woody cross-road below Cold Harbor, a rough piece of cracker-box nailed to an old sign-post, and inscribed "Richmond, Va., 20 miles—Gorham, Maine, 500 miles." A Maine regiment, whose mark this was, had camped near by, and was again on its light-hearted way. As with the cat's face in the fairy story, a grin seemed to linger about the cross-road after the artist had left. But the author of this pleasantry, if haply he still kept the ranks, did not get to Richmond as soon as he had counted on; and he was so long in getting back to Gorham that a big book has grown out of following another Maine regiment in the actual interval.

Major Gould traces the history of what he styles the 1–10–29th Regiment—that is, a regiment of Maine infantry which bore these numbers successively—he, amongst others, serving under all three. Unhappily, we think, for the truth of history and for the satisfaction of all concerned, the writing of regimental histories is a labor not commonly very well repaid, if repaid at all, outside of a small, interested circle. For the most part the task has, therefore, been given over to such hands as the Military History Departments at State Capitols, and from these sources we know pretty well what to expect. We have seen a printed form sent by a State historian to a regimental officer for his filling up, calling for such items of interest as the full maiden name of his mother and the occupations of his boyhood, and leading him on line by line through his career in peace to a declaration of his part in the war, even to his heroism in particular instances. Possibly, some who think their reputations demand it will comply literally with all these requirements, especially if they are going into politics. Perhaps in the whole State one man will tell the simple truth about himself, and in case this man should ever become a Washington, a grateful country will know where to study his early footprints on the sands of time. But this is not the way in which State historians or any others can compose military history, in the proper sense of the word. Major Gould is one of the only class who can write on such a subject what will be worth the printing or the reading. Civilians attempt it, chaplains and surgeons attempt it, but the work needs the hand and the experience of one who has "been thar'," in the fullest sense of the California poet.

Such an author ought to seek and secure a larger circle of readers than the regiment's survivors and local friends. Nothing in history touches the average American like the recent war and its incidents, if brought before him with an air of reality; and fiction would not charm him more if he could find a truthful and lifelike record of what went on in the field. He does not care for strategy and tactics, or dull recital of grand campaigns. He does not breathe a military atmosphere; he has a dread of standing armies, and does not long for foreign war or the sentimental glory of arms. But take him well to the front where the fighting was, and let him stand in the once deadly ranks, and there is nothing that moves him so much. Nobody can do this for him like a regimental officer; and only from such a one can he and all of us realize the dread facts of that long struggle which seems now almost forgotten. A generation is already growing up to whom the sense of personal loss was not very keenly brought home. Figures may tell what the losses were; but we have grown dull to figures, and milliards now are no more surprising than thousands were before the war. We should better feel what had to be undergone by our army if the soldiers told us simply what the regiments saw and did and suffered. General Sherman wisely said in Philadelphia, at the unveiling of a picture of the battle of Gettysburg, that he hoped more pictures like it would be painted, not to illustrate the triumph of one section over another, but to keep it in the minds of the oncoming generation how such scenes as that had marred our land for months and years. It is mainly from this point of view that we hope for lifelike war histories; not for the glorification of men or organizations.

The chief difficulty in the way lies in the mass of details of merely local interest with which authors feel bound to encumber such works. Perhaps there is no help for this, but it is, of course, one of the reasons why the general public pays so little attention to regimental histories. We have never seen any work on the war which at all compared, for interest, with the scraps of letters printed in the "Harvard Memorials"—we take it, because they tell in a natural way the ups and downs and hard realities of soldier life as it was, unspoilt by a sense of authorship and unburdened by dulness for mere record's sake. Major Gould's book has, in parts, a very general interest, and, in parts, is very well written. His account of his regiment's fight in the battle of Antietam is, for a page or two, one of the best of its kind we have ever read. Kinglake, in his "Crimean War," tried to paint, as if from life, just such a scene of close combat; but with great elaboration and refining, his effort was cold and artificial by the side of the simple and truthful narrative before us. The regiment, almost alone by chance, confronted at very close quarters a rebel regiment in a piece of woods. One of the Maine captains, who had fainted from exhaustion at Cedar Mountain, and thought himself, therefore, under a cloud, stood by the regiment's colors, and, while aiming his pistol at one of the enemy, was instantly killed. The men took to what poor shelter they could find, and a duel by regiments ensued. The enemy sent sharpshooters into the trees, and got a plunging fire on our men, who, in turn, brought down some of these high skirmishers, one of whom was seen to have climbing-irons strapped to his legs. The Maine colonel's horse was shot in the head, and became frantic, plunging wildly about. The colonel, dismounting, was shot in both legs, and his horse, being free, ran to where the lieutenant-colonel was standing, and, suddenly wheeling in front of him, kicked him in the breast and stomach, and wholly disabled him. The loss of men was meantime very heavy. General Mansfield, the corps commander, rode up to check the firing, thinking that both regiments were Union troops, but just as he discovered his error the brave old man was mortally wounded, and had to be carried from the field. As Major Gould tells this story, we have a battle scene indeed, stripped of all pomp and circumstance, and, for once, true to the life. "On going in," says Major Gould, "came the moment of battle that tried us severely; not that there was a sign of hesitancy or show of poor behavior, but it is terrible to march slowly into danger, and see and feel that each second your chance for death is surer than it was the second before. The desire to break loose, to run, to fire, to do something, no matter what, rather than to walk, is almost irresistible;" and on coming out, "the sight of our thinned ranks, and the prospect of another day of bloody work, was sickening. There had been hardly an incident in the whole day's work of butchery and blood to cheer us, yet we repeated to each other our experiences, and tried to make the best of a bad state of things."

These comments, and the slight hint we have given of the author's faithful sketch of one sharp fight he was in, will illustrate what we have said of the value and moral of a regimental history written under such auspices. But if this should not suffice, there is still food for reflection in the author's account of the slaughter at Cedar Mountain, and of Banks's calamitous Red River Expedition—calamitous to the Northern arms in a military sense, and to the Southern people in the destruction of valuable property. There is something cheering in the Shenandoah Valley victories, because only by victory could we have peace again; but a generous sympathy will feel for the misfortunes of Early's misled army, and for the war-ridden people whose homes lay in the path of that campaign. And finally, the chapter on reconstruction, which tells of the military occupation of the South just after the war—of demoralized volunteers—of Treasury agents—of the Freedmen's Bureau—all this should bear with it a lesson to be had constantly in remembrance as the years go on. It is not within our province to follow the career of Major Gould's regiment, or to speak of a book like his from a literary standpoint. We wish that the result of his praiseworthy and intelligent labor, aided as it was by his all-important personal observation, which was shrewd and just, had been a book free from matters of mere regimental detail—such a book as would attract the curiosity of many readers outside of his own State whom he might greatly interest and instruct. Perhaps he might still make it such.

* "History of the 1-10-29th Maine Regiment. By Major John M. Gould." Portland: Stephen Berry. 1871.

Reminiscences of Fifty Years. By Mark Boyd. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1871.)—We have read strings of epitaphs more entertaining than this collection, which seems to have been put together for the sake of saving dull scraps of biography. Or else it was compiled to justify the common belief in a Scotchman's insensibility to such humor as is more delicate than personal. The best story of all is carefully spoiled in the telling. When Sydney Smith was expressing impatience at the delay of certain dignitaries to attend a meeting on the subject of paving the streets around St. Paul's with wood, he did not say that "as the question of blockheads was to be discussed, there was no other course than to wait"; but he did suggest that the absentee aldermen had only "to lay their heads together." The welcome that met Crabbe Robinson's interminable gossiping memoirs may have given a hint to this reminiscent, emulous of his example, to collect and print his own notes of dinner-conversations. Most of the anecdotes read like crumbs picked up after the feast of talk was over—they need action, the stimulus of good cheer, and an audience tolerant of "l'Amphitryon où l'on dîne," to make them moderately lively.

Their range of time and characters leads one to expect some variety, though it was hardly worth while to go back to Johnson for a tame jest on dissenters, or cross to Italy in search of a cabman's everyday banter. Nelson and Wellington figure at length and prosily; Sir John Franklin and Burnside are lugged in to say something not worth repeating; and Talfourd and Rothschild reserve for the listener's delight their most commonplace remarks. The natives of New Zealand and Australia, where the author modestly hopes his reminiscences will be read, may be touched with the freshness of the salt-and-egg story, transferred from J. Miller to a London club; but for the rest, they must agree with Froissart, who thought these English took their pleasure after a sad fashion. Thackeray is introduced at a Greenwich dinner of Scotchmen, where "there was an immense amount of post-prandial oratory, involving much mutual laudation. 'Good gracious,' he whispered, 'do they mean all they say? for, if so, there are some three or four men at this table already qualified to be prime ministers.'" He would have found something sharper to say if invited to the extraordinary scene of riot and drunkenness at a country funeral in Kirkcudbright, described on page 89, where the procession exhilarated itself into a steeple-chase, leaving many of the riders as helpless as the principal subject of the occasion. Indeed, the writer contrives, in a dull and lumbering way, to leave a very poor impression of Scotchmen's morality and generosity, not much relieved by the campaign incidents celebrating their acuteness and gallantry.

The best parts of the book are composed from personal sketches of two very different men—Lieutenant Waghorn, the indomitable but too convivial sailor, who made the overland route to India known and possible, and Gentleman Jones, the comedian and teacher of elocution. There is something quite Western in Waghorn's straightforward persistence and contempt of red-tape. Ministers and directors stood very little in his way, and he emphasized his indifference by slamming their doors and by unhandsome gestures to their very faces in an amusing fashion. Jones's history reveals some secrets for manufacturing Parliamentary orators that our stump-speakers might profit by. As models for speaking the English language purely, he was accustomed to listen to Bishop Blomfield's sermons, Lyndhurst's judgments, and the speeches of Ellenborough. The specimens of his anecdotes given make us regret that the collector lost his best opportunity for producing a readable book by neglecting to note down the other numerous and instructive ones he praises.

Sir Henry Halford's advice is worth recording: "If you wish to preserve your eyes, never read by candlelight anything smaller than the ace of clubs;" which perhaps gives a clue also to the odd Scotch practice, elsewhere mentioned, of calling spectacles "preserves." And there is a dramatic effect in the description, borrowed from Palgrave, of Speaker Abbott, lingering ten minutes, his face as white as a sheet, over the casting vote that condemned Dundas for official misconduct, while Pitt crushed his hat over his brows to hide the streaming tears, and pushed in haste out of the House. But, with the exception of a very few pages, the amusement to be gained from these gleanings of fifty years is of that very mild sort one may find in being reminded of the insignificant things great men can do and the indifferent ones clever men have said.

JUST PUBLISHED

BY

PORTER & COATES,

PUBLISHERS,

PHILADELPHIA.

I.

AMERICAN ORNITHOLOGY;

OR,

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE BIRDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Illustrated with Plates engraved and colored from Original Drawings taken from Nature.

BY ALEXANDER WILSON.

With a life of the author, by George Ord, F.R.S. With Continuation, by Charles Lucien Bonaparte (Prince of Musignano). 3 vols. imperial 8vo, with a folio volume of carefully colored plates embracing nearly 400 figures of birds, mostly life-size. Elegantly bound in cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, $75; in half Turkey morocco, gilt edges, $85.

II.

THOS. HOOD'S POETICAL WORKS.

2 vols. crown 8vo, tinted paper, cloth extra, $1 75 per vol.; half-calf, gilt, $3 50 per vol.; half-morocco, gilt top, $3 50 per vol.

III.

UP THE RHINE.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

Crown 8vo, tinted paper, cloth extra, $1 75 per vol.; half-calf, gilt, $3 50 per vol.; half-morocco, antique, $3 25 per vol.

Immediately, in One Volume 8vo, pp. 406.

HISTORICAL ESSAYS.

BY EDWARD A. FREEMAN, M.A.,

Hon. D.C.L., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford.

CONTENTS:

The Mythical and Romantic Elements in Early English History.
The Continuity of English History.
The Relations between the Crowns of England and Scotland.
St. Thomas of Canterbury and His Biographers.
The Life of Edward the Third.
The Holy Roman Empire.
The Franks and the Gauls.
The Early Sieges of Paris.
Frederick the First, King of Italy.
The Emperor Frederick the Second.
Charles the Bold.
Presidential Government.

NOW READY.

THE HISTORY OF NAPOLEON THE FIRST.

BY P. LANFREY.

Vol. 1, 8vo, cloth, $3 50.

"One of the most striking pieces of historical composition of which France, rich as she is in that order, has its boast. Assuredly, M. Lanfrey's book is important not merely for the illustration which it supplies of pure theories of government, but for the light which it throws on the character of what is in so many ways, even now in its hour of confusion, the most important power in Modern Europe."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

38 Bleecker Street, New York.

PRIVATE SECRETARYSHIP or similar employment wanted by one of some experience, with Academic Honors, and good social position. Address H. S. B., care of "THE NATION."

LIFE AND LETTERS OF CAPTAIN JOHN Brown. Edited by Richard D. Webb. The best ever written. With photograph showing the face without the beard. Price $1 50. Address, Publisher of THE NATION, Box 6732, N. Y.

AMERICANA. A Catalogue of a Recent Importation of Rare Books on American History may be had on application to

GEORGE TAWSE, Bookseller,
2 Dey Street, New York.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. Reprinted from THE NATION, and in some measure supplying the place of the first two volumes of the paper, now somewhat scarce. Price $1 50. Address, Publisher of THE NATION, Box 6732, N. Y.

YALE AND HARVARD USE

WHITNEY'S GERMAN COURSE,

OTTO'S FRENCH COURSE.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,

PUBLISHERS,

No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

The Publishers issue a very large assortment of works in the same department.

☞ A Descriptive Catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

"No diligent writer will willingly be without a copy."

JUST PUBLISHED, COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME.

LIPPINCOTT'S PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY OF

BIOGRAPHY AND MYTHOLOGY,

CONTAINING

Memoirs of the Eminent Persons of all Ages and Countries, and Accounts of the various Subjects of the Norse, Hindoo, and Classic Mythologies, with the Pronunciation of their Names in the Different Languages in which they occur.

BY J. THOMAS, A.M., M.D.

Complete in 1 vol. imperial 8vo, toned paper, sheep, $15; half-Turkey, $17; half-calf, $18.

This invaluable work embraces the following peculiar features in an eminent degree:

I. GREAT COMPLETENESS AND CONCISENESS in the Biographical Sketches.
II. SUCCINCT BUT COMPREHENSIVE ACCOUNTS of all the more interesting subjects of Mythology.
III. A LOGICAL SYSTEM OF ORTHOGRAPHY.
IV. THE ACCURATE PRONUNCIATION OF the Names.
V. FULL BIBLIOGRAPHICAL REFERENCES.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Lippincott's Biographical Dictionary, according to the unanimous opinion of distinguished scholars, is the best work of the kind ever published."—Phila. Ledger.

"The most complete and satisfactory work of the kind in the language."—Chicago Standard.

"The most comprehensive and valuable work of the kind that has ever been attempted. . . . An invaluable convenience."—Boston Ev. Traveller.

"The most valuable contribution to lexicography in the English tongue."—Cincinnati Chronicle.

"No other work of the kind will compare with it."—Chicago Advance.

"This work presents a very wide range of treatment, great compactness and perspicuity, wonderful accuracy, and a typographical execution that is absolutely perfect."—N. Y. Ev. Post.

"The most complete Biographical Dictionary in the world."—Phila. Age.

"An admirable work."—New York Independent.

"A work of extraordinary value."—Boston Post.

"Its plan is admirable."—New York Tribune.

☞ For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent, free of expense, upon receipt of the price, by the Publishers.

Special Circulars, containing a full description of the work, with specimen pages, will be sent, post-paid, on application.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., PUBLISHERS,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia, and 25 Bond Street, New York.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE
ON THE
BANKRUPT LAW.
SECOND EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

PRICED CATALOGUE No. 21
OF
ANCIENT AND MODERN BOOKS,

Comprising Standard and Valuable Works in
ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, HISTORY, VOYAGES, TRAVELS, ETC. ETC. ETC.

☞ Just published, and will be forwarded FREE to any address.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
Dealer in New and Old Books, 17 Astor Place, N. Y.

BOOK-BUYERS.

Send for Catalogue of INTERESTING, USEFUL, and SCARCE BOOKS added to the Stock in hand of
FRANCIS EMMINS,
80 Nassau Street, New York.

G. P. PUTNAM & SONS

Will Publish To-day:

I.

A New and Beautiful Work on Popular Astronomy, by the Astronomer-Royal.

THE MIDNIGHT SKY:

Familiar Notes on the Stars and Planets.

BY EDWIN DUNKIN,

Of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich. With 32 Star Maps, and numerous other illustrations. Folio, in a handsome and unique cover, cloth extra, $3 75.

II.

ART, PICTORIAL AND INDUSTRIAL.

An illustrated volume of Original Essays on various topics connected with Ancient and Modern Art. With 53 curious and valuable illustrations from Original Works, produced by the Autotype process.

Complete in one elegant folio volume, cloth extra, gilt edges, $16.

III.

SWISS PICTURES:

A TOUR IN SWITZERLAND.

Drawn with Pen and Pencil. With numerous fine illustrations.

BY E. WHYMPER, F.R.G.S.

Imperial 8vo, cloth extra, gilt edges, $3 75.

IV.

THE TOY-BOOK PRESENT.

A handsome quarto volume. With 24 large and attractive colored engravings.

4to, cloth extra, $2 50.

V.

HEALTH AND ITS CONDITIONS.

BY JAMES HINTON.

With Illustrations. Reprinted from Smith & Elder's Edition, by arrangement with the author.

12mo, cloth, $1 50.

VI.

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

POLITICAL, MILITARY, AND SOCIAL.

From the Earliest Times to the Present. [With special reference to the progress of the people in Literature and the Arts, and in Practical Life.]

BY BENSON J. LOSSING,

Author of the "Field-Book of the Revolution," etc. With three colored maps.

Large 12mo, Library Edition, cloth, $2 50.

GILMAN'S FIRST STEPS IN ENGLISH LITERATURE.

"Mr. Gilman has prepared a valuable work. I do not know where an equal amount of valuable literary information combined with judicious criticism can be found in so brief a space."—From Homer B. Sprague, Principal of Adelphi Academy, Brooklyn, N. Y.

HURD & HOUGHTON, NEW YORK.
THE RIVERSIDE PRESS, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW YORK CHURCH BOOK STORE.

THE PSALTER AND CANTICLES; Pointed for Singing, according to the use of Trinity Parish, New York. 18mo, paper boards, 30 cents; or in cloth boards, sprinkled edges, 40 cents.

THE INCARNATION AND PRINCIPLES OF Evidence. A Theological Essay. By Richard Holt Hutton, M.A., with an Introduction by Samuel Osgood, D D. 18mo, cloth, 60 cents.

COMFORTING THOUGHTS FOR THE WEAK and Weary. Brief Meditations on Passages of Scripture, selected from the Works of the Rev. Edward Bickersteth. 12mo, cloth, extra, $1 25.

THE DAY OF TROUBLE. Plain Words for the Suffering and Sorrowful. Selected from the Writings of the Rev. W. B. Mackenzie. 12mo, cloth, extra, $1 25.

EIGHT YEARS' EXPERIENCE OF MOthers' Meetings. By Mrs. Goodwin Hatchard. 12mo, red edges, $1 50.

THE INTROIT-PSALMS FOR SUNDAYS and Holy Days, as Prescribed by the First Prayer Book of Edward Sixth. Set to Original Chants for Congregational Use. By J. H. Cornell. Small 4to, cloth, $1 50.

NEW BOOKS
FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL LIBRARIES, ETC.

THE RAINBOW STORIES: For Summer Days and Winter Nights. $1 50.

SHORT CHAPTERS ON NATURAL HISTory. 75 cents.

THE DAY-STAR: or, A Gospel Story for the Little Ones. Illustrated. $1 25.

CARRIE WILLIAMS AND HER SCHOLARS. $1.

EMILY MILLMAN. The Little Sunbeam of the Farm House. $1.

THE HAPPY VILLAGE, and How it Became so. $1.

IN THE PRESS.

BY MRS. MARSHALL.

Millicent Leigh.	Brothers and Siste
Helen's Diary.	Old Gateway.
Violet Douglass.	Hetty's Resolve.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.
(LATE POTT & AMERY),
Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

THE ECLECTIC MAGAZINE OF FOREIGN LITERATURE
FOR OCTOBER

Reprints from the Quarterly Review the Elaborate Essay on

DARWIN'S DESCENT OF MAN.

This is by far the ablest and most scientific attack that has yet been made on this remarkable book. It contains 15 valuable papers, and among them we enumerate the following: Sir Walter Scott; The Herschels and the Star-Depths; A Festa in Venice; The State Papers of France; The Literary Life; Mediæval Goldsmiths; Art, Miscellany, etc. A fine portrait of the great astronomer, Sir John Herschel, embellishes the numbor. For sale by all Booksellers.

TERMS OF THE ECLECTIC: Single copies, 45 cts.; one copy, one year, $5; two copies, one year, $9. Address

E. R. PELTON, Publisher,
108 Fulton Street, New York.

THE NATION PRESS.

The Proprietors of THE NATION PRESS give notice that they have established a Book, Pamphlet, Job, and Newspaper Printing-Office in this City, and are prepared to execute at moderate prices, for cash, the best of work in any and all of these branches.

For BOOKS they will furnish Electrotype or Stereotype Plates, as desired, and will guaranty unusual accuracy in their preparation.

J. ROSS & CO., 27 Rose St., New York.

A BRILLIANT OFFER.

SIXTEEN MONTHS FOR A YEAR!

To any person who will remit us $4 (which is the regular subscription price), we will send from September, 1871, to January, 1873. Anthony Trollope's great story, THE EUSTACE DIAMONDS, commenced in the September Number.

THE GALAXY

THE GALAXY

IS THE

BEST AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

NO FAMILY CAN AFFORD TO DO WITHOUT IT.

It gives more Good and Attractive Reading Matter for the Money than any other Periodical or Book Published in the Country.

THE LEADING NEWSPAPERS PRONOUNCE

THE GALAXY

The Best and Most Ably Edited American Magazine.

THE GALAXY

Meets the Wants of Every Member of the Family.

It contains Thoughtful Articles by our Ablest Writers.
It contains Sketches of Life and Adventure.
It has Serial Stories by our Best Novelists.
It has Short Stories in Each Number.
It has Humorous Articles in Each Number which are a constant source of delight to the public.
In Each Number is a Complete Review of the World of Literature.

The New Department of "Scientific Miscellany" appears in Each Number.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE!

Price 35 cents per number. Subscription Price, $4 per year. Address

SHELDON & COMPANY,

677 Broadway, New York.

WASHBURN'S LAW LECTURES.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON,

Have Just Published,

LECTURES ON THE STUDY AND PRACTICE OF THE LAW.

Delivered in the Law School of Harvard University.

BY EMORY WASHBURN, LL.D.,

Author of "A Treatise on the American Law of Real Property," and "A Treatise on the American Law of Easements and Servitudes."

Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL.

It is one hundred years since the Oil House of Chas. Pratt was established. May their celebrated Astral Oil be used for one hundred years to come. If the past is any index of the future, such will be the case.

THE NEXT

GENERAL CONVENTION.

THE CHURCHMAN will furnish, week by week, during the next General Convention, a full report of its proceedings. In addition to this, and on account of the very great interest attaching to the Debates of the Lower House, the Messrs. M. H. Mallory & Co. will publish, during the Convention, a DAILY EDITION of THE CHURCHMAN, at Baltimore. It will contain a complete report, verbatim, of the Debates in the House of Deputies, Committee Reports, Sermons, etc., made by D. F. Murphy, Chief of Official Corps of Reporters of the U. S. Senate, and his Assistants.

THE CHURCHMAN,

DAILY EDITION,

will be mailed each morning to persons subscribing for the same, and making a prepayment of $1 50.

Bound volume, on superior paper, $5; one copy daily and a bound volume, $6; four copies sent to any address and a bound volume, $10.

Postage on Daily paid by subscriber at office where received. Address immediately,

M. H. MALLORY & CO., Hartford, Conn.
713 Broadway, New York.

VAN NOSTRAND'S

ECLECTIC ENGINEERING MAGAZINE,

VOL. V., No. 4, OCTOBER,

NOW READY.

CONTENTS:

The Mont Cenis Tunnel; The Heat-Restoring Gas Furnace; On the Gaseous and Liquid States of Matter (Illustrated); Boiler Explosions; Narrow-Gauge Railways; Submarine Rock Surveying (Illustrated); Public Monuments; Through the Euphrates Valley; The Manufacture of Russia Sheet Iron; The Distribution of Temperature in the North Atlantic; Nitro-Glycerine Test; Traction of Road Steamers (Illustrated); Towle's Spider for Driving Piles in Deep Water (Illustrated); The Half-and-Half Style of Modern Architecture; The Keokuk and Hamilton Bridge; The Timbering of Trenches and Tunnels applicable to Railway and Sewerage Works; The East River Bridge; Shifting Stuff; Boiler Explosions; The Coining of Gold; What is Steel? Curves upon Railways; Turbine Fluid Meter (Illustrated); India Rubber vs. Iron Tires; Narrow-Gauge Railroads; Stone Caissons (Illustrated); The Building Arts of Russia; Telegraphy—The Pneumatic Tube System; Transmission of Power by Wire Ropes; Plaster-of-Paris Manufacture; Steam on Common Roads (Illustrated); On Style in Architecture; Practical Electricity; Ransome's Stone for Caissons; Military Railway and Bridge Building.

PARAGRAPHS—Iron and Steel Notes; Railway Notes; Ordnance and Naval Notes; Engineering Structures; New Books; Miscellaneous.

TERMS—Published in monthly numbers of 112 pages, at $5 per annum. Single numbers, 50 cents.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
No. 23 Murray Street and No. 27 Warren Street.

JUST ISSUED.

PRICED CATALOGUE OF RARE

AND

VALUABLE BOOKS

Relating to Shakespeare and the Drama, American History, Biography, Poetry, etc., for sale by

T. H. MORRELL (Agent),
78 Nassau Street, New York
(Between Fulton and John Streets).

☞ Catalogue sent free on application.

THE GREATEST LITERARY TREASURE IN AMERICA.

GEORGE TAWSE is prepared to treat with Public Libraries, or Gentlemen of Taste, for the sale of

ROBERT BURNS'S OWN COPY OF SHAKESPEARE'S WORKS,

AND

ROBERT BURNS'S OWN COPY OF BLIND HARRY'S SIR WILLIAM WALLACE.

Both works belonged to "THE IMMORTAL POET," and bear his manly autograph. "The Shakespeare" is in 8 vols. 12mo, Edinburgh, 1771, and was presented to Burns by Dr. Blair, the editor. "The Wallace" is in 3 vols. 16mo, bound in 1 vol., Perth, 1790, and was subscribed for by Burns, and bears his name among the subscribers. It is confidently asserted that no Literary Treasure of equal importance has heretofore been offered for sale on this continent. He is prepared to sell both works in one lot. Offers will be received by

GEORGE TAWSE, Bookseller,
2 Dey Street, New York.

PUBLISHED THIS DAY:

I.

CHAPTERS OF ERIE, AND OTHER ESSAYS.

By Charles Francis Adams, Jr., and Henry Adams. 1 vol. 12mo, $2.

CONTENTS: A Chapter of Erie; The New York Gold Conspiracy; An Erie Raid; Capt. John Smith; the Bank of England Restriction; British Finance in 1816; The Legal Tender Act; The Railroad System.

This volume contains papers of remarkable power, thoroughness of research, and great value to persons who desire to be fully informed regarding some of the most important corporate and financial questions that perplex statesmen and more or less concern every American citizen. Its great merits, its pungent satire, the adroitness with which it pierces railway and financial shams, and its vigor and transparency of style, render this one of the most noteworthy books of the year.

II.

THE ENGLISH NOTE-BOOKS

OF NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

Illustrated Library Edition. 1 vol. 12mo. With Illustrations. Very handsomely bound and stamped. $2.

This is the sixth volume of the Illustrated Library Edition of Hawthorne's Works, which has been received with marked favor by the press and the public. Speaking of the English Note-Books, the London News remarks:

"They are the productions of an admirable intellect, a thoughtful, sensitive, reverential soul, and a character which casts its own quaint lights and shadows on all it noted in the world of humanity, of nature, and of art. Hawthorne seems to have gone to all the chief places of interest in England, Wales, and Scotland, and his vivid powers of word-painting and singular depth of metaphysical insight are apparent throughout."

III.

AURORA LEIGH.

BY ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

1 vol. 16mo. Diamond Edition, $1. Red-Line Edition, with Illustrations, $3 50.

These editions of this masterpiece of Mrs. Browning, whose place in the front ranks of the great poets of this century is undisputed, are published by special arrangement with Mr. James Miller of New York. They are uniform with the compact and widely popular Diamond and Red-Line editions of Whittier, Longfellow, Tennyson, Lowell, etc., published by Messrs. James R. Osgood & Co.

For sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. Sent post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers,

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO.,

BOSTON.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1871.

The Office of The Nation has been removed to No. 5 Beekman Street.

The Week.

THE New York State Republican Convention has met at Syracuse, and resolved and nominated, but has not succeeded in restoring harmony between the two contending factions in this city, which it was fondly hoped it would do. Both sent delegations to the convention, and a compromise was looked for by which both would be admitted to seats, but the difficulties—insurmountable, as they afterwards proved—in the way of this were foreshadowed by what occurred at the door of the hall on the first morning, when the Custom-house party being in possession of the building, and making some difficulty about throwing the doors open to some delegates of the other side, a smart rap with a wooden mallet was returned with a blow from a chair, and a general mêlée thereupon followed, in which the legs of adjacent tables, broken up for the purpose, were used as weapons, and which ended by the interference of the police. Indeed, the police played a somewhat prominent part on the occasion, having been called on to restore order on the platform once, and, subsequently, to defend it against a storming-party from the body of the hall. Mr. Andrew D. White, President of Cornell University, was chosen chairman, with the support of the Conklingites, and his rulings greatly disgusted the other side; and, finally, all hope of reconciliation was destroyed by Mr. Conkling's successful opposition to a proposition to admit both the contending delegations, with a half-vote to each delegation, and to direct the State Committee to perfect the organization of the party in New York, as a substitute for the report of the Committee on Contested Seats, which declared that the organization established by the State Committee in this city (the Custom-house or Conklingite Committee) "was the regular and only Republican organization." When this proposition was rejected, the Fentonites bolted, and went to another hall, where they bore their testimony in a frank way against the enemy, Tom Murphy receiving a fair share of attention. The Tribune announces, however, that they accept the platform, and will support the nominations.

The platform warmly commends the Administration of General Grant for its reconstruction policy, its Indian policy, its financial policy, and for, "by considerate investigation, making worthy efforts for the elevation and reform of the civil service," and for the treaty with Great Britain; views "with horror and grief" the "astounding revelations of fraud" in New York City, and furiously denounces the Tammany Ring, for the existence of which it holds the Democratic party responsible, and accuses it of seeking to extend the same régime over the whole Union; promises, on behalf of the Republican party, to try and "achieve a triumph over corruption and fraud;" calls on Congress to reduce taxation, to adopt that remarkable and well-known species of tariff which shall yield the needed revenue with the least injury to the people, at the same time "affording protection to our own, rather than to foreign manufactures;" approves of the Act of Congress for the regulation of elections, and calls for a new registry law; calls for "wholesome legislation," "fostering relations and conditions favorable to the proper payment of labor;" claims for local majorities the right to prohibit as well as to license the liquor traffic; approves of cheap and speedy transportation, and, therefore, of low tolls on canals; congratulates the party on the results of the late elections; adjures in favor of harmony. The only allusion to civil-service reform is amusingly mild and non-committal. Many of the members of the convention are indeed not willing to go beyond considerate investigation in the direction of reform. The important offices for which nominations have been made this year are the Attorney-Generalship and the Comptrollership. The selection of General F. C. Barlow for the former will give hearty satisfaction to all friends of reform. But it seems, to those who know him, very difficult for the brethren of the Custom-house to support him.

The Butler movement in Massachusetts came to a disastrous close at Worcester, on Wednesday, by the nomination of Mr. William B. Washburn by a majority of 607 to 460. Mr. Washburn is already well known as a member of Congress, and is a man of education and ability and experience, and is highly respectable in every way, and his selection is a worthy close to the late extraordinary struggle. It must be admitted, however, that Butler's success in securing nearly half the delegates, in such a State as Massachusetts, is not a pleasant subject of contemplation. The result is gratifying, but we hope the affair will not pass from people's minds without inspiring some wholesome reflections as to the tendencies of our politics and as to the character of public men. The last day at Worcester Butler became openly blasphemous and indecent, comparing himself to Jesus Christ, and his opponents to the persecuting Jews, and quoting Scripture profusely to an uproarious and congenial crowd. It ought not to be forgotten that this man was the "manager" whom the Republican party set to prosecute Andrew Johnson for "swinging round the circle," and he either introduced the article which arraigned Johnson for the ribaldry of his language, or laid great stress on it in the prosecution. He is not going to bolt.

The New York Times defends itself against the accusation of neglecting its duty in not assailing Murphy, on the ground that it does not believe the charges against him to be fully proved, and thinks him the victim of Fentonite hostility, and it insinuates that, on hearing this, we shall perhaps set it down as "a Custom-house organ" or "the hired advocate of Mr. Murphy." We shall do nothing of the kind. If the Times does not believe Murphy guilty, all we shall say is that we think its views of evidence are peculiar; but, as it now recommends Murphy to resign, as not "strong" enough for the position, we shall not dispute further with the Times about his qualifications for the position, or its own duty in the premises. We shall, however, take leave to observe once more, for the benefit of whom it may concern, that, as we see it, corruption is one and indivisible, and cannot properly be considered in sections as Republican or Democratic, State or Federal. All thieves, too, are brethren—members of one great family. Or, to vary the simile, Tweed and Murphy grow on the same soil, and are manured from the same heap. We do not think, whatever we may "seem to think," "all will go well" if Murphy be turned out of office. All will never go well while the Administration is in a state of mind about the civil service which makes possible the selection of such a man as Murphy for such a place as the collectorship of this port. New York is a bad place, but it is not sunk so low that it does not contain scores of good Republican business men, of unblemished character, who would accept such a post, and do its duties honestly; and we shall never be content, and never cease to "growl" and be disagreeable, till this post is given to such men, with one instruction only—viz., to collect as large an amount of revenue as the law allows, with the least possible amount of vexation to importers and travellers, and the least possible cost to the Government. That such an expectation as this should seem extravagant, and that anybody entertaining it should be set down as "a millenarian," is a curious illustration of the state of mind we are getting into about politics. The Times ought not to make such a charge lightly, because we believe this is just the charge the erudite Hall makes against it. Many a time, we have no doubt, during the past year, the question has been asked at meetings of that august body, "the Board of Apportionment," "What under the sun" (this is not the precise expletive used, but is as near as we dare come to it) "has got into the New York Times?" In short, corruption in office is "the main question;" it is the sum of all villanies; as long as it lasts, no reform is possible, because if your public officers be knaves, you can neither get the laws faithfully executed, nor justice righteously administered, nor the revenue honestly collected or honestly spent.

The fact is—it may as well be stated plainly—there are many signs in the Republican party, some of which have been called out by this Murphy case, of the growth of the sectarian or denominational conscience, so well known in ecclesiastical and other organizations, which judges acts rather by their effect on the fortunes of the party or order than by any moral standard, or in other words, places the means higher than the end. It has in various ages and countries made drill more important than victory, the order or church more important than religion, the party more important than good government, the office more important than the duty, and so on. There seems to be, just now, a general consensus in the Republican party as to the propriety of Murphy's resigning or being dismissed, but anybody who looks through the Republican papers will be startled, if not entertained, by finding how much more frequently he is inveighed against as a source of weakness to the party than as a swindling contractor filling a great financial post. One paper—a pious one, and very friendly to the President—asks for Murphy's dismissal on the simple ground that it is not worth while to alienate Mr. Greeley by keeping him, and it is amazing how many very good men one meets who look on the charges against him as simply incidents in a faction fight—and the principal question concerning them not, Are they true? but, Are they made out of spite? We believe this is a bad state of things, which promises disaster. When a party or church becomes a crust in this way, something, we may rely on it, is going to happen. There are not many men or women in America who, after denouncing Haggerty for stealing vouchers, can turn round, and, with a perfectly calm face, contemplate the virtuous Murphy collecting customs, after having suborned witnesses, bribed police officers, and made away with standard hats. Most of them are sure to weep or blush, and "growl," and the Administration will therefore do well to let Tom go. Seeing that Mr. Grinnell was dismissed without even the courtesy of notice, the eternal fitness of things would seem to require that Tom's departure should be marked by some signal token of Executive indignation, but no one will insist on that. It is worthy of note that every Democratic Senator voted for his confirmation, and it would be interesting to know whether they received any hint on the subject from that pious body, the New York "Board of Apportionment."

The movement against the Tammany Ring has made, on the surface at least, a good deal of progress during the week. Sufficient evidence has been collected touching the Mayor's endorsement of the warrants under which so much money was stolen by Garvey, Ingersoll, and others, to lead Judge Barrett, acting for the Committee of Seventy, to apply for a warrant against him for a misdemeanor, but at this writing the Justice had contented himself, out of respect for Hall's office, with sending him notice to appear, promising a warrant in case he disobeyed. Hall is more likely to come to grief than any of the others, or likely to come earlier to grief, partly owing to his want of any personal following, and partly to his light-headedness, not to say silliness, which is so great as to make his success, even in New York politics, somewhat difficult to understand. He has in him, judging from his career in the mayoralty, the stuff of a smart but rather flippant reporter for a second-rate newspaper, and yet he has managed to be District-Attorney, and finally Mayor, apparently without much trouble. He has been the charlatan or mountebank of the Ring, who amused the populace outside, while the real managers were working the machinery inside. His moral condition may be guessed from the fact that he has boasted before a crowded audience that, when District-Attorney, he "never could find time" to prosecute indictments for violations of the license law, and his mental calibre from his wearing a green coat on St. Patrick's day, and his informing the Comptroller, first, that he could not remove him, but wished he would resign; next, that he (the Comptroller) had done what was tantamount to resignation, and that he would therefore appoint his successor; but, to make sure that he had resigned, he would still remove him. He will, apparently, not prove very wild game.

The hardest nut to crack is Tweed, who is really able, and bold, not only by temperament, but through long impunity, and is reported to believe, and probably does believe, that the reformers dare not touch him. He has violated Barnard's injunction, and the pending application for an attachment for contempt will bring about a curious crisis. Tweed is, in the meantime, spreading wonderful stories of what will happen if the pursuit of him is persisted in. Thirty thousand of his maddened followers, of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and other orders and associations, are to rise, clap the Committee of Seventy in jail, drive the militia into the mountains, and sack the houses of Orangemen and reformers, and hold New York against the Union in arms, and realize their "social ideal," as the Communists say. Other people in the city, however, would like to realize another "social ideal," in which the Ancient Order have no place, and we would advise the members to keep quiet. The business of denouncing corruption in the abstract has been reduced to an absurdity by the passage of resolutions against corruption at a Tweed meeting.

Perhaps the most cheering fact in city politics is the election of a set of Democratic delegates to the Rochester Convention such as have not left this city for many years, as regards standing and character. They are headed by Charles O'Conor as chairman, who emerges for this occasion from well-won and honored repose. Their departure was preceded by a meeting at which Tammany was savagely denounced. The Ring, which, since Connolly's defection and Hall's collapse, may be said to consist of Sweeny and Tweed only, is also sending up delegates of its own; but it seems nearly certain that they will be refused admission. We hardly do them injustice in asserting that, though all of them are probably not liable to criminal prosecution, there is hardly one whom a term in the penitentiary would not improve. In the meantime, great crowds of roughs are going out on free passes by the Erie road, and Tweed goes with them.

Mr. Boutwell has started on a tour to the West, and has delivered a speech at Cincinnati in explanation and defence of his financial policy which was listened to with a great deal of interest, and deservedly so, for it contained a very singular confession. After the usual defence of his policy of paying off the debt, which is readily defensible, because it has undoubtedly improved the national credit, though at enormous cost in other ways, he comes to explain the mode in which he has disposed of "the new loan" to the Syndicate, about which, as we said some weeks ago, an explanation was needed. The laws (of 1869 and 1870) under which Mr. Boutwell acts, provide two things as clearly as language will allow: 1. That the interest-bearing obligations of the United States shall not be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at the time other obligations bearing a lower rate of interest shall be salable at par in coin; 2. That no increase shall be made in the bonded debt of the United States, except by the issue of certain four, four and a half, and five per cent. bonds at par, to be applied to the redemption of the six per cents, minus a half per cent. for expenses. The Secretary has now confessed, with great naïveté, at Cincinnati, that he has issued $200,000,000 of five per cent. bonds to the Syndicate, to be paid for in three months, the bonds all the while drawing interest—that is, the Syndicate is to pocket three months' interest, which is one and one quarter per cent.—and the Government takes the risk, which we admit is small, of the money being forthcoming at the appointed time. This whole transaction is in direct violation of the law. It is in reality, for the time being, an illegal increase of the bonded debt, or, supposing the increase to be legal, it is made at an illegal and unauthorized cost. Now, how does the Secretary justify himself? Why, by a calculation of the saving which the Government will have effected by the transaction at the end of ten or twenty years, if all goes well. This is literally true, supposing him to be correctly reported. It is difficult to believe, in the face of such an avowal, that Mr. Boutwell has any adequate sense of his situation. Whatever be the fate of the new loan, we trust Congress will not allow such an extraordinary disregard of the law of the land to pass unnoticed. Of course, if the Secretary can let the Syndicate have Government bonds on credit for three months, he can for six, or for a year. There is no limit to such an abuse, and it might become, in the hands of men less honest than Mr. Boutwell, a very shocking abuse. While upon this subject, we should like to ask whether the foreign banking business of the Government has not been put into "politics"? whether it has not been given to the house which now holds it as a reward for political services? and whether we shall not hereafter witness the extraordinary spectacle of the foreign bankers of the United States "rotated" by each new Administration, and the business given to whatever banker makes the largest donations to the campaign fund and is most active for the party?

Senator Schurz's appearance south of Mason and Dixon's line, as it used to be the fashion to say, has caused him to be regarded as a sort of deliverer by the disfranchised whites, and by all others who are suffering under carpet-bag misrule. His speech at Nashville elicited a remarkable letter of thanks from some seven hundred Confederate soldiers, and, when the report of it reached Texas, emboldened thirty of her citizens to lay before him at great length, and yet perforce incompletely, the story of the State's hardships under reconstruction. The opening portion of this document is pitched on rather too high a key to attract the attention which it merits, but the rest is much more moderate in tone, and is carefully supported by evidence. Passing over the five years of military rule upon the close of the war, the first grievance alleged is the unfair election of the present Governor, Davis, over the rival candidate, Gen. A. J. Hamilton, who, as favoring a general amnesty, received the votes of the Democrats, who had no candidate of their own. The Legislature owed its political complexion to the same unfairness, and embraced "several illiterate colored men, and a considerable number of unknown adventurers from other States, largely chosen by pandering in various disreputable ways to the ignorance of the colored population, then for the first time admitted to the ballot." This body, chosen under the constitution for "two years from the day of general election," or from November 30, 1869, sat twice in provisional and regular sessions in 1870, and then passed a law making the first annual session begin in January, 1871, thus extending their term of office a whole year. The legislation of the past two years we cannot here review in detail, but may say in sum that the governor is invested with a power of appointment such as no Northern governor dreams of; that he is the head of a State police created by himself, numbering commonly "48 officers and 210 privates," but capable (especially at election times) of being swelled by 2,620 special police, the whole force costing $456,720, "equal to the largest sum ever required for the entire expenses of the State for any one year before the war." While the population has increased less than a third since 1860, the taxes have grown from $470,000 to $7,000,000. Directly or indirectly, the governor appoints 9,538 persons to places of honor, trust, and profit, including 5,106 school-teachers, examiners, etc., "in the selection of not one of which, excepting the governor, have the parents or people of the State any voice whatever." "Elections are only allowed at county seats, requiring thousands to ride from twenty to forty miles, first to register and then to vote"; and an act professedly to ensure the purity of the ballot-box forbids these travelling voters to remain at the county seat after they have cast their votes, and makes all gathering in numbers at or near the county seat presumptive evidence of intent to intimidate voters. In a word, it is enough to say, on this head, that whatever justification there may be for these election regulations, they would not be tolerated in any part of the North. Finally, the governor is authorized at any time to proclaim martial law—he has done so in two counties in the past six months—and institute military commissions.

The masters and workmen at Newcastle-on-Tyne have not yet reached any settlement of their difficulties. Both parties are contending furiously in the press, and it is difficult to make out on which side the greater responsibility lies, but it appears to be quite certain that the first overtures of the men, looking towards arbitration, or friendly discussion, were peremptorily and rudely rejected. The dispute is over an hour, and Mr. Potter, a prominent workingman's champion, has suggested a compromise by splitting it, and making nine hours and a half the day's work, on condition that, when the men work overtime, the tenth hour is to be paid for at regular wages only. All attempts at compromise or arbitration have, however, thus far failed. The masters are prosecuting some of the foreign hands whom they had imported, and who have deserted, for breach of contract, and have had a few sent to jail, which does not tend to restore harmony.

One of M. Thiers's minor troubles with the Germans, which has caused a great deal of comment and some apprehension, has passed away. The army of occupation has now completely evacuated the Department of Oise, one of the four departments yielded to the French on the payment of the third half-milliard of the war indemnity—after having halted in its eastern cantons, around Compiègne and Crépy, for a number of days beyond the anticipated term. The delay, we now hear, is attributed by General Manteuffel to a misconception of orders; but, excused as it was before on the ground of the acceptability of some of the French drafts not having been fully ascertained, it was probably intended to give some additional weight either to Count Arnim's complaints of maltreatment to which German residents were here and there subjected in France, or to Bismarck's objections to the modifications introduced by the National Assembly in the recently negotiated Alsace-Lorraine customs treaty. The point in the amendments chiefly obnoxious to the German Chancellor is reported to be the one demanding the same tariff immunities for French manufactures in Alsace-Lorraine as are to be accorded the manufactures of these provinces in France. According to last reports, M. Thiers has abandoned the article in question, and all difficulties in the way of the ratification of the treaty are considered overcome. But as the National Assembly is not in session, and its law, expressly passed for the purpose, authorizes the President only "to ratify a treaty in conformity with the conditions prescribed" in the act, we cannot exactly see how the ratification is to be carried out without a stretch of powers such as not only French public opinion but Bismarck himself must find rather exorbitant. The eagerness, however, which the French Executive has evinced in smoothing the way for the acceptance of the treaty by the Assembly renders it almost certain that, if the German Chancellor only raises no objection, Thiers will not hesitate to take the responsibility of a bit of usurpation the immediate result of which is to be the deliverance of a number of French departments from the presence of the hated foreigners seven months before the term fixed by the treaty of Frankfort.

Things look rather confused in Cisleithan Austria. The elections for the diets of the provinces whose anti-ministerial assemblies were dissolved, about two months ago, by the Hohenwart Cabinet, have resulted in what may be claimed as a victory both by the German or Liberal party—the defenders of the Cisleithan constitution as it is—and their allied Slavic and Clerical opponents, the Federalists. The reason is, that the Constitutionalists have achieved splendid triumphs in some of the provinces, and made a gallant fight in the others, but have not carried a number of elections sufficient to prevent the cabinet from obtaining a two-thirds majority in the Reichsrath, in case the Czechs of the Bohemian Diet determine—against their former resolutions—to join the other non-dissolved diets in sending representatives to that central assembly, in order to complete the number of votes requisite for the modification of the constitution, so long and so uncompromisingly urged by themselves. In Lower Austria, which includes the Imperial capital, Vienna, in Carinthia, Styria, and Silesia, the success of the Constitutionalists was overwhelming, and they also triumphed in Salzburg; but they were badly defeated in Moravia, Tyrol, and Upper Austria. Although victorious in the provincial elections in the proportion of seven to four, they will stand in the Reichsrath in a minority of no more than five to eight, even if Bohemia refuses to attend that assembly, and Moravia—now also under the control of the Czechs—follows her example. The situation is thus highly complicated, and it seems equally difficult for Hohenwart to proceed with firmness in the prosecution of his federalistic attempts against the powerful and passionate opposition of the Germans, and for Francis Joseph to dismiss him in the face of a two-thirds majority in the provincial assemblies in favor of federalism.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM IN THE PARTY PLATFORMS.

We expect, or at least hope, that there will come into power some day or other a party which will not only reform the civil service, but will also reform the official language in which parties are in the habit of expressing themselves at conventions. There is nothing in American literature, and indeed in the literature of any other country, which can approach an average "platform" in inflation, vagueness, exaggeration, and general air of insincerity and humbug; and, indeed, nobody who formed a bad opinion of the moral character of "managers" from their preambles and resolutions would have much difficulty in justifying himself. The model of them all is evidently the old editorial article of forty years ago; there is nothing in the newspapers of our time, except the descriptive work of some reporters, which bears any resemblance to it. The average newspaper article of our day, though despised by purists, and generally slipshod and slangy, has the great merit of terseness and directness and clearness. Its language is the language which men speak in everyday life when they want to transact business, and to get other men to believe them. One can argue powerfully in it, or denounce in it vigorously and effectively. A party platform generally reads as if it had been prepared partly as a joke and partly as an exercise of ingenuity, and the result is that each resolution is apt to be what may be called a "wind-bag," though we believe this term is more commonly applied to a certain class of orators and statesmen than to the productions of their gifted pens. The first thing which the composers of platforms have in view is not to omit expressing, or appearing to express, an opinion on each of the topics which are supposed most prominently to occupy the public mind, in order to prevent the enemy drawing damaging inferences from their silence; the second is to distinguish carefully between those topics on which it is safe to speak decidedly and boldly, those on which it is doubtful what had better be said, and those on which it is desirable that what is said should not be easily understood. The one topic on which all platforms on both sides speak decidedly is always, or nearly always, the Administration for the time being. It is a matter of course that the first resolution, or one of the first, shall either represent the President as a mixture of Solon and the Apostle Paul, or as a lazy and tricky fellow, whose sole object in getting into the White House was to gratify his bad passions and those of a parcel of disreputable companions. The principal features of his "policy" are, of course, praised or condemned with equal energy and decision, but always in inflated and loud-resounding periods, like those of the Pope's Encyclicals. After this, the work becomes very delicate, and needs caution. In three or four years after the war there was remarkable concord of opinion between the parties on the propriety of paying the pensions of the soldiers and sailors, though this was the only topic on which they ever did agree; and their proclamations of their determination to see these pensions paid were so frantic, that one always wondered involuntarily who the rascals were who were trying to have the pensions stopped, and wished they could be dragged to light. No exposure of them was, however, made; and during the last two years the omission of all mention of the subject in any platform seems to indicate that the danger, whatever it was, is over.

It is in dealing with questions on which, though not questions of practical politics, the minds of voters within the party are a good deal excited, and about which there is much division of sentiment, that the drafter of resolutions, however, shows most audacity—for ingenuity there is absolutely no field. For instance, in touching upon a foreign war, like the late Franco-German war, he cannot possibly take sides, so he boldly expresses his sympathy with each, and hints that he would be glad if both were to win. He praises the Germans for invading France, and the French for trying to drive them out, and openly confesses that, no matter how it ends, not only will he be delighted, but all will be well. The contending claims of labor and capital he treats in the same impartial way. He is always ready to declare himself eager for the independence of Ireland, and would, if any "capital" were to be made out of it, express a warm desire for the restoration of the Moorish kingdom of Grenada. Indeed, if a strong tide of immigration should ever set in from the Barbary coast, we should certainly witness this result.

There has probably no question come up of late which puzzles him so much as the question of civil-service reform. There has been hardly a platform drawn up by the Republicans, certainly within the last two years, which has not contained some allusion to it; and it must be admitted that the expressions of opinion on it become stronger and more decided every year; but it is very plain that the men who draw platforms have very little interest in the matter, and very little faith in the value or success of any such reform. The admission of any commendation of it into party resolutions is, indeed, simply a concession to public opinion, and a very remarkable one, on the part of a body of persons in whose eyes politics would lose all interest or attraction if any such reform were carried. To them, the game of politics consists wholly in a struggle between two parties for various Government offices. In this game, the questions of the day play a part, it is true, but only a subordinate part. They are used as a means of interesting the outsiders and getting them to vote, and as a means of testing the right of a party to dispose of the offices. In this State, for instance, there exists a feud of extraordinary fierceness in the Republican ranks. The two factions hate each other with a fervor which neither has ever felt towards the common enemy, yet not because they are divided on any question of public policy, but because the division of the Federal patronage between the two senators is not satisfactory. To suppose that the head men of either the Fentonite or Conklingite parties would be glad to have the offices taken away from both of them, is simply absurd. We might as well suppose that a pair of gamblers would be delighted to have somebody sweep the stakes off the table, and give them to a missionary society. Both gamblers would doubtless readily declare, if questioned, their interest in missionary societies, and, if flush of money, would contribute to their funds, but it would be ridiculous to take this as an indication that they thought all gambling should be done away with. There has probably been no period since the outbreak of the war, and no occasion in the history of this State except the outbreak of the war, when it was so important that the party should be united, as at the late Syracuse Convention. The questions to be taken up were of overwhelming interest, but the only question which really agitated the convention was whether Conkling or Fenton was to have the offices; and on that, and not on the question of city government, or the home and foreign policy of the Administration, it split.

The mention of civil-service reform in the platform which the Conklingite faction drew up after the others had gone, is a model in its way. They do not advocate civil-service reform in New York. We have not even got as far as that; they simply commend the Administration for "having by a considerate investigation made worthy efforts for the elevation and reform of the civil service." Now this is exactly what politicians would like the Administration to keep doing. If it will only persevere in striving for the reform of the service by "considerate investigation," but will never go beyond investigation, they will be well satisfied. It is, however, hardly necessary to criticise the modes of reforming the civil service advocated by a body of which Mr. Conkling was the leading member. Indeed, it requires a good deal of effrontery in him to be present at any meeting where any allusion is made to the subject, inasmuch as he is the head and front of whatever offences can be laid to the charge of the Administration on that score in this State. All that was needed to give the finishing touch to the scene was the appearance of Tom Murphy, to declaim on the propriety of "putting none but honest men in office."

We greatly fear—and we are very sorry to say it—that the principal effect of the proceedings of the convention on the public mind will be the diffusion and strengthening of the belief, already strong and widely spread, that reform is not to be looked for from one party any more than from the other, and that those who seek it must possess their souls in patience till the force of circumstances builds up a really reforming organization. The evils of the office-seeking, office-distributing system are more apparent in this State than elsewhere, and here we shall, therefore, probably have the first hearty movement towards a better state of things. Nowhere else is the political class so demoralized. A striking illustration of the extent to which this demoralization has gone is to be found in the history of the body of Republicans known to the readers of the New York Times by the not inappropriate designation of "Tammany thieves," but to a more charitable outside world as "Tammany Republicans," over whom the convention has split. The origin of this body, stripped of details, was really an attempt to provide this city with a non-partisan municipal administration, by a division of certain offices equally, or in certain proportions between both parties, the experiment being begun several years ago in the Board of Supervisors, and continued in various commissions created at Albany. Had there been no "spoils" attached to the offices—that is, if they furnished the holders with no means of "taking care of their friends"—the arrangement would in all probability have worked well. Human nature, when not assailed by temptation, is on the whole not a bad thing, and is in public life disposed to do well, for the mere sake of public applause. But every office-holder having "spoils" at his disposition, it was not very long before the two sets of politicians, who were expected to check and watch each other, came to a cordial understanding, and from log-rolling and jobbing together soon got to stealing together, and we believe that, on the whole, the Republicans have been worse, because more hypocritical, knaves than the Democrats. They both pass the day plundering and "receiving" around the City Hall, and then, in the evening, one party goes to one caucus or meeting and declaims in favor of the three constitutional amendments, while the other goes to another caucus or meeting and declaims against them. The whole arrangement reminds one of the manner in which the warring Italian Republics of the Middle Ages used to be served by the condottieri. The citizens in those days being rich, industrious, and comfortable, though hot-headed and quarrelsome, did not like fighting in the field. So they hired a lot of Toms, Bills, Dicks, Hanks, Charleys, Nats, Bens, and Rufes to do their fighting for them, and these worthies used to go out against each other in splendid array, and in two bands, each under the banner of its employers, and, after saying their prayers, would draw long swords and lay big spears in rest, and rush on, swearing and yelling furiously, and holding out fair promise of cruel slaughter. It was generally found, however, that, after a whole day's fighting, there would be no more casualties among them than usually attend a Fourth-of-July picnic. Now and then a man would be hurt by a fall, but generally the worst the citizens had to fear was the desertion of their whole army to the enemy—the Bills, and Toms, and Hanks of one side being generally very good friends with the Dicks, and Jacks, and Bens on the other, and being much more intent on getting their pay, and plundering the peasantry, than settling political controversies.

THE LESSONS OF THE BUTLER CANVASS.

It is a thing sad to reflect upon, but the world will probably never know the exact frame of mind with which Mr. Wendell Phillips, on the morning subsequent to the recent Worcester Convention in Massachusetts, meditated the proceedings therein of his friend, "the grim soldier of New Orleans." He must, indeed, have thought that a more melancholy spectacle had not often offended the eyes of gods and men. But a few days before, he of "the silver tongue" had kindled thousands into enthusiasm over the proprietor of "the one great, iron right hand," who was at once "the judge and executioner of the Republican party," and who, "instead of waiting, his eye taking in the future, flings away his chances, and comes out to lead the new enterprises of the coming epoch." All this egregious nonsense had been uttered by Mr. Phillips upon the 13th of September; upon the 27th of the same month, exactly a fortnight later, the Worcester Convention was held. "Grim soldiers" do not usually lead their followers into the enemy's camp, and there surrender them at discretion; men who "over the stagnant waters of office-holding wave a new idea" (whatever the process thus referred to may be), do not, we presume, ride that idea as a hobby until they think it may fail them, and then make haste to cut loose from it; men who "fling away their chances, and come out to lead the new enterprises of the coming epoch"—who say, "I represent this, or I die in the attempt"—these men do not bawl and bluster through the length and breadth of a commonwealth in order that they may more perfectly collapse when the pinch comes, and so leave the "new enterprise" to take care of itself.

It by no means needs to be said that we are no admirers of either Mr. Wendell Phillips or the labor-reform brethren of Massachusetts. We have hardly more sympathy with the extreme prohibition leaders, and, if anything, rather less with the female suffragists. Together, they certainly constitute a motley gathering. Their present discomfiture, however, bears with it a lesson which ought not to be lost upon better men. For years they have been sedulously laboring in Massachusetts to build up distinct political organizations, through which they might give practical effect to their peculiar ideas. They have claimed to constitute parties by themselves. They have voted for their own candidates, and elected their own representatives to the Legislature of the State. This year, however, they, as well as the Democrats, indulged in a "new departure." They all pinned their faith to a political charlatan, and through him sought, not to fight their own battles, but to take possession of another and distinct party organization. In their efforts to accomplish this they stuck at nothing. They systematically invaded primary meetings into which they had no right to come; they turned caucuses into mobs; they broke down all the barriers intended to secure the true representation of popular opinion; and the occasion only, and not the will, was lacking which prevented their breaking up the State Convention in a riot. And in what did it all result? The man of whom they sought to make a tool, but who, in truth, was making them his tools, utterly failed them at the decisive moment. All through his angry, boastful, blackguard canvass, he tolled them along with the fond belief that, failing their attempt to take possession of the Republican party for him, he would himself break from it and split it for them—that he would be their leader, even if to lead them he was forced for a time into that minority which constitutes the politician's Gethsemane. They trusted him and they followed him. How well they trusted him and how faithfully they followed him, no one needs to be told who at all watched that disgraceful canvass. A large minority of the voters of the old Puritan commonwealth gave conclusive proof that none of the famous election precincts of New York City could teach them anything as regards ballot-stuffing, repeating, or mob rule at elections in general. And so they tagged after their chosen representative into the convention. All through the proceedings of that convention they yielded him the obedience of dogs; they cheered to the echo his harlequin tricks; they adopted as their own all his gross breaches of decency and decorum; they were prepared either to force his nomination there or to bolt with him and nominate him elsewhere. They got their reward. When the decisive moment came, the wretched charlatan was as a reed shaken by the wind. He, "the grim soldier," the man of the "great, iron right hand," who had led them trustingly out of their own camp into that of the enemy, "to represent them, or die in the attempt," there surrendered them, while he himself clumsily dropped the rôle of "judge and executioner" in order to pass, as best he might, under the Caudine Forks of party discipline. So much for expecting a quack to do the work of a hero.

The good people of Massachusetts, however, no less than the motley crowd of blatherskite reformers, may draw a very significant, though somewhat alarming, lesson from the singular canvass they have just witnessed. They have had a very great deliverance, it is true, and may well be very thankful for it; but, at the same time, they had best look at the danger carefully, even if for the time it has ceased to threaten. What was the significance of this strange conflict? Was it, after all, anything less than the bold attempt of a thoroughly bad demagogue to take possession of the whole politics of the State, through the agency of its discontented factions? Was it not the organization, prematurely and under false colors, but still the organization of such a commune as America would now supply? No reflecting man will deny that it was this, and there are few who will not allow that it came dangerously near to success. Is it not matter for reflection with Massachusetts men that their State, young, prosperous, enlightened, wealthy withal, and as yet untried by adversity, should contain so many discontented elements, ready to the hand of the disorganizer?—elements to which the idea of a personal government, a government of men and not of laws, strongly commended itself, provided only that it was their Cæsar or their Cleon who governed.

Whence came these elements? They are not far to seek. Butler's strength throughout his canvass lay almost exclusively in the large manufacturing towns. Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill, Lynn, New Bedford, Fall River, Springfield, Fitchburg, and North Adams, all of them among the most thriving places in the State, either showed a united front in his favor or elected a majority of his supporters. The opposition to him, on the contrary, came in a very large degree from the small farming towns, sending but from one to three delegates, and lying away from the manufacturing centres. A close analysis of the list of delegates, and a very superficial review of the primary meetings, show conclusively that this was a clean-drawn struggle between the manufacturing and other operatives of the State, in combination with the Sentimentalist reformers of the Phillips school, on the one side, and the more well-to-do and observing classes, aided by the old New England yeomanry, which, up to this time, has constituted the moral backbone of Massachusetts politics, upon the other. Such a division at this time is very significant in the light of the figures of the last census. As we have had occasion more than once to notice in the Nation, the shrewd, hard-headed, stubborn New England farmer is rapidly disappearing. Amateur successors of the George B. Loring type by no means supply his place as the basis of a political structure. It is questionable whether, within the last five years, there is a single purely agricultural town in Massachusetts which has enjoyed more than a nominal increase; on the other hand, it is safe to say that of the 112 towns in the State which, during that period, have suffered an absolute decrease, nine out of ten are either agricultural or fishing towns. The recent canvass was, therefore, a contest between two forces, the one of which is slowly but surely declining, while the other is rapidly increasing. The whole policy of the State also necessarily looks towards this transfer of power. Massachusetts, as an agricultural community, has no future; railroads are killing it; and nothing but heavy protective duties upon the products of the rich soil of the West can save it. Indeed, between the "pauper labor of Europe" on the one hand, and the bottom lands of the Mississippi Valley on the other, the soul of the Massachusetts protectionist must be sorely perplexed. Meanwhile, materially, Massachusetts has but one policy to pursue. It must, as a community, fling itself heart and soul into the complete development of its manufacturing industries. This necessarily involves the rapid increase of the manufacturing population, and the speedy and total transfer of all political power to the manufacturing centres. The political tendencies of the population gathered at these centres should, therefore, constitute a very interesting subject of study to the Massachusetts philosophers.

In so far as they have been developed in the political campaigns of General Butler, these tendencies are far from reassuring. We had fondly hoped that a deep-seated admiration of "smartness," regardless of truth, character, courage, or decency, might be confined to Essex County. The recent canvass has indicated otherwise. It seems to be a criterion of political merit common to the New England manufacturing centres. While the citizens of Massachusetts, therefore, may well take pride in the good courage and prudent conduct which at the eleventh hour saved them from a very grave peril, it yet behooves them very seriously to consider the deplorably low condition of political morality which the events of the last two months have unmistakably revealed as existing throughout what is soon to be their controlling class. Having maturely considered this subject, they had best, while there is yet time, energetically bestir themselves in regard to it. Should they fail to do so, some demagogue bolder than Butler, and as unscrupulous, will yet illustrate to them the great difference which exists between popular institutions emanating from those who follow the sea and till the soil, and the same institutions in the hands of those who crowd the tenement-houses and workshops of manufacturing cities.

THE CRISIS IN THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The affairs of the Protestant Episcopal Church have been forced upon public attention during the last few years, and the dissensions which distract that body have been brought to light by complaints of oppression, appeals to public opinion, sensational and extravagant usages in worship, and public admonitions addressed to clergymen before large congregations. To a certain extent, of course, denominational quarrels affect only the limited circle in which they occur; but the present instance is made exceptional by the fact, which is patent to unbiassed observation, that these dissensions have their roots in those contrary and fundamental currents which are at present shaking the world of thought and speculation. The church in question, from the peculiarity of its constitution, embraces representatives of all the great tendencies now in motion, and its dissensions represent in miniature the confusion which reigns in religious matters in the world at large.

The history of the Anglican Reformation has been written from almost every imaginable standpoint. Every prepossession seems to be able to find support in the facts, if it looks for it. To an impartial student, this raises a strong presumption in favor of the view presented by the least partisan historians: that is, that that reformation was many-sided; that it did not proceed from any well-defined principle, but from expediency; and that the result was, therefore, neither simple nor consistent. The movement bore a political character throughout. It fluctuated according to political exigencies, and the final form was the resultant of a number of conflicting forces, no one of which gained a complete victory. The church was retained by the statesmen as an establishment; but, in so retaining it, they proposed to give it the form which suited their purposes. A number of noble and conscientious men were participants in the work; but no one of firm, self-poised, and commanding genius impressed any character on the movement. The aim of those in control was to make a national church—that is, to say, a church which should comprise all the religious parties and interests of the nation. All this tended to give the church, as finally constituted, the character of a compromise, and such it is in its essence. The Prayer-Book offers satisfactory forms to every phase of orthodox Protestantism, and to each phase also offers stumbling-blocks. Each must tolerate what it dislikes for the sake of having what it desires.

It is evident that a church so constituted has many important advantages. In theory, it is comprehensive. The first requisite for its satisfactory operation is toleration and charity. It discourages the bigotry, narrowness, and spiritual pride of sectarianism. It should encourage breadth and freedom of thought, and so become the nursing mother of science and speculation. However, a church must necessarily insist on sincerity and firmness of conviction, and it is a law which, in the present condition of human nature, holds good, that strength of conviction is always in the inverse ratio of the tolerant spirit. In fact, therefore, the only times at which the Anglican Church has worked smoothly have been the times when conviction was feeble. So soon as zeal, conscientiousness, and faith have revived, so soon has dissension arisen.

During the last fifty years there has been within it a remarkable revival of religious energy and conviction. Different parties have sprung up. Every tendency which has arisen in the world of thought has found representatives in this ecclesiastical body, who, while standing on the old traditions, have sought to establish a reconciliation with that higher and purer conception which we call truth. The parties whose strife has occupied public attention have had representatives who carried on the battle on the narrower ecclesiastical arena—all the more bitterly for the closeness of their relations. These parties have not been one or two in number, but several. Their powers are, at the present moment, well developed; their positions are well defined; their antagonism is thoroughly pronounced; and the crisis seems now to be impending. The question which presents itself is whether the external unity (love for which has long held the parties together) can any longer be maintained. The coming convention seems likely to form an epoch in the history of the church, from the bearing which its action or inaction will have on this question.

In spite of the parties which have been developed on one side and on the other, the majority of the members of this communion still maintain a position which they assert, with great show of justice, to be the traditional position of the Anglican Church. But when this position is examined according to modern standards, and according to the true idea of the functions of a church in these days, it must be said that, if this is the true position of the Anglican Church, then that body has survived its usefulness, and has no longer a reason for existing. The party in question are not puritanical in morals or rationalistic in dogma. They do not define or care for definitions. They hold propositions which they do not understand, or propositions which "mutually destroy each other," undisturbed by the inconsistency. They ignore questions of the highest moment with bland indifference to the consequences. They repeat formulæ which strike dully upon the ears of the uninitiated, and certainly make no impression on the minds of men of this generation. They turn to England for all their precedents and models, and import ecclesiastical rococo for the conversion of this raw American society. They introduce among us "cathedrals" and semi-monastic colleges, and elaborate and artificial ecclesiastical machinery. If they find themselves losing hold on the thought and intelligence of the day, they turn to "the poor," the children, and such adults as, by sheer exercise of the will, accept their premises, and drill these into functions in the ecclesiastical machine. They found schools in which they ape those details of dress and usage of English schools of which the English themselves would be only too glad to be rid. They flood the church with illiterate clergy, who easily become episcopal retainers, shield themselves behind any ecclesiastical shelter which promises protection to their weakness, and so fall easy prey to notions which seem to suit the meagre outfit of traditions with which they have been provided. Such a body as this appears, to one who is fairly informed as to the needs of this day and the subjects which are occupying the attention and subtly moulding the consciences of men, to be verily "up in a balloon." Its plan of offence is to dogmatize to men who may know little about the subject-matter, but who cut short discussion the moment they recognize dogmatism in the method by which it is conducted. Its plan of defence is to shorten the cords and strengthen the stakes of tradition, which is like shutting one's self up in a fortress and leaving the enemy to sap it at his leisure. The enemy is not far wrong, if this policy prevails, in trying his voice already for the pæan of victory, for his victory is inevitable. This body, however, possesses the majority; and those who are interested in the church can hardly look to it with much confidence for the practical wisdom which is necessary for such a crisis.

Around this main body are grouped the parties which, either in one direction or another, seek to accommodate the Anglican traditions to modern needs. The rationalizing tendency of the age, which infects all but those who are carefully shielded from contact with modern thought, leads men to define and circumscribe their position. They seek to know what they mean by the words they use, what are the mutual relations of the doctrines they receive, what is their bearing on the results of other investigations, and what are their logical results.

On one side, the Evangelical party, under the influence of this desire, sharpen and accentuate the branches of a dogmatic system. They desire to define theological terms with metaphysical exactness. On their premises, it is all-important to use theological terms correctly. They cannot consent to ambiguity, nor use ambiguous terms in a connection in which they may be misunderstood. No doubt it would show more strength and independence simply to maintain one's own definition while using traditional terms, and leave it to others to provoke a conflict, if there is to be one; but before the bar of enlightened opinion, the man who will not be careless, but insists on accuracy, deserves respect more than the easy-going who will not take the trouble, or the imbecile who is unable, to define.

On another side, another party also splits off from the traditional via media theology, and seeks clearness and precision, but it goes to find it in a supposed Catholic tradition which is wider and greater than the Anglican. This party sees already the shadow of the foe which the traditional theology is destined to meet in spite of any efforts. It shrinks back from the contest. It endeavors to reverse the stream of history. It turns back to one of the branches, and anxiously takes up again all which was then dropped as worn out. It denies the theory of progress, and insists on a theory by which the world's destiny is to feed continually on the husks of the past. It relies on the magical efficacy of unity, catholicity, antiquity, and obedience. It endows all with a poetical and romantic glow. In these things it finds cures for the ills which afflict this age, and prescribes them with the simple faith with which a mediæval practitioner would give his queer elixirs and nostrums. It is the reflex wave towards the lost mediæval theology which has never been wanting in the Anglican Church, and which rises higher as the hour for the decisive conflict between the traditional theology and rationalism approaches. This movement is like a retreat before the battle, and is a valuable negative testimony to the certainty that that conflict is approaching.

Another party holds to religion, not only as a beneficial social influence, but also as a blessing and duty of man. It accepts the dogmatic formulæ which are handed down by tradition, but insists that they are not now popularly understood as they were originally intended. It seeks the truth in a philosophical and critical form under the dogmatic formula. It thus stands on the tradition of the church, but insists on receiving and considering the testimony of science and speculation as to what is true. These men seek scientific and philosophical bases for the faith, and they test it by the criteria of reason and conscience, not of tradition. For them the traditional dogmas are open to revision and correction. They almost monopolize the scholarship of the church, which scholars in other departments would recognize as such, and they are the only party which recognizes the office of Biblical criticism, and perceives the immense influence which it must inevitably exert on religious opinion. Their position is, in many respects, weakest of all. It embraces the cleft which divides the modern world—the antagonism between science and faith. They would be content to use the church according to its original theory, and reconcile it to modern thought. They do not, therefore, contribute directly to the disruption of the church, but their toleration is called latitudinarianism; their tendency to philosophize and sublimate doctrine appears to change the contents of dogmatic expressions, and is called rationalism; and their willingness, under certain circumstances, to modify tradition, is regarded as treason to the faith. They contribute mightily to the disintegration, by the repulsion which they excite in all the other parties.

Already, various efforts have been made to revise the Prayer-Book by different parties, each seeking to suit itself exactly. Such a revision would be an actual disruption of the church, for if one party found nothing to condemn, and no longer needed to resort to private interpretations, other parties would no longer find anything to approve. To the increasing restlessness of the malcontents the majority has opposed, as yet, the stubborn refusal which seems to supply the only necessary element for an explosion yet wanting—the resisting force. There is a steady advance of hierarchical pretension, and a steady revolution from a constitutional to a monarchical organization. The Anglican Church has, in its theory, many most valuable elements of conservatism, which are among the chief needs of the time, but it is now in a crisis which requires all its strength to preserve its own integrity. If it should perish, or dwindle to a lifeless and dying sect, it would be an unquestionable loss to the community. It would also seem to prove that a church cannot tolerate dissent in the midst of itself, and that charity and strength of conviction are mutually destructive. That would indeed be a sad conclusion, and we could only wait and hope that at some subsequent time, in a higher state of enlightenment, sectarian narrowness would not be the only form in which religious faith could exist, but that men might be able both to entertain profound convictions and respect a difference of opinion in others.

QUEBEC.

II.

To make out the case for Quebec as regards its European tone, I should dwell on the light provincial flavor of the little residential streets. Here some of the houses possess a certain stale Frenchness of complexion, suggestive of dwellings that Balzac may have lodged novels in. They are chiefly built of stone or brick, with a stoutness and separateness of structure which stands in some degree in stead of architecture. I don't know that, externally, they have any greater charm than that they belong to that category of dwellings which in our own cities were long since pulled down to make room for brown-stone fronts. I don't know, indeed, that I can express better the picturesque merit of Quebec than by saying that it has not a brown-stone front in it. The greater number of houses are built of rough-hewn squares of stone, painted with frank chocolate or buff, and adorned with blinds of a cruder green than we admire. As you pass the low windows of these abodes, you perceive the walls to be of extraordinary thickness; the embrasure is of great depth; Quebec was built for winter. Door-plates are frequent, and you observe that these compact mansions are tenanted chiefly by a French bourgeoisie. Here and there before a door stands a comely private equipage—a fact agreeably suggestive of a low scale of prices; for evidently in Quebec one need not be a millionaire to keep a carriage, and one may make a figure on moderate means. The great number of private carriages visible in the streets is another item, by the way, among the Europeanisms of the place; and not, as I may say, as regards the simple fact that they exist, but as regards the fact that they are considered needful for women, for young persons, for gentility. What does it do with itself, this gentility, keeping a gig or not, you wonder, as you stroll past its little multicolored lodgments? You strive almost vainly to realize the life of this French society, locked up in its small dead capital, isolated on a heedless continent, and gradually consuming its principal, as one may say—its vital stock of memories, traditions, and routine. Its evenings must be as dull as the evenings described by Balzac in his "Vie de Province"; but has it the same ways and means of dulness? Does it play loto and écarté in the long winter nights, and arrange marriages between its sons and daughters, whose education it has confided to abbés and abbesses? I have met in the streets here little old Frenchmen who look as if they had stepped out of Balzac—quaint with Old-World lights and shadows, wrinkled with Old-World attitudes. Something assures one that Quebec must be a city of gossip; for evidently it is not a city of culture. A glance at the few booksellers' windows gives evidence of this. A few Catholic statuettes and prints, two or three Catholic publications, a festoon or so of rosaries, a volume of Lamartine, a supply of ink and matches, form the bulk of the étalage.

In the lower class of the French population there is a much livelier vitality. They are a genuine peasantry; you very soon observe it, as you drive along the pleasant country roads. Just what it is that makes a peasantry it is, perhaps, not easy to determine; but whatever it is, these good people have it—in their simple, unsharpened faces, in their narrow patois, in their ignorance and naïveté, and their evident good terms with the tin-spired parish church, standing there as bright and clean with ungrudged paint and varnish as a Nürnberg toy. One of them spoke to me with righteous contempt of the French of France—"They are worth nothing; they are bad Catholics." These are good Catholics, and I doubt if anywhere Catholicism wears a brighter face and maintains more docility at the cost of less misery. It is, perhaps, not Longfellow's "Evangeline" for chapter and verse, but it is a tolerable prose transcript. There is no visible squalor, no rags, no curses, but a most agreeable tinge of gentleness, thrift, and piety. I am assured that the country people are in the last degree mild and peaceable; surely, such neatness and thrift, without French petulance and hardness, is a very pleasant type of character. Without being ready to proclaim, with an enthusiastic friend, that the roadside scenery is more French than France, I may say that, in its way, it is quite as picturesque as anything within the city. There is an air of completeness and maturity in the landscape which suggests an old country. The roads, to begin with, are decidedly better than our own, and the cottages and farmhouses would need only a bit of thatch and a few red tiles here and there to enable them to figure creditably by the waysides of Normandy or Brittany. The road to Montmorency, on which tourists most congregate, is also, I think, the prettiest. The rows of poplars, the heavy stone cottages, seamed and cracked with time in many cases, and daubed in coarse bright hues, the little bourgeois villas, rising middle-aged at the end of short vistas, the sunburnt women in the fields, the old men in woollen stockings and red nightcaps, the long-kirtled curé nodding to doffed hats, the more or less bovine stare which greets you from cottage doors, are all so many touches of a local color reflected from over the sea. What especially strikes one, however, is the peculiar tone of the light and the atmospheric effects—the chilly whites and grays, the steely reflections, the melancholy brightness of a frigid zone. Winter here gives a stamp to the year, and seems to leave even through spring and summer a kind of scintillating trail of his presence. To me, I confess it is terrible, and I fancy I see constantly in the brilliant sky the hoary genius of the Climate brooding grimly over his dominion.

The Falls of Montmorency, which you reach by the pleasant avenue I speak of, are great, I believe, among the falls of the earth. They are certainly very fine, even in the attenuated shape to which they are reduced at the present season. I doubt whether you may get anywhere in simpler and more powerful form the very essences of a cataract—the wild, fierce, suicidal plunge of a living, shrieking flood. A little platform, lodged in the cliff, enables you to contemplate it with almost shameful convenience; here you may stand at your leisure and spin analogies, more or less striking, on the very edge of the white abyss. The leap begins directly at your feet, and your eye caresses dizzily the long, perpendicular shaft of foam, and tries, in the eternal crash, to effect some vague notation of its successive stages of sound, and fury, and destruction; but the vaporous sheet, for ever dropping, lapses from beneath the eye, and leaves the vision dizzy in mid-space; and the vision, in search of a resting-place, sinks in a flurry to the infamous sawmill which defaces the very base of the torrent. The Falls of Montmorency are obviously one of the greatest of the beauties of nature; but I hope it is not beside the mark to say, that of all the beauties of nature, "falls" are to me the least satisfying. A mountain, a precipice, a river, a forest, a plain, I can enjoy at my ease; they are natural, normal, self-assured; they make no appeal; they imply no human admiration, no petty human cranings, and shrinkings, and head-swimmings, and similes. A cataract is "sensational." You are certain, moreover, to have to approach it through a tourniquet, and to enjoy it from some terribly cockneyfied little booth. These present falls seem to be the private property of a negro innkeeper, who "runs" them evidently with great pecuniary profit. A day or two since I went so far as to be glad to leave them behind, and drive some five miles further along the road, to a village rejoicing in the pretty name of Château-Richer. The village is so pretty that you count on finding there the elderly manor which might have baptized it. But, of course, at the château-point the picturesque in Quebec breaks down: one must not ask too much of it. You enjoy from here, however, a superb revelation of the noble position of the city. The river, finding room in mid-stream for the long island of Orleans, opens out below you with a peculiar freedom and serenity, and leads the eye far down to where an azure mountain gazes up the channel, and responds to the dark headland of Quebec. I noted, here and there, as I went, an extremely picturesque effect. Between the road and the river stand a goodly number of ancient peasant-dwellings, with their back-windows looking toward the stream. Glancing, as I passed, into their hither casements toward the road, I saw, as through a picture-frame, their dark, rich-toned interiors, played into by the late river-light, and making an admirable series of mellow tableaux de genre. The little curtained alcoves, the big household beds, and presses, and dressers, the black-mouthed chimney-pieces, the crucifixes, the old women at their spinning-wheels, the little heads at the supper-table, around the big French loaf, outlined with a rim of light, were all as warmly, as richly composed, as French, as Dutch, as worthy of the brush, as anything in classic sketching-grounds.

I suppose no American can look at all these things, however idly, without reflecting on the ultimate possibility of their becoming absorbed into his own huge state. Whenever, sooner or later, the change is wrought, the sentimental tourist will keenly feel that a long stride has been taken, rough-shod, from the past to the present. The largest appetite in modern civilization will have swallowed the largest morsel. What the change may bring of comfort or of grief to the Canadians themselves, will be for them to say; but, in the breast of this sentimental tourist of ours, it will produce little but regret. The foreign elements of Eastern Canada, at least, are extremely interesting; and it is of good profit to us Americans to have near us, and of easy access, an ample something which is not our expansive selves. Here we find a hundred mementoes of an older civilization than our own, of different manners, of social forces once mighty, and still glowing with a sort of autumnal warmth. The Old-World needs which created the dark-walled cities of France and Italy, seem to reverberate faintly in the steep and narrow and Catholic streets of Quebec. The vague, indefinable presence of these things gives the town a palpable atmosphere, a rare physiognomy. The little houses achieve their quaint suggestions by rather inexpensive arts; the city-walls are coated with a sort of silvery innocence; but the kindly fancy, conscious of a general solidarity in the picturesque, ekes out the romance, and deepens the coloring.

SCENES AMONG THE BUTLERITES.

BOSTON, September 30, 1871.

THE cars which ran from Boston to Worcester at half-past five on Tuesday last were crowded with delegates to the convention; but any one who went up simply as a spectator had, of course, little opportunity to gain information as to the political intentions or desires of the passengers. With a single exception, no one seemed disposed to take many of those surrounding him into his political confidence. To be sure, that one exception made up for a great deal of reticence, as it consisted of a confidential communication made by a gentleman at the top of his voice, to the effect that the train was full of "Butler's shoulder-hitters," and that another gentleman, who sat near him, was one of them. As the individual in question was a large and powerful-looking man, the accusation had just enough probability in it to rouse the attention of every one, greatly to the amusement of the "shoulder-hitter," who, between his friends and his enemies, led a troubled life during the time of the convention. After being accused on Tuesday evening of being a Butler shoulder-hitter, he was, on Wednesday morning, arraigned by Butler before the convention for having said, in the hearing of some one, that rather than vote for Butler he would vote for John Quincy Adams. Except this charge, which no doubt was induced by a sincere though mistaken desire for reform, very little occurred on the journey to enliven the tedium of the polyphloisbœan car-wheels or to alleviate the heavy rattle of the rain. The storm, which had begun moderately enough, gradually increased in violence as we neared Worcester, and then providentially died away just before the cars ran into the station.

Far be it from me to weary your readers with a detailed description of the Bay State House or of the various "Headquarters" of the various candidates for the governorship. Suffice it to say that there was a Butler, and a Rice, and a Loring, and a Washburn headquarters. This gave—at least to the columns in the hall of the hotel, on which the notices were posted—a rather military appearance; an illusion which a visit to the interior of the headquarters themselves soon dissipated. On the walls of the hotel were posted placards announcing the latest returns of delegates; but, as the Butler returns invariably showed a majority in favor of the General, while the Anti-Butler returns showed exactly the reverse, we gladly fell back on those primitive intuitions which, in political matters, are always more valuable, as well as more interesting, than statistics. Those intuitions told us that Butler would be defeated, and yielded us an à priori satisfaction which, we must confess, those whom we met did not seem to share. The gloom which, on Tuesday evening, overshadowed the countenances of the Anti-Butler delegates was, no doubt, chiefly caused by the fact that no coalition had as yet been formed or seemed possible among the General's opponents, but no doubt it was also partly due to the wild rumors with which the industry of his supporters had filled the peaceful town of Worcester.

A town in which Butler is canvassing always bears a striking resemblance to the historic village of Eatanswill. I noticed this fact in the great Butler-Dana contest in 1868; it was so now in Worcester. Not only had the great chieftain, with rare sagacity, hired every hall in the town, to prevent the delivery of Anti-Butler harangues, but it was said that he "had under his control all the brass-bands of Massachusetts," and I think many of the delegates must have arrived in Worcester half-expecting to find a Butler Guard defending the approaches of the principal hotels. One rumor current in Boston had it that piles of combustibles had been accumulated under the hotels, which a word from Butler would fire. The curious in such matters may perhaps explain this as having arisen from another story, to the effect that a great Butler torchlight procession was ordered for Tuesday evening. The non-appearance of this procession, it was said, was owing to the state of the weather, though, as the rain stopped about seven, there were not wanting sceptical persons who attributed the fact to a different cause. However this may be, there is no doubt that a glorious Butler meeting took place in the evening in the hall in which the convention was to meet the next day, when Mr. G. A. Somerby, of the Boston bar, together with other gentlemen, including General Butler, exposed vice and corruption in all their hideous forms for the space of two hours, and with the happiest result; vice and corruption meeting throughout with no favor from the audience, while all allusions to truth and virtue elicited rounds of applause. It has not been sufficiently noticed by those who accuse General Butler of appealing invariably to low motives that throughout this late campaign he has made almost as much use of good as of bad ones, to say nothing of his manly stand against intemperance. In none of his speeches has he failed to hold up to public scorn and loathing the rapacity of capitalists, battening on the toil of the poor, the corruption of the political class, the infamy of Rings. Indeed, Mr. Somerby declared that the General was waging in Massachusetts the same good fight against the "Boston Ring" which New York is carrying on against Tweed, Hall, Sweeny, and Connolly. Remembering, also, the catholic principle of welcoming sinners into the fold, he has not only denounced wickedness, he has willingly forgiven the wicked, thereby swelling the number of his followers, strengthening the cause of virtue, and not a little increasing his own reputation for magnanimity—which, perhaps, reached its highest point when he lately appeared at an anti-corruption meeting in Hyde Park arm-in-arm with the former president of the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad, Mr. J. S. Eldridge.

On the night before a convention, rooms are obtained, if at all, through political influence, and, not having much weight in the Butler ranks, my friend and I determined, if possible, to form a combination to further our selfish ends in the Anti-Butler party. In this we thought we had succeeded on receiving from the hotel clerk a ticket for a room in a neighboring house. The room, however, having been sold twice, once to the hotel, and then to a gentleman whom we found in bed, expecting, as he told us, another gentleman shortly, the ticket was not of much service; nor was a second ticket, directing us to a second house; and we had almost made up our minds to spend the night on the appropriate "headquarters" floor, when the hospitality of a citizen of Worcester relieved us of our embarrassment. The prevailing impression at midnight was that Butler would succeed.

This impression was strengthened in the morning. As I did not go into the hall in which the convention sat till the afternoon, I can only speak from hearsay, but all the Anti-Butler men whom I saw were very doubtful of the result. Outside the convention, the scene was enlivened by the sale of poems and tracts in the Butler interest, while here and there knots of men discussed the latest news from inside. Meeting a gentleman of color whom I knew very well, I asked him whether he was a delegate. "No," he said, "not a delegate; I came to look on." "Which of the candidates has the best chance?" "Oh! Butler; he is sure to win." "I hope not." "Well, sir, I hope he will; General Butler has done a great deal for this country, and he hasn't been paid enough for it yet." Leaving my friend, I went towards the door of the convention, and purchased a Butler poem, a few verses of which I quote—not so much for their poetical merits, as because they had about them a strangely foreign, anti-American, unrepublican flavor:

> "We've been ruled by the Rings, and been choked from our choice,
> But we're up, and we're free, and at last giving voice!
> We'll have for our leader the man that we've tried,
> Who all of his lifetime has fought on our side.
> He's the friend of the people, the prop of the poor,
> Wherever he goes no oppressor's secure.
> Fair play for us all, and no more, is his game,
> And he'll have what he wants, for Ben Butler's his name!"

As I read, the applause from the hall came back like a ghostly echo. For the moment we were in Europe—the many and the few; the poor and the rich, the oppressor and oppressed; the demagogue and his dupes. The old sad story, handed down with curses and groans and tears from generation to generation; the story of misery and wrong that we boasted was for ever ended—was it indeed enacting itself again, and in Worcester, Massachusetts?

But sentiment of this kind was entirely out of place—in the first place, because there was no one on the ground who would have readily appreciated allusions to Cleon, the leather-dresser, or the island of Sphakteria, and in the second place, because I had not yet succeeded in obtaining admission to the hall. After some difficulty I was admitted by the State Central Committee to the floor of the convention, where I had an excellent opportunity of observing the proceedings, which, notwithstanding the peculiar tactics of General Butler, were of the most orderly character throughout. This was, no doubt, due to the organization. The chairman, Hon. G. F. Hoar, presided with great dignity and vigor, while his brother, the late Attorney-General, who was placed at the head of the committee on credentials, gave the report of that body a weight which even Butler himself was obliged to respect. The Advertiser makes a serious mistake when it attributes Butler's defeat to the character of the candidates opposed to him. It was not those candidates, but the men behind them, who defeated him. If it had lain with Rice, Jewell, Loring, and Washburn to defeat him, he would have been now the nominee of the convention. None of them has a tithe of the native force of their rival. Loring is a hack politician, Rice and Jewell are respectable men, without any particular qualities of any kind, and Washburn, though no doubt superior to Loring and Jewell, is still a commonplace man enough.

But there were men in the convention who really had strong intellects and characters, and who were sent there by people who were determined that the honor of Massachusetts should not be stained by the intrusion into the highest office of the State of a man like Butler; it was these men who defeated him. The convention contained a number of men who rarely go to conventions, and who, when they do, go there with very different purpose from that of pulling wires or log-rolling.

Almost all day was occupied in waiting for the report of the committee on credentials; nothing could be done, of course, until the question of contested seats was settled. Meantime General Butler and his friends were not idle. On the reassembling of the convention at three o'clock, after a recess, handbills were to be found in every seat containing the latest news as reported by the Butler party, couched in terms well calculated to fire the hearts of delegates:

THE SHAMBLES

OF THE GOOD OLD

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS!

The Rice leaders offered to sell their delegates to Gen'l Butler—the price, the Lieutenant-Governorship. This Gen'l Butler declined.

They sold to Washburn!!!

Berkshire buys Boston for a mess of pottage.

Will these delegates be the sheep of the new Brighton Market?

These hand-bills, however, fell short of the mark perhaps, because all eyes and ears were fixed on the principal object of interest in the convention—General Butler himself. Sitting as a delegate from Gloucester, he led his party through all the proceedings, not omitting the least details, such as the act of voting, when he walked across the platform, and deposited his ballot for General B. F. Butler, to the great delight of several of the delegates, who evidently thought that "the great American joke" had at last reached its climax. Pacing up and down on the floor, or mounting the platform, sitting restlessly in his seat with his eye fixed on the chair, interrupting, approving, debating, haranguing, he kept himself throughout "in evidence," from the time when he forced the convention to admit the "people of Massachusetts" to the galleries, to the time when, after the final vote, he "bowed to the people's will," and withdrew from the canvass. His appearance has been so often described that it is unnecessary to say anything about it, except that, on comparing him with the body of the convention, an impartial spectator was forced to admit his great superiority over the rank and file in sheer force of intellect and will. The body of the convention, with such exceptions as we have alluded to above, was a very mediocre-looking set of men—a body which looked as if it had been selected by lot from the male inhabitants of Massachusetts, after a preliminary exclusion of all persons tainted with the higher education. Most political conventions which I have seen have more resembled flocks of some strange new animal than assemblages of individual men. In the words of the poet,

"The individual dwindles, and the Whole is more and more."

Butler stood out distinct from the common herd. Whatever he did was done as no one else would have done, as no one else would have dared to do it. Those who lament the absence of the picturesque in American politics have great reason to be grateful to General Butler. It is impossible to describe the æsthetic pleasure which his speeches are capable of producing. When he rose on one occasion, and said, with great emphasis, "Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Convention: I am a plain, blunt man," one felt an impulsive inclination to move a resolution of thanks. His oratory is a study—without a single art of manner, or a single pleasing tone of voice, in fact, with a very disagreeable voice and insolent manners, he is not without success as a speaker. His points always tell, and you could not help feeling that his audience had a fear of him, which must, of course, be an effective assistance to oratory when it can be used to advantage. His gestures are ludicrous. He appeals by shaking his fist, he emphasizes an assertion by falling back from his toes on to his heels, he points a rejoinder by a curious movement which is difficult to describe, because it is not common among articulate-speaking men, but which consists in casting his head forward with his neck, as if it was a missile, and then bringing it down at the end of the shot with a sudden drop.

The vote on the admission of the Ward 6 Delegation from Boston was a curious satire on parliamentary law. Delegates both for and against Butler had been elected by different caucuses, and the question was which was the regular caucus. According to the Anti-Butler account, the original caucus was broken up by a Butler mob, which, by noise and turbulence, prevented a fair vote, thus making it necessary for the true Republicans present to adjourn to another place, and hold a new caucus. At this other place—the Charles Street Church—the Anti-Butler delegates were chosen. The original meeting, after the withdrawal to the church, of course elected Butler delegates. The whole question was whether the original meeting was or was not broken up by a mob. This question the committee on credentials investigated, and reported in favor of the Charles Street caucus and the Anti-Butler delegates. The convention voted separately on the adoption of this part of the report, and, though the question was evidently one of fact, and had nothing to do with the merits of the contest for the governorship, it was accepted on all hands as a test-question to decide for or against Butler. To the spectator it was a simple matter of evidence, with the convention it was a party question—to be decided, not according to the evidence, but according to the preferences of the delegates. The Anti-Butler delegates were admitted, and the contest was virtually over.

When the delegate from Gloucester saw what the result was going to be, his proceedings were curious to watch. If the voting could be invalidated on any ground, it would at least give him a loophole; he might either demand another vote, or might bolt. He therefore made this extraordinary motion: "That the president of the convention be authorized to enquire of the officers at the door whether unauthorized persons had taken tickets from them at the door; whether the number of tickets of persons that came into the hall was less than the number of persons that were in the hall." This motion was evidently a tentative one, made for the purpose of seeing whether he could create a disturbance. The chair, of course, ruled that he could neither go to the door-keepers, nor could he summon the door-keepers to the chair; but that a motion for a committee of enquiry would be in order. The General made no such motion, however, and waited for his next opportunity. This came very soon. During the vote for governor by counties, the chairman announced that, as some counties would probably poll more than the regular number of votes, in any such county the vote would be taken a second time. Butler at once rose, and, turning to the convention, said: "What can you expect, gentlemen, when the chairman himself announces that there is going to be illegal voting?" Again the insinuation fell dead; and, seeing that it was going to come to nothing, Butler wisely allowed the threatening demeanor with which he began his sentence to change into a plain, blunt smile, and sat down again as if the whole thing had been a joke.

When the vote was declared, all eyes turned again to Butler: would he bolt, or would he withdraw? As your readers know, he withdrew, in a speech which was, from a dramatic point of view, much the best thing he ever did in his life. He told the convention that evil-minded men had circulated a story that if he was not nominated for the governorship he would run against the regular nominee. These same evil-minded men had also said that, if he secured the regular nomination, they would bolt, and run an independent candidate against him. He continued in words of which I have not a report before me, but which were, in effect, these: "But, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am a better Republican than they. (Great applause.) I shall support the nominee of the convention. (Immense applause.) One word to my friends: We have fought a good fight, and, though for the present we are defeated, the conflict is not over. Meantime, we have accomplished much; we have proved our loyalty to truth and right. Your support has cheered me through the long battle. Your friendship will warm my heart and support my courage in the great conflict which we will continue to wage inside the Republican party, until our efforts are crowned by the final redemption and liberation of this glorious old Commonwealth of Massachusetts from corruption and vice." (Tremendous applause.)

So ended the contest. Butler was beaten, and beaten by that unknown force which he so persistently ignores—character. The men who defeated him were not wire-pullers or managers; they were men like the chairman of the convention, who ruled every question that arose with an absolute impartiality; men like the chairman of the committee of credentials, who made a report rather in favor of than against the Butler party. The result showed that Massachusetts is not the same place yet as the Fifth District, and that the opinion of the respectable non-political classes has still some weight in the selection of officers. But it is absurd to suppose that the conflict is over or Butler silenced. As I returned in the cars to Boston the next morning, I happened to hear a Butler delegate giving his views to one of the opposing party: "This fight," said he, "is not over. General Butler has been beaten now, but so have other men. The Free-Soil party was at first, and the men who come up here to vote against him are the same men who, in 1856, voted for James Buchanan against Fremont. Don't be too damned sure of your position. We shall have our turn, too."

A. P. M.

FRANCE.—A NEUTRAL PRESIDENT—THE ARMY.

PARIS, September 15.

M. THIERS has sent his first messages to the Chamber. We have really a President—not like yours, shut up in a constitution, watched by a Senate, and tied by law and precedent. Our new President goes to the Chamber, if he likes—he continues to be a leader, a speaker. May we not compare him, for want of a better comparison, to Pericles? For his real power is eloquence; his dictatorship is the dictatorship of persuasion. But here the comparison must stop. When Pericles came into power, the Athenians were at the height of prosperity. Pericles, young, beautiful, looking like a demigod, kept Athens joyous, and had only to resist the license of a people intoxicated by victory. Thiers, old, owl-faced, like an ironical image of fate, appears after Sedan, after Metz, after the surrender of the finest province of France. Thucydides, giving an account of the government under Pericles, says that it was a democratic government, which in fact was a monarchy, as the first citizen had all the authority. It is undeniable that the power of M. Thiers is almost without limit. He derives his authority less from the absence of any constitutional check than from the nature of his character; he has a strong will in the midst of men who have no will; he knows his own mind, and he alone knows it. From the first day of the meeting of the Chamber at Bordeaux, he followed a single idea, and the continuity of his purpose gave him an easy victory over parties which, though numerous, had no fixed policy and no organization. He intended to be President; and though the Republican party was in a minority in the Chamber, he took advantage of circumstances to form a majority with men of all parties in the name of order. The manifestoes of the Count de Chambord helped him very powerfully, as they put an end to the consolidation of the monarchical party. The Orleanists could not accept the doctrines of these manifestoes, though many of them would have been prepared to accept the Count de Chambord as king, if he had had the sense to take the position of a constitutional sovereign. The Legitimists are now completely discouraged, but many of them, at least, prefer the continuance of the Republic to the monarchy of the Comte de Paris; in fact, every party seems to prefer the Republic to the triumph of some other party; and thus the new administration is kept in a sort of unsettled equilibrium by a system of negative forces.

It is not rare to find foreigners who have made the most honest efforts to understand the French mind and the French policy telling you: "I give it up in despair. It seems to me that every man here is like a ship lost at sea, in the starless night, without a compass. Where is public opinion? In what direction does it run? There are no public meetings, there are no acknowledged leaders of the people, who are ready to take up a question and to explain it to the country. The press is full of scandalous personal attacks or of nauseous flatteries addressed to the executive of the day." If we look at the Chamber, we see a body of seven hundred and fifty men who are ruled by an old statesman who sometimes receives his support from the Right, sometimes from the Left, and sometimes from the Centre: a shifting majority without discipline, without any settled purpose, without courage, rising at times against M. Thiers, and, the moment after, returning to his feet like a whipped spaniel. It is very hard to anticipate what will be the results of so much negative policy. Its object seems to be how not to do it—not to proclaim the monarchy, and still to preserve some chances for the monarchy; to make a President of the Republic, and still not to give a legal status to the republican form of government. M. Thiers, in the message he read two days ago, has as usual increased the confusion. Everybody thought that, now that he is President, he would give a decidedly more republican tone to his utterances. The Left was, therefore, decidedly surprised and disgusted when M. Jules Simon read the following lines of the message:

"We have to settle our present and our future lot, and it is necessary to know whether it is to be in accordance with the past tradition—the tradition of a thousand years—that our country is to be constituted, or whether, abandoning itself to the torrent which in the present day precipitates human society towards an unknown future, it is to put on a new form, and thus peacefully pursue its noble policy. This country, the object of the passionate attention of the whole universe, is it to be a republic or a monarchy? will it adopt one or the other of these two forms of government which, at the present time, divide all nations? What greater problem was ever placed before a great nation in the terms in which it has now presented itself to us? I ask you the question, gentlemen, Is it very astonishing that this problem is for us an exciting one? The greater our sincerity and our patriotism, the more must it necessarily excite us. And observe how other nations are almost as disturbed as we are ourselves at the extraordinary spectacle which we afford them."

We do, indeed, afford them an extraordinary spectacle, but still, there is something very childish in this way of lugging into a domestic question the "passionate attention" and the "disturbed" emotions of the foreigner. The chauvinism of Thiers has resisted defeat, and is as self-complacent now as it was before Sedan. I will not comment on the tone of this message, so different from the speech from the throne in England or of messages of an American President. The Chamber itself, though it is very emotional, could not help laughing at some parts of this long dissertation. I need only point to the foregoing passage to show that M. Thiers, though he is now President of the Republic, means to keep the future quite uncertain, and the balance perfectly equal between Republicans and Monarchists. I am sorry to say that the past history of M. Thiers allows me to put this question: Is this declaration sincere? or has it only for its object to offer a fresh bait to the monarchical members of the House, and to cherish in them a last hope, lest they be driven by despair into an unflinching opposition? M. Thiers continues to play in his old age the part of a political Don Juan; he says to the Republicans, "I am with you"; to the Monarchists, "I protect you."

And it may be, after all, that there is not so much insincerity in this conduct as might at first seem. There is really in the last message a childlike prolixity and an incontinent and feeble rhetoric which seem to prove that M. Thiers in his seventy-fifth year is no longer what he has been. He certainly has conducted the negotiations with Germany neither with skill nor with vigor; he showed more determination in the latter stages of the siege of Paris, but he exhibited great weakness in the first days of the Commune. It cannot be denied that he is a man of strong will (indeed, I am afraid he is the only man of strong will in the Chamber), but his intellect is easily obscured, and long habits of political intrigue have twisted and, I may almost say, perverted his mind. Now that he has himself broken the compact of Bordeaux, by accepting the title of President, he means to prove that the compact of Bordeaux is not broken. The Rivet proposition was in reality a sort of parliamentary coup d'état, which completely changes the relative position of parties and of the executive. The decree which made M. Thiers President is in reality a constitution, short as it is. Therefore, all the political engagements which were made in the name of the pacte de Bordeaux have come to an end. For instance, the Princes of Orléans are now free to take their seats in the Chamber. But I know that M. Thiers is unwilling that they should do so, and I should not be surprised if this was the secret motive which led him to address to the Chamber the paragraph I have cited above.

The Chamber is going to adjourn till the 4th of December, and during this time the deputies will see the electors, and, it is to be hoped, draw a little more courage and consistency from the provincial soil. Meanwhile, M. Thiers will be absolutely sovereign; he will not give much work to the parliamentary commission which will remain at Versailles. He obtained, yesterday, the Chamber's permission to ratify, in the absence of the deputies, a supplementary treaty with Germany, which will hasten the evacuation of six departments, on condition that the Alsatian goods, for some time to come, may enter into France with an exceptional tariff. M. Thiers will also have more time to devote to the army. The historian of the Empire has always had the military mania; and he is certainly reorganizing the French army with great zeal. The army of Paris is now 150,000 strong; it is organized into corps d'armée, and the men live in baraquements, not in barracks—which means that they are living in tents and wooden huts. The men and the officers receive the vivres de campagne (campaign rations), which is an expense that falls heavily now on an impoverished treasury; but it is thought that this mode of outdoor life will sooner improve the army. There is another army, quite as strong, organizing on the same principle in camps about Bourges; 60,000 are in the forts of Lyons, or in the neighborhood. In all, we have not less than 500,000 men under arms, and it is truly wonderful to see how rapidly the work of reorganization is going on. I am not one of those who believe that M. Thiers is bent upon recommencing the war as soon as he can. There are people who maintain that his whole policy, his clinging to power as he does, is explained if you admit that he will himself retake Alsace and Lorraine before he dies. But the fact is this: the French army is rapidly reforming; the officers all burn with the desire of revenge; and in the siege of Paris, men and soldiers showed certainly high military qualities. It may be simply that Thiers wishes to be popular with the army that he spends so much money on it, in order that the Bonapartists may not find any support in its ranks.

Notes.

MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. have in press a large number of novels, of which several are reprints from the English, and but one seems distinctively American: "Left to Herself," by Jennie Woodville—"a striking and original novel of Southern life," says the publishers' announcement. Also the following works (reprints): "The World of Anecdote" and "Religious Anecdote," by Edwin Paxton Hood; Lubke's "History of Sculpture," in two volumes, uniform with his "History of Art," and containing three hundred and fifty illustrations; Edward Whymper's entertaining "Scrambles among the Alps"; and "Half-Hours in the Temple Church," by J. C. Vaughan, D.D. And the following: B. Donbavand's "Wild Ireland; or, Recollections of Some Days and Nights with Father Michael," which has already been pleasant reading for the patrons of Lippincott's Magazine; "Southern Voices," by Dr. W. H. Holcombe; and the "Coin Book," which professes to give all the information one is likely to need about the coinage, mint laws, and coinage statistics of this country, besides "a dictionary of all coins known in ancient and modern times, with their values," etc., etc. Messrs. Lippincott & Co. announce that with the October number the Sunday Magazine, of which they are the American publishers, begins a new series at a reduced price—$2 75 per annum instead of $3 50.——Macmillan & Co. announce "On the Nature, Origin, and Use of Wine," by Drs. Thudichum and Dupré, a work telling of wine-making processes, and giving statistics of production in various places, chemical analyses of different wines, etc., etc.

—In our notice of the magazines last week the types made us speak of Mr. Howells's article and Mr. James's in these words: "Of Mr. Howells's story and essay in one, and of Mr. James's story, we need say nothing; except, perhaps, that neither is just nor so perfectly characteristic of its author as the former parts have been." We had not meant to assert anything as to the "justice" of either of these articles, and make haste to say so before any demand to that effect is made upon us. If the reader will leave out the "nor" following "just," he will have what we think we meant to say, though the absence of the manuscript "copy" prevents our being precisely certain as to the phraseology employed. The omission above recommended will, however, certainly leave the substance of what we meant to say. A principal characteristic of Mr. Howells's humor is its rare delicacy and subtlety. But in this October instalment of 'Their Wedding Journey," some of the topics humorously treated—as the illogicality of woman, for instance—are not very far sought, nor treated so very differently from what is common when such topics are up for discussion. Not that it is not all very nice reading. Indeed, why we expressed the opinion that we perhaps had nothing more to say about these productions by Mr. Howells and Mr. James, was that we had previously spoken in praise of them. In Mr. James's story, at its October stage, there appears to be less of its author's elaborateness of analysis than has marked the other parts of his excellent story, and rather more than is desirable of sudden "fallings in love," of a kind that we should say would be better as beginnings of "flirtations" between a harmless kind of persons than they are for Mr. James's purpose in delineating his interesting personages. Perhaps it might not do to say that this practice is not characteristic of Mr. James; but hardly, we should say, of him at his best; and usually it is not quite so blank presented as here.

—A movement of considerable strength has been set on foot in the West, and first took an organized shape at a great convention of teachers, held in St. Louis last July, for the foundation of "a national university" on a great scale, having its seat, we presume, in the Mississippi Valley. The promoters look to the General Government for the principal portion of the necessary funds, and for this purpose are going to agitate for a great donation of public lands, before the national domain has all been disposed of. Ten million dollars, we believe, is talked of as the amount which would be necessary to make the institution worthy of its name. There are some difficulties in the way of establishing a university—apart altogether from the various drawbacks which grow out of mere newness. One is that if the main reliance is placed on endowments by private individuals, a small beginning has to be made, with half-starved second-rate professors, and a defective library and apparatus and buildings, and, what with low vitality, and puffing, and begging, and bragging, the morale of everybody connected with the organization has received serious injury before it has secured a permanent and effective footing. If, on the other hand, Government supplies the funds, it can do so liberally, and can make the institution all it ought to be materially from the outset; but there is hardly any government willing to endow a university, and then relinquish all control over it. If the Government retains the right of supervision—that is, if the university be not a thoroughly independent and self-governing body—there is great danger of its becoming a mere political machine, injurious to the politics of the country and of little use to its education. This is true even of European countries, where the politicians are generally university men, with a strong respect for universities, and a keen appreciation of their needs; it is doubly true of this, where the common run of politicians dislike and suspect universities and university men. The present condition of West Point Academy is something which those who ask Congress to found an American university would do well to heed. The promoters of the new movement, therefore, will, we trust, take good care, if their funds come from the nation, that the charter gives undisputed control to the Faculty—not to political trustees, or supervisors, or even to "prominent citizens." We say this in the most friendly spirit towards the undertaking, and, in fact, in testimony of our good wishes. A national committee to carry on the preliminary work was appointed at the St. Louis meeting, Ex-President Hill, of Harvard; Dr. Samuel Eliot, of Boston; and Mr. E. L. Godkin, of New York, being placed on it to represent the Eastern States. Mr. Godkin has, however, for personal reasons, declined to serve.

—The Evening Post may, if it pleases, take a lesson in synonyms from an excellent article in the Illinois Staats-Zeitung of Sept. 26. "Volk and People" is the title of it, and its object is to show that an appeal to the "people" against the "people's" chosen rulers in this city, as in its present emergency, is childish, and that "people" is a very different idea from "folk." To say, when the remedy for our evils is under discussion, "If the 'people' could only get a chance at the Ring," is as ridiculous as the Russian serf with his proverb, "If the Czar only knew." Tweed, Sweeny, Hall, and Connolly are all men of the "people," elected by the "people" by enormous majorities, and assured in this hour of their open disgrace that the "people" is on their side, and they have nothing to make them afraid. There is, continues the Staats-Zeitung, no New York Volk, even if there is a New York "people." The German word signifies not an arbitrary number of featherless bipeds, but an association (Genossenschaft) of men knit together by community of blood, language, manners, generally also religion and interests. It cannot properly be rendered by the English word "people," which is rather the equivalent of Leute, and designates a purely arbitrary number at that. Kossuth succeeded in making the cultivated classes in England and America understand him when he used "peoples" in the sense of the German Völker, but he failed to naturalize this plural for the common use and comprehension. There is a remedial force in public opinion only when we have actually a homogeneous community to deal with—a real Volk, which rapidly disappears in all cities when they get well up into the hundred thousands. New York has already become, for native and immigrant residents alike, a mere camp, with tents of stone instead of canvas, inhabited only so long as money can be made; a disarticulate heap of human atoms, in which a public opinion definitely affecting the resolutions and actions of individuals can hardly be said to exist. Every one make what he can, and the devil take the hindmost, is the sum of the philosophy of "municipal self-government" in New York. "Self-government" is all very fine, but it needs before everything a directing "self," i.e., a community conscious of its organic unity. Popular government is also a fine thing, needing first of all, however, a "people" (Volk). The chance inmates of a great hotel are no Volk, although they are people; and New York is in fact a gigantic hotel. The writer concludes with an ingenious distinction in favor of Chicago, which, he says, is perhaps the only great city in America where, spite of the complex elements in its population, it is permissible to speak of a Volk; the reason being that the inhabitants of a city which, in thirty years, has sprung up from nothing, have (the great majority of them) a very direct share in its growth, and, consequently, possess a certain civic pride at which other cities may jest, but which is a very fair equivalent for the common feeling (Gemeingefühl) which prevails in European cities, and which is necessary to convert a "people" into a Volk.

—The chronic difference between Connecticut and New York as to their respective boundaries, to which we alluded the other day in our notice of Baird's "History of Rye," has lately been revived as to the southern boundary of the former State. In May last, the case of Keyser vs. Coe was removed by the defendant from the Superior Court of Connecticut to the United States Circuit Court, Judges Woodruff and Shipman. Mr. John H. Keyser's home is in the town of Norwalk, on the shore of the Sound, about a mile from which is Goose Island, a small bit of territory owned by Mr. Enoch Coe, who has thereon "an establishment in which he manufactures artificial manures from dead fish and other offensive materials, the fumes of which often reach the mainland and the plaintiff's residence, and create, as the bill alleges, an intolerable odor, exceedingly disagreeable and sickening." Mr. Coe's removal of the case was on the ground that Goose Island was not within the State of Connecticut; but, if he could have made this good, he might still have found that he had only jumped from the frying-pan into the fire, since the Circuit Court would then probably have been the proper tribunal for trying a nuisance carried on in one State to the detriment of citizens of another adjoining. The full text of the decision, which was adverse to Mr. Coe's pretensions, was printed last week in the New Haven Palladium, together with a map of the Connecticut coast-line from Lyon's Point to Stonington and Point Judith. Judge Shipman quotes the essential passages from the Warwick Patent of 1631, the Connecticut Charter granted by Charles II. in 1662, and the Duke of York's patent granted by the same monarch in 1664—by which last Connecticut lost possession of Long Island. It is shown that, by any fair construction of these instruments, the coast islands belong to the State, and that, with the exception of Fisher's Island, they have always been occupied by citizens of Connecticut, recognizing her jurisdiction, and in their conveyances describing the lands as lying within her limits, the defendant himself holding his title under a long line of conveyances of this very nature. Notice is taken of a curious attempt in 1765 to interpret the Warwick Patent so as to make the southern boundary of the State a straight line drawn due west from Point Judith parallel with the northern boundary, and thus cut off all the coast-line and islands west of New London or thereabouts. The lawyer who contrived this device of making Connecticut an inland State, and spreading New York along the Sound, achieved his purpose of establishing a quasi right in New York to the three Captain's Islands, but the claim was too preposterous to be pushed further.

—On the 10th of last month died Mr. Richard Bentley, whose fame as a publisher can hardly be said to have been equalled by any of his contemporaries, though of late it has not maintained its pre-eminence. For more than forty years he had been engaged in the making of books, and had thus become associated with some of the most popular of recent English writers—Horace Smith, Colley Grattan, G. P. R. James, Lord Lytton, Dr. Maginn, Father Prout, Harrison Ainsworth, Dickens, Marryat, Moore, Albert Smith, Thackeray, Barham, together with Cruikshank and Leech and Alfred Crowquill—and with Fenimore Cooper, Prescott, and Haliburton. It was in Bentley's Miscellany that "Oliver Twist" first appeared, Mr. Dickens having drawn up the prospectus, and being then the editor of the magazine, which was started in 1837, almost as a novelty. Two stories are told of the naming of this magazine, whose success, by the way, has been inherited by Harper's Monthly along with the design of its cover —one (apocryphal) that when the title had been changed from the too pretentious Wit's Miscellany to Bentley's, Barham enquired, "Is not that going rather too far the other way?"—the other, that prophets of evil suggested that the new venture had better be called Bentley's Don't-sell-any. Mr. Bentley had a costly experience in 1857 with the copyrights of his American authors in England, by a decision of the House of Lords which has since been reversed. At the time of his death, he was nearly seventy-seven years of age. His son and associate, Mr. George Bentley, remains to carry on the business, and to preserve the honorable tradition that "the name of Bentley on a title-page is a guaranty that the book is worth reading for some quality or other."

—The French press, with a pardonable sore-headedness, is indulging in pretty general abuse of friend and foe alike—the Italians, for example, as well as the Germans; and the compliment does not fail to be reciprocated. But, as the Perseveranza points out, the French papers entrench themselves behind their old practice of ignoring all that is said of them by foreigners; and happily so, or the mutual recrimination might lead to a dangerous heat and international imbroglios. Baron Stoffel, it is clear, is all very well for the army, but is not at all needed in journalism, where it is still the prerogative of the grande nation to shut its eyes and its ears to what is going on outside. The press stands in effect as a Chinese wall between the French people and its neighbors, and while it serves to keep out foreign criticism and foreign ideas, is less representative of the nation than any press in Europe. It is scarcely possible to magnify the evil of this defect, which is no less disastrous for domestic than for external policy, and is a principal reason why revolution is so easy in France. When one enquires what probability there is of a change in this respect, the answer must be that it depends ultimately on the decline of French vanity, and this is a national trait of which it is not easy to predict the disappearance. But it is evident that the political view of the nature and functions of the press must also be greatly modified. We have seen that Gambetta's notion of them was the same as Napoleon's, and that of the moderate republicans, from Thiers down, is but little different. It appears to be regarded on all hands as a public danger when the press truly becomes the mouthpiece of public opinion; and the only safeguard lies in reducing it to the mere expression of a few quill-drivers, and in making them known and easily amenable to warnings and penalties.

NOTES ON CHOLERA.*

Dr. Budd said to Prof. Tyndall: "From the day when I first began to think of these subjects, I never had a doubt that the specific cause of contagious fevers must be living organisms." Of this utterance the British Medical Journal remarks, that "it is, of course, a very interesting proof of early wisdom, but is not of the nature of a strict demonstration." Yet the view thus announced with effusion is held by many intelligent physicians; not, indeed, as demonstrably, but as probably, explaining the origin of all zymotic diseases. And since the advocacy of the germ-theory by Prof. Tyndall in his popular lectures upon "Dust and Disease," it has met the approval of many who are quite unaware of the amount of work that had been previously applied to its investigation. Although the germ-theory of disease cannot yet be considered to be fully established, it arrays many probabilities in its favor; and those thinkers at least who value the "scientific uses of the imagination" are inclined to accept it in advance of full demonstration. It is a growing belief that cholera and other communicable diseases are produced in man by invisible organic germs that are conveyable by persons, baggage, clothing, ships, and through both water and air.

The germ-theory has been in danger from its friends. Dr. Salisbury maintained that he could show in the field of his microscope the particular variety of spores which caused the miasmatic fevers of the region where he lived. But other observers failed to find them, and the discovery was not confirmed. The cholera spore, too, has thus far evaded the search of the medical detective. Messrs. Loschmidt and Stoney, and Sir William Thompson, independently of them, have lately given approximate measurements of the ultimate atom, a particle much too small for the microscope to show us; yet that it exists, and that we have, if we may be allowed the expression, roughly measured its dimensions, is conceded by some of our foremost scientific men. A different yet not less coherent chain of argument than that which has furnished us with the ultimate atom prefigures for us the cholera spore, while we await for the microscope to obtain such power as may serve to make it visible. Like predicted planets, these small entities may yet become evident to the sense; unless the coming intelligence shall find such a confirmation superfluous, and show that logic is more satisfactory than seeing with the eye.

Meanwhile, the interest of the cholera question, at least in temperate climates and in non-epidemic times, lies quite as much in the investigation of the essential nature of the disease as in the methods of its treatment. To neither of those enquiries has Dr. Peters contributed much that is new, though he makes a very definite claim to that effect. His reference, in the second preface, to a succeeding page for an account of the recently discovered "true nature of the choleraic poison" led us to open the present volume with expectation and interest. The pages in question, prove, however, to contain nothing more than a description of the experimental conveyance of cholera from one animal to another, and of its communication between men. We think Dr. Peters reprehensible for so placing and wording this passage in the preface as to misguide persons who may be seeking information about "the true nature" of cholera. Nor will his claim of "great originality" (made in the first preface) for what he calls his "Physiological Theory," and for the "advocacy of the internal disinfectant and corrective treatment" appear, to those who are familiar with the literature of the subject, and especially with the writings of Niemeyer and of Dr. George Johnson, of London, to be better founded than the claim that we have already mentioned.

Of the effects of treatment Dr. Peters says: "Many cases recover under all kinds of treatment, and under no treatment. Many die under all varieties of treatment." The fatality of cholera in temperate climates is, however, overrated in the public estimation; and the alarm felt in an American community, for instance, at its approach, is out of proportion to any of its dangers, except such as may result from gross neglect of sanitary precautions. We are now familiar with the conditions under which cholera appears, and with those which favor the spread of the epidemic, and we are abundantly informed as to the efficient means of checking and even of arresting the spread of such an epidemic. For the amount of zymotic disease in a community is a pretty accurate index of the amount of uncleanness, whether of air, water, or dwellings, in that community. The cholera germ cannot survive disinfectants.

* "Notes on the Origin, Nature, Prevention, and Treatment of Asiatic Cholera. By John C. Peters, M.D." 16mo, pp. 200. Second Edition. New York: D. Van Nostrand.

In a recent circular of the Medical Department of the Privy Council of Great Britain, we find warnings against the chief dangers which favor the spread of cholera, and especially against tainted water-supplies and tainted air. Dr. Peters contributes a new unpleasantness to this very unpleasant subject. He calls attention to the fact that in New York (and we may presume in many other cities less advantageously placed for drainage) some of the sewers run up-hill at various angles of absurdity. This is the case, for instance, in East Twenty-sixth and Thirty-fourth, and West Thirteenth and Nineteenth Street, and in a part of Madison Avenue. This state of things is not exhilarating to residents who may chance to know that the numerous pipes which connect their houses with those drains often serve, with still greater facility, to introduce to the house the exhalations of the drains. For this nuisance there is, indeed, a partial remedy —to lead from the lowest part of the waste-pipe a small tube through the roof of the house into the open air, and to stop the openings of pipes at night with cotton. But what is wanted is an improved system of refuse-removal and of water-supply, similar to that which an enlightened fear has caused to be introduced into many of the large towns in England. With such a system, and with proper disinfectants, we could regard the cholera as a considerably less dangerous visitor than the scarlet fever.

Dr. Peters has not added, in the present volume, to our knowledge of cholera. As a practical treatise upon the subject, from the hand of an intelligent physician, it has, of course, a certain value—a value that is, however, lessened by the want of an index and a table of contents. In a scientific work, this omission is quite unpardonable.

Journal of a Young Lady of Virginia. (Baltimore: J. Murphy & Co. 1871.) — This young lady of Virginia wrote her journal, which covers only a part of the year 1782, in the form of letters. Indeed, it does not appear that she was in the habit of keeping a journal when she was at home, and apparently we owe the pleasant little record here published to the fact that in the fall of 1782 she went down into the since famous Wilderness to make a round of visits among her relatives, the Washingtons, Lees, Gordons, and other families of Lower Virginia. Her surname is not known, but her Christian name was Lucy, and her friend was Polly Brent, so the diary, following the fashion of these days, is "From Lucinda to Marcia." It is very entertaining, with its flavor of old times, and with its shadowings forth of our dead-and-gone great-great-grandmothers when they were girls—"slight she-slips of rebel blood." Perhaps to some of them the poet's unaltered description may have been truer, and they may have been "slight she-slips of loyal blood," for although written in the fall of 1782, there is here no indication that, less than a year before, a relative of our young lady of Virginia had compelled the surrender of his Majesty's army under Lord Cornwallis down at Yorktown. It is interesting, too, for its hints as to the manners of the Old Dominion in those days; and the young lady herself, "Lucinda," is a very taking figure. "Lucy Gordon and myself are just returned from walking out," she says in one place; "I was delighted: we walked to a river they call it here; but it is very narrow. The banks of it are beautiful, covered with moss and wild-flowers; all that a romantic mind could form." Not displeased she appears to be at her romantic mind: "Lucy Gordon is a truly good Girl, but nothing of the romance in her. So much the better say I, she is much happier without. I wish to heaven I had as little. Colonel Ball dined here to-day." September the twentieth, eighty-nine years ago, she spent in reading "Lady Julia Mandeville," and was much affected. Indeed, she thinks she never cried more in her life in reading a novel: "the stile is beautiful but the tale is horrid." Further on she says: "I have a piece of advice to give you, which I have before urged—that is to read something improving. Books of instruction will be a thousand times more pleasing after a little while than all the Novels in the World. I own myself I am too fond of Novel reading; but by accustoming myself to other Books I have become less so, and I wish my Polly to do the same." Equally correct sentiments she expresses on the fifth of November following: "I have for the first time in my life just read Pope's 'Eloiza.' Just now I saw it laying in the Window. I had heard my Polly extol it frequently, and curiosity led me to read it. I will give you my opinion of it: the poetry I think beautiful, but do not like some of the sentiments. Some of Eloiza's is too Ammorous for a female I think." In fact, the passion of love she appears to suspect, and to prefer before it the esteem and affection of her own sex: "You may depend upon it Polly this said Matrimony alters us mightily. I am afraid it alienates us from every one else. It is, I fear, the bane of Female Friendship. Let it not be with ours, my Polly, if we should ever Marry."

Here is a little sketch of the manners of that day which would have pleased Thackeray, when hewas writing "The Virginians," more than all that is written in the chronicles of Mr. Bancroft:

"About sunset, Nancy, Milly, and myself took a walk in the Garden [it is a most butifull place]. We were mighty busy cutting thistles to try our sweethearts, when Mr. Washington caught us; and you can't conceive how he plagued us—chased us all over the Garden, and was quite impertinent.

"I must tell you of our frolic after we went in our room. We took it into our heads to want to eat; well we had a large dish of bacon and beaf; after that, a bowl of Sago cream; and after that, an apple pye. While we were eating the apple pye in bed—God bless you! making a great noise—in came Mr. Washington, dressed in Hannah's short gown and peticoat, and seazed me and kissed me twenty times, in spite of all the resistance I could make; and then Cousin Molly. Hannah soon followed, dress'd in his Coat. They joined us in eating the apple pye, and then went out. After this we took it in our heads to want to eat oysters. We got up, put on our rappers, and went down in the Seller to get them: do you think Mr. Washington did not follow us and scear us just to death. We went up tho, and eat our oysters. We slept in the old Lady's room too, and she sat laughing fit to kill herself at us. She is a charming old lady—you would be delighted with her. I forgot to tell, Mr. Beal attended us here. I have been makeing Milly play on the forti-pianer for me; she plays very well. I am more and more delighted with her. She has just returned from the Fredericksburg races, and has given me a full account of them."

This Mr. Washington, whom some have unavailingly sought to identify with the Father of his Country, was probably Mr. Corbin Washington, the husband of the above-mentioned Hannah. The volume is printed and published in aid of the fund for a memorial to General R. E. Lee, and its appearance reflects credit on its publishers, and is worthy of its entertaining contents.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books on the wrapper.*

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Adams (C. F., jr., and H.), Chapters in Erie, and Other Essays	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) $2 00
Anne Furness: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.) 75
Abelous (L.), Gustavus Adolphus	(Carlton & Lanahan)
Ames (P. W.), Speeches of Fisher Ames in Congress, 1789–1796	(Little, Brown & Co.)
Brown (J. B.), Misread Passages of Scripture, 2d series	(Carlton & Lanahan)
Collins (W. L.), Cicero	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Dumas (A.), Louise La Vallière, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 00
Dunn (Rev. L. R.), The Mission of the Spirit	(Carlton & Lanahan)
Disraeli (B.), Tancred, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.) 50
Douglas (Matilda), Doings in Maryland	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Emerson (L. O.) and Tilden (W. S.), The Hour of Singing	(O. Ditson & Co.)
Formby (Rev. H.), Pictorial Bible and Church-History Stories	(Cath. Pub. Soc.)
Gardner (Celia E.), Stolen Waters: a Poem	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Gardiner (Rev. F.), The Life of Our Lord in the Words of the Gospels	(W. F. Draper) 1 00
Gardner (F. B.), The Carriage Painter's Illustrated Manual	(S. R. Wells) 1 00
Gardner (Mrs. H. C.), A King's Daughter, and other Tales	(Carlton & Lanahan)
Holbrook (Dr. M. L.), Parturition without Pain	(Wood & Holbrook)
Haliburton (T. C.), Sam Slick, the Clockmaker	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 25
Hawthorne (N.), English Note-Books	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 2 00
Hinton (J.), Health and its Conditions	(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 1 50
Im neuen Reich, Nos. 27-36, swd	(L. W. Schmidt)
Jay (W. M. L.), My Winter in Cuba	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Johnson (E.), The Judge's Pets	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 25
Kingsley (Rev. C.), At Last	(Harper & Bros.)
Life of Jefferson S. Batkins	(A. K. Loring)
Leeds (L.), Treatise on Ventilation, 2d ed	(J. Wiley & Son)
Lindsay Lee and his Friends	(Carlton & Lanahan)
Loring (F. W.), Two College Friends	(A. K. Loring) 1 00
McVickar (Rev. W. A.), Life of Rev. John McVickar, S.T.D.	(Hurd & Houghton) 2 00
Menke (Dr. T.), Spruner's Hand-Atlas für die Geschichte des Mittelalters und der Neueren Zeit, Part I., swd	(B. Westermann & Co.) 1 60
Pond (Rev. E.), The Apocalypse Explained	(Hoyt, Fogg & Breed) 1 50
Rolfe (W. J.), Shakespeare's Tempest	(Harper & Bros.)
Sand (Mme. George), Handsome Lawrence, swd	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 50
Six Months Hence: a Tale, swd	" " 75
The Home at Heatherbrae: a Tale	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
The Workshop, No. 9, swd	(E. Steiger) 46
The Fall of Man; or, The Loves of the Gorillas, swd	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Underwood (F. H.), Hand-Book of English Literature	(Lee & Shepard)
United States Patent Law	(Munn & Co.)
Whedon (D. D.), Commentary on the New Testament, Vol. III	(Carlton & Lanahan)
White (Alexina B.), Little-Folk Songs	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 25
Weiss (Rev. J.), American Religion	(Roberts Brothers)
Williams (L. A.), The Lost Despatch: a Tale, swd	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 50
Winter (W.), My Witness: Poetry	" " 1 25
Zeitschrift für Erdkunde, Vol. VI., No. 3, swd	(L. W. Schmidt)

JUST PUBLISHED
BY PORTER & COATES,
PUBLISHERS,
PHILADELPHIA.

I.

AMERICAN ORNITHOLOGY;
OR,
THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE BIRDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Illustrated with Plates engraved and colored from Original Drawings taken from Nature.

BY ALEXANDER WILSON.

With a life of the author, by George Ord, F.R.S. With Continuation, by Charles Lucien Bonaparte (Prince of Musignano). 3 vols. imperial 8vo, with a folio volume of carefully colored plates embracing nearly 400 figures of birds, mostly life-size. Elegantly bound in cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, $75; in half Turkey morocco, gilt edges, $85.

II.

THOS. HOOD'S POETICAL WORKS.

2 vols. crown 8vo, tinted paper, cloth extra, $1 75 per vol.; half-calf, gilt, $3 50 per vol.; half-morocco, gilt top, $3 50 per vol.

III.

UP THE RHINE.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

Crown 8vo, tinted paper, cloth extra, $1 75 per vol.; half-calf, gilt, $3 50 per vol.; half-morocco, antique, $3 25 per vol.

A GRADUATE OF YALE, intending to devote his life to the study of History and Political Science, wishes a situation in some college with a view to a professorship. Is willing to teach other branches also. T. T. U., Editorial Rooms Christian Union, 27 Park Place, New York.

FOR TRAVELLERS TO GERMANY. Young men of good moral character who are going to Germany in order to study the German language, will be received into the family of a Hanoverian Teacher residing at Frankfort-on-the-Main. He also gives lessons after an approved method to those who do not live in his family. For further intelligence apply to Prof. THOS. L. ANGELL, Bates College, Lewiston, Me.

THE NEXT
GENERAL CONVENTION.

THE CHURCHMAN will furnish, week by week, during the next General Convention, a full report of its proceedings. In addition to this, and on account of the very great interest attaching to the Debates of the Lower House, the Messrs. M. H. Mallory & Co. will publish, during the Convention, a DAILY EDITION of THE CHURCHMAN, at Baltimore. It will contain a complete report, verbatim, of the Debates in the House of Deputies, Committee Reports, Sermons, etc., made by D. F. Murphy, Chief of Official Corps of Reporters of the U. S. Senate, and his Assistants.

THE CHURCHMAN,
DAILY EDITION,

will be mailed each morning to persons subscribing for the same, and making a prepayment of $1 50.

Bound volume, on superior paper, $5; one copy daily and a bound volume, $6; four copies sent to any address and a bound volume, $10.

Postage on Daily paid by subscriber at office where received. Address immediately,

M. H. MALLORY & CO., Hartford, Conn.
713 Broadway, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED BY
LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,
110 WASHINGTON STREET,
BOSTON.

I.

THE AMERICAN LAW REVIEW.

Vol. VI. No. 1.
(OCTOBER, 1871.)

CONTENTS:

I. Estoppel of a Tenant to Deny his Landlord's Title. II. Misunderstandings of the Civil Law. III. Doubtful Points under the Bankrupt Law. Unrecorded Conveyance of Chattels. IV. Married Women. V. United States District Court. VI. Digest of the English Law Reports for May, June, and July, 1871. VII. Selected Digest of State Reports. VIII. Book-Notices. IX. List of Law Books Published in England and America since July, 1871. X. Summary of Events. XI. Correspondence.

TERMS: Subscription price, per annum, $5; Single numbers, $1 25; Vol. I.-V., bound in law sheep, each, $6.

II.

UNITED STATES DIGEST,

VOL. XXIX.

(ANNUAL FOR 1869.)

Containing a Digest of Decisions of the Courts of Common Law, Equity, and Admiralty in the United States and in England. Royal 8vo, sheep, $6 50.

III.

FISHER AMES'S SPEECHES.

The Speches of Fisher Ames in Congress, 1789—1796. Edited by Pelham W. Ames. 8vo, cloth, $2.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

PRICE, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
596 Broadway, New York.

PRICED CATALOGUE No. 21
OF
ANCIENT AND MODERN BOOKS,

Comprising Standard and Valuable Works in
ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, HISTORY, VOYAGES, TRAVELS, ETC. ETC. ETC.

☞ Just published, and will be forwarded FREE to any address.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
Dealer in New and Old Books, 17 Astor Place, N. Y.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE
ON THE BANKRUPT LAW.
SECOND EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

YALE AND HARVARD USE
WHITNEY'S GERMAN COURSE,
OTTO'S FRENCH COURSE.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,
PUBLISHERS,
No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

The Publishers issue a very large assortment of works in the same department.

☞ A Descriptive Catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

Immediately, in One Volume 8vo, pp. 406.

HISTORICAL ESSAYS.

BY EDWARD A. FREEMAN, M.A.,
Hon. D.C.L., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford.

CONTENTS:

The Mythical and Romantic Elements in Early English History.
The Continuity of English History.
The Relations between the Crowns of England and Scotland.
St. Thomas of Canterbury and His Biographers.
The Life of Edward the Third.
The Holy Roman Empire.
The Franks and the Gauls.
The Early Sieges of Paris.
Frederick the First, King of Italy.
The Emperor Frederick the Second.
Charles the Bold.
Presidential Government.

NOW READY.

THE HISTORY OF NAPOLEON THE FIRST.

BY P. LANFREY.

Vol. 1, 8vo, cloth, $3 50.

"One of the most striking pieces of historical composition of which France, rich as she is in that order, has its boast. Assuredly, M. Lanfrey's book is important not merely for the illustration which it supplies of pure theories of government, but for the light which it throws on the character of what is in so many ways, even now in its hour of confusion, the most important power in Modern Europe."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MACMILLAN & CO.,
38 Bleecker Street, New York.

BOOK-BUYERS.

Send for Catalogue of INTERESTING, USEFUL, and SCARCE BOOKS added to the Stock in hand of
FRANCIS EMMINS,
80 Nassau Street, New York.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,
BIBLIOPOLE,
133 NASSAU STREET,
Catalogues sent on application.
Special attention given to orders by letter.

NEW BOOKS.

CARLTON & LANAHAN,

805 BROADWAY,

On receipt of price will forward by mail,

DR. WHEDON'S COMMENTARY. Vol. III., comprising Acts and Romans. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. 12mo, pp. 402, $1 75.

THE MISSION OF THE SPIRIT; or, The Office and Work of the Comforter in Human Redemption. By Rev. L. R. Dunn. Small 12mo, pp. 303, $1 25.

MISREAD PASSAGES OF SCRIPTURE. By J. Baldwin Brown, B.A. Second Series. 12mo, pp. 200, $1.

THE CHRISTIAN PASTORATE: Its Character, Responsibilities, and Duties. By Rev. D. P. Kidder, D.D. 12mo, pp. 564, $1 75.

THE PROBLEM OF EVIL. By M. Ernest Naville. Translated from the French by Prof. J. P. Lacroix, M.A., of Ohio Wesleyan University. The only authorized translation. 12mo, $1 50.

THE KING'S DAUGHTER. With Other Stories from Real Life. By Mrs. H. C. Gardner. 16mo, pp. 379, $1 25.

THE HEROINE OF THE WHITE NILE; or, What a Woman Did and Dared. A Sketch of the Remarkable Travels and Experiences of Miss Alexandrine Tinne. By Prof. William Wells. 16mo, pp. 207, $1.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS: The Hero of the Reformation. From the French of L. Abelous. By Mrs. C. A. Lacroix. Five Illustrations. Large 16mo, pp. 193, $1.

LINDSAY LEE AND HIS FRIENDS: A Story for the Times. Large 16mo, pp. 138, 75 cents.

NEW BOOKS

TO BE PUBLISHED BY

POTT, YOUNG & CO.

A SHORT TREATISE ON THE HOLY Catholic Church; its Divine Ideal, Ministry, and Institution. With a Catechism on each chapter, forming a course of methodical instruction on the subject. By Edward Meyrick Goulburn, D.D. [In the Press.

THE THEORY AND USE OF THE CHURCH Calendar, in the measurement and distribution of time. Being an account of the origin and growth of the Calendar, of its reformation from the old style to the new, and of its adaptation to the use of the English Church by the British Parliament under George II. By the Rev. Samuel Seabury. [In the Press.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF THE LATE Rev. Dr. Mahan. Edited by the Rev. J. H. Hopkins, jr. 3 vols. 8vo, cloth.

Vol. I. Church History.
Vol. II. Palmoni and Mystic Numbers.
Vol. III. Miscellaneous Writings.

Price, $10 the set.

INDEX CANONUM. Containing the Canons called Apostolical, the Canons of the undisputed General Councils, and the Canons of the Provincial Councils of Ancyra, Neo-Cæsarea, Gangra, Antioch, and Laodicea, together with a complete Digest of the whole code of Canon Law, in the undivided Primitive Church. Alphabetically arranged. By John Fulton, D.D. 8vo, cloth. Price to subscribers, $3.

THE RITUAL LAW OF THE CHURCH, With its application to the Communion and Baptismal Service. To which is added Notes upon Orders and the Articles. By Murray Hoffman, Author of "Law of the Church." Price to subscribers, $3.

The last 3 books will be issued to Subscribers only at the prices annexed.

Subscribers' names should be sent at once through any bookseller, or direct to the Publishers.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.
(Late Pott & Amery),
Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE TRANSFORMATIONS

(OR METAMORPHOSIS) OF INSECTS.

With 241 Illustrations. Insecta, Myriapoda, Arachnida, and Crustacea. By P. Martin Duncan, F.R.S., Professor of Geology in King's College, London. Being an adaptation, for English readers, of M. Emile Blanchard's "Metamorphoses, Mœurs et Instincts des Insects"; and a compilation from the works of Newport, Charles Darwin, Spence Bate, Fritz Müller, Packard, Lubbock, Stainton, and others. 1 vol. royal 8vo, pp. xii. 480, extra cloth, full gilt, $7 50. (London print.)

LABBERTON'S HISTORICAL SERIES,

FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

Outlines of History. With Original Tables, Chronological, Genealogical, and Literary. By Prof. Robert H. Labberton. 1 vol. oblong 4to, cloth, $2.

Historical Questions, Logically Arranged and Divided. The Companion-book to "Outlines of History." By Prof. Robert H. Labberton. 1 vol. oblong 4to, cloth, $1 75.

An Historical Atlas, containing a Chronological Series of One Hundred Colored Maps illustrating successive periods, from the Dawn of History to the Present Day. By the author of "Labberton's Outlines of History," etc. 1 vol. oblong 4to, fine cloth, $3 50.

The latest changes in the Map of Europe (1871) are fully and accurately exhibited.

These books have received the highest encomiums from the press and of eminent educators who have examined them.

For specimen pages, terms for introduction, etc., address the Publishers.

Key to the Iliad of Homer, for the Use of Schools, Academies, and Colleges. By William R. Smith, President of the University of Alabama. 8vo, half-roan, $3.

History of the Working and Burgher Classes. By M. Adolphe Granier de Cassagnac. Paris, France, 1838. Translated by B. E. Green. Demy 8vo, $2 50.

Fairmount Park (Philadelphia). Sketches of its Scenery, Waters, and History. With Map and 35 illustrations. 12mo, paper cover, 75 cents; flexible cloth, $1 25. A complete guide for visitors to the Park.

American Wonderland. By Richard Meade Bache, author of "The Young Wrecker," "Tales of Algeria," etc. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

NEW NOVELS.

Bertha, the Beauty. By Sarah J. C. Whittlesey. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

Aureola; or, The Black Sheep. A Novel. By Mrs. Adelheid Mackenzie. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

My Roses: The Romance of a June Day. By Mrs. L. Virginia French. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

Lowly Ways; or, The Diary of a Poor Young Lady. After the German. By F. E. B. 16mo, cloth, $1.

Downward and Upward. By the author of "Gabled House," "Paul Venner," etc. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

Maud and Miriam; or, The Fair Crusader. By Harriet B. McKeever, author of "Westbrook Parsonage," "Silver Threads," etc. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

☞ For sale by all Booksellers.

CLAXTON, REMSEN & HAFFELFINGER,
PUBLISHERS,
819 and 821 Market Street, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, BAZAR,

$4 PER YEAR EACH.

$10 a Year for the Three.

$7 for any Two.

An Extra Copy of either gratis for every five Subscribers at $4 each in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE sent by mail on receipt of six cents in postage stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

OFFICE OF THE ATLANTIC

MUTUAL INSURANCE CO.

NEW YORK, January 26, 1871.

The Trustees, in conformity to the Charter of the Company, submit the following Statement of its affairs on the 31st December, 1870:

Premiums received on Marine Risks from 1st January, 1870, to 31st December, 1870,	$5,270,690 09
Premiums on Policies not marked off 1st January, 1870,	2,155,723 64
Total amount of Marine Premiums,	$7,426,413 73
No Policies have been issued upon Life Risks, nor upon Fire Risks disconnected with Marine Risks.
Premiums marked off from 1st January, 1870, to 31st December, 1870,	$5,392,738 55
Losses paid during the same period,	$2,253,590 39
Returns of Premiums and expenses,	$1,063,263 57
The Company has the following Assets, viz.
United States and State of New York Stock, City, Bank, and other Stocks,	8,843,740 00
Loans, secured by Stocks and otherwise,	2,377,350 00
Real Estate and Bonds and Mortgages,	217,500 00
Interest, and sundry Notes and Claims due the Company, estimated at	339,352 03
Premium Notes and Bills receivable,	2,089,915 95
Cash in Bank,	316,125 45
Total Amount of Assets,	$14,183,983 43

Six per cent. interest on the outstanding certificates of profits will be paid to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after Tuesday the Seventh of February next.

The outstanding certificates of the issue of 1867 will be redeemed and paid to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after Tuesday, the Seventh of February next, from which date all interest thereon will cease. The certificates to be produced at the time of payment, and cancelled.

Upon certificates which were issued (in red scrip) for gold premiums, such payment of interest and redemption will be in gold.

A dividend of Thirty-five per cent. is declared on the net earned premiums of the Company, for the year ending 31st December, 1870, for which certificates will be issued on and after Tuesday, the Fourth of April next.

By order of the Board,
J. H. CHAPMAN, Secretary.

TRUSTEES:

J. D. Jones,	C. A. Hand,
Charles Dennis,	James Low,
W. H. H. Moore,	B. J. Howland,
Henry Coit,	Benj. Babcock,
Wm. C. Pickersgill,	Robt. B. Minturn,
Lewis Curtis,	Gordon W. Burnham,
Charles H. Russell,	Frederick Chauncey,
Lowell Holbrook,	Robert L. Taylor,
R. Warren Weston,	Geo. S. Stephenson,
Royal Phelps,	William H. Webb,
Caleb Barstow,	Sheppard Gandy,
A. P. Pillot,	Francis Skiddy,
William E. Dodge,	Charles P. Burdett,
David Lane,	Robt. C. Fergusson,
James Bryce,	William E. Bunker,
Daniel S. Miller,	Samuel L. Mitchill,
Wm. Sturgis,	James G. De Forest,
Henry K. Bogert,	Robert L. Stuart,
Dennis Perkins,	Alexander V. Blake.
Joseph Gaillard, Jr.,

JOHN D. JONES, President.
CHARLES DENNIS, Vice-President.
W. H. H. MOORE, 2d Vice-President.
J. D. HEWLETT, 3d Vice-President.

STATEMENT OF THE CONDITION
OF THE
PHENIX INSURANCE CO.,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

On the first day of January, 1871.

Offices in Brooklyn: Phenix Building, 12 and 14 Court Street, W. D., and No. 84 Broadway, E. D.

Office in the City of New York: 173 Broadway.

CAPITAL.

Capital		$1,000,000 00
Gross Surplus	$895,557 10
Less Liabilities	137,277 93	758,279 17
Net Assets		$1,758,279 17

STEPHEN CROWELL, President.
CHAUNCEY BEDELL, Vice-President.
PHILANDER SHAW, Secretary.
WILLIAM R. CROWELL, Sec'y Mar. Dep't.
DANIEL F. FERNALD, Sec'y Brooklyn Dep't.
WILLIAM H. VAN VOORHIS, General Agent.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. The endorsements of Pratt's Astral Oil from Insurance Cos., eminent scientific men, dealers, and consumers, in all parts of the country, would fill a volume. Remember the danger of using unsafe oils, and remember that no accident can occur from using Pratt's Astral.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1871.

The Office of The Nation has been removed to No. 5 Beekman Street.

The Week.

THE event of the week which overshadows all others is the terrible destruction by fire, on Sunday and Monday, of the business portion of Chicago, and of so large a number of dwellings that nigh a hundred thousand persons, of all ages and conditions in life, have suddenly found themselves destitute, and obliged to take refuge in the open prairie, while the whole city is exposed to the most extraordinary privations from want of food and water. The details of this unprecedented disaster will have been given to the world so widely that we shall make no attempt to rehearse them. It is enough to say that a common ruin involved all the banks, all the principal hotels, all the newspaper offices, the court-house, the chamber of commerce, the post-office, the telegraph offices, most of the railroad depots and grain elevators, and the finest, most substantial, and apparently fireproof warehouses, which were the pride and the commercial heart of the city. All these, besides a great number of houses of the better class. The burnt area stretches inward and westward from the lake to the distance of from one to one and a half miles, and north and south from four to five miles. A large number of lives have been certainly lost.

The entire business community is momentarily stunned by the magnitude of the Chicago disaster. The heaviest loss falls naturally upon the insurance companies, some of which are scarcely in a condition to bear a heavy blow. The next sufferers outside of Chicago herself are the New York and New England merchants, who had sold goods to the Western dealers on credit, and who cannot now expect to be paid for even a very small percentage of their claims. Again, very grievous losses will be borne by the host of Eastern capitalists who have for years past partly owned, or who held heavy mortgages on, the magnificent buildings for business purposes and residences in which Chicago rivalled every city on the Continent. But the heaviest blow of all falls upon the interests connected with the trade, storage, and transportation of produce and provisions, the pride of the "Queen City of the West." The keen scent of Wall Street discovered the gravity of the evil at an early hour, and the owners of railroad securities so long upheld by the manipulations of gigantic rings and combinations, eagerly rushed into the market as sellers, producing a panic and excitement almost equal in intensity to that of the famous Black Friday of 1869. Stocks declined from five to ten per cent., the best and most substantial securities falling as heavily as the thinnest and most treacherous of fancy stocks. At the close of business on Monday, a gloomy atmosphere, an undefined sense of dread and terror, overhung the entire financial community, and the ablest, calmest, and most conservative did not hesitate to express their fear that the catastrophe of Chicago will prove but the beginning of widespread financial and commercial difficulty. Indeed, so great a misfortune could hardly have befallen the community at a time when it was so ill-prepared to meet it. At the opening of the fall season, with the banking interests expanded to a point that has been threatening a collapse even without external aid; with the great corporations largely under the control of reckless Wall Street gamblers; with real estate greatly inflated; with the national finances in a somewhat nebulous state of transition; with a political disorganization which pervades all sections of the country and all grades of national life; with all these unfavorable circumstances pressing on the community, the destruction of so large an amount of property at Chicago has a most disastrous effect, and tends to destroy credit in every direction, and to precipitate a panic. But it ought to be borne in mind that a very large part of every "panic" is panic, and nobody ought to get more frightened than he can help.

One of the complications of the situation is due to the condition of France, and its present overpowering influence upon the money markets of the world. However much mistaken they may have seemed who declared France could not bear the pressure of the indemnity, and whose predictions have been apparently disproved by the course of events, it is nevertheless true that France is incapable of supporting this expenditure out of her own resources. The payments so far made have been accomplished by straining her temporary credit to the utmost, and it is beginning to be very doubtful in how far she can comply with her monetary engagements. England, who made the largest advances, is suffering a terrible drain of specie towards the coffers of that reckless "blood and iron" financier, Prince Bismarck, who proposes to lock up large amounts of money to abide future political developments. In the meantime, England is attempting to replenish her coffers by calling upon France, and the latter is being very rapidly drained of all her available coin, and is beginning to experience the beauties of our own system of irredeemable currency, the premium having advanced to about three per cent. The drain from England, too, causes a call upon America, and the rate of foreign exchange here has risen to a point at which specie shipments are not improbable.

The effect which the burning of Chicago is producing on the business world is perhaps as striking a proof as we have ever had of the closeness of the relations which have been established between the uttermost ends of the earth. Calamities, and especially great calamities, are fast ceasing to be what is called local—they are all now general. No serious disaster can overtake Chicago or St. Louis without making London feel something more than sympathy. The probable effect of all this on human happiness would form a curious subject of speculation. It appears almost probable that there will, before long, be no privileged places any more than privileged persons, and no place, in short, any more peaceful or secure against alarms and anxieties than any other place. No matter how much a man may seclude himself, he is tied to the busy world, unless he is a hermit, by his income—and wars, and fires, and famines, and tornadoes, no matter where they occur, now make themselves felt in every pocket. The Happy Valley is a thing of the past. But it is doubtful whether the fire to Chicago itself is as much of a misfortune as it appears. The city was too hastily constructed for permanence and safety. It abounded with wooden houses, wooden pavements, and wooden sidewalks, and the fire will serve a good purpose if it adds one more lesson, even if a terrible one, to the warnings we are every day receiving that great cities can neither be constructed nor managed as small country towns and villages are. Large agglomerations of population do not differ from small ones simply in size; they differ in needs, and, above all, in dangers. The silencing of the press of Chicago by the fire, even for a few days, is one of the strangest of the disasters. The voice of the Tribune especially will be missed by us all, but greatly missed in the West; even in the short period during which the enterprise of its proprietors will allow it to remain unheard. The new Chicago will doubtless have all the excellence of the old one, and a symmetry and solidity and security to which the old one would have taken long to attain. The outpouring of charity caused by the event all over the country bids fair to be on a scale unequalled since the war.

The Democratic State Convention at Rochester has done a little better than most people feared it would do, and a little worse than a few expected. It refused admission to Tammany delegates, but under an arrangement which Tweed had a hand in making, which converted the refusal, to all outward appearance, into a magnanimous withdrawal on the part of Tammany. Moreover, Tammany's withdrawal was deprived of all moral value by the refusal of the Convention not only to admit but to notice the existence of the Reform delegation, and it was with difficulty that three of the delegates were allowed on the last day to address the Convention. Nevertheless, the non-appearance of Tammany in a body which it has for some years ruled despotically, was in some degree a gain for reform, and the Democratic platform, beside the usual bunkum, did denounce the frauds, and did suggest positive remedies—which is more than could be said for the Republican platform—by calling on the Legislature to repeal or modify the charter, so as to concentrate responsibility, and to give the Governor the power of removing mayors. The most valuable piece of work done by it was, however, the passage of a resolution directing all delegates to be hereafter elected by assembly districts, in New York as well as elsewhere. This will put an end to the practice by which Tammany has become a powerful oligarchy, of sending up a solid delegation from this city representing the Tammany General Committee, and nobody else, and really nominated by it and responsible to it. An excellent letter was read at the Convention from Mr. Charles O'Conor, who was unable to attend, and it was a curious sign of the times that the Convention was thrown into confusion by a proposal to nominate him for the Attorney-Generalship. It did nominate Mr. Champlain, a man of whom little is known, except that he is a creature of the Ring. We doubt if many respectable Democrats will, however, vote for him; we are sure a great many will vote for General Barlow, who is not a strict party man. It is of the last importance, at this crisis, that the prosecuting officer of the State should be both able, and honest, and willing, but, above all, willing. The possession of this office by the Ring, both in the State and city, is one of its great sources of strength.

The two most important pieces of news connected with the City frauds during the week have been the assignment, by Mr. Keyser, of about $650,000 worth of property in trust to a member of the Committee of Seventy, to satisfy any claims which may be proved against him, arising out of his transactions with the City Government. He alleges, however, that although he has been set down in the city books for nearly a million and a half, nearly half this he never received, and knows nothing of, and that what he did receive he honestly earned. He has been driven into his present course, it is said, by the pertinacity of the reporters, whose remorseless pursuit nearly drove him crazy; but it is very unfortunate for Mr. Keyser's reputation that he has come out with no reply or explanation till two months after the discovery of the frauds. It was hardly the part of an honest man to hold his tongue, under the circumstances, even if he had nothing to "confess." In the meantime, the Committee of Investigation has also made its report, and tells the same dismal story, with which we are all familiar, of fraud, malversation, forgery, and extravagance in connection with the city funds. Indeed, no form of corruption and abuse ever resorted to by the most corrupt governments of any age or country, except debasing the coin or issuing paper money, seems to have been absent from the management of our city finances. Even the aristocratic device of "sinecures" has been carried to a point never witnessed. The sinecurists and corruptionists of other ages and countries were at least men of some polish or culture, and, even if not respectable, did for some reason or another respect themselves; but our corruptionists are drawn from the very dregs of society—the riff-raff of police courts and bar-rooms, who enjoy the grossness of vice almost more than anything else in it. It is greatly to be feared that the Chicago fire may help the Ring by drawing attention away from the frauds, and filling the public mind with apprehension of great financial disaster. We trust everybody will try to guard against this.

One rarely sees a more nearly unanimous expression of opinion by the press than has been called forth by Murphy's case. The Republican newspapers, almost without exception, ask for his removal, some for the sake of the party, of course, but others on the simple ground of his rascality. He, however, shows no sign of going, and, indeed, this could hardly have been expected; but people did expect that the President would, on seeing what he was charged with, dismiss him. The news comes now, however, and is apparently authentic, that he will not dismiss him, on the ground that Tom has been twice charged and twice acquitted on these charges—once by the Commission of Enquiry in this city, and once by the Senate. This is true; but he has not been acquitted on the evidence now before the public; this was never produced before, and, if the President is not convinced by it, he owes the country a statement of the reasons of his decision just as much as any judge on the bench is bound to give the reasons of his decision. Let us now state once more exactly what Murphy's position is. He has risen from the very dregs of New York politics within ten or twelve years; he is grossly ignorant, so much so that he cannot write a note in decent English; his business reputation was not good before he began to supply the Government; his supplies have been examined by experts, and it has been proved that they were very inferior to the standard; the evidence of his fraudulent intent was produced in abundance, but two of the most important witnesses, after their depositions, which were conclusive, had been taken down, kept out of the way, and refused to sign them. At the investigation, the army standard was found to have been made away with, and the best witnesses failed to appear; it has now been proved that Murphy bribed the detectives not to pursue the case against him; that he has been concerned in "real estate speculations" with Tweed, Connolly, and Hall; that he was at the Philadelphia Convention on Andrew Johnson's side, and voted for Hoffman for the Governorship—in short, that not only is he a bad man, but a bad Republican. Over and above all this, the merchants of the city have no confidence in him, and the Custom-house is managed by him on the same principle as Tweed manages the City Hall. If the President retains him in office, he creates for honest Republicans a situation of exceeding perplexity, and helps to create for the Democrats, or would help if they had any sense, a golden opportunity.

Mr. George Evans, late agent for the State of Pennsylvania in the collection of its claims against the United States arising out of the war, whom the State is now pursuing criminally for breach of trust, has been followed to this city by requisition from Governor Geary, and surrendered, after a vain attempt to escape on a habeas corpus issued by the New York courts. While the argument was pending, we received from his counsel a batch of printed documents, which Mr. Evans believes prove his innocence, and were requested to read them and do him justice. We have read them, and have compared them with the statements we made Sept. 7, and find that we fell into one or two trifling inaccuracies. We said that Mr. Evans "found two bondsmen in $5,000 dollars each"; the bondsmen were in $10,000 each. We said that there was no mention of the rate of compensation he was to receive made in his agreement with the governor; there was mention of it, by reference to the joint resolution creating the office. Having made these corrections, we may as well say that we think Mr. Evans shows a good deal of assurance in asking us to whitewash him. Upon the papers now before us, we find that, although by his own agreement he was bound "to pay over forthwith to the State Treasurer all moneys he might be able to collect, less the commission allowed (10 per cent.) and to make semi-annual reports to the State Treasurer of amounts collected, and the sources from which derived; and also to make annual reports to the governor under oath, including amounts collected, and a statement of all claims ascertained to be due the State, and from what sources," he made no report to anybody for four years. He entered on the duties of his office in March, 1867, and his first report, which he waggishly calls an "interim report," and says that "the time had come when it might be made without any prejudice to the interest of the State," meaning, of course, the interest of George Evans, is dated July, 1871. Moreover, on his own showing, he collected in May, 1867, nearly $2,000,000, of his disposition of which he rendered no account, though he pocketed the commission. He also subsequently discovered a batch of other State claims against the General Government, which were clearly not contemplated in the joint resolution, and these he collected too, again pocketing the commission, but still making no report, and never having his accounts audited by anybody in behalf of the State. We do not assert that there is proof as yet that he has been guilty of fraud, but he has acted in all respects like a man who is guilty of fraud, and is, we think, an eminently fit subject for a searching investigation.

The political nominations in Massachusetts were closed last week by the action of the Labor Reformers at Framingham and the Prohibitionists in Boston; and so far as the personal character and ability of the four candidates for governor are concerned, the Massachusetts voter might fairly hesitate how to choose among them. Butler men, who appeared as Republicans at Worcester, were found in both gatherings, and one of these, a colored lawyer, Mr. George L. Ruffin, got his reward in a nomination for Attorney-General. The General himself, however, received but a cold support from the Labor party, though that experienced politician, Mr. Wendell Phillips, seemed to find it necessary, in his rôle of president and manager, to advise against Butler's nomination on grounds of expediency. In the course of his remarks he made his usual defence of the Commune and the Internationale. The resolutions, however, were not of so furious a type. They affirmed "labor, the creator of wealth," to be "entitled to all it creates," and the aim of the party to be "the overthrow of the whole profit-making system," and to make "war with the present system of finance," and other more definite as well as some sensible objects, including ten hours a day for factory work "as a first step," and eight hours in Government employ. Women were readily admitted as delegates, and resolutions favoring equal wages for them and the suffrage were adopted.

With the exception of Texas, the recent elections have been uniformly favorable to the Republicans. In Connecticut the contest was for town officers. In Pennsylvania, on Tuesday, the House, part of the Senate, and two executive officers were chosen, and the result is a working Republican majority in the Legislature, which assures to the party the redistricting of the State for a new lease of power. Amid serious rioting, in which the police were conspicuous for assaults on the colored voters, the Republicans have carried the city of Philadelphia, and rescued it from Democratic control. As was expected in Ohio, the Republicans elect Gen. Noyes and the rest of the State ticket, but the complexion of the Legislature is, as we write, uncertain, and upon that depend Senator Sherman's chances of being kept in his seat or succeeded by a Democrat. From Iowa, too, we have no certain intelligence, but the only open question in that State is the choice among several Republican candidates for the senatorship. In Texas, the Republicans will be lucky if they have retained one Congressman of their three, and the Democrats (or the anti-status-quo party) will now have an opportunity to redress some of the maladministration of the last three years.

Major Hodge, the defaulting paymaster, has been sentenced by court-martial to what would practically prove imprisonment for life, ten years of it with hard labor, but the President has commuted it to ten years of hard labor; not too severe, if only the requirements of the day are considered, but far too severe when we consider that similar defaulters in the civil service are treated simply as unfortunate debtors. The Louisville Commercial disputes our assertion that civil functionaries are not "brought to justice" for these frauds, and cites, in proof of its contradiction, a report of the recovery of a judgment at Williamsport, Pa., by the United States District Attorney, against a defaulting collector and his sureties. Precisely; but has anybody heard of the indictment of a defaulting collector? Suing a man for money he has made away with is not what is called "bringing him to justice."

The elections for the Conseils Généraux in France have taken place and the result, if we may judge by the first reports, looks like a triumph of the Republicans—of both wings, Radical and Moderate—over the men of the Right, and chiefly over the Legitimists. The Radicals have carried the great cities of Lyons, Marseilles, and Toulouse, and most of the industrial centres; the Moderate Republicans have been successful in Lille, the Department of Cher, and almost all over Normandy; the Conservatives, in Paris. The Bonapartists are reported to have carried some districts in the Department of Aisne, in Aube, in Corsica, and in "Central France." The Orleanists have elected the Duc d'Aumale; the Legitimists, M. Larcy, the Minister of Public Works; the Radicals, General Faidherbe; the Bonapartists, Prince Napoleon. Among the defeated are Gambetta, Picard, and Forcade. The partial success of the Bonapartists, whatever it may have been, is probably owing in the main to the co-operation of Conservatives of other shades whom recent defeats have caused to despair of victory under their own banners. That the Imperialists have of late been more than usually active in recruiting adherents all over France, is now admitted on all hands, excepting by their own organs; and that the doings of their special agents for the purpose are not viewed by the Government with indifference is proved, among other things, by an order of General Ladmirault, the Military Governor of Paris, commanding a strict watch over the surroundings of the barracks, and the arrest of persons caught in attempts to distribute Imperialist pamphlets among the soldiery. The Republican journals of Paris teem with denunciations of conspiracies, and some plotters are said to have been arrested. More serious, however, seems to be the disquietude inspired by the condition of affairs in Algeria, in spite of all the defeats and chastisements lately inflicted on the revolted tribes and localities. In fact, that province threatens to be to France what Cuba is to Spain.

The Alsace-Lorraine treaty is reported to be on the point of being concluded, both M. Pouyer-Quertier and Count Arnim, the principal negotiators of the contracting governments, having gone to Berlin to finish the affair in presence of Bismarck, to whom M. Thiers, on his own responsibility, sacrifices the obnoxious point of full tariff reciprocity inserted by the National Assembly. In doing it, the President of the Republic is aided by the urgent clamor for deliverance from the German occupation now so opportunely raised by the territories the evacuation of which is one of the main stipulations of the treaty. The city of Dijon is the loudest in its cries for speedy relief and accusations against the German garrison. The counter-complaints of the Germans, referring to outrages suffered by their countrymen in Lyons, M. Thiers endeavors to allay by punishing some of the offenders. His pardoning power, in regard to the victims of the Versailles courts-martial, he declares to be limited by the Committee of Pardons. According to a despatch which, as we believe, lacks confirmation, M. Rochefort is the first to whom a commutation of sentence has been granted. This he hardly deserved by the attitude he assumed in his self-defence during the trial, which was far from dignified and manly. On the other hand, we cannot discover in his answers, which, if not brilliant with wit and repartee, were certainly ready and to the point, any trace of that cowardly nervousness which some correspondents have depicted: "His attitude was pitiful. His pallor was horrid. He trembled from head to foot; his voice . . . was only heard in spasmodic sobs, and his whole appearance was so humble that it roused indignation instead of pity." Two things, however, appear to us to be settled beyond all doubt; first, the gloves which Rochefort wore on the occasion were faultless; second, that the course of action which he defended was abominable.

The controversy between M. Thiers and Bismarck over the customs duties on the manufactures of Alsace and Lorraine is one of the most singular in political history. It reveals, as perhaps few incidents have ever done, the logical absurdity which underlies the whole protectionist theory, and illustrates the soundness of Turgot's saying, that nobody was competent to discuss economical problems who, while doing so, could not banish political boundaries from his mind. What Bismarck and Thiers are each trying to do is to prevent the entrance of the products of Alsatian industry into their respective countries—that is, the very things which made Alsace most valuable to France, the great products of her labor and capital, have become evils to be avoided by France in every possible way, because the German flag is hoisted on her soil. On the other hand, these very things, too, which have contributed largely to make Alsace worth seizing, are now treated by Germany as evils to be kept out as long as possible, simply because they are of French origin. Frenchmen are poor and suffering, and have suffered enormous loss of capital; therefore, they must not have the cheap cotton and linen of their lost provinces; and Germans are poor, too, and must be saved from the same curses, for a while anyhow.

"THE BOSS'S" DOMINIONS.

THE proceedings at the Democratic Convention at Rochester will repay careful study for more reasons than one. They afford, of course, first and foremost, conclusive evidence—though it cannot be said that any evidence was needed on this point—that nothing in the way of reform is to be expected from the Democratic party in this State, as such. The party organization has grown too strong—paradoxical as this may sound—for any good to be got out of it. That is, although it contains a great many honest men who really mean well, and who would like to see it serviceable to the country, the great majority have contracted habits of considering its maintenance as an organization as the highest political end, and all other things as secondary and subsidiary to this. This is the perfection of discipline, but any party which has allowed it in a free country may be said to have become simply and purely an instrument of evil. Voters who obey blindly are just as dangerous to the state as an army which fires blindly; indeed, they may be said to be more dangerous, because they are more difficult to deal with. An army may be dissolved; but what is to be done with a hundred thousand citizens to whom their ballots are served out like fixed ammunition, and who drop them into the box at the word of command, and with a kind of military pride in not caring what they contain, provided they come from the proper quarter? To this pass all successful parties are apt to come, and to this pass the Democratic party came long ago, though the strength of its discipline has never been subjected to so severe a test as at Rochester. Two delegations went up from this city: the one composed of men whom any party in any State in the Union might be proud to send to a convention, chosen through the usual party machinery, and representing the best elements of the party in this city; the other, composed of obscure men, either damaged in reputation or the acknowledged creatures of public officers who are laboring under grave charges of fraud and peculation. There was nothing doubtful either about these charges. Many millions of the money of the city have confessedly disappeared while the treasury was in charge of the Tammany chiefs. This is not denied. The only question now in debate is in what way the money was divided between them; and the whole matter has been before the public for two months. The Reform delegation was, in fact, elected for the express purpose of filling the place in the Convention which it was taken as a matter of course the "Tammany thieves" would, under the circumstances, be compelled to vacate. Nevertheless, although the Tammany delegation did not take its seat, it was allowed to proclaim that it refrained of its own free will, and the Reform delegation was not even alluded to in the proceedings, and it was only through great effort that towards the close two or three of its members were allowed to make speeches as private individuals. This was all done in the interest of the party. The leaders—even those who believe in the Tammany frauds—consented to allow the Tammany men to arrange the matter in their own way, and to ignore the existence of the reformers altogether; and they did so because in their opinion a contrary course would have exposed the party in this State to a tremendous disaster at the next election.

Now, what was the danger they feared? The answer to this question contains such food for reflection as has seldom been supplied to an intelligent political community, and we ask for it the serious attention of our readers. What they feared, and what they sought to avoid by the scandalous rejection of the Reform delegation, and the still more scandalous submission to Tweed's programme, was the loss of the Democratic majority in this city, and the consequent loss of the State. In other words, they feared that if they refused to let Tweed have his own way, he, whom nearly every respectable man in New York calls a scoundrel, and whose life is a scandalous piece of riotous profligacy, would carry with him out of the Democratic ranks enough votes to cause the complete defeat of the party—that is to say, from 30,000 to 50,000. They felt, and in this way acknowledged, that no platform or ticket they could construct could prevent this result; that without Tweed they could not have the voters—and they surrendered to him accordingly. We are not now dealing in vague rumors or gossip. We are reciting notorious facts.

Now, consider what this means. It means that the shrewdest politicians we have, have deliberately reached the conclusion that one man, of notoriously bad character, steeped in fraud and corruption, audacious and open in his defiance of law and public opinion, and ostentatious in displaying the results of his peculations, commands, as a general commands troops, a sufficiently large body of the voters of the metropolis to turn the scale at elections in this State, and can lead them from one side to the other, without regard to principles, doctrines, or cries, so as to defeat and drive from the field whichever party attempts to meddle with him. We do not say that this is true; we say that our shrewdest managers believe it to be true; Mr. S. J. Tilden confessed that he believed it, in sackcloth and ashes, by his action at the Convention. Tweed himself is just as sure of it as he is of the existence of his "mansion" and stables on Fifth Avenue, and laughs over the attempts of the good people to drive him from power very much as MacCallummore or Shane O'Neill would have laughed, in the sixteenth century, if a sheriff had come up from Edinburgh or down from Dublin to arrest him for debt.

We are glad of all this for various reasons, but, most of all, because it will help still further to open the eyes of the optimists and theorists whose good-humored complacency is one of the great obstacles in the way of real reform. The best people of New York have never been fully aware of the gravity of the situation which has, for the last twenty years, been growing up in this city—partly through the carelessness and hopefulness which are bred of great material prosperity, and partly through total ignorance of the nature of the element which emigration has been introducing into our population. The newspapers have never pointed the facts as darkly as they might have pointed them; first, because no newspaper likes to play the part of a Cassandra, and, secondly, because they did not expect to be believed if they did. When the Times began its crusade against corruption and rascality, it labored hard and long before it got the public ear, or could secure public faith in its sincerity, and, indeed, if James O'Brien had not peached on the Ring, we greatly fear the gallant and public-spirited conductors of that paper would have found, by this time, that all they had got for their pains was the reputation of querulous, growling, ill-conditioned "slangwhangers."

The Citizens' Association, in its earlier and better days, instituted an investigation in the nature of a census, with the view of ascertaining the number of voters whom the Ring reached and controlled, or influenced, by the various instruments at its command—offices, sinecures, contracts, public works, untried indictments, suspended sentences, penalties, licenses, ordinances, and so on—and found that it was not less than 60,000, that is, nearly half the voting population of the city. Since then its powers have been greatly increased by concentration in fewer hands, and by the control of larger funds. This conveys a tolerably clear idea to anybody's mind. Most Americans understand how a vast system of corruption may be created out of such materials as these; but what most Americans do not understand is the moral and mental condition of the population in which this system operates. The good people in New York are, of course, of all races and come from all parts of the country; but the more active reformers are mostly of New England origin or education, or, at all events, are peculiarly and strongly American in the best sense of the term. Now, to this class it is hardly an exaggeration to say, that the region over which Tweed rules is as much a terra incognita as Montenegro or Albania. They send missionaries and teachers into it and go into it occasionally themselves, with food, and medicines, and tracts, but they know no more what the inhabitants of that dark land are thinking and saying, by what motives they are governed, how they look at American politics and society, what influences operate on them most powerfully, and what circumstances excite their distrust or confidence, than if they were still in Cork or Limerick. Most of Tweed's subjects are Irish Catholics; and if there be a character and temperament which to the Irish Catholic are peculiarly unsympathetic and repulsive, not to say irritating, it is those of the orderly, methodical, conscientious, cold, exacting American Protestant. He dislikes him, constitutionally, socially, and historically. He is the old "Saxon foe," modified, doubtless, and for the better in some ways, but for the worse in others; and he lives apart from him, and cannot co-operate with him cordially in any work not purely commercial, or in which sentiment plays any part. We might illustrate this indefinitely if we had space, or if it were necessary. Nearly everybody who lives in a large city can illustrate it for himself. There could hardly be a more striking revelation of the sources of Tweed's power than is to be found in the gulf which still separates American families from their Irish servants.

The American, on the other hand, finds it just as hard to understand the Irishman. In the first place, two centuries of self-government, self-dependence, and practice in affairs, and close calculation of the results of conduct, have given him a utilitarian habit of mind which has made of him the best politician the world ever saw. Indeed, so ingrained has his utilitarianism become, that he finds a man who acts from impulse in politics, and is not amenable to reason or persuadable by discussion, and is unwilling to be bound by the vote, and believes in occasionally closing an argument by a blow, almost incomprehensible—so incomprehensible that he even doubts the existence of large bodies of such persons. Wherever he sees disorders, and tumults, and revolutions, he ascribes them to the machinations of an aristocracy, and he fondly persuades himself that there is no people who would not be happy if the government were handed over to the majority. The average Northern man could not believe that the Southerners would really revolt till the shells began to burst under his nose; and three or four years ago it was calmly laid down, at a dinner given to M. Romero by a number of very intellectual men in this city, that universal suffrage was not only good for the Mexicans, but for all races and peoples on earth. Now, the whole system of morality which the American has built up around the ballot-box, his reverence for the decision of the majority, and his horror of bribery and frauds, are to the average Irish peasant simply ridiculous, and for this principal reason: the Irish Catholics—putting aside for the moment the difficulties in the way of constitutional government which in their case, as well as in that of the French, are created by temperament—are really, as regards political development, still in what we may call the clan stage—that is, they have not passed through the same process of political and social development as the other European races. The destruction of the power of the chiefs was not followed in Ireland by the admission of the people to a free political life, but by a kind of anarchy in which all political education was impossible. The only mode of deciding controversies ever seen was force; the only law, the will of a great man; the only source of security or plenty, somebody's bounty. The priest, in some degree, took the place of the chief, but as soon as the English political system was extended over the island, the old tribal ideas were at once applied to the elections. The voters went to the polls as to a faction-fight, and voting was done as a sign of devotion to a beloved leader, but a sign of the same kind as giving one of his enemies a blow with an oak stick. A man voted when no other way of rendering the service offered itself—that is, as one of many tactical devices for confounding the foe.

The application of all this to the state of things here is obvious. Tweed's retainers are fed by his bounty. The first thing one of them does on his arrival here is to take some one as his political guide; it is probably the most prominent and active man of his own faith and race in the ward, a grog-shop keeper whose house he frequents, or a contractor who employs him, and with whose ways of thinking and feeling he is familiar, and whose word he believes. All these henchmen are in Tweed's pay in one way or another, and their preachings are supplemented and enforced by enormous largesses, such as the $50,000 in coal which he distributed last winter. The Evening Post, and a good many other excellent people, fancy his influence can be broken by sending in missionaries of the Republican party with tracts to tell the clansmen that Tweed is a rascal, and is robbing them; but we take leave to say that this is a delusion, and we wish we could call it a harmless one. There is only one body of men in [this city who could do this work effectually, and that is the priests; but Tweed has secured himself against attacks from that quarter by means familiar to everybody. The proverb that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," is a terse statement of one of the great difficulties of politics. What the remedy is, we have left ourselves no room to state fully this week; but we repeat our belief that it will have to be more radical, and will need more courage than is generally imagined, and one portion of it must be the call of the tax-gatherer on the largest possible portion of the population. The cheap and easy plan of making the large property-holders come in with their checks to the treasury must be given up. We must go, or make Tweed go, round to every room-keeper even, and get his contribution to the municipal expenses—that is, we must somehow put the government into the hands of men who pay taxes, and know they pay them. This would be costly and cumbersome, but to this or something like it we must come, if we would not come to something worse. To something worse we certainly shall come, if the plan of blinking the hard facts of the situation be persisted in.

BOHEMIANISM IN FRENCH POLITICS.

The sentence passed on Rochefort—imprisonment for life in a fortress—excited a good deal of surprise in other countries, and especially in this, by its severity. It has since been commuted to banishment from France, owing partly to the intercession of friends, but principally, we suspect, to the painful evidences, revealed on the trial, of the man's utter feebleness of character. He broke down completely when arraigned before a court-martial and put in peril of his life, and had nothing better to falter out in defence of the lying articles in which he assailed the Versailles Government, during the reign of the Commune, than that their follies and falsehoods were due to "a nervous way of writing he had." The rigor of the court-martial was, however, fully approved by the French public, and for reasons all of which do not appear on the surface, and the weightiest of which have no relation to Rochefort personally. Rochefort really was by no means the worst of those concerned in the late troubles; indeed, he may be said to have been one of the best, and to have earned during the siege the thanks of the friends of order and decency. Nor were his literary labors under the Commune anything extraordinary in the matter of bitterness and unscrupulousness. His misfortune, or his crime, was that he appeared before the military tribunal as the representative of what has been called the "Bohemian element" in the Commune; or, in other words, the chief of the band of broken-down littérateurs, lawyers, doctors, and students who did so much through their speeches at the clubs, and their articles in the petite presse, to make the Commune possible, and who played so large a part in carrying it on after it was set up.

The more that is known about the Commune, the stranger it seems; and there was, perhaps, nothing so strange and startling in its history as the appearance in it of a swarm of adventurers from the Quartier Latin, with pretensions more or less well founded to education, and who had nothing in common with the working-classes, for whose benefit the Commune professed to be established, except poverty. A remarkable paper on the part played by this low literary element in Parisian society in the late troubles, from the pen of M. Caro, of the Institute, appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes of July 15, and it is worth reading by anybody who wants to understand the hatred with which men of Rochefort's stamp are now regarded by the conservative portion of French society—that is to say, by four-fifths of it. To be a "Bohemian," in the French sense of the term, as originated, we believe, by Henri Murger, who was the original Bohemian, one has not only to be averse to regular industry, unable or unwilling to follow any regular vocation, fond of physical enjoyment, indifferent to all the things which constitute "respectability," but also to be, ostensibly at least, a worshipper of "art"—that is, of an ideal standard of excellence, whether in painting, music, or literature. Every great city contains a large number of persons of this stamp, but Paris a far larger number than any other, for several obvious reasons. The condition of the French professions and of French commerce is such that failure to root one's self at the outset in a fixed calling is almost irretrievable. The barriers between one pursuit and another are rarely surmountable, and society is singularly intolerant of anything like enterprise or fertility of resource; and the spirit of adventure, which at one time sent its restless spirits out to found new states, or make great conquests, has been completely dead for over a century. Then, it must be admitted that the tendency to "loaf" which is the besetting sin of all persons whose work is completely in their own hands and may be done at one time as well as another, displays itself strongly in the French character. The frequency with which all through the provincial towns one finds the husband playing dominoes at the café, at broad noon, while the wife is attending the store, is a familiar illustration of it. Then, the drift of young men to Paris to seek their fortune, as well as to study, and the obstacles to anything like quiet and persistent devotion to a calling which Paris life has for the last twenty years more particularly offered, are things the like of which is not seen in any other capital. The failures of all professions gather there, and they are met by all the vaguely ambitious, the idle, the lazy, the greedy, and the envious, and the good-for-nothing of all kinds, and the whole of them devote themselves to two things—writing for the press, painting pictures, and making love to sewing-girls. We published in the Nation, three years ago, some articles descriptive of life among the art students, which gave a vivid picture of the singular, and many people would say the awful, moral condition of the whole Bohemian world; the complete extinction among them of belief in anything, or admiration for anything, but "art" and material luxury. They were not even proud of being Frenchmen, but of being "very civilized."

In the beginning, Bohemians were simply poor and unsuccessful, so that though, according to their own account, nearly all that was heroic or genuine in French society, and all the insight in art, and literature, and philosophy which Providence had allotted to the people, had taken refuge among them, the problem which mainly occupied their minds when they got up in the morning was the means of finding a dinner or paying for their lodging. Out of this phase, which, as it appeared in their literature, lasted about ten years, they passed into the envious and malignant phase, and devoted themselves to reviling the successful in all walks of life, especially in art and literature, and accounting for it by disgraceful events in their career. Under the Empire, for the first time, Bohemia turned its attention to politics and sociology, and, from hating successful artists and authors, took to hating all well-to-do people, and all people who had established themselves in any walk of life, and the "petite presse," as it was called, appeared, consisting of a swarm of little papers, mostly short-lived, filled with scandalous stories of and attacks on persons occupying respectable positions, and revelling in the sense of discomfort and alarm they spread through the community. It was evident they were now making war on society as a whole. In the latter days of the Empire, however, they turned their attention to the crapulous and unclean horde of courtiers and speculators who had gathered round the Tuileries, and delighted the Parisian world for some months by the incisiveness and brutality of some of their exposures, and even seduced many into the belief that the Bohemians were going to turn moralists. About this time, Rochefort, who was one of them, came to the surface with his Lanterne, and devoted himself wholly to the Emperor and his family, sparing neither age nor sex, and rapidly grew, to the disgrace of French society, into a political personage. His filthy libels and lampoons did more to shake the Empire than all the eloquence and labor of the opposition in the Chambers. But the Bohemians never really appeared above-ground till the clubs were opened in 1868–9. When the meetings began, it was remarked that the workingmen who appeared at them as orators, and who, wild as many of their notions were, were really in earnest, were far outnumbered by seedy-looking "doctors" and "advocates" and elderly "law and medical students," the editorial corps of papers which never got beyond No. 1, all of whom began to devote themselves, as M. Caro says, wholly to "transcendental politics and humanitarian regeneration." There appeared with them a considerable force of female lecturers, or, as he calls them, "conférencières," who maintained with great fierceness that the failure of the first Revolution was due to its neglecting the emancipation of woman. Several of these started little papers, and developed a new type of journalist—the "journaliste communeuse." M. Thiers had no more ferocious enemies than these; according to them, the old rascal was always "drunk with the people's blood and sweat." What made their adhesion to the cause of the Commune all the more singular was, that they have been shockingly treated by some of the leading male socialists. Proudhon has cruelly castigated them, but none of the sect has been so unrelenting as Bebel, the great German apostle of the Communists, who says, "as to woman, with very rare exceptions, she can be of no use in the reconstruction of society. The slave of every prejudice, tainted with all sorts of diseases, moral and physical, she will be the stumbling-block of progress. Towards her it will be necessary to employ—morally, certainly, physically, perhaps—the peremptory argument used with the inbred slaves—the stick."

The Marseillaise, perhaps, marked the highest point reached by Bohemian journalism. One of its "staff," Paschal Grousset, was made Minister of Foreign Affairs by the Commune, and amused himself and the world by sending despatches to the Prussian commander and notifying Europe of his accession to office. Scores of others of the tribe became magistrates, inspectors, judges, and commissioners, and had a brief taste of power and luxury, enough to console them probably for years of penury and obscurity. The descent of the Positive philosophers into the arena, many of whom were tickled by the Commune's contempt for majorities, gave the farce a curious air of science which sat oddly on many of the Bohemians. Raoul Rigault, a licentious rascal, who acted as Procureur of the Commune, talked flippantly on spontaneous generation, a theory which greatly delighted him, just as he was going to execute the unfortunate hostages at La Roquette. "It makes creation completely useless," said he, "and God, if he existed, would be good for nothing, except to be shot."

We ought to add that M. Caro ascribes a good deal of influence on the course of events to the Bohemians' love of absinthe, which they drink regularly, and of the deleterious effects of which on the brain tissues doctors are now fully satisfied. But, in spite of the general and hideous absurdity of the performance, there was in it a certain method, from the Bohemian point of view. They realized in the Commune a thoroughly Bohemian dream of riches and power acquired without labor, and retained simply by continuous and incoherent talking, and it ended, like a splendid theatrical finale, in a glorious and exciting scene of flame and blood. There was one incident in the story which is hardly short of delicious in its pathos and simplicity. The Communist Minister of Public Instruction published, during his brief tenure of office, a periodical at the public expense, in which he printed the articles which he had for years offered in vain to the brutal editors of the old society. He at least had his revenge, and saw the dawning of the better day.

NIAGARA.

I.

NIAGARA, September 28.

MY journey hitherward by a morning's sail from Toronto across Lake Ontario, seemed to me, as regards a certain dull vacuity in this episode of travel, a kind of calculated preparation for the uproar of Niagara—a pause or hush on the threshold of a great sensation; and this, too, in spite of the reverent attention I was mindful to bestow on the first-seen, in my experience, of the great lakes. It has the merit, from the shore, of producing a slight perplexity of vision. It is the sea, and yet just not the sea. The huge expanse, the landless line of the horizon, suggest the ocean; while an indefinable shortness of pulse, a kind of fresh-water gentleness of tone, seem to contradict the idea. What meets the eye is on the ocean scale, but you feel somehow that the lake is a thing of smaller spirit. Lake navigation, therefore, seems to me not especially entertaining. The scene tends to offer, as one may say, a sort of marine-effect manqué. It has the blankness and vacancy of the sea without that vast essential swell which, amid the belting brine, so often saves the situation to the eye. I was occupied, as we crossed, in wondering whether this dull reduction of the ocean contained that which could properly be termed "scenery." At the mouth of the Niagara River, however, after a three hours' sail, scenery really begins, and very soon crowds upon you in force. The steamer puts into the narrow channel of the stream, and heads upward between high embankments. From this point, I think, you really enter into relations with Niagara. Little by little the elements become a picture, rich with the shadows of coming events. You have a foretaste of the great spectacle of color which you enjoy at the Falls. The even cliffs of red-brown earth are now crusted, now spotted, with autumnal orange and crimson, and laden with this ardent boskage plunge sheer into the deep-dyed green of the river. As you proceed, the river begins to tell its tale—at first in broken syllables of foam and flurry, and then, as it were, in rushing, flashing sentences and passionate interjections. Onwards from Lewiston, where you are transferred from the boat to the train, you see it from the cope of the American cliff, far beneath you, now superbly unnavigable. You have a lively sense of something happening ahead; the river, as a man near me said, has evidently been in a row. The cliffs here are immense; they form genuine vomitoria worthy of the living floods whose exit they protect. This is the first act of the drama of Niagara; for it is, I believe, one of the commonplaces of description that you instinctively harmonize and dramatize it. At the station pertaining to the railway suspension-bridge, you see in mid-air beyond an interval of murky confusion produced by the further bridge, the smoke of the trains, and the thickened atmosphere of the peopled bank, a huge far-flashing sheet which glares through the distance as a monstrous absorbent and irradiant of light. And here, in the interest of the picturesque, let me note that this obstructive bridge tends in a way to enhance the first glimpse of the cataract. Its long black span, falling dead along the shining brow of the Falls, seems shivered and smitten by their fierce effulgence, and trembles across the field of vision like some mighty mote in an excess of light. A moment later, as the train proceeds, you plunge into the village, and the cataract, save as a vague ground-tone to this trivial interlude, is, like so many other goals of æsthetic pilgrimage, temporarily postponed to the hotel.

With this postponement comes, I think, an immediate decline of expectation; for there is every appearance that the spectacle you have come so far to see is to be choked in the horribly vulgar shops and booths and catchpenny artifices which have pushed and elbowed to within the very spray of the Falls, and ply their importunities in shrill competition with its thunder. You see a multitude of hotels and taverns and shops, glaring with white paint, bedizened with placards and advertisements, and decorated by groups of those gentlemen who flourish most rankly on the soil of New York and in the vicinage of hotels; who carry their hands in their pockets, wear their hats always and every way, and, although of a sedentary habit, yet spurn the earth with their heels. A side-glimpse of the Falls, however, calls out one's philosophy; you reflect that this is but such a sordid foreground as Turner liked to use; you hurry to where the roar grows louder, and, I was going to say, you escape from the village. In fact, however, you don't escape from it; it is constantly at your elbow, just to the right or the left of the line of contemplation. It would be paying Niagara a poor compliment to say that, practically, she does not hurl off this chaffering by-play from her cope; but as you value the integrity of your impression, you are bound to affirm that it hereby suffers appreciable abatement. You wonder, as you stroll about, whether it is altogether an unrighteous dream that with the slow progress of culture, and the possible or impossible growth of some larger comprehension of beauty and fitness, the public conscience may not tend to ensure to such sovereign phases of nature something of the inviolability and privacy which we are slow to bestow, indeed, upon fame, but which we do not grudge at least to art. We place a great picture, a great statue, in a museum; we erect a great monument in the centre of our largest square, and if we can suppose ourselves nowadays building a cathedral, we should certainly isolate it as much as possible and subject it to no ignoble contact. We cannot build about Niagara with walls and a roof, nor girdle it with a palisade, but the sentimental tourist may muse upon the chances of its being guarded by the negative homage of empty spaces and absent barracks and decent forbearance. The actual abuse of the scene belongs evidently to that immense class of iniquities which are destined to grow very much worse in order to grow a very little better. The good humor engendered by the main spectacle bids you suffer it to run its course.

Though hereabouts so much is great, distances are small, and a ramble of two or three hours enables you to gaze hither and thither from a dozen standpoints. The one you are likely to choose first is that on the Canada cliff, something above the suspension bridges. The great fall faces you, enshrined in the surging increase of its own resounding mists. The common feeling just here, I believe, is one of disappointment at its want of height; the vision grasps less in quantity than it had been prompted to expect. My own sense, I confess, was absolutely gratified from the first; and, indeed, not the bulk and volume of the matter, but its exquisite expression, seemed to me paramount. You are, moreover, at some distance, and you feel that with the lessening interval you will not be cheated of your chance to be dizzied with pure size. Already you see the world-famous green, baffling painters, baffling poets, clear and lucid on the lip of the precipice; the more so, of course, for the clouds of silver and snow into which it drops transformed. The whole picture before you is admirably simple. The Horseshoe gleams and glares and boils and smokes from the centre to the right, drumming itself dim with vapors: in the centre, the dark pedestal of Goat Island divides the double flood; to the left booms and smokes the minor thunder of the American Fall; and, on a level with the eye, above the still crest of either cataract, appear the white faces of the uttermost rapids. The circle of weltering froth at the base of the Horseshoe, emerging from the dead white vapors—absolute white, as moonless midnight is absolute black—which muffle impenetrably the final crash of the plunge, melts slowly into the powerful green of the lower river. It seems a mighty drama in itself, this blanched survival and recovery of the stream. It stretches away like a tired swimmer, struggling from the snowy scum and the silver drift, and passing slowly from an eddying foam-sheet, touched with green lights, to a cold stony green, streaked and marbled with trails and wild arabesques of foam. This is the beginning of that air of unforgotten trouble which marks the river as you meet it at the lake. The ultimate green I speak of is of admirable hue—the clearest, the greenest, the coldest of all greens—a green as sombre and steady as most greens are light and inconstant. So it shifts along, with a sort of measured pride, deep and lucid, and yet of immense body, the most stately, the least turbid of torrents. Its movement, its sweep, and progression are as admirable as its color, but as little as its color to be made a matter of words. These things are but part of a spectacle in which nothing is imperfect. As you draw nearer and nearer, on the Canada cliff, to the right arm of the Horseshoe, the mass begins in all conscience to be large enough. You are able at last to stand on the very cope of the shelf from which the leap is taken, bathing your boot-toes, if you like, in the side-ooze of the glassy curve. I may say, in parenthesis, that the importunities one suffers here, amid the central din of the cataract, from hackmen and photographers and venders of gimcracks, are simply hideous and infamous. The road is lined with little drinking-shops and warehouses, and from these retreats their occupants dart forth in competition upon the hapless traveller with talk of their pigmy side-shows. I can but ask—need such things be? You purchase release at last by a great outlay of the small coin of dogged "No's," and stand steeped in long looks at the most beautiful object in the world.

Correspondence.

THE REDUCTION OF DUTY ON SUGAR AND COFFEE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Notwithstanding I differ totally from you on the question of protection, I am happy to concede to you the rare merit of fairness in argument. Your auxiliary in the contest, the New York Evening Post, seems unable or unwilling to be just when a point can be made in favor of free trade. In its issue of September 23 will be found an article trying to explain the awkward fact that, though the duty on sugar has been reduced about one cent per pound, and on coffee two cents per pound, the prices of these articles are to-day as high as they were a year ago under the old tariff. The writer, after groping in the dark for a reason, says boldly the one cent on sugar "is divided between the refiner and dealer," and on coffee "the gain is enjoyed by the wholesale and retail dealers."

In regard to coffee, a writer in the same journal explained, under date of September 26, that the cause of high prices in this case was a deficiency in the crop, which, of course, produced higher prices throughout the civilized world. The producer got the benefit of the advanced prices, and the dealer had nothing more than his usual small profit for importing and distributing. The same fact is true in regard to sugar. Our chief supply comes from Cuba, and there the deficiency in the crop is estimated at from 20 to 30 per cent. The result has been a rise in prices in Cuba. No. 12 (Dutch standard) sugars, September 16, 1871, were worth 10½ to 11 reals, and last year, September 17, they were 9 to 9¼ reals.

This rise dates back to the beginning of the free deliveries to this country—July 8, 1871, 11¼ to 11½ reals; July 9, 1870, 9 to 9¼ reals; April 29, 1871, 10¼ to 10¾ reals; April 30, 1870, 8¼ to 8½ reals. It seems pretty clear that the importer has to pay more for his sugar than he did last year. If the Evening Post had consulted any of that class of merchants, he might have found out that the one cent remitted by a generous government from its duties may have gone to Cuba, but certainly did not stick by the way in the importer's hands. But he adds, the refiner got a part. The exact truth is, that the refiners, as a class, do not import their sugars. They buy the raw sugar in the open market, and their gain or loss is in the difference between the price of raw and refined sugars, deducting the expense of manufacture. If raw sugar is 9 cents or 10 cents per pound, they have to buy it, and the change in tariff is of no direct importance to them.

To compare last year with this, taking the printed prices current: September 14, 1871, good to prime refining, 9⅝ to 9¾ cents; crushed, 13 cents—September 15, 1870, good to prime refining, 9⅝ to 9¾ cents; crushed, 13⅜ cents. That is, the refiner pays as much for his raw material as he did a year ago, and gets three-eighths of a cent less for his refined product. I really cannot see that any part of the one cent comes into the refiner's possession.

It is fair to say, then, that this year's experience proves that a reduction in the tariff cannot secure low prices if the rest of the world has to pay high prices. The figures, without explanation, are neither for nor against free trade, but the explanation does show that the importer on the seaboard has no direct interest in prices, except so far as low prices encourage importations and enable him to do a larger business. The sugar refiners are in the same position. High prices are not in their favor, since the difference between raw and refined sugars is their only source of profit. The whole point of their interest in the tariff has been to have the scale so graduated that refined, or partially refined, sugar, the product of slave or pauper labor, should not be allowed to come in at a rate of duty which would prevent the use of American manufactures. Their position is that of the cotton manufacturers, or other producers of articles not far advanced beyond the crude state. They do not ask for an undue protection to build up a new enterprise, but simply such a rate of duty as will pay a moderate rate of interest to the owner, and such wages to the workmen as Americans insist upon having. U. C.

Notes.

Messrs. Dodd & Mead's fall publications include a new work by President Porter, on the trustworthiness of induction in philosophy; a popular work on "Corals and Coral Islands," by Prof. James D. Dana, with numerous original illustrations; "The Theology of the New Testament," a hand-book for Bible students, by Dr. Van Oosterzee, professor in the University of Utrecht; "A Comparative History of Religions," by Prof. James C. Moffat, of Princeton; "Bible Lore," by James Cowper Gray; "Heroes of Puritan Times," by John Stoughton; and a new series of stories for the young, by Jacob Abbott.——"The Character of Christ: Does it Supply an Adequate Basis for a Religion?"—a paper which lately appeared in the Contemporary Review—will be reprinted by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. They will also publish, for the American Tract Society of Boston, Dean Howson's "Metaphors of St. Paul" and "Companions of St. Paul."——Noticeable works on the list of Harper & Bros. are "Woman's Worth and Worthlessness," the complement to "A New Atmosphere," by Gail Hamilton; "The Hand of Desolation," a record of Arctic travel, by Dr. I. I. Hayes; "Life and Letters of Catharine M. Sedgwick," by Mary E. Dewey; "The Rise and Fall of the Paris Commune in 1871," by W. Pembroke Fetridge, a witness of the events described; and the following reprints: "The Earth," by Élisée Reclus; "The Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," by Rev. Luke Tyerman.——Macmillan & Co. announce "Historical Essays," by Edward A. Freeman; "Legends of the Old Testament," collected from Talmudical and Rabbinical Sources, by S. Baring-Gould; "A History of Philosophy, Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern," by Rev. F. D. Maurice; "The Life and Works of Raphael," with twenty autotype illustrations.——Roberts Bros. will publish Philip G. Hamerton's "Unknown River: An Etcher's Voyage of Discovery," with 37 etchings from nature by the author; an illustrated edition of Lord Houghton's sweet child's song, "Good Night and Good Morning"; an illuminated edition of the Sermon on the Mount; "Arabesques—Four Stories of the Supernatural," by Mrs. Richard S. Greenough; Miss Rossetti's nursery rhyme-book, "Sing Song," with 120 illustrations by Arthur Hughes; and the admirable manual, "English Lessons for English People," by Messrs. Abbott and Seeley.——Huxley's "Anatomy of Vertebrated Animals" is announced as in press by Mr. Henry C. Lea, of Philadelphia.

—According to the late census, New York State has a total population of 4,382,759; Pennsylvania, 3,521,791; Ohio, 2,665,260; and Illinois, 2,539,891. The following six Northern and five Southern States have each a population rising one million, viz.: Missouri, 1,721,295; Indiana, 1,680,637; Massachusetts, 1,457,351; Iowa, 1,191,792; Michigan, 1,184,059; Wisconsin, 1,054,670; and Kentucky, 1,321,011; Tennessee, 1,258,520; Virginia, 1,225,163; Georgia, 1,184,109; North Carolina, 1,071,361. In six States, all Northern, the foreign-born population exceeds 300,000, viz.: New York, 1,138,353, chiefly Irish and German (about 1 to 3 of the native-born); Pennsylvania, 545,261 (1 to 5); Illinois, 515,198 (1 to 4); Ohio, 372,493 (1 to 6); Wisconsin, 364,499, almost wholly German (1 to 2, a proportion which the next census may almost reverse); Massachusetts, 353,319, chiefly Irish (1 to 3). The colored population exceeds 300,000 in eight States, all Southern, viz.: Georgia, 545,142 (about 6 to 7 of the whites); Virginia, 512,841 (5 to 7); Alabama, 475,510 (9 to 10); Mississippi, 444,201 (7 to 6); South Carolina, 415,814 (6 to 4); North Carolina, 391,650 (4 to 7); Louisiana, 364,210 (almost exactly the same as the white population, 362,065); Tennessee, 322,331 (1 to 3). The Chinese population, including about 100 Japanese, amounts for the whole United States to but 63,254, of which number only 168 are found in the North. California has 49,310; Idaho, 4,274; Oregon, 3,330; Nevada, 3,152; and Montana, 1,949. Comparing the fifteen States first mentioned, the largest rate of increase since 1860 is shown by Iowa, being a doubling of its population about every 11 years; Michigan would double in 17, Illinois in 20, Missouri in 22, Wisconsin in 28, Indiana in 40, Pennsylvania in 47, Massachusetts in 55, Ohio and Kentucky in 70, New York in 77, Georgia and Tennessee in 80, North Carolina in 125, and Virginia in about 2,000. Virginia has, in fact, increased by less than 6,000, and shows more than any other Southern State the combined effects of slavery and the war.

—The change from agriculture to manufactures in Massachusetts, of which we spoke last week, and which has been quietly but steadily going on for many years, is exhibited in the history of Leicester. This town celebrated, last Fourth of July, the one-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of its organization, and, from the pamphlet report of the proceedings, we learn that as early as 1814 the manufacture of woollen cloths was begun there, and "the once fitful brooks, which ran to waste between drought and freshet, turned into perennial sources of enterprise and wealth"; that Leicester has been the parent (by division) of several manufacturing villages; and that, notwithstanding the natural obstacles in the way of making a connection by railroad with other places, it is earnestly bent on being so connected, and believes, in the language of one of the toasts, that, if the town is "too high for a railroad," it is "too low to be contented without one," and looks to the narrow-gauge for a solution of all engineering difficulties. The hilly roads a century ago did not deter the rich merchant Jews of Newport from settling (some of them) in Leicester, on the occupation of Rhode Island by the British in December, 1776. In their new home "they not only found a ready welcome, but intimacies and friendships grew up between the citizens and them which lasted as long they lived." Their trading-house was afterwards used as an academy, which became famous throughout the State, being the third chartered. The Quakers also were once numerous in Leicester, where such was the general religious harmony that "the town and the parish remained entire until 1833," and "the pastorates of six ministers cover the whole one hundred and fifty years."

—We do not know of any American newspaper-English which we like better, as English, than that of Mr. George Alfred Townsend, generally the Washington, but in vacation the roving correspondent ("Gath") of the Chicago Tribune. Our readers are not ignorant of Mr. Townsend's services at the capital, where he has distinguished himself as a hater of shams and friendly to all those measures of political reform to which the better portion of the Republican party is irrevocably committed. It is, to be sure, sometimes easier to be amused by Mr. Townsend's personalities than to apologize for them. There is a humor and a picturesqueness about them which is nothing less than poetical; and in fact this writer's claim to the title of poet might be as satisfactorily established from his prose as from the clever volume of verses which he lately published. Here, for instance, is a characteristic extract from a recent letter of his in the Tribune, in which that peculiarly American invention, the "base-burner," is put to a use not designated in the letters-patent. Mr. Groesbeck, of Ohio, is the person he alludes to in the beginning:

"He is one of the few wealthy men in America who has no active profession, and who is equally uninterested in other people's business. This gains him the name of being an aristocrat, and makes him offensive to the class of Democrats who attend primary meetings. With like consistency, these same chaps also allege that he is close, penurious, self-intent, and no radiator. Our fellow-citizen, as you are aware, must be a kind of Morning-Glory stove, with window-lights in him to let us see precisely how much fuel he burns, and how it is glowing; and he must, besides, throw off powerful beams of warmth while we all sit around with our feet on him, spitting underneath him now and then. We want our great man right in the family, amongst the pictures of Washington, the Horse Fair, and the Village Blacksmith—otherwise he is an aristocrat, particularly in Cincinnati."

—Scribner & Co. have just received two books which will interest the lovers of William Blake. One is a copy of the translation, or travestie, as it rather deserves to be called, of Bürger's "Leonora," by J. F. Stanley, published by William Miller, London, 1796. The present edition is the second, and the translator makes no bones of confessing that, out of respect to morality and religion, he has discarded his original version, in which he would appear to have followed his author as closely as possible, and made another, in which Bürger's story is entirely changed, so far as the catastrophe is concerned. He gives his reasons for this absurd performance with the most perfect assurance and self-satisfaction. His publisher, however, appears to have had his doubts, for, in a prefatory note, he informs the public that he has appended the original German to Mr. Stanley's version, a proceeding which shows a lamentable indifference, on his part, to the morals and religion of his better-educated patrons. He says, also, that he has adorned this present edition with new engravings, but neither the name of Blake, who made three designs for the English version, nor those of D. Chodowiecke and Harding, who made, the first, one illustration, and the other two, to the German of Bürger, are mentioned, either on the title-page or in the publisher's introductory note. The three designs by Blake are engraved by a certain Perry, while the other three are all engraved by Harding, who, as we have said, also designed two of them. We should like to see more of Perry's work, for as it shows in the last two designs—where are all Blake's tenderness and grace, with that deep earnestness of his that lifts these qualities far above all taint of mawkishness and sentimentality—this engraver, otherwise unknown to us, shows that he knew something of the master whose work he was translating. In the first design, which is in Blake's "terrible way," the engraver could not so well follow him. Gilchrist speaks of all three designs at length, and so well, that we may better refer the reader who wishes to know more about them to him. Gilchrist makes a mistake, not very important, to be sure, in attributing two of the three illustrations of the German poem to Chodowiecke. They are paltry enough, but Chodowiecke is only responsible for one of them. We may just add that a very instructive comparison might be made to his class by a teacher of a school of design between the first of these illustrations of Blake's, where William is carrying off Leonora on the hell-horse, and the avenging angel on horseback, either in Raphael's Heliodorus or in the representation of the same subject by Allston. There is a drawing by the Japanese Oksai, illustrative of a similar theme, which, for fire and spirit, would well deserve to enter into such a comparison.

—The other book is a "mounted" copy of Gilchrist's "Life of Blake," containing, beside the usual amount of interesting but rather "lugged in" matter relating to persons and places mentioned by the way, quite a number of specimens of Blake's work seldom met with, and interesting to readers of Gilchrist's book. There is a complete set of Blake's illustrations to Thornton's Virgil; three designs by Stothard, engraved by Blake, when he was working for the rather shabby English Raphael; two illustrations, designed and engraved by Blake for Mary Wollstonecraft's "Tales for Children" (Gilchrist gives a wood-cut reproduction of another of the set); Blake's etching of Cowper's monument, as altered (with a vengeance!) from Flaxman's design, by Mr. Hayley; six designs by Mrs. Maria Flaxman, the sculptor's wife, to Hayley's poem, "The Triumphs of Temper"—these are weakly graceful productions in the Flaxman-Stothard school, with something added by Blake, as we think, of his own; two of the designs made by Blake to illustrate Hayley's "Ballads." One is for "The Eagle," and is Blake at his best in this direction; the other is for "The Lion," and contains a touch of Blake at his quaintest in the shape of the Lion himself, a little woolly poodle from the toy-shop standing on a bank. The volume also contains eight plates from some one of Blake's "illuminated" books which seems to have been unknown to Gilchrist and Rossetti, as neither mentions it. It would appear to have been a collection of aphorisms, each of which is illustrated by colored figures of personages. Each design is about an inch square, the letterpress is printed in pale yellowish ink, and the color-printing of the figures is clumsily done, often obscuring quite hopelessly the design. They are not very valuable as art, but are interesting as records or hints of one of Blake's methods.

—Our readers may like to know something of the way in which these "mounted" books, of which we see so many nowadays, are produced. It has come to be a regular business, and gives employment and a good living to a considerable number of persons. One man in particular has made himself a name by his skill in this manufacture. He buys wherever he can lay his hands on them, but principally at auctions, all illustrated books, no matter what may be their subjects. The illustrations are cut out carefully, with as little injury to the book as possible, and they are then accurately classified and put into portfolios. The man we speak of as having gained a name for himself in this business employs several boys, who are kept busy cutting out, assorting, and indexing the illustrations. This indexing is done with great care, and the portfolios are gone over every day, to see that their contents are in order. Suppose "Sir Walter Scott's Life and Works" to be the book to be "mounted." The master takes his place at the table, round which stand the boys with their portfolios, and reads over the index appended to any edition of Scott. Perhaps the first word in the index is "Abbotsford." The apprentices dash at their portfolios, examine their several indexes, call out, "Here's Abbotsford, sir," "Here's another," and no matter how many there may be, the master takes them all, if they are different one from another. Then to the next word in the index, and any engraving connected however slightly with the word, or however slightly with the subject of the work to be illustrated, is fish for the mounter's net. In their mechanical execution, the neatness [with [which the illustrations are mounted, the skill with which the binder has done his part—and not every binder can bind a "mounted" book—these volumes are often very attractive. But they are also often queer messes, and it is painful to a real lover of books to think how many beautiful, rare, and valuable books must have been mutilated, and destroyed for men of his kind, by these remorseless fanatics.

—The lover of books, too, may be curious to know what becomes of the volumes out of which the illustrations have been cut by the book-mounter. They are made up into lots and sold at auction for whatever they will fetch, and the sum, no matter what it may be, is set down to the credit of the mounted book in estimating its market value. The mutilated books are—the reader may be surprised to hear—eagerly sought after by lending-libraries of all sorts, "Circulating," "Mechanics'," "Sunday-school," Village libraries, reading-clubs, book-clubs, etc., etc. These institutions greatly prefer books without illustrations, because these are never cut or mutilated, while no book with pictures in it is safe. One library in our own city makes it a rule never, if it be possible to avoid it, to buy a book with illustrations, and our informant assures us that the now-retired head librarian of a great public library in this city was very hostile to illustrated books, and when a new book was to be bought for the library, if it belonged to the obnoxious class, he would say, with an emphatic gesture, "Oh! pshaw, it has pictures in it!" The explanation, therefore, is simple, when one sees on some second-hand book-shelf the copy of Moore's "Epicurean," or of Rogers's "Poems," or of "The Landscape Annual," that he has been hunting after for years, and eagerly seizes it with a glow at the heart, only to find, and not for the first or second time either, that all the plates are gone. They have probably suffered transmigration into some "mounted book."

—Chapman & Hall have made another hit—since the success of the "People's Edition of Carlyle's Works," which has reached a sale of 30,000 a month—in the astonishing popularity of their new illustrated edition of Charles Dickens's works, published weekly, a sheet, or signature, at a time, for a penny a sheet. The sale at the last advices has reached 150,000 a week! This, we believe, is a greater sale than was ever reached before by any book. But the edition very well deserves its success. The shape and size of the volume is handy, the print, though in double-columns, is clear and large, and the illustrations by young Mr. Dalziel are original and clever.

—Perhaps, with the subdivision of learning that attends the increase of the world's knowledge and of knowable things, scholars and investigators may contrive a plan of classifying, and, so to speak, pigeon-holing their comments, conjectures, and discoveries in a way very imperfectly answered by any "notes and queries" ever attempted. For a certain sort of subjects (by no means few), we can imagine in each case a society, or section, or learned committee (domestic or foreign), which would be the natural recipient of everything published relating to its specialty, and which at stated intervals would digest, summarize, and republish these contributions along with its regular transactions. An exchange of transactions between societies having the same object would then make the sum of knowledge acquired during a given period accessible to students in every country, with the minimum of labor in research, much that would otherwise have been overlooked being thus garnered up, sifted, ordered, and indexed. In this way, too, some things would be settled once for all, as an example of which, as well as of the kind of information that ought not to be left to take its chance of being brought to the attention of specialists, we may cite the explanation of two words in Chaucer, published in the Athenæum of September 23, premising that each has heretofore been a crux that baffled commentators. One is "Atazir," in line 305 of "The Man of Lawes Tale":

"O Mars, O Atazir, as in this cas."

This is the Spanish form of the Arabic attathir, influence, and "was used in Spanish as an astrological term, signifying either the influence of one star upon another, or the influence of a star upon the fortunes of men. Chaucer evidently used it in a bad sense, as much as to say, 'O evil influence!'" For the proper interpretation of a second Arabic derivative, "dulcarnon," in the phrase "to be at dulcarnon," or at wit's end, we must refer to the article in the Athenæum. We hope there is a Chaucer pigeon-hole ready for it, and an appropriate pigeon-hole for the highly-plausible filling up of a lacuna in the Moabite Stone proposed in the last number of the Academy (Sept. 15).

—Attention has just been called in Germany to the anomalous character and arbitrary powers of the officer known as the "University Judge," who administers punishment for all infractions, by students, of moral law or university discipline. This functionary at the University of Berlin is Lehnerdt, a law professor, and he has very harshly exercised his authority on an occasion like the following: At the close of the war with France, the students assembled in regular meeting in order to file a petition for the abolition of certain inveterate abuses in the administration, but the committee which they appointed was promptly dissolved by the senate, on the ground that it was partly composed of persons not regular students. A fresh committee to which this objection could not be brought was immediately appointed, and apparently with impunity. At the close of the semester, however (Aug. 15), when the majority of the students had left Berlin, and a disturbance was therefore not to be apprehended, the judge Lehnerdt pounced upon the sixteen committee-men, and dismissed them for ever from the university, refusing them a legal defence and even a copy of his decision. In addition, they were compelled to pass one night in the "Carcer," and to pledge themselves to leave Berlin by the first conveyance; and a university official was deputed to admit no relations to visit them, nor any letters, unless read by the judge himself, and to attend them constantly until they got off. Such conduct recalls too forcibly the days when students were restrained by the Government as natural revolutionists, and suggests the abolition both of the special privileges of the students—a mediæval tradition—and the university judge. The affair has caused an unpleasant impression, and is generally condemned by the unofficial press in Germany.

—The religious movement in Germany presents so many phases that it can scarcely be followed by foreigners with the interest it deserves. Last month witnessed the "Protestant-day" at Darmstadt, where it was discussed not only what Protestantism should do in view of the latest phase of Romanism, but how free-thinking Protestants should meet the so-called clerical element in their own church. A monster conference, held soon after at Munich, Sept. 23 and 24, was attended in crowds by the "Old Catholics," among whom Father Hyacinthe reckoned himself and put in a personal appearance. The main topics proposed for discussion were: the restriction of the Papal Power, the return of the legislative power in church matters to the general councils of the church, the election of the clergy by the laity, the abolition of celibacy, the foundation of parish organizations on the principles of the early church, and the relation of the church to the national element. The delegate from Switzerland to the Munich gathering was chosen at a large meeting of "Old Catholics" at Aarau. On the other hand, 2,000 of the Pope's adherents, who, perhaps, must be called "Neo-Catholics," assembled at Fribourg, in Switzerland, to celebrate the anniversary of the founding of the Pius Verein, an association for propagating the Roman Catholic religion. This meeting sent by telegraph, through its chairman, the president of the association, an address of sympathy and respect to the Pope. A Capuchin monk, who is said to have taken his audience by storm, indulged in the following declamation:

"There is first liberty, then liberalism, and, lastly, license. There is also pagan liberalism, heretical liberalism, and Catholic liberalism. The last is the worst of all, the Holy Father having declared it to be especially dangerous, and it is difficult to understand what it really means. Luther is the father of modern liberalism and impiety, and one of his most devoted disciples, Guizot, has followed in his footsteps by insisting that the church should only speak to the heart and intellect, and discard altogether any appeal to physical force. Now, I unhesitatingly tell you that, in my opinion, the state is the true father of the family. The Liberals want us to bring up children by kind words and persuasion; the Holy Scriptures, on the contrary, tell us to chastise them. St. Francis de Sales was well whipped by his father for his first and last fault, and so effectual was the correction that he never forgot it. The state, in the same way, ought to employ, not argument, but the rod. Liberalism has produced assassination, ignorance, and immorality, and socialism is its natural offspring. I will cite only the two revolutions of 1793 and 1870 as proofs of the correctness of what I assert. Stand fast, then, I beseech you, to conservative Catholicism, and the truth shall make you free."

RECENT WORKS ON THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.*

THE political revolution through which the country has passed during the last ten years has naturally created an active demand for works treating, or purporting to treat, of the Constitution and Government of the United States. The press has been ready to supply this demand. It has issued elaborate treatises upon the general theory of government, and upon the peculiar forms, national and State, which we have adopted, by the side of which "The Federalist" and Story's "Commentaries" are superficial; it has supplied us with one-sided discussions—purely partisan pamphlets in the form of bulky books—which add nothing to our stock of knowledge, but only serve to keep alive old and bitter differences—works which, on the one hand, like Stephens's "War between the States," reassert all the exploded dogmas of State sovereignty; or which, on the other, like Whiting's "War Powers under the Constitution," would make the Congress, and especially the Executive, the most hateful of despotisms, and would crush out all personal independence and civil liberty; it has also furnished us with not a few specimens of the mechanical trade of book-making, which have no raison d'être except the opportunity of sale.

"The Federal Government and its Officers" belongs most emphatically to the last class. Mr. Gillett describes himself on the title-page as "Formerly a Member of Congress from St. Lawrence County, N. Y., more recently Register and Solicitor of the United States Treasury Department, Solicitor for the United States in the Court of Claims, Counsellor-at-Law, etc.," which would grammatically imply that since his retirement from Congress and from the other official positions mentioned, he had been admitted to the bar. His opening announcement strikes the key-note of the book; the whole is done in the same slipshod manner, and contains a mass of like unimportant matter. The preface tells us that "the author of the following pages was early called into public life in the Federal Government." Referring to the prevailing ignorance concerning "the affairs of the General Government," and the difficulty of obtaining any accurate information as to the public statutes and the departmental regulations, he adds: "It was at the commencement of his official life that the author deeply felt the want of such a volume as he has prepared and now offers to the public. No opportunity of acquiring the desired knowledge has ever been neglected. A long practice in the higher national courts, and over twenty years' service in Congress and in various important official positions in the executive departments, have rendered him comparatively familiar with most matters pertaining to the Federal Government." A note, however, at the close of the preface, which is like the postscript to a woman's letter, informs us that "the body of this work was prepared before the adoption of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments of the Constitution."

We have, then, a book upon the National Government, published in 1871, which, in its discussions of the civil rights of individuals, makes no reference to the stupendous changes wrought by the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, and in its statement of political rights, and especially in its description of the representative system, and of the capacities of electors, conceals the fact that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments abrogated one of the fundamental notions upon which the Constitution and Government were based. These omissions will hardly—to use Mr. Gillett's own graphic language—"enable the rising generation to understand the structure of our government." He assures his readers that "without knowing what the Constitution and laws authorize and require, the citizens cannot give instructions to those entrusted with power." This may be true; we do not venture to deny it, because, as yet, we are unable to comprehend its meaning; but we are sure that Mr. Gillett's book, which placidly puts aside the results of the war, and ignores the work of the people which has in so many important respects reformed their fundamental law, will not furnish the citizen with that "knowledge" which will alone "enable him to give instructions to those entrusted with power."

* "The Federal Government and its Officers, and their Duties. By Ransom H. Gillett." New York: Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co. 1871.
"A History and Analysis of the Constitution of the United States. By Nathaniel C. Towle." Third Edition. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1871.

The faults of the book may be summed up under two brief heads: 1. The reader cannot rely upon the accuracy of its statements as to existing laws of the United States; and, 2. It is made up of vague generalities, and of commonplace platitudes, often bordering upon twaddle, from which the "citizen" can derive no precise information which will enable him to understand the actual workings of our administrative system, or afford him any help in the transaction of business with the public offices or departments. A considerable portion is made up of mere "padding," of so useless a character that we are not unduly harsh in saying that it may be considered as an imposition upon the buyer. One or two examples will illustrate this statement. The volume contains 437 pages. The whole Constitution is printed in an appendix of 21 pages. Chapters 5 to 22, inclusive, purport to contain a description of the government and a discussion of its powers. They extend over 35 pages, several of them occupying not more than a half-page, and some even but a few lines, the rest of the page being blank, or what the happy compositor denominates "fat." These chapters are a mere reprint of the text of the Constitution, with a very few slight verbal changes, and some alteration in the arrangement, and with an occasional observation of the author, of which the following are samples: "The object and intent with which powers are conferred upon Congress, and their extent and manner of exercise, ever have been, and will continue to be, matters of controversy, and [sic] upon which the people have been, and will be, divided, thus forming and continuing political parties" (p. 83). "This leaves open only the often difficult question whether laws are really made in pursuance of the Constitution, concerning which the widest differences exist" (p. 93). "Punctual attendance of Senators and members of the House is essential to prompt dispatch of their business" (p. 97). "It was the high object in preparing the Constitution to secure the proper qualifications for the principal agencies under it" (p. 98). These are fair examples of Mr. Gillett's political discussions and comments upon the fundamental law. We must do him the justice to say there are very few of them. He has only printed the text of the Constitution twice over, filling up 56 pages, and has even eked out the space by a list of the States in small-capitals. Thirty-three pages of the body of the book are appropriated to lists of Presidents, Vice-Presidents, Heads of Departments, and Judges, which can be found in any good political almanac.

The greater part of Mr. Gillett's book is devoted to an explanation of the powers and duties of the President, of the Secretaries, and of their subordinates, and to a description of the executive departments and their various bureaus. It is in this portion that he has communicated most of the information which he supposes will "enable the rising generation to understand the structure of our Government, what officers are employed in its practical operations, and their general duties." Here is certainly a field for conscientious and thorough work; but Mr. Gillett has not undertaken any such labor. He has not attempted to examine the numerous statutes conferring particular powers and imposing duties upon the President and heads of departments, and to arrange and classify these powers and duties according to any method by which a clear and adequate notion might be given the reader of the administrative functions of the Government as a whole. On the contrary, he seems to have put down without any order the provisions of such special statutes as he was able to remember, and to have left the mass of executive duties unnoticed.

We will illustrate our criticism by a reference to his description of the President's office. After stating the constitutional provisions relating to the President without explanation or comment, he proceeds to the following enumeration of official powers, which we copy without change in order or substance: "Formerly he signed patents for all lands granted by the United States, but this is now done by a clerk." "He is authorized to discharge public debtors from prison." "He may employ the army and navy to enforce the neutrality laws." "Under a statute he employs a private secretary and a steward at the public expense." "He prescribes the uniform for the army." "He causes our sea-coast to be surveyed, and accurate charts thereof made." As the author immediately informs us that "laws temporary in their character, or of minor importance, are not referred to in this work," we must assume that the list of the President's powers has thus been exhausted. We are also bound to suppose that, except in the matter of employing a private secretary and steward, the President does everything by virtue of his own sweet will; that he surveys the coast and makes charts, that he prescribes a uniform for the army, and that he once did sign patents, without any authority or directions from Congress. At least such is the natural, if not necessary, import of the language we have quoted.

In addition to these high political and governmental functions, Mr Gillett communicates other information to the "rising generation," in order to enable them "to understand the structure of our Government," which is so important that we cannot withhold it from the readers of the Nation who have not already "risen." We are told that, "being the head of the Government, the President receives, but does not usually make, calls, except in cases of sickness." We are a little in the fog here as to whose sickness is the occasion of a call, whether of the President, or of the person who suffers the call; but in either case the act is praiseworthy. Also, "no uniform or particular style of dress is required by those visiting the White House for any purpose, more than at the house of any citizen. On New Year's Day the custom is, for every one who chooses, to call and wish the President a happy New Year. On these occasions the crowd is immense and of a varied character." All this is interesting and good; but it is the mere prelude of an announcement which, by one happy stroke, finishes this delightful picture of simple social life: "On New Year's and at evening levees, there is always music by the full band." This essay upon the executive office closes with an observation which surpasses in infantile twaddle anything which we remember to have read: "The power of the President is various and immense to be deposited in the hands of a single individual, and the range of duties is almost without limit. Unless he is thoroughly versed in the Constitution, laws, usages, and business of the Federal Government, and has business capacity of a high order, and superior common sense, and inflexible honesty, he will fail to meet the expectations of the people, and be unable to aid them much in their pursuit of happiness."

Leaving the President in this hopeless condition, Mr. Gillett passes to the departments. In his preliminary observations he vouchsafes to the "rising generation" some etymological information. "Cabinet" we are told "is a French word meaning a small room," while, "originally, bureau signified merely a large writing-table." He might also have added that at present its most common signification is "a chest of drawers for clothes." It would be waste of time and space to follow our author in his round through the executive offices, and we shall be content with pointing out a few passages which will illustrate the whole. While with the Secretary of State we are favored with a discussion upon the diplomatic service which contains some information new to us, and probably so to the "rising generation." Thus we are told that "ambassadors are the highest order of foreign ministers, and represent the dignity of the sovereign sending them. They are not sent to reside abroad, but to make solicitations upon special occasions." This announcement will be discouraging to the subordinates in the diplomatic corps of the great European states, who are doubtless looking forward to a residence at Paris as the goal of their ambition. "Ambassadors," we are informed, "are absolutely excepted from all allegiance and from all responsibilities to the laws of the country where accredited." As this rule is in the text confined to ambassadors, we are left to assume that it is not true of ministers plenipotentiary or resident, and of all other diplomatic agents. Of the Secretary of War it is said: "To what extent the President has conferred powers, directing the Secretary to execute them, is unknown to the public, and is nowhere found published or written. It is probable that he has assumed to act in such cases as he deemed proper on the occasion; and that custom—a growing one—is the principal authority for action when no provision is made by statute. It is now history that he does many things which the President could not authorize." This is certainly a "dark saying." We are afraid that, during his long career at Washington, Mr. Gillett must have come in contact with Secretary Stanton. But we must close our remarks upon "The Federal Government," and we do it with an apt quotation from Mr. Gillett himself, which not only illustrates his peculiarities of thought and style, but is in itself a choice apothegm which will command universal assent, and which we commend to his notice: "Few men have the courage and hardihood to brave an adverse criticism resting upon an unquestioned and solid foundation."

Mr. Towle's book is of another and better kind. We were rather startled, it is true, by the opening of the preface: "Broad and trackless oceans separate the Old World from the New. Equally separated are the principles which give form and vitality to the institutions that prevail in the two hemispheres." He immediately, however, descends from this arduous flight, and devotes himself to plain, honest, thorough, and useful work. The volume is, in fact, a condensation or abridgment of the compilation known as "Elliott's Debates." Nearly everything in it of political importance is taken from that work. While Mr. Towle's labors have not therefore been those of an original investigator, and while he has attempted no discussion of the Constitution itself, he has in a convenient form furnished the public with a mass of most important matter—matter having a high politico-historical value, which was not before generally accessible. This "History and Analysis" will not take the place of "Elliott's Debates" with political students, constitutional lawyers, or practical statesmen. They cannot be satisfied with an abridgment. But, unless we are mistaken, it will be serviceable to the public, and will be read with interest and profit.

The design of the work is to describe the gradual process by which the Constitution and Government were formed. Giving a rapid sketch of the colonies, of the Continental Congress, and of the Confederation, it pauses and dwells with more care and minuteness upon the times when the great statesmen of an early day were consulting in respect to the future of the country and the establishment of a permanent national Government. This is set forth in some important correspondence in the acts of the New York Legislature of 1782, in resolutions of the Virginia Legislature of 1786, in the proceedings of the preliminary and abortive convention at Annapolis in 1786, and of the Congress of the Confederation in 1787. We are thus brought to the convention which framed the Constitution. Mr. Towle traces this instrument through its formative stages, giving in full the plans proposed by Mr. Randolph, by Mr. Patterson, by Mr. Pinckney, and by Mr. Hamilton, the general resolutions embodying an outline of the organic law adopted by the convention, and referred to a committee of detail to be put into shape, and the original draft as reported by this committee. All this is given without comment. The documents themselves occupy but little space, and they show better than any description could show the gradual advance in the conceptions of a General Government, which began with a proposition to amend the Articles of Confederation, and ended with an organic law in which the national idea was so fully incorporated that it has, after many and bitter struggles, necessarily triumphed.

By far the greater part of the volume, from page 36 to page 249, is devoted to what Mr. Towle calls an analysis of the Constitution. The name is an inappropriate one, because there is no attempt at any analysis; but the matter is good, call it by whatever name we please. The text of the Constitution is given as it stands, and under each section is arranged the substance of the debates in the convention when that particular clause, or a general proposition involving it, was before the body for discussion. The reader has thus placed before him in a compendious form, and arranged according to the present text of the Constitution, the sum of what was said by the statesmen who guided the deliberations of the convention. The speakers' names are given, and their language as reported is not altered. This is, of course, all taken from "Elliott's Debates" and from the "Madison Papers." In giving a construction to the Constitution, and in applying it to the questions and events which may arise in the nation's history, we would not place too much reliance upon the expressed intentions and meaning of the gentlemen who framed the instrument, and offered it as a proposal to the people for their acceptance. It is rather in a historical point of view that these opinions and sentiments are instructive. Mr. Towle's work will bring this most important scene in our political history freshly before the public, and we most cordially wish for it a general reading.

PLAY FOR MANHOOD.*

To those who love good writing for reading's sake, and simple manly narration of things a man ought to hear of, and may wisely do, it is a delight to get hold of a book like Mr. Stephen's, in which, with a sensational material which makes one hold one's breath in realizing what took place, the artist has told his story in so low a relief that it resembles one of those wonderful Greek bas-reliefs, in which the beauty and fitness of the thing told are almost lost in our wonder at the apparent inadequacy of the means employed to tell it. It is an open question how far such sports as those of the Alpine Club are permissible by the social ethics of our civilization; the answer to it depends with each individual on the value he puts on his life, and the objects for which he proposes to utilize it. There is a certain moral value in the spectacle of a man's going "into the jaws of death" of his own accord, head erect, nerves well strung, and in his soul a consciousness of superiority to the common enemy, even when he goes without higher utility than to assert his own manhood. Duelling and war used to be the outlet of all such irrepressible manhood; that Alpine climbing and ambulance service take the places of those grosser forms of derring-do is a cheering sign in civilization, but one in which the English are likely to find few rivals, as in some other amusements of true manhood.

To read Mr. Stephen's book, few people would comprehend that in every one of his excursions he ran a greater risk of his life than if he had gone through a first-class battle—that it required more nerve and pluck to back one of those Alp ridges than to face a battery of Prussian artillery. We all know how many even of the surest feet have slipped into eternity from those ice-slopes; the Alpine Club itself has paid its forfeit to success, and guides and mountaineers, too, even on well-known and oft-travelled paths. Whoever would know of what human nature is capable in this direction should read Mr. Stephen's account of the ascent of the Roth horn, of one point of which the frontispiece to the book furnishes an illustration—not too sharply drawn, aiguille-like as it is:

"Three principal pinnacles rose in front of us, each of which it was necessary to turn or to surmount. The first of these was steepest on the Zinal side. Two deep gullies on the Zermatt side started from points in the ridge immediately in front and rear of the obstacle, and converged at some distance beneath. We carefully descended by one of these for some distance, considerably inconvenienced by the snow which lodged in the deeply-cut channels and concealed the loose stones. With every care, it was impossible not occasionally to start crumbling masses of rock. The most ticklish part of the operation was in crossing to the other gully; a sheet of hard ice, some two or three inches thick, covered the steeply-inclined slabs. It was impossible to cut steps in it deep enough to afford secure foothold. The few knobs of projecting stone seemed all to be too loose either for hand or foot. We crept along in as gingerly a fashion as might be, endeavoring to distribute our weight over the maximum number of insecure supports, until one of the party had got sounder footing. A severe piece of chimney-sweep practice then landed us once more upon the razor-edge of the arête. The second pinnacle demanded different tactics. On the Zermatt side it was impracticably steep, whilst on the other it fell away in one of the smooth sheets of rock already mentioned. The rock, however, was here seamed by deep fissures approximately horizontal. It was possible to insert toes or fingers into these, so as to present to telescopic vision (if any one had been watching our ascent) much the appearance of a fly on a pane of glass. . . . When two crevices approximated, we should be in danger of treading on our own fingers, and the next moment we should be extended, as though on the rack, clutching one crack with the last joints of our fingers, and feeling for another with the extreme points of our toes. The hold was generally firm when the fissure was not filled with ice, and we gradually succeeded in outflanking the hostile position."

In climbing the third of the pinnacles they were obliged literally to bestride the edge of rock and work along, as boys do, on a steep roof-ridge:

"The attitude adopted had the merit of safety, but was deficient in comfort. The rock was so smooth, and its edge so sharp, that as I crept along it, supported entirely on my hands, I was in momentary fear that a slip might send one half of me to the Durand and the other to the Schellenburg glacier. . . . The rock above us was, if I am not mistaken, the one which, by its sharp inclination to the east, gives to the Rothhorn from some points of view the appearance of actually curling over in that direction like the crest of a sea-wave on the point of breaking. To creep along the eastern face was totally impossible. The western slopes, though not equally steep, were still frightfully precipitous, and presented scarcely a ledge whereby to cling to their slippery surface. In front of us the rocks rose steeply in a very narrow crest, rounded and smooth at the top, and with all foothold, if foothold there were, completely concealed by a layer of fresh snow. After a glance at this somewhat unpromising path, Melchior examined for a moment the western cliff. The difficulties there seeming even greater, he immediately proceeded to the direct assault. . . . So steeply did the precipice sink on our left hand, that along the whole of this part of the shelf the glacier, at a vast distance below, formed the immediate background to a sloping, rocky ledge, some foot or two in width, and covered by slippery snow. . . . Looking backwards, I was gratified by a picture which has since remained fixed in my imagination. Some feet down the ridge was Grove. Below Grove appeared the head, shoulders, and arms of Jacob. His fingers were exploring the rock in search of infinitesimal crannies, and his face presented the expression of modified good-humor, which in him supplies the place of extreme discontent in other guides. . . . Our view of continuous rock was thus limited to a few yards of narrow ridge tilted up at a steep angle apparently in mid-air; and Jacob resembled a man in the act of clambering into a balloon far above the earth."

But it is impossible by any extracts to give an idea of the nature of the dangers, which the author skips over with a gaiety which takes shame in acknowledging danger even when it has been conquered. He loses his footing, and is sliding down into a crevasse, which any writer would be excusable in describing as an awful depth of green horror, or by any other ghastly phrase, but he remarks: "Melchior ignominiously hooked me under the arm with his axe, and jerked me back, with a suitable warning for the future." In fact, Mr. Stephen does Alp-climbing infinite injustice, and might tempt some of us to our deaths in a belief in the innocuousness of the pastime. He errs, if it be error, in repressing the sensations of weakness which even a brave man may justifiably feel in presence of dangers which no discretion, no human power or foresight, can conjure away, once braved. To straddle jokingly the arête of an Alp, with one foot pointing to green ice two thousand feet below, and the other to meadows ten thousand, is to be cool and self-possessed, but we should not think less of a man who shuddered as he did it.

* "The Play-Ground of Europe. By Leslie Stephen, late President of the Alpine Club." London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1871.

But Mr. Stephen's merits as a master of good, terse, polished English will recommend him even more than his nerve on the Rothhorn. Amid the heavy crops of verbiage with which the mass of bookmakers come to market, to find a nervous, concentrated, artistic style like that of the book under notice is a pleasure which once reading will not develop to its highest, and which is so far removed from the range of careless judgment and thoughtless reading that it behooves those who have been fortunate to find it out to speak all the commendation it deserves. Not a word redundant, yet not a sentence is obscure, and with the most perfect polish there does not appear a trace of ostentation, of sententiousness. Mr. Stephen uses words so well that one regrets that he does not indulge himself in more liberty with them, and give us a few more than were actually needed. The author's insight and power of characterization do not spend themselves on ungrateful rock alone; his descriptions of some of the people one meets in the Alps are in the keenest and most subtle humor, and he paints some of his witless countrymen, astare before nature, in a manner which would have inspired Leech. The chapters on "The Regrets of a Mountaineer" and "The Dangers of Mountaineering" are written from different points of view, and with a gravity and directness of expression which recommend them to the study of every mountain-lover and every prospective mountain climber; and the moral of the whole is that to men prudent, well-trained, and well-provided, any alp is safe, and repays climbing, while to the careless, rash, and weak-footed any alp may be fatal.

The chapter on "The Peaks of Primiero" is full of a weird fascination which might tempt a landscape-painter to pack his traps and be off to Primiero on the first opportunity. There are some passages of mountain description which for pure objective truth are not surpassed by anything we know of in the language. There is not the delusive witchery of words of Ruskin's fantasy, but a sober, intensely-felt, and reverently-told perception of what is most lovely and of good report in the mountain solitudes the author loves so well. We will only quote a single passage out of many on mountain effects which one must be an able artist to put in color as Mr. Stephen has put them in words. He is describing a sunrise:

"Then a huge dark mass begins to mould itself slowly out of the darkness, the sky begins to form a background of deep purple, against which the outline becomes gradually more definite; one by one the peaks catch the exquisite Alpine glow, lighting up in rapid succession, like a vast illumination; and when at last the steady sunlight settles upon them he feels his heart bound. . . . The grandest of all such sights that live in my memory is that of a sunset from the Aiguille de Goûté. The snow at our feet was glowing with rich light, and the shadows in our footsteps a vivid green by the contrast. Beneath us was a vast horizontal floor of thin level mists suspended in mid-air, spread like a canopy over the whole boundless landscape, and tinged with every hue of sunset. Through its rents and gaps we could see the lower mountains, the distant plains, and a fragment of the Lake of Geneva, lying in a more sober purple. Above us rose the solemn mass of Mont Blanc in the richest glow of an Alpine sunset."

MITFORD'S TALES OF OLD JAPAN.*

BEFORE the appearance of this book of Mr. Mitford, the most accessible and useful information about the land of the Rising Sun was contained in Walter Dixon's volume, "Japan," and Aimé Humbert's "Le Japon Illustré," which forms part of the series known as "Le Tour du Monde." It was in these books that one found a seemingly truthful, though faint, image of the feudal empire, with its orders of nobility, its division into provinces, and subdivision into estates, all held on the tenure of military service to the next superior—and its strange double headship of Emperor and imperial vicar or substitute. These authors have the advantages over old Kaempfer of writing in a somewhat more historically-minded time, and also of having the use of his and his contemporaries' books; but, most of all, of seeing Japan during the internal convulsions that have revealed much that had been carefully hidden. Thus, Kaempfer was the author of the notion that the "Spiritual" and "Temporal" Emperors were somehow of equal rank, and that the latter had, little by little, got most of the power and all the money into his hands. And that author seems to have been thoroughly puzzled—and not inexcusably—by the two systems of nobility, that of the really Imperial or "Spiritual Emperor's" court at Miako, and that of the Shogun (Tycoon) or "Temporal Emperor," centred at Yedo. It was reserved for the writers of the last few years to discover and set forth the actual government and social system of Japan, so far, at least, as it is known to us. There is, no doubt, enough more to be learned.

Japan and the Japanese are a most interesting land and a most interesting people to study. Their curious history, their singularly complex government, their advanced state of civilization, mingled with strange barbarisms—like the mixture of civil and savage life seen in the Iliad—their extraordinary skill in many of the arts, their equally extraordinary simplicity of life and manners, their warlike and fearless national character, their unexampled readiness to study the superior material civilization of the Western nations, and to adopt it, but little by little, and with discrimination—these are the characteristics of a people and a national fabric very fascinating to the student. In one of the stories in Mr. Mitford's collection, the peasants of a certain province are oppressed by taxes newly imposed, and after trying in vain appeals to the officers of their feudal lord, and to the lord himself, one self-sacrificing man, a "head of a village," watches for the passing of the Shogun, and contrives to thrust a petition into his litter. The result is, that the prince of the province in question returns to his province under orders from the Shogun to take off the taxes, and enraged with his officers, whom he removes right and left. But the heads of the villages are considered as having conspired against the prince, their feudal lord, of whose conduct they had of course no right to complain. They are punished, and he who gave the petition to the Shogun is put to death with his family, and his goods confiscated. In another story, Daimios, or princes of the Shogun's court, are shown receiving the messenger of the Emperor, and as needing instruction in the proper ceremonies of the occasion from "a high official," as Mr. Mitford has it—presumably a Kunge or noble of the Emperor's court. This is perhaps the only instance in which the Emperor is mentioned. Public interests and great ambitions in Japan must have felt, even at the highest pitch of the power of the Shogunate, the constant presence of the supreme authority, though veiled and in retirement at Miako. But private life, the life of soldiers, and farmers, and citizens, the sports of the young and the domestic life of the old, seem to have taken no note of the heaven-descended Emperor and his unquestionable authority over all, and seldom to have looked higher than the local daimio, never higher than the Shogun. His office was of military origin, it is clear, and the full title was warlike enough—Sai-e-tai-Shogun, "Barbarian-repressing commander-in-chief." His authority seems to have had no limit, however, and his duties to have been as much civil as military, so that we have called him imperial vicar, replacing the Emperor, who chose to remain in retiracy. When the treaties were made with the United States and with European powers, the Shogunate appeared at the front as the supreme government. The style Tai-Kun was borrowed from the Chinese as a handy title, and our treaties were made with the seeming sovereign, known as "His Majesty, the Tycoon of Japan." This was the state of things until the Emperor deposed his substitute, and undertook to govern Japan by himself, and, after considerable resistance and a small civil war, pacified the country under the new arrangement. We have to imagine Japan now as a young country of mixed monarchical and parliamentary government, and of quasi-European institutions. The old feudal, isolated, and solitary empire is the Japan of these legends; and the title, "Tales of Old Japan," is descriptive.

The skill of the Japanese people in the arts makes no small part of the interest they inspire. For instance, their swords are a favorite subject of Mr. Mitford, who has one or two stories that turn almost wholly upon the peculiar preciousness of blades by this or that famous swordsmith. The long and short swords being worn always when abroad by every man entitled to wear them, these weapons are as familiar companions and as trusted friends of every man of military rank as the rapier of the sixteenth-century noble, or the claymore of the Highlander; a thing of daily wear, to whose protection the wearer habitually trusts his life. Upon these swords, therefore, is lavished the best skill of Japan. It may not be given to any Westerner to distinguish a Muramasa blade from one of a less known swordsmith; but it must be interesting to study the different degrees of excellence where the lower degrees are so wonderfully fine. The blade of the commonest Japanese sword we have ever seen is a noble piece of handiwork, and these splendid blades, heavy, sharp for their whole length of edge, brilliant, perfectly forged, flawless, are mounted with the utmost magnificence and good taste when intended for the nobles, so that a Japanese noble's sword, as Mr. Mitford says, may easily cost, the blade alone, £300 sterling, and the mounting half as much more, in Japan itself.

* "Tales of Old Japan. By A. B. Mitford, Second Secretary to the British Legation in Japan." With illustrations drawn and cut on wood by Japanese artists. New York: Macmillan & Co. 2 vols. 8vo.

The Japanese bronzes, porcelains, and lacquered work are well known and universally admired in Europe and America for their beauty and the admirable delicacy of their workmanship. But few persons are familiar with the higher grade of these ornamental arts—specimens are rare and necessarily very costly. Nevertheless, enough is known to all persons who notice such things at all to command their interest and admiration. It is so with the purely representative arts, as well-executed original drawings or paintings are seldom to be seen; almost never any original work of a high class. But woodcuts in books and separate, colored and uncolored, are very accessible and very cheap, and their great and often extraordinary merit may be seen by any one who cares to look. Concerning these pictures and their subjects we have written before;* but in the discussion of these subjects, having begun with the representations of the gods of the Sintoo religion, we never reached, on our downward course, the illustrations of popular legend and tradition.

If we should discuss these latter here, it would be necessary to point out that Mr. Mitford's illustrations are very much less pleasing, as well as less characteristic. These, indeed, were "drawn in the first instance by one Odaké, an artist in [Mr. Mitford's] employ. They were cut on wood by a famous wood-engraver at Yedo, and are therefore genuine specimens of Japanese art." Genuine specimens, indeed; but specimens of Japanese art as modified and weakened by influences foreign to its nature. A student of Japanese pictorial art would recognize at once their genuineness and their inferiority. They do not tell their stories as well as the native woodcuts we have explained and criticised in former essays on Japanese fine art, and they are immeasurably less artistical in design. It would not be fair, indeed, to put these rather slight illustrations into comparison with the strong, delicate, and justly celebrated designs of Oksai, which are often very elaborate, and often full of dramatic power, clearly expressed sentiment, and astonishing verve; nor can we justly compare them even with the works of half-a-dozen less-known—for us sometimes nameless—artists who have worked in Oksai's manner, more or less modified. But the thin books about Falcons and Falconry which one buys for a dollar apiece in the Broadway stores of Japanese curiosities, and other similar picture-books, are not far out of the way for a comparison. Certainly, the little novels, two thin volumes in one wrapper, text and illustrations all pell-mell together on the pages, and selling in Yokohama ten for a bu, are common and humble enough to serve as a standard. And tried even by this low standard, our Anglo-Japanese pictures smack of pidgin-English, and are only half right.

It is the more to be regretted that these should fail in spirit, or in characteristically Japanese qualities of art, because we suppose that it would have been easy to select illustrations to the Japanese legends in this book, or to any such legends, from out the mass of illustrations already existing. Illustrations to the tale of the Forty-seven Ronins, for instance, we think we can furnish, although the story seems to differ a little in some of its incidents as given by the pictures and as given by Mr. Mitford. Apart from this, however, we have nothing but praise to give this book. As to the accuracy of translation we cannot speak, but the English style is fresh and pleasant, and the stories are original and vigorous enough to be exactly reproduced. One begins the reading of the volumes with pleasure, and expecting pleasure, for the type and paper are grateful to the eye, and one is favorably disposed toward Mr. Mitford's setting forth of Japanese history and legend, because of well-known writings of his in the London monthlies, some of which are incorporated in these volumes. And so we have only to add that it is easy to read the book through, and that it gives a clearer idea of the people of Japan than any other work with which we are acquainted.

Gabriel Riesser's Life, with Extracts from his Correspondence [Leben nebst Mittheilungen aus seinen Briefen]. By M. Issler, Dr. (Frankfort-on-the-Main: "The Riesser Association." Leipzig: Volckmar. 1871. pp. 663.)—Although called on the title-page a second unaltered edition, this work is, as the editor explains, only a reprint of the first volume of the collected writings of Riesser, which were printed by the association established by his friends and admirers in Frankfort, and called after his name. It is, in fact, rather in the influence which Riesser exerted on his contemporaries, than in any of his completed literary works, that we see how well he deserved the honor of a memorial biography. Gabriel Riesser was born of respectable Jewish parents in Hamburg, in 1806, so that his earliest recollections were of a kind to make him, above all things, an earnest advocate of German unity and power, and in every way hostile to French modes of thought and action. Graduating at Heidelberg in 1826, he went thence to Munich, but here, as at his own university, and at Jena, too, he found himself excluded by his religion from the humble position of a voluntary tutor, and then, returning to his native town to seek admission to the bar, he met the same barrier. Just as he was beginning to complain of the hardship of his condition, the French Revolution of 1830 broke out, and sent through Germany a thrill of aspiration for personal liberty even in the down-trodden Jews, and Riesser determined to be their advocate.

At that time there was legislative oppression of all sorts, and a vast deal beyond the letter of the law, that weighed down his race. In Lübeck and Bremen, both "free cities," the laws were very severe. The former allowed a Jew to teach Hebrew at the gymnasium, but excluded the race for all other purposes; the latter city made no such exception. In Frankfort, their privileges had been bought at a good round price of Dalberg, Napoleon's Grand Duke, while their residence in Hamburg was at the cost of every pursuit except retail trades. Oddly enough, the earliest governments to accord the Jews greater privileges were Electoral Hesse and Würtemberg, in 1816 and 1828 respectively, although as far back as 1808 Baden—then, as later, the precursor of German liberal principles—had given them at least decent treatment. In Hanover, under French mastery from 1807 to 1813, the Jews had been on equal footing with all others, but they were put back into the barbarous condition in which, under mediæval rules, they were alike degraded and injurious to the state and to their fellow-citizens. In Prussia their condition was beginning to improve, to the great advantage of the state as well as of the Jews themselves, when the reaction that followed the French Revolution of 1830 brought back many of the old evils as part of the general conservatism of the day.

Against such a condition of things, and at such a time, Riesser engaged in a crusade which ended only with his life. It imposed upon him a vast amount of labor, and of literary effort, in various forms; it required of him journeys through his own country, and through Europe, and even to America for a short visit in 1856; and it did much, no doubt, to give him the prominence which led to the active part he took in the German Parliaments of 1848 and 1849. He was a minister of the short-lived German Empire of that day, but his public career on this broad stage was long enough to enable him to display great oratorical power and good administrative ability, and to secure for him the confidence, affection, and admiration of the foremost men of that day of dupes and deceptions. Riesser returned to his Hamburg life, and, giving up his notarial business—an office of more dignity and importance than the same name betokens here—became a lawyer, and finally a judge, in his native city. He saw, therefore, the almost absolute success of his early efforts for the freedom of the Jews from all political, and particularly municipal, restrictions not only completely secured, but rewarded by honors which were as well earned as they were rare. It is not surprising, therefore, that his friends should have determined to perpetuate his memory, both by a suitable monument, and by reprinting a complete edition of his numerous writings. Among these, by the way, are several able articles on American affairs, and, as his friends here were such men as Lieber and Kapp, it cannot be doubted on which side of our struggle his sympathy was thrown. The Riesser Memorial also includes a fund to be used in contributing to the expense of university education of Jewish students, and another to help them as practitioners of science, art, and literature in those countries where the laws are still so stringent as to put them under restraint.

These are strong evidences that the subject of this volume was a man of such temperament and disposition as to endear himself with all his associates and contemporaries, and the large space given to his letters—nearly half of the volume—enables the reader to see for himself how many-sided were Riesser's virtues. His tender devotion to his mother and sister, his manly friendships, his sturdy perseverance in a championship that threatened to cost him all advancement and promotion, his modest bearing when honors, social and political, did at last come upon him, his energy in the national cause of all Germany, his hope when it was apparently lost for ever—now realized beyond even the faith of the most ardent—these are all the elements that made the man, and that justify this memorial volume of his life and letters. Without the literary skill of Börne and Heine, he contrasts well with them, for he fought manfully for his race, while they turned their barbed and poisonous arrows as often against their hereditary faith as against any other obstacle in their way; and that way led mainly to their own selfish personal comfort, while his was meant only to be for the good of others. Without the learning of Bunsen, or the gifts and hereditary advantages of the Gagerns, Riesser's name will stand in a favorable light in the same line with them and the other men who, in 1848, builded—better than they knew—the foundations of the existing German Empire. Bunsen was, if not selfish, yet still so self-important that a recognition of his importance seemed to him more necessary than many active measures in which he might have assisted. The Gagerns were both aristocrats, of the type of De Tocqueville, but of about equal importance in reforming the political government of their country, while Riesser was a man of the people, working for them from pure zeal, without reserve of any kind, and with no notion of obtaining anything but the form of government that should best answer the requirements of the German nation. Democracy was no part of his faith, nor was he an ardent advocate for the mere form of a Republic; but he labored to secure the individual freedom and advancement of every German citizen, and it was just that which makes Germany to-day the foremost power of Europe.

* See the Nation, Vol. VII., Nos. 157, 159, 160, 161, and 167.

Leading Cases on the Law of Elections in the United States. By Frederick C. Brightly. (Philadelphia: Kay & Brother.)—With the poems written as social correctives and the novels that disguise plans of reform, we are all sadly familiar. This is the first instance of a collection of law-cases worked into reproof and warning as to an evil that offends the compiler. Let us hasten to say that the censure touches a system and not its agents, and is thoroughly deserved and fairly administered. It is against the delegation of discretionary powers in political causes to elected judges that Mr. Brightly arrays the learning and the invective of his notes. Some of the cases may convict those who decided them of bias or narrowness, but it is only incidentally, and with the kindest disclaimer of purpose by the author, that he thus hoists an occasional judge with his own petard. Before the wisdom of Democracy bestowed on us the blessing of a partisan bench, the cases arising out of elections were fewer and less alarmingly interesting than they have since become. English rulings had settled acceptably to our own courts most doubtful points upon voting in corporations or private bodies. But their decisions on political elections were confined by limited suffrage within too narrow a field to be of service or authority in this country. The citations presented in this volume range over nearly sixty years of our history, and gather up the wisdom of courts in twenty-four of the States.

Whether the people in primary assemblies have legislative power, was once a question much discussed. The current of decisions has been adverse to the claim, holding that constitutions delegate such power to the legislatures alone, which cannot refer their function back to the people, and the chief cases that determine what may or may not be submitted to the popular vote are given at length. Others follow relating to the voter personally, settling points as to his qualifications, and as to registry, residence, and privileges. The power and mode of action of courts in correcting errors, rejecting a poll, and regulating election districts and officers, are illustrated by a great number and variety of decisions. Occasionally the positive views of some clear-thinking judge are reported, ridiculing the moonshine of an absolute right of suffrage. The volume is rich in election cases involving questions as to the limits of national and State jurisdictions. Some of them, as those relating to the test-oaths and the disfranchisement of deserters, grew out of temporary war-measures. The legal controversies throughout the country upon more important points presented under the constitutional amendments, display moderation and firmness on the part both of the Federal and the State judges. But those cases in the State courts, especially those concerning elections in municipalities, which have carried political passion in the shape of a legal issue before a partisan bench, do fully justify the author's grave fears of the danger to the permanency of free institutions brought upon us by the innovation of an elective judiciary.

The Pupil of the Legion of Honor. By Louis Enault. Translated from the French by Mrs. Rebecca L. Zutt. (Philadelphia: Porter & Coates 1871.)—This is by no means an uninteresting novel. There is a touch of the graveyard at the beginning, but after that we follow beautiful but poverty-stricken virtue through lofty castles, gilded drawing-rooms, and humble attics; through flirtations, temptations, and, in fact, direct assaults, to a happy marriage and an ample income. How far this is a solution of the question of woman's rights and woman's duties, as is claimed for it in the introductory letter of "Porte Crayon" to the publishers, is still unsettled. Not all who are poor and virtuous are of exceptional beauty and possessed of every accomplishment. Not all women can marry marquises, much less rich ones. Still, those taking the novel for two or three hours' amusement may be sure they have read poorer ones, even if this is not the best they have ever read. The translation cannot be recommended. It is full of "Gallicisms and despoiled phrases," as the Portuguese grammar calls them. For instance, p. 11, at the end of Chapter III., "At last, who knows?" added he, shrugging his shoulders. "All whom we condemn are not executed. But the poor lady is very ill, in truth." Or, p. 31, "The Colonel's daughter found an illustrated book on the table—dear to those from whom literature keeps, yet, its secrets, and which can be run over with the thumb."

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Beecher (Rev. H. W.), The Life of Jesus, the Christ	(J. B. Ford & Co.)	$3 50
Darwin (C.), Researches in Natural History and Geology, new ed	(D. Appleton & Co.)
De Forest (J. W.), Overland: a Tale	(Sheldon & Co.)
Dickens (C.), Our Mutual Friend	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Emerson's Singing School	(O. Ditson & Co.)
Freeman (E. A.), Historical Essays	(Macmillan & Co.)	4 00
Froude (J. A.), Short Studies on Great Subjects, 2d Series	(C. Scribner & Co.)
Gross (M.), Languages and Popular Education, swd	(E. Steiger)
Hopkins (E. A.), Relationes Comerciales entre la República Argentina y la de Bolivia, swd	(Buenos Ayres)
Hudson (C. F.), Critical Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament, 2d ed	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Illustrirte Kriegs-Chronik, Part 25, swd	(B. Westermann & Co.)
James (Marian), The Diamond on the Hearth, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)	50
Josh Billings's Farmer's Allminax for 1872, swd	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW

FOR OCTOBER.

Single Number, $1 50.

CONTENTS:

I. VOLCANISM AND MOUNTAIN-BUILDing. J. D. Whitney.

II. THE REGENERATION OF ITALY. E. Gryzanovski.

III. THE MISGOVERNMENT OF NEW York—A Remedy Suggested. Charles Nordhoff.

IV. LANGUAGE AND EDUCATION. W. D. Whitney.

V. FRENCH AND GERMAN DIPLOMACY after Sadowa. C. K. Adams.

VI. CRITICAL NOTICES. Clarke's Ten Great Religions. Müller's Lectures on the Science of Language. Greene's Life of Nathanael Greene. The Fall of England, etc.

For sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers,

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO.,

BOSTON.

JUST PUBLISHED BY

PORTER & COATES,

PUBLISHERS,

PHILADELPHIA.

I.

AMERICAN ORNITHOLOGY;

OR,

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE BIRDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Illustrated with Plates engraved and colored from Original Drawings taken from Nature.

BY ALEXANDER WILSON.

With a life of the author, by George Ord, F.R.S. With Continuation, by Charles Lucien Bonaparte (Prince of Musignano). 3 vols. imperial 8vo, with a folio volume of carefully colored plates embracing nearly 400 figures of birds, mostly life-size. Elegantly bound in cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, $75; in half Turkey morocco, gilt edges, $85.

II.

THOS. HOOD'S POETICAL WORKS.

2 vols. crown 8vo, tinted paper, cloth extra, $1 75 per vol.; half-calf, gilt, $3 50 per vol.; half-morocco, gilt top, $3 50 per vol.

III.

UP THE RHINE.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

Crown 8vo, tinted paper, cloth extra, $1 75 per vol.; half-calf, gilt, $3 50 per vol.; half-morocco, antique, $3 25 per vol.

YALE AND HARVARD USE

WHITNEY'S GERMAN COURSE,

OTTO'S FRENCH COURSE.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,

PUBLISHERS,

No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

The Publishers issue a very large assortment of works in the same department.

☞ A Descriptive Catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

133 NASSAU STREET,

Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

BOOK-BUYERS.

Send for Catalogue of INTERESTING, USEFUL, and SCARCE BOOKS added to the Stock in hand of

FRANCIS EMMINS,

80 Nassau Street, New York.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

13 ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK.

THE RIVERSIDE PRESS, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

Will publish on Saturday, October 14.

ZANITA: A Tale of the Yo-Semite. By Theresa Yelverton, Viscountess Avonmore. In 1 vol. 12mo. Price $1 50.

The sub-title indicates the locale of the story; the author has made herself familiar with the scenes of the famous valley, and her book, besides its pictures of nature, will contain a shrewd observer's characterization of California life and manners.

CONTENTS.—Kenmuir. A Strange Guide. The Daughters of Ah-wa-nee. A Day's Pleasure. Squirrelism. The Fall of the Mercede. The Radds at Home. The Episode of a Kiss. A Return to the Valley. Ah-wa-nee. More than a Handful. Breaches of Decorum. Zanita's Schooling. Zanita among the Nuns. A New-comer. A Shadow Falling Before. An Apology for Love. New Symptoms and a Recourse to Nature. Au Revoir. A New Bud. Peering over the Edge. The Creeping Shadow. Over the Brink. Waking and Sleeping Terrors. In her Mother's Arms. Finis.

A JOURNEY ROUND MY ROOM. From the French of Xavier de Maistre. By H. A. With vignette illustrations. In 1 vol. 16mo. Price $1 50.

This is the first translation into English of De Maistre's "Voyage autour de ma chambre," a book which enjoys a classical reputation at home. The style of this American edition aims at fitness to the delicacy of the work.

PICTURES IN BLACK. By Paul Konewka. In 1 vol. 4to. Price 75c.

Uniform with "Black Peter," by the same eminent artist. The beauty and admirable drawing of these silhouette pictures make them admired by all of artistic perception, while their humor and fun and story-telling character make them great favorites with children.

LITTLE JAKEY. By Mrs. S. H. De Kroyft. With eight illustrations by George G. White. In 1 vol. crown 8vo. Price $1 50.

The pathetic story of a little German boy, an orphan and blind.

LATELY PUBLISHED.

Pictures of Travel. Andersen	$1 75
The Last Knight. Anastasius Grün	2 50
The Fables of Pilpay	1 50
Stories from Old English Poetry	1 50
The Clockmaker (Sam Slick)	1 25
Little Folks' Songs. Mrs. White	1 25
Four, and What they Did	1 25
Mother Goose's Melodies. Illustrated	1 75
The Judge's Pets. Johnson	1 25
Life of Dr. John McVickar	2 00
Culture and Religion. Shairp	1 25
Wake-Robin. John Burroughs	1 50
Handbook of Legendary Art	3 25

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of prices annexed.

PRICED CATALOGUE No. 21

OF

ANCIENT AND MODERN BOOKS,

Comprising Standard and Valuable Works in

ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, HISTORY, VOYAGES, TRAVELS, ETC. ETC. ETC.

☞ Just published, and will be forwarded FREE to any address.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,

Dealer in New and Old Books, 17 Astor Place, N. Y.

NEW BOOKS

TO BE PUBLISHED BY

POTT, YOUNG & CO.

A SHORT TREATISE ON THE HOLY Catholic Church; its Divine Ideal, Ministry, and Institution. With a Catechism on each chapter, forming a course of methodical instruction on the subject. By Edward Meyrick Goulburn, D.D. [In the Press.

THE THEORY AND USE OF THE CHURCH Calendar, in the measurement and distribution of time. Being an account of the origin and growth of the Calendar, of its reformation from the old style to the new, and of its adaptation to the use of the English Church by the British Parliament under George II. By the Rev. Samuel Seabury. [In the Press.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF THE LATE Rev. Dr. Mahan. Edited by the Rev. J. H. Hopkins, jr. 3 vols. 8vo, cloth.

Vol. I. Church History.
Vol. II. Palmoni and Mystic Numbers.
Vol. III. Miscellaneous Writings.

Price, $10 the set.

INDEX CANONUM. Containing the Canons called Apostolical, the Canons of the undisputed General Councils, and the Canons of the Provincial Councils of Ancyra, Neo-Cæsarea, Gangra, Antioch, and Laodicea, together with a complete Digest of the whole code of Canon Law, in the undivided Primitive Church. Alphabetically arranged. By John Fulton, D.D. 8vo, cloth. Price to subscribers, $3.

THE RITUAL LAW OF THE CHURCH, With its application to the Communion and Baptismal Service. To which is added Notes upon Orders and the Articles. By Murray Hoffman, Author of "Law of the Church." Price to subscribers, $3.

The last 3 books will be issued to Subscribers only at the prices annexed.

Subscribers' names should be sent at once through any bookseller, or direct to the Publishers.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.
(Late Pott & Amery),
Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

PRICE, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
596 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, BAZAR, $4 PER YEAR EACH.

$10 a Year for the Three.

$7 for any Two.

An Extra Copy of either gratis for every five Subscribers at $4 each in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE sent by mail on receipt of six cents in postage stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

WILL BE PUBLISHED OCT. 20.

A New Volume, by the Author of "Stepping Heavenward."

AUNT JANE'S HERO.

1 vol. 12mo, 300 pp., $1 50.

THE object of AUNT JANE'S HERO is to depict a Christian home whose happiness flows from the living Rock, Christ Jesus. It protests also against the extravagance and other evils of the times, which tend to check the growth of such homes, and to show that there are still treasures of love and peace on earth, that may be bought without money and without price.

ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH & CO.,
770 Broadway, corner Ninth Street, N. Y.
☞ Early Orders Solicited.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

HISTORICAL ESSAYS. By Edward A. Freeman, M.A., Hon. D.C.L., author of the "History of the Norman Conquest." 8vo, cloth, $4.

EXPERIMENTAL MECHANICS. A Course of Lectures delivered at the Royal College of Science for Ireland. By Robert Stowell Ball, A.M. With numerous illustrations. 8vo, cloth gilt, $6.

THE HISTORY OF NAPOLEON THE First. By P. Lanfrey. Translated with the sanction of the Author. Vol. I. 8vo, cloth, $3 50.

Mr. Lanfrey's History of Napoleon has taken its place in French literature as the standard history of the period with which it is concerned, occupying a place similar to that occupied by such histories as those of Palgrave and Froude in England.

☞ Second and Revised Edition, with Notes.

ON THE GENESIS OF SPECIES. By St. George Mivart, F.R.S. With numerous Illustrations. Second edition, revised, $2.

THE DAILY NEWS CORRESPONDENCE of the War between Germany and France, 1870–71. Edited with Notes and Comments. Complete in 1 vol. With Maps. $2 50.

INSIDE PARIS DURING THE SIEGE. By an Oxford Graduate. Cloth, $2.

THE SEVEN WEEKS' WAR: Its Antecedents and its Incidents. By H. M. Hozier, F.C.S. 2d edition. With new Preface and Maps. Cloth, $2 50.

MACMILLAN & CO.,
38 Bleecker Street, New York.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE ON THE BANKRUPT LAW.

SECOND EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. More accidents occur from the use of unsafe oils than from steamboats and railroads combined. The universal use of Pratt's Astral Oil would save thousands of lives and millions of property.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1871.

The Office of The Nation has been removed to No. 5 Beekman Street.

The Week.

THE panic produced in financial and commercial circles by the Chicago fire has subsided; but the real magnitude of the calamity begins only now to be measured. The loss is evidently much less in amount than the first exaggerated estimates, but the character of the loss is widely different from what is generally believed. The first effect was the more or less compulsory sale of securities to provide the means of meeting actual losses. It was this sale, and its anticipated effect upon the markets, that created the terrible depression in securities of last week from which Wall Street has not yet recovered. The more serious effect is that which results from the withdrawal of funds from New York to enable the banks, merchants, and people of Chicago to repair their losses. The banks, in order to respond to this drain, even to the limited extent so far experienced, were obliged already last week to draw their reserves down below the limit prescribed by law, and the drain has been more severe the present week than it was last. It is from this source that the real danger threatens. The actual loss of property, great as it is, will be speedily retrieved by the inexhaustible activity, energy, enterprise, and intelligence of the people, but the disturbance in the delicate machinery of bank credits is more difficult to rectify, and many persons are already calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to interfere, with all the power of the United States Government, to prevent a serious curtailment of the currency of the people, and to issue a portion of his greenback reserve in place of the credits destroyed by the present uncertainty.

In Wall Street, the alarm reached its height on Saturday, prices rallying sharply from the lowest points, and working, with moderate fluctuations at best, a slight level above the extreme decline. Money continues stringent, though no longer at the usurious rates artificially made in the midst of the panic by speculators for a decline. The average fall in securities is probably not much less than ten per cent. Gold has likewise fallen off, owing to the abundant supply of foreign capital offered here at the extreme rates of interest. The rates of exchange have correspondingly declined from the same reason. The fall in Government securities, which seems at first surprising, is caused by the fact that many financial companies, at the first sign of alarm, sold those securities upon which they could most speedily raise cash without great loss. All trade has received a severe blow, no one daring to enter upon important negotiations until the effect of the fire is better understood. Prices of most articles have fallen off. Produce and provisions are lower; best coffee, tea, and groceries, of which the supply is insufficient, remain firm. Real estate is in a very precarious condition. The general feeling throughout the community is one of uncertainty, but no longer of alarm.

Strengthened and comforted by the magnificent benevolence of the rest of the country, Chicago has spent the week in looking on the bright side of her great calamity, in adjusting and diminishing the losses, clearing the débris, building anew, and caring for the homeless and starving. There is, happily, no disposition manifested to rely for exemption from future destruction on the exceptional conditions which invested the late fire with so much fury and awfulness; though it is difficult to see in what the safety of the city will consist so long as the Western Division and what remains of the Southern continue to be of wood. A hint as to the proper safeguard may be found in the singular preservation of Mr. Ogden's house in the North Division, in spite of its being a frame house and shingle-roofed; apparently, because it had a public square on one side, and private grounds, of green trees and shrubs, about it on the three others. It is well-known, also, that the progress of the flames on the south was stayed by a couple of vacant lots at the end of a block. Now, if a cordon of open space were temporarily drawn all around the district to be rebuilt (from which, of course, all wooden structures will be excluded), the new city would seem to be secure against the tinder-boxes to the west and south of it. The wooden pavements do not appear to have helped the spread of the flames materially, but the plank sidewalks undoubtedly did; and, being loosely laid on trestle-work, boarded at the side, forming tunnels, with seasoned pine studding underneath, they offered the best arrangement for extending a fire that could be made at the cost. These we shall not see restored; neither, it is to be hoped, the finishing of brick and stone buildings with wooden cornices and parapets and immense wooden signs. So, too, those blocks within blocks have disappeared for ever—wooden houses set back from the broad to the narrow streets, and surrounded by solid warehouses; new Chicago displacing but encircling the old. All accounts agree that the heat of the fire was overpowering at a great distance in advance of the destroying flames, and the roar of the hurricane horrible and appalling. It was this that gave the event the character of a tropical catastrophe.

Simultaneous with the burning of Chicago, still more dreadful fires, if possible, have occurred in Wisconsin and Michigan, along the shores of Lakes Michigan and Huron and Green Bay and Saginaw Bay, and even along the river valleys and in the interior of those peninsulas. Here the forest fires have destroyed whole villages at a blow, with the same violence of wind as at Chicago, and with a loss of life not only greater in the aggregate, but more overwhelming to the survivors. The only refuge was underground, or in the lake and river water, where too often death came in a double guise. The very industry of these districts, largely peopled by Belgians and Hollanders—the pine-lumber manufacture—has been annihilated, together with their accumulations and stores for the coming winter, and the hardship is most distressing. Some idea of the force of the gales may be had from the experience of Peshtigo, on a river of the same name emptying into Green Bay. It had once before suffered seriously from fire, and the heart of the village, being thus removed, had never been rebuilt, so that the town had a very scattered appearance, with the houses very far apart, and the river dividing it into two distinct divisions. Menomonee was a much larger place, and its saw-mills were, perhaps, the largest in the world. The loss of life was probably largely due to panic. In both towns, however, the refuse of the mills lay piled about, and was, doubtless, after being fired, lifted and thrown about with a force sufficient to kill those who were exposed to the flying fragments.

The war between the two Republican factions seems only to grow fiercer as the election approaches. The Conklingite leader is in the field, hallooing vigorously, but the Fentonites are left without their great chief, who, in the classic language of one of the Conklingite organs, is "pouting in his tent," "because of a quarrel about discipline and Federal appointments." The battle with Tammany, in which both factions are engaged, is every day or two interrupted in a most comical manner by a scrimmage in the Republican ranks, caused by somebody's dropping his musket to kick the shins or punch the head of the next man in the ranks. The Tribune and Times have a tussle nearly every day, and call each other dreadful names, and it is very funny to see the deep, awe-stricken interest with which the small fry of country papers watch these frays, and to read the faint cackle of sympathy or applause for one side or the other which comes up from them, and which the combatants reprint with great solemnity. We have always wondered, and shall never cease to wonder, how it is the editors of newspapers have not found out how utterly nauseating to the great bulk of their readers these quarrels with each other are, and how very few people read them, and how completely all interest in them is confined to other newspaper men. The wonder, too, is made all the greater by the fact that no newspaper was probably ever yet injured in circulation or influence by what another newspaper said of it. The success of a paper, and the estimation in which it is held, depend, as in the case of individuals, on its general character—that is, on prolonged experience of the way in which it does its work, and of the value of its judgments of men and affairs. Any paper which has gained a respectable footing in these respects cannot be in the least injured by another paper's saying every now and then that it is a fool, a liar, or a knave. We observe, by the way, that among the Republican inspectors of election recently appointed, the Tribune sets down one as having been dismissed from the Brooklyn navy-yard "for expressing admiration for Senator Fenton and Mr. Greeley." We believe admiration for Mr. Greeley to be not incompatible with a healthy condition of mind and body; but any person who "admires" Senator Fenton should receive all the care and attention that science and affection can bestow.

We believe it was generally admitted, even by his most indulgent and admiring friends, that Mr. Conkling's late attempt, in his letter to Mr. Griswold, of Troy, to play the part of a moral philosopher of a sanguine turn, was a failure. The whole performance was overdone. His childlike expression of confidence, for instance, in the inability of Satan to "entrap men with so coarse and bad a snare" as office, was more than the public could swallow, coming from a gentleman of Mr. Conkling's experience. We are, therefore, glad to see that he has abandoned that particular rôle, and come out as a good working party politician, in a long speech delivered at Albany on Wednesday week. He was particularly severe on that occasion, as usual, on "corruption," which seems to have the power, whenever he contemplates it, of producing in his mind an extraordinary wealth of imagery. He compared it to "a pestilence that wasteth at noonday," to an animal "with a stealthy creep, a leprous touch, and deadly breath, which wastes and rots fair fabrics," and also to a "sea-bird which blasts trees, by building its nest on them." The question whether this strange nondescript—part pestilence, part beast, part bird—"would mark us for destruction too," he says, "the times are too murky to forecast," so he proposes "to hammer it out on the anvil of the future." Of the two jobs, we think the "forecasting" is, on the whole, much easier than the "hammering"; but, a little further on, he gives it to be understood that neither will be necessary, as "it will be answered on election day." He confines himself mainly to the affairs of this State, denouncing the Tammany frauds both at the elections and in the management of the city funds; also, the bribery of the Legislature at Albany, which he says is done with the city money, and must be stopped by the Legislature, but he does not say how it is to be stopped. It must be confessed, however, that all he says on these matters is strong and pointed, and has the merit of singling out particular rascals for reprobation.

Mr. Conkling, in discoursing of the management of the finances under the present Administration—for which there is much that is creditable to be said—has followed the bad example of Mr. Delano, and misstated the facts in a very reckless way. It is not true that the taxes on spirits and tobacco were reduced simultaneously with the advent of the present Administration; they were reduced four months before General Grant's election, seven months before his inauguration, and a full year before he had finished the work of turning out old employees and putting in new ones. The increase in the product of these taxes under the reduced duty is, therefore, not to be credited to the present Administration; two-thirds of it at least is due to Johnson, if due to anybody, which we deny. It is due in part to the elasticity of the revenue, and in part to the cessation of the frauds and smuggling caused, and inevitably caused, by the high duties. Mr. Conkling also grossly and inexcusably misrepresents the comparative cost of collecting the revenue under Grant and under Johnson. He says that the expenses of the Internal Revenue Bureau in 1868, under Johnson, were $8,387,793; the first fiscal year of Grant, $5,916,410. Now, Mr. Conkling's authority, Mr. Columbus Delano, expressly states, on page 17 of his Internal Revenue Report for 1869, that the expense of collecting the internal revenue for 1868 was $8,776,814, and, for the year 1869, $7,394,395; so that, even if 1869 was Grant's first year, the saving would be only $160,863, instead of $2,471,383. But it was not Grant's first year; two-thirds of it was Johnson's. The fact is that there is nothing to be said that is very creditable to the Administration for its mode of collecting the internal revenue, and the less said about it, the better. The Administration has raised the Government credit, but, as we believe, at enormous cost to the country, and to the total neglect of the greatest financial evil of the day—our bad currency.

A delegation from the Committee of Seventy, with Judge Pierrepont at their head, went up to Albany on Tuesday, and had an important conference with Governor Hoffman and the Attorney-General. Their object was to invoke the Governor's aid in bringing Tweed & Co. to justice, and in forcing them to disgorge their plunder. The authority under which they hoped he might be induced to act is his Constitutional function to "see that the laws are faithfully executed"; the mode of interference they refrained from suggesting. Governor Hoffman naturally pointed out the vagueness of this authority, in the absence of any statute defining the occasions for its exercise, and contented himself with promising that he would do what he lawfully could, and was prepared to protect the city against any riotous demonstrations on the part of the Ring. The Attorney-General was able to give more positive assistance, by requesting Mr. Charles O'Conor to act as counsel in the prosecutions for fraud, and empowering him to institute in the name of his (the Attorney-General's) office any suit or proceeding which, as such counsel, he may approve. This accession will certainly encourage the Committee, as it will inspire the public with confidence in the ultimate success of the reform movement. In the Ingersoll suit, Mr. Havemeyer's standing as plaintiff has been affirmed by Judge Ingraham.

The inexpediency, to use a mild word, of extending Executive clemency to the adventurers who figure as Fenian "generals," has just been illustrated by the appearance of the redoubtable O'Neill, seconded by another warrior named O'Donohue, in a raid on North Pembina, where these two, with forty men, seized a Hudson Bay Company's post, garrisoned by an old man and his wife, a one-armed man, and a clerk. One of the prisoners managed, after capture, to send a note over to the commander of the United States garrison at Pembina, who came out with thirty men and marched down on the Fenians, who had massed their troops inside the house, and were enjoying themselves. On hearing of the approach of the regulars, however, the whole invading army rushed out like mad; O'Neill forgetting his invincible sabre on the table, and O'Donohue making wildly for his horse, which had been in the meantime seized and mounted by one of his men with fugacious designs. Him he knocked down, and fled on the animal himself, but was pursued by Captain Wheaton, of the United States Army, who, revolver in hand, and in a high-handed and brutal manner, captured both him and O'Neill, and ten privates and non-commissioned officers, and a good many rifles and cartridges. So ended the invasion. The views current in the Fenian army as to the causes of the failure are various, but the general opinion is that the principal cause was "treason." Another opinion makes O'Neill rather fonder of good living and notoriety than of battle and murder, which seems to us also well-founded. The United States Commissioner has discharged them, for the present, on the ground that the offence was committed beyond the border; but will not the Government, in common humanity to the poor dupes from whom these rascals get the money for their expeditions, not leave them to serve out their term in jail, if they are again convicted, as we hope they will be? Can we wonder that the New York mob should get on the tops of houses to throw hand-grenades into processions, when lazy vagabonds like O'Neill and O'Donohue are allowed to get a living by heading gangs of robbers in making incursions on farmers along the northern frontier?

The London Economist gives an explanation of the way in which the Berlin Government has been disturbing the market by its dealings with the money drawn from France in payment of the indemnity. The writer says he has enquired into the matter "on the spot," and the result is this: It is estimated that the German Government has received from France and holds $25,000,000 in English gold and $75,000,000 in French gold. This enormous sum it keeps, it is supposed, for the purpose of paying off a five per cent. debt falling due at the end of the year. It does not desire barbarously to withdraw so large a quantity of coin from circulation, and offers to lend it at three and a-half per cent., but it asks for security such as few are willing to give, and the loan, with such security and at such rates, has no attractions for the German banks, so the money lies in the treasury. A large sum has also been received from the French in silver five-franc pieces, but these do not go into circulation either, because the branch bank of Berlin at Frankfort, acting under Government orders, has refused to receive them at the conventional rate of 2 gulden 20 kreutzers, at which they have always hitherto passed. It is estimated that about $15,000,000 are in this way kept lying idle, and the Frankfort and other banks which counted on it as part of their reserve have been compelled to raise the rate of interest. The object of the Government in throwing this large quantity of silver out of currency is not very apparent, but it is supposed to have some connection with the contemplated plan, of which the Emperor has spoken in his recent speech to the Reichsrath, of a reform in German coinage. The Berlin Government contemplates a change not only from a silver to a gold currency, but the establishment of a uniform basis for the coinage of the whole Empire. In the meantime, the locking up of the money is producing keen pressure in the money markets of Europe, and particularly in London, where the French have borrowed a considerable portion of the indemnity. There is something of the characteristic Prussian hardness in the small concern which the Government seems to be giving itself about making it easy for the French to pay, and yet it is in the highest degree expedient as well as merciful to lighten the burden in all ways that will not diminish the conqueror's gains.

The second session of the German Reichstag was opened last Monday by the Emperor William in person. In his address, after reviewing the history of German unification, and the eminently favorable condition of united Germany, he enumerated the topics the consideration of which his Government recommended to the Parliament, mentioning, first of all, the budget for the Empire. This threatens to raise exciting discussions, as the transitional period of five years for which the war budget was established under the late North German Confederation expires with the close of the present year, and the new financial arrangements are also to settle the repayment, from the funds of the French war indemnity, of the advances made during the war by the several states of the Empire, and the expenses required for the government of the territories annexed from France. The change of coinage and the securing of a line of direct communication with Italy through Switzerland, by means of the proposed St. Gothard tunnel, were also warmly recommended. The foreign relations of Germany the Emperor declared to be entirely satisfactory, and especially those with Austria, which were now—after the conferences of Gastein and Salzburg—"of a cordial nature," and "no longer shadowed by reminiscences of past conflicts."

The Alsace-Lorraine customs treaty, the subject of so many conferences and deliberations, comments and reports, has finally been concluded at Berlin. It consists of three "conventions": one territorial, by which Germany retrocedes to France a small strip of territory; one financial, providing for the payment of the remainder of the war indemnity—three milliards and a half of francs—in specie bills to the amount of eighty millions every fortnight, beginning with the 15th of January next, so that the last instalment would be paid shortly before the close of 1873, and a number of months before the date stipulated by the treaty of peace; providing also for the evacuation of six departments of France, and the reduction of the German army in the other six departments still to remain under their hands to the number of thirty thousand men, which is further materially to be reduced after six months, if the payment progresses regularly; and the last relating to the customs, according to which the products of Alsace-Lorraine shall be permitted to enter France, and those of France to enter Alsace-Lorraine, free of duty, for the next twelve months. The financial convention is definitively concluded by the signatures, affixed to it on the 13th, of Prince Bismarck and M. Pouyer-Quertier; and the evacuation of the Departments of Aisne, Aube, Côte-d'Or, Haute-Saône, Doubs, and Jura is to begin within a fortnight from that date—or from the ratification of the customs convention by the German Reichstag, if another telegraphic abstract be correct, which we greatly doubt. Thiers, on his part, who has saved the customs reciprocity clause, and seems to have made an excellent bargain in every respect, needs no further ratification, having acted in accordance with an authorization previously obtained from the National Assembly.

The vanquished Emperor, Francis Joseph, who, a year after Sadowa, seemed to have reconstructed his shattered empire on a new and durable basis, is now again laboring under difficulties, which must make him feel as keenly as ever the impotence into which that terrible day plunged him. By immoderately yielding to the long-protracted passive resistance of the Czechs, by going so far as not only to throw all the influence of his Government into the Slavic scale before and during the late elections to the provincial diets, but also to acknowledge, in a rescript to the Diet of Prague, the sovereignty rights of the Bohemian nation, he has raised a storm in the German provinces which his Cisleithan cabinet, under Hohenwart, seems to be unable to allay, while a retreat appears equally perilous, and must certainly be humiliating in the highest degree. The Diet of Lower Austria, which represents the imperial capital, has launched an almost unanimous and most violent protest against the new policy, declaring it openly subversive of the constitution, and its possible results null and void. Other diets, in which the majority is German, are equally emphatic in their opposition; and where Slavic majorities decide, the German minorities, imitating the former example of the Czechs, retire under protest. What makes the condition of affairs worse is that the Hungarians, though not directly concerned, are somewhat alarmed by the sweeping Slavic reaction in Cisleithan Austria, which provokes agitation and ferment in Croatia, and are therefore inclined to take part with the Germans, and object to the change as incompatible with the dualistic arrangement (Ausgleich) of 1867. Chancellor Beust, too, who has just established the entente cordiale with Germany, is dissatisfied, and, according to a report, threatens to resign. No wonder, therefore, that the abdication of Francis Joseph himself is rumored.

And yet, Hungarians and Croats, Czechs and Germans, and all the other nationalities of the polyglot Austro-Hungarian Empire, could so easily live together in peace and harmony were they only to listen to the advice of the Fifth Annual Congress of the International League of Peace and Liberty, held two or three weeks ago at Lausanne, in Switzerland. That League distinctly shows them the way, which is, to overthrow their despotic Government, join the League in forming a republican confederation of the peoples of Europe, and then live on in peace and harmony. For the particulars in achieving all this, they might refer to the reports and debates of the League on "the means of extending its action"; on the "means of doing away with social enmity between citizens"; on "the Eastern question"; on "the Polish question"; on "decentralization, federation, annexation"; and many other things, to be settled or done away with in peace and liberty, without war or bloodshed. This, however, is unfortunately not the opinion of Mazzini, who, in a letter, told the League that, "to his regret, he could not hope that Europe would become either pacific or republican without at least one great European war, which was absolutely necessary, if only to settle the question of the Slavic races." We presume the League of Peace and Liberty can have no strong objection to one great European war. But then the question arises, how are Hungarians and Croats, Czechs and Germans, who happen to hold diametrically opposite views on the "question of the Slavic races," harmoniously to join in that war, the last of wars?

ANOTHER "NEW DEPARTURE."

THE Republican triumphs at the late State elections and the prospective triumph of the party in this State, under the influence of the Ring frauds, are apparently producing something like complete demoralization in the Democratic ranks—demoralization such as they have not hitherto shown. Under existing circumstances, the Democratic prospect for the next Presidential election is well-nigh hopeless. There does not seem to be the smallest chance that any man, fairly identified with the party by his antecedents or frankly holding its peculiar doctrines, could be elected. It was the growing consciousness of this fact which led to the "new departure" movement. Seeing there was no hope of making the original Democratic creed with which the party came out of the war acceptable to the country, the leaders resolved to provide it with a creed that would be acceptable to the country; but this, too, has proved a failure. The new creed was not a bad one, and the "new departure" looked very sensible; but few could be got to believe in its sincerity and genuineness. The party has, in fact, been going through some of the experiences of the discharged convict who, though truly desirous of mending his ways and heartily sorry for his past transgressions, finds that no sooner is his history known than he is turned out of his place, no matter how exemplary his behavior may be. The "new departure" (which is fustian for "fresh start") has, in fact, apparently left the party in a worse plight than ever. Its defeats in California and Pennsylvania and Ohio, in the third year of a Republican Administration which has certainly not been free from faults, leave no further doubt as to the desperate state of its fortunes.

There are now some signs that this despair, if deepened, as it probably will be, by defeat in this State, and by the break-up of the New York Ring, from which the party treasury has of late years been well supplied, may lead to a crisis which would bring to an end that stage in national politics on which the country entered with the formation of the Republican party. The first and great object of the Republican party was the prevention of the extension of slavery into the Territories. The conduct of the war, and the extinction of slavery, and the establishment of equality before the law grew out of this; but since these were accomplished, as they were accomplished by the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment, the mission of the party has consisted simply in keeping the Democrats from undoing its work or destroying the public credit. Now, the consciousness that it holds its place simply because there is nobody else who can be trusted to fill it, or, in other words, lest a worse thing should happen, is as injurious to a party as to an individual. That the Republican party has suffered from this position no candid man can deny. Its platforms have grown windier; the office-holding element in it has grown more influential and active, reliance on party discipline more confident, as time has worn on and no positive work has been provided for it to do. It has become more and more the fashion for its leaders to meet demands for reform by asking whether there was any probability that the Democrats would take them, and, if not, by assuming that there was no occasion for Republicans to trouble themselves with them; and they have found this reply so effective, that those Republicans who long to be up and doing—and who feel that "keeping watch" is, after all, a sorry rôle for the majority of a great political community to be playing in an era of incessant change and progress—have, during the last year or two, been resigning themselves to the belief that there was no hope of a forward movement until the Democratic party as an organization had been somehow got out of the field.

How this deliverance was to be brought about nobody could, of course, undertake to say. No sober-minded man could flatter himself that the disappearance from our politics of an organization which has, for over half a century, played a leading part in the government of the country, and exercised a most powerful influence on its legislation and its ideas, and has always possessed, and still possesses, through its name and traditions, if not through its policy, a strong fascination for foreign immigrants, was to be counted on very confidently or looked for very soon. But the opinion gains ground every day that this it is, come when it may, and not any break-up in the Republican ranks, which is to turn over the new leaf in our political history, and start us on that path of internal reform and progress—municipal, legislative, financial, educational, and industrial—from which the slavery controversy has for forty years, if not longer, shut out the national thoughts and energies. For, if regrets were not useless, and if the abolition of slavery were not in itself so great a thing, thinking of what might have been if slavery had never troubled the waters of American politics would be as sad an occupation as a patriotic man could sit down to. The mere sight of what moth and rust have done to our political fabric during the last thirty years is enough to excuse the despondency with which many of our best and purest minds look into the future. There is hardly an institution, from the ballot up, which has not been in some manner befouled, or has not in some degree decayed; and if the devotion called out by the war, and the tremendous force and activity of commerce and industry, and the perennial flow of benevolence—of the depth and vehemence of which it sometimes takes a calamity like the Chicago fire to remind us—were not a constant illustration of the richness and strength of the material with which the American legislator has to deal, many an earnest man would feel disposed to give up the fight as lost already—lost after a single charge—lost before one quarter of the national forces had been brought into play.

We do not mean to say that the approach of the crisis is yet certain, but there are signs of it on which it is no harm to keep one's eye. The St. Louis Republican, one of the most, if not the most influential Democratic organ in the West, has, within a few days, boldly propounded the plan of making no nomination for the next Presidential election as perhaps the wisest thing the party can do under the circumstances, and the only thing it can do to break up the Republican strength; and the suggestion has been met with more or less open approval, or with silence, which, considering what the nature of the plan is, is the next thing to approval. The Republican points to the success of this plan in Missouri as an indication of the results which might be looked for if it were tried in the larger field of national politics. There it led to a split in the Republican ranks, and the sending of a man like Carl Schurz, of unquestioned purity, culture, and experience, to the United States Senate, which ought to contain no other kind of men, and the seating in the Governor's chair of Gratz Brown—a man who, though he has been identified with all that is most radical in the most Radical policy, came out of the war with his head clear, his views broad, and his hold on the great principles of free government unshaken. The consequence was that Missouri, a State rent more than any other by the fratricidal feuds of the civil war, has suddenly subsided into complete tranquillity; the old hates have disappeared, as if by magic; the old rebels have become loyal and contented; the old Radicals kindly and hopeful; and the community has entered on a career of material prosperity such as is nowhere else to be seen.

We do not look for much good sense, self-sacrifice, or self-restraint from the Democratic managers; and then the notion that a party must make nominations, whether it expects to win or not, has secured too firm a place among the rules of party strategy to make us hope that this novel plan of retiring to the mountains, and letting the enemy quarrel over their conquests, is likely to find favor rapidly. But that it will gain in favor we do not doubt, and that a defeat in New York would greatly help it is very certain. The probable effect of it on the Republican party we shall not now attempt to sketch. One consequence is obvious enough. It would bring into play elements which the existence and activity of the Democratic party now keep out of sight, and the appearance of which would be bitterly mourned by many "useful" men. It would be the blackest day the Forneys, the Murphys, and the Camerons have seen for a long while, for any reorganization must consign them, for a period at least, to retirement. It is hard to conceive of any new organization rising up in the present state of the public mind in which this class of veterans would find any place worth their attention; but even if not wholly laid on the shelf, the early, enthusiastic, hopeful days of a party are not those in which they and their like find their way into places of trust and profit.

THE CONFEDERATE BONDHOLDERS.

The prevalent opinion in the United States concerning the British holders of Confederate bonds is that their claim is utterly without foundation; that an argument even in its support cannot be framed; and that they themselves cannot with a good face present their demand to our Government for settlement. Certain of the newspapers have found in the provision of the Treaty of Washington which requires all matters brought before the arbitrators to be presented by the respective governments, and not by individuals, a complete bar to any action by the Confederate creditors, because the British Government would never violate international good manners by appearing to father a claim so preposterous and so irritating to our sensibilities. It is, however, likely that the British bondholders will assert their alleged rights; and there is danger that the British Government will make itself the vehicle of their reclamations; and if so, the arbitrators will be obliged to consider and pass upon the demand. It is not, in fact, absolutely and incontestably groundless. Lord Cairns has pronounced in favor of its validity; and Lord Cairns's opinion in England is much what Charles O'Conor's would be in New York: we may doubt or deny its correctness, but we cannot impugn its honesty. As this claim may soon be brought before the Board of Arbitrators, we purpose to state the outline of the argument which can be and probably will be made in its support, without more than a passing judgment upon the merits of the controversy.

This argument is based, first, upon the doctrines and principles of international law, and, secondly, upon the acts of the United States Government itself. Without now discussing the operative language of the bonds themselves, we shall assume that they created in favor of their holders a fixed and certain debt resting upon the Confederacy and its Government. There are certain principles which underlie this whole subject. The obligations which burden a nation, whether they arise from treaties creating permanent servitudes, or whether they arise from indebtedness to foreign nations and subjects, are not in the slightest degree affected by any change in the form of the internal government, however radical and complete. Nor are these obligations affected when the nation upon which they rest surrenders its independence and sovereignty, and, either by voluntary and peaceful cession or by force, becomes swallowed up and incorporated with another state: the latter in such case ipso facto assumes and becomes charged with the international burdens, of the character we have described, which were formerly borne by the expired commonwealth. In other words, the state which thus acquires additional possessions takes them cum onere. These principles have been affirmed by all publicists, from Grotius down to the latest systematic writer upon international law, and have been as generally observed and acted upon as any other portions of the public code. By applying them to the results of a war, upon private and public rights and duties, there has grown up the system of rules known as the doctrines of postliminy, which have been discussed at great length by European juridical writers, and have to a large extent occupied the attention of European diplomatists. We are now only concerned with these rules of postliminy as they affect public rights and obligations.

When, in the progress of a war, one belligerent has overrun and occupied the territory of the other, displacing, for the time being, its government and overthrowing its power, and keeps simply and purely a military possession thereof—a possession by the sword—and is finally driven out, or voluntarily abandons its acquisitions, all dispositions of public national property, and all discharges of debts due to the state, and all creation of national obligations made during the interval by the invaders, are not at all binding upon the legitimate government when it returns to its rightful rule. But if, on the other hand, after having effected a purely military occupation of the enemy's territory, the invader sets up a civil government, which maintains itself as such, and becomes, in a true sense of the term, de facto, the dispositions of public movable property, and the discharge of public debts owing to the state, and the creation of additional public obligations made by this inter-reigning though usurped power, are valid and binding upon the legitimate authority when it is restored and returns to the exercise of its proper functions. This doctrine, we say, is maintained by all publicists. Phillimore states it thus: "It is the opinion of the best jurists, fortified by reason and practice, that, until a title indicating permanent possession has been superinduced to the temporary title of the sword, no valid alienation of property can be made by the conqueror. In effecting the change from conquest to established government, time is, of course, the principal agent; but the recognition of such government by a treaty of peace with other states is the most usual and unquestionable evidence. This change, however, may also be effected by the submission of the conquered people to the new government, indicated by some public act of the state, or by the fact itself, evidenced by the tranquillity of the people, their obedience to the law, and, above all, by the quiet and regular administration of justice in the proper civil tribunals." Heffter, who treats of this subject at length, comes to the same conclusions. The European states have acted upon these doctrines as an acknowledged part of the public law. At the final overthrow of Napoleon, and the return of the legitimate sovereigns to their thrones, all but the Elector of Hesse-Cassel, and one other small German potentate, treated the acts of the conqueror as valid, although he had, just before his downfall, been denounced as an enemy of mankind.

The cases in which this doctrine has been applied in Europe have, as was natural, generally been those of external violence, of an intermediate government established by an invader; it will be claimed by the holders of Confederate bonds that the same principle applies to a civil war and to an irregular and usurped government established by insurgents. Assuming this to be correct, the controversy will be reduced to a simple question of fact, namely: Did the Confederacy possess a de facto government dominating civilly over the territory and people, acting by and through its civil arm as counterdistinguished from its mere military power, in a manner and to an extent sufficient to satisfy the rule? This we say is a question of fact. Its answer is to be found in the constitution of affairs within the Confederacy, in the acts of the United States towards it, and in the acts of foreign powers. We must bear in mind, however, as a matter of the highest importance, that the internal policy and intention of the United States, as shown by the statutes of Congress, by the declarations of the President or the Secretary of State, and even by the Constitution itself, have nothing to do with this question. Nations cannot escape their international obligations by the most formal denial or repudiation of them, even though made through every department of the government. We may dismiss from our consideration, therefore, as entirely irrelevant, all the proclamations made by the President, and all the protests made by Mr. Secretary Seward, and all the statutes passed by Congress, denying a belligerent and de facto character to the Confederacy and its government. It is the acts and not the talk of the United States that we are to examine. The facts are all familiar to our readers, and we need not recapitulate them. It is enough to say that the United States Government, through all its departments, fell back upon its general and unlimited powers to carry on a war as with a foreign enemy; and we must remember that war brings with it international duties and obligations, as well as powers and rights. The Confederacy had a civil government entirely distinct and superior to the military domination over the territory occupied by it. For several years this government exercised all its functions; its legislature passed laws which were obeyed without resistance by the people; the courts were in operation; taxes were laid and collected. The Confederacy was never fully recognized as an independent nation, but its Government was recognized by all the European states, except Turkey, as a de facto power, capable of carrying on a proper war; its military and commercial flags were recognized; consular intercourse was openly carried on; and a diplomatic intercourse sub modo. The United States also recognized the Confederacy as a belligerent, and therefore as a de facto Government, by the very act of carrying on a proper war with it, and by claiming therein all the rights and privileges of war as against neutrals, and as against the inhabitants themselves of the Southern territory. This point has been overlooked by many American writers; it has been evaded by the United States authorities; but we may be sure that it will be pressed with great energy upon the board of arbitrators by the British claimants.

Passing by as secondary the manner in which the conflict was actually waged, with truces, capitulations, exchanges of prisoners, and cartels, there are certain facts which stand out with prominence, and which singly, and much more in combination, indicate the nature of the Confederacy itself, and the attitude of the United States towards it. In the first place, the blockade, and its enforcement against neutral vessels upon the high seas, was an absolute acknowledgment that the conflict was a proper war waged between two forces having international belligerent rights. All of Mr. Seward's protests could not overcome the fact itself; and Mr. Sumner's "peaceful blockade" is the creation of his own ingenious brain. In the second place, the confiscation statutes passed by Congress were an absolute acknowledgment and declaration that the conflict was a proper war, and that the Southerners were proper enemies. The Supreme Court of the United States has, in a series of cases extending down to the past winter, decided in the most solemn manner that these statutes cannot, under the Constitution, be upheld as an exercise of the national sovereignty over citizens who have rebelled, but must be upheld, if at all, and can be upheld, simply as an exercise of the power to wage proper war upon enemies; that the international law permits the capture and confiscation of private enemy-property upon land; and that the statutes are valid under these international doctrines, and not under our municipal system. In the third place, upon the downfall of the Confederacy, property belonging to it was left in the hands of its agents in England. The United States claimed this property as the national successor to the Confederacy, and as the universal heir of its goods, and attempted to enforce its right through the English courts. This very claim admitted the de facto nature of the Confederate Government. If the Confederacy had been an uncombined mass of individuals, with no national or international organization, then the United States would only have been entitled at most to seize and confiscate such goods as were within its jurisdiction, and as fell into its possession. But the property in England had never been within its jurisdiction nor possession. Asserting ownership over it as successor by the rights of conquest was therefore acknowledging the corporate national character of the former owner. The English courts sustained these views, and held that the United States must take the property, if at all, with the liens and other burdens imposed upon it by the former owner. Several passages in our early history show how decided the United States has always been to claim a de facto government for itself. The reclamations first made upon Denmark by Dr. Franklin, and continued down to the year 1843, for a breach of neutral duties during the early years of the Revolution, form a precedent so conclusive that it amounts almost to an estoppel.

We should refer in detail to several important historical events in which the doctrine of postliminy was applied did our space permit. The case of the debts due to the Elector of Hesse-Cassel paid to and discharged by Napoleon, is familiar to every student of public law. We must, however, recall one incident in our own history which, in some of its essential features, resembles the case of the Confederate bondholders. In the year 1806, Ferdinand IV., King of the Two Sicilies, was driven from the continental portion of his dominion by the French, and a usurping government was established therein. Ferdinand, however, retained possession and exercised full authority over the island of Sicily. During the continuance of Murat's power, several American vessels and their cargoes were seized and confiscated by him. Upon the restoration of the legitimate monarch, the United States demanded compensation for these losses. The negotiations were protracted, but, in 1832, a treaty was signed awarding an indemnity to the American owners. A very recent writer has well said that "this convention constitutes the most complete recognition of the principle which establishes the responsibility of every country for the acts of its government de facto, under whatever title it may exist."

There is another view of the case which may be fatal to the bondholders before these questions of international law are reached. The promissory language of the bonds themselves does not appear to be absolute and certain; the liability of the Confederate Government is rather made to rest upon a contingency—upon the happening of an event which has never happened—namely, its final success. These securities, therefore, may have been, in fact as well as in figure, mere bottomry bonds upon the Southern ship of state, and may have perished when that ship foundered in the political sea.

The case is one, however, that has a political side which is far more important than the legal side. The British Government can exercise its discretion about bringing these claims forward, and we sincerely trust that it will not bring them forward, but take on itself the responsibility of rejecting them, and not throw it on the arbitrators; for it is as well to say that they will not be paid under any circumstances, and the opinion of even the soberest Americans would be that they should not be paid, no matter what it would cost to resist them. To bring them forward will be to imperil the treaty, and, what is worse, imperil the good understanding which now happily begins to spring up between the two nations. This cotton loan, it must be remembered, was not a commercial venture simply; we doubt if any of the holders would even now have the effrontery to maintain that it was. Of course they had more or less hope of getting back their money when they went into it, but their most powerful motive was sympathy with the revolt against the United States, and desire for its success. In short, the money was lent to carry on war against this Government, and the claimants are persons who, outside of this loan transaction, largely assisted in creating the difficulties between England and America, which are now about to be settled. To call upon the United States to repay it on technical legal grounds is to ask for a display of magnanimity, and of respect for law, of which no nation has as yet shown itself capable, and of which, we will venture to add, it is not desirable on moral grounds that our Government should show itself capable in this case. The loss of the money will be a valuable lesson to the average British capitalist; it will teach him never to invest in a passion, as well as to be a little more careful in choosing sides before he mixes himself up in foreign quarrels.

NIAGARA.

II.

THE pure beauty of elegance and grace is the grand characteristic of the Fall. It is not in the least monstrous. It is supremely artistic—a harmony, a conception, a masterpiece; it beats Michael Angelo. One may seem at first to say the least, but the delicate observer will admit that one says the most, in saying that it is pleasing. There are, however, so many more things to say about it—its multitudinous features crowd so upon the vision as one looks—that it seems absurd for me to attempt to handle details. The main feature, perhaps, is the incomparable loveliness of the immense line of the river and its lateral abutments. It neither falters, nor breaks, nor stiffens, but maintains grandly from wing to wing its consummate curve. This noble line is worthily sustained by mighty pillars of alternate emerald and marble. The famous green loses nothing, as you may imagine, on a nearer view. A green more gorgeously cool and pure it is impossible to conceive. It is to the vulgar greens of earth what the blue of a summer sky is to our mundane azures, and is, in fact, as sacred, as remote, as impalpable as that. You can fancy it the parent-green, the head-spring of color to all the verdant water-caves and all the clear, sub-fluvial haunts and bowers of naiads and mermen in all the streams of the earth. The lower half of the watery wall is shrouded in the steam of the boiling gulf—a veil never rent nor lifted. At its core, this eternal cloud seems fixed and still with excess of motion—still and intensely white; but, as it rolls and climbs against its lucent cliff, it tosses little whiffs and fumes and pants of snowy smoke, which betray the furious tumult of its dazzling womb. In the middle of the curve, at the apex of the gulf, the converging walls are ground into finest powder, and hence arises a huge mist-column, and fills the upper air with its hovering drift. Its summit far overtops the crest of the cataract, and, as you look down along the rapids above, you see it hanging over the averted gulf like some far-flowing ensign of danger. Of these things some vulgar verbal hint may be attempted; but what words can render the rarest charm of all—the clear-cut brow of the Fall, the very act and figure of the leap, the rounded turn of the horizontal to the perpendicular? To call it simple seems a florid over-statement. Anything less combined and complicated never appealed to the admiration of men. It is carved clean as an emerald, as one must say and say again. It arrives, it pauses, it plunges; it comes and goes for ever; it melts and shifts and changes, all with the sound as of a thousand thunderbolts; and yet its pure outline never lapses by a bubble's value from its constant calm. It is as gentle as the pouring of wine from a flagon—of melody from the lip of a singer. From the little grove beside the American Fall you catch superbly—better than you are able to do at the Horseshoe—the very profile of this full-flooded bend. If the line of beauty had vanished from the earth elsewhere, it would survive on this classic forehead. It is impossible to insist too strongly on the prodigious elegance of the great Fall, as seen from the Canada cliff. You fancy that the genius who contrived it was verily the prime author of the truth that order, measure, and symmetry are the conditions of perfect beauty. He applied his faith among the watching and listening forests, long before the Greeks proclaimed theirs in the shining masonry of the Acropolis. Rage, confusion, chaos, are grandly absent; dignity, grace, and leisure ride upon the crest; it flows without haste, without rest, with the measured majesty of a motion whose rhythm is attuned to eternity. Even the roll of the white batteries at the base seems fixed and poised and ordered, and in the vague middle zone of difference between falling flood and rising cloud you imagine a mystical meaning—the passage of body to soul, of matter to spirit, of human to divine.

Goat Island, of which every one has heard, is the great menagerie of lions, and the spot where your single stone—or, in plain prose, your half-dollar—kills most birds. This broad insular strip, which performs the excellent office of withholding the American shore from immediate contact with the Fall, has been allowed to remain a very proper piece of wildness, and here you may ramble, for the most part, in undiverted contemplation. The island is owned, I believe, by a family of co-heritors, who have the good taste to preserve it intact. More than once, however, as I have been told, they have been offered a huge price for the privilege of building a hotel upon this sacred soil. They have been wise, but, after all, they are human, and the offer may be made once too often. Before this fatal day dawns, why shouldn't the State buy up the precious acres, as California has done the Yo-Semite? It is the opinion of a sentimental tourist that no price would be too great to pay. Otherwise, the only hope for their integrity is in the possibility of a shrewd prevision on the part of the gentlemen who know how to keep hotels that the music of the dinner-band would be injured by the roar of the cataract. You approach from Goat Island the left abutment of the Horseshoe. The little tower which, with the classic rainbow, figures in all "views" of the scene, is planted at a dozen feet from the shore, directly on the shoulder of the Fall. This little tower, I think, deserves a compliment. One might have said beforehand that it would never do, but, as it stands, it is incontestably picturesque. It serves as a unit of appreciation of the scale of things, and from its spray-blackened summit it admits you to an almost downward peep into the green gulf. More here, even, than on the Canada edge, you perceive how the great spectacle is wrought all in water. Its substantial floods take on at moments the likeness of walls and pillars and columns, and, to present any vivid picture of them, we are compelled to talk freely of emerald and crystal, of silver and marble. But really, all the simplicity of the Falls, and half their grandeur, reside in the fact that they are built clean of fluid elements, and that no rocky staging or earthy commixture avail to complicate and vulgarize them. They are water piled on water, pinned on water, hinging and hanging on water, breaking, crashing, whitening in mutual masses of water. And yet for all this no solid was ever solid like that sculptured shoulder of the Horseshoe! From this little tower, or, better still, from various points further along the island-shore, it seems indeed a watery world. Before you stretches the huge expanse of the upper river, with its belittled cliffs, now mere black lines of forest, dull as with the sadness of gazing at eternal storm. Anything more horribly desolate than this boundless livid welter of the rapids it is impossible to conceive, and you very soon begin to pay it the tribute of your terror, in the impulse to people it with human forms. On this theme you can spin endless romances. Yes, they are alive, every fear-blanched billow and eddy of them—alive and frenzied with the sense of their doom. They see below them that nameless pause of the arrested current, and the high-tossed drift of sound and spray which rises up lamenting, like the ghosts of their murdered brothers. They shriek, they sob, they clasp their white hands and toss their long hair; they cling and clutch and wrestle, and, above all, they bite. Especially tragical is the air they have of being forced backward, with averted faces, to their fate. Every portion of the flood is like the grim stride of a giant, wading huge-kneed to his purpose, with the white teeth of a victim fastened in his neck. The outermost of three small islands, interconnected by short bridges, at the extremity of this shore, places one in singularly intimate relation with this portentous flurry. To say that hereabouts the water leaps and plunges and rears and dives, that its uproar deadens the thunder, and its swiftness distances the lightning, is to say all that we can, and yet but a tithe of what we should. Nowhere surely in the wide world is water handled with such a masterly knowledge of effect.

The great spectacle may be called complete only when you have gone down the river some four miles, on the American side, to the so-called rapids of the Whirlpool. Here the unhappy stream tremendously renews its trouble. Two approaches have been contrived on the cliff—one to the rapids proper, the other, further below, to the scene of the sudden bend. The first consists of a little wooden cage, of the "elevator" pattern, which slides up and down a gigantic perpendicular shaft of horrible flimsiness. But a couple of the usual little brides, staggering beneath the weight of gorgeous cashmeres, entered the conveyance with their respective consorts at the same time with myself; and, as it thus carried Hymen and his fortunes, we survived the adventure. You obtain from below—that is, on the shore of the river—a specimen of as noble cliff-scenery as the continent can afford. The green embankment at the base of the sheer red wall is by itself a very fair mountain-slope; and from this starts erect, rugged and raw, a grandly spacious lateral section of mother earth. As it stands, Gustave Doré might have drawn it. He would have sketched with especial ardor certain parasitical shrubs and boskages—lone and dizzy witnesses of autumn; certain outward-peering wens and warts and other perpendicular excrescences of rock; and, above all, near the summit, the fantastic figures of sundry audacious minor cliffs, grafted upon the greater by a mere lateral attachment and based in the empty air, with great lone trees rooted on their verges, like the tower of the Palazzo Vecchio at Florence. The actual whirlpool is a third of a mile further down the river, and is best seen from the cliff above. Thus seen, it seems to me by all odds the finest of the secondary episodes of the Niagara drama, and one on which a scribbling tourist, ineffectively playing at showman, may be content to ring down his curtain. The channel at this point turns away to the right, at a clean right-angle, and the river, arriving from the rapids just above with stupendous velocity, meets the hollow elbow of the Canada shore. The movement with which it betrays its surprise and bewilderment—the sudden issueless maze of waters—is, I think, after the Horseshoe Fall, the superbest thing in its progress. It breaks into no small rage; the offending cliffs receive no drop of spray; for the flood moves in a body and wastes no vulgar side-spurts; but you see it shaken to its innermost bowels and panting hugely, as if smothered in its excessive volume. Pressed back upon its centre, the current creates a sort of pivot, from which it eddies, groping for exit in vast slow circles, barely outlined in foam. The Canada shore, shaggy and gaudy with late September foliage, closes about it like the rising shelves of an amphitheatre, and deepens by contrast the strong blue-green of the stream. This slow-revolving basin resembles nothing so much as some ancient palace-pavement, cracked and scratched by the butts of legionary spears and the gold stiffened hem of the garments of kings.

ENGLAND—THE MILITARY MANŒUVRES.

London, Sept. 29, 1871.

We are in the depths of what is sometimes called the "silly season." A general disinclination on the part of things in general to happen is the most characteristic peculiarity of the time of year. Yet for once the papers have not been driven to discuss that ever-recurring, but not, as one would think, very inscrutable problem—the cause of the dulness of sermons. The fortunate godsend by which they were enabled to fill their columns was the military manœuvres in Surrey. If there is one thing in which the English press may claim superiority over most foreign rivals, it is, I should say, in the fulness and accuracy of its war correspondence. Though the battles of Fox Hill and Weaver's Down were fortunately not of a bloody character, they afforded almost as good material for graphic description as the most desperately earnest battles. From a purely artistic point of view, the campaign seems to have been a decided success. There are few prettier bits of English country than the Surrey Hills, which were the scene of the struggle. Though scarcely thirty miles from Charing Cross, it is easy for the tourist to fancy himself on a wild Scotch moor. Heather-covered ridges stretch with little interruption for many miles, and recall memories of the highwaymen who, in old times, specially favored this district in the neighborhood of the Portsmouth road. Though the hills are not exactly Alpine, they command distant views as far as what White of Selborne called that "stupendous range of mountains," the South Downs above Brighton. The intervening country is rich in parks and country-houses, in deep sandy lanes, with picturesque hedges arching above them, in quaint old cottages and farm buildings, and in all that gives to primitive English scenery its air of solid, old-fashioned comfort. Across this region the contending forces struggled for ten days or so with varying fortune. The author of the "Battle of Dorking," the most successful hit of modern times, laid his scene in the immediate neighborhood of the manœuvres; and we imagined ourselves to be witnessing a rehearsal of the movements by which some future invader is to be met.

The British army, I am thankful to say, finally triumphed; but I confess that my mind is left in a state of considerable confusion as to other results of the campaign. I shall, I hope, be in future more tolerant of the singular discrepancies which are apt to occur in the accounts of more serious contests. There could in the present instance be no patriotic feeling to mislead the judgment of spectators. Whether the 71st Highlanders were to be considered as having crushed the Horse Guards by their fire, or as having been cut up by their charge, was a question on which even a Scotchman might be trusted to give a tolerably fair verdict. Yet, as a matter of fact, the contradictions were as great as between the early reports from the French and German armies last summer. I read, for example, in an article in a well-informed newspaper, a description of a certain charge by a regiment of hussars as illustrating the way in which a small body of cavalry might, by good management, hamper the enemy and obtain useful information at trifling sacrifice. Another equally well-informed critic described it as a repetition of the Balaklava charge, only with an aggravated disregard of the most obvious military principles, and declares that every man would have been killed and taken prisoner for no good result. How is a poor civilian to know which of the judicious persons is right? Then I am terribly perplexed as to what really happened to the Prince of Wales. He was nearly taken prisoner, and only escaped after a desperate gallop, in close pursuit by a large body of cavalry. Some critics admire his gallantry and hold that he deserved the Victoria Cross, others declare that he was (theoretically) pierced by about five hundred bullets and transfixed by as many bayonets, and that his fate was the natural consequence of his foolish rashness. Had he been an ordinary Ensign Jones, they say that he would have been severely reprimanded. On such matters I am veritably at a loss; and those who took part in the manœuvres are, with a few exceptions, not much wiser. They do not even know whether on the whole they were or were not a success. If indeed we could have persuaded General Von Blumenthal to give us his candid opinion, we might have heard something profitable, whether palatable or otherwise. But our foreign visitors could not well communicate their impressions, and I am at a loss whether to be comforted by the assertion of the Times correspondent, that they all thought that our artillery was unapproachable, our cavalry superb, and our infantry very good: or depressed by some German writer, who calls the whole thing ridiculous, and says that we could not resist a Prussian army for three days.

In one sense, of course, this is unpleasantly near the truth. There were between 30,000 and 40,000 men employed in the manœuvres—the largest army which has been assembled in England since the old Revolutionary wars, but yet not equal to more than one weak German corps or to a tenth part of the number of Frenchmen who were sent prisoners to Germany. No patriotic fervor could induce me to believe that one Briton is equal to ten Prussians. I should be quite content, indeed, if, according to our traditional standard for measurement with the French, we were equal to three. If, therefore, there were any probability of seeing a German army landed on the English coast, and if our 30,000 men are all that we could muster to oppose them, my anticipations would be of a gloomy cast. I am happier when I reflect on the extreme improbability of any quarrel with our excellent friends, and on the further improbability that they would ever effect a landing. Still, I should be glad to be assured that, even on that most unlikely supposition, we could look with confidence at the result; but it is impossible to discover what inferences are to be drawn in this direction from the recent manœuvres. The Times, which is of the optimist faction just now, says that the gallant 30,000 are merely a fair sample of the 400,000 men who are included in our army, militia, and volunteers; and that, with a little more practice in certain departments, we shall be able to mobilize the whole of the 400,000 at a short notice. If so, invasion would certainly be chimerical. The Pall Mall Gazette, on the other hand, which is doubtless a very able paper, but is given to grumbling at everything and everybody in a manner which becomes a little tiresome in the long run, says that the manœuvres have proved only one thing, and that is that we are totally without anything worth calling an army, and that the recent changes have been entirely in the wrong direction. Once more I may ask how I, an humble civilian, am to form any opinion, when the authorities to which I should naturally appeal are so hopelessly divergent?

To say the truth, I am content not to have any very definite opinion; but, endeavoring to strike a rough balance between the various judgments which I read in the papers, and those which I hear from other sources, I should guess—it is nothing more than a guess—that the manœuvres have been fairly successful for a first experiment; that the regular army has done well; that the reserved forces, the militia and the volunteers, have proved themselves to be very deficient in training, the militia being decidedly the worse of the two; and that the transport service, which has been very recently reorganized, though it has not broken down, has shown that it is very far indeed from being at present capable of acting on an adequate scale. In short, though, as everybody knows, we are not, we do not wish to be, and we never shall be, a great military power, we have got a fair nucleus of an army, and a mass of raw material, in a very chaotic state, which might be made sufficiently serviceable to keep this little island tolerably safe at home. Meanwhile, the army has had some good hard work, and there have not been any of those palpable breakdowns which could not be regarded as altogether out of the question at starting. The comic element seems to have been chiefly provided by the Horse Guards, who are ornamental, but a trifle ponderous. Besides a general stampede of their horses on the first night of camping out, owing to the adoption of some over-ingenious system of picketing, they seem to have been habitually surprised by skirmishers, annihilated by the fire of infantry, ridden over by light cavalry, and frequently to have stood for hours exposed to a raking fire from batteries of artillery. They took it all with the stolid composure natural to men whose weight when in the saddle averages over 300 lbs., and who are never exposed to severer work than escorting her Majesty from Buckingham Palace to the Houses of Parliament.

Turning from such matters, unfamiliar to English pens, let me briefly notice two or three bits of news which may, perhaps, require some more comment in future. The Queen has been seriously ill, and her illness has produced a certain number of loyal articles and half-apologies for the previous complaints of her supposed neglect of business. She is now apparently recovered, and perhaps our loyalty will again decline. Any alarm as to her health creates a sincere regret in quiet-loving people, proportioned to the respect which she certainly deserves and to the rather different feeling entertained towards her heir. Another remarkable event is the return of Mr. Butt, the representative of the "home-rule" agitation, for Limerick. Mr. Gladstone has just made a speech showing that Irishmen have nothing to complain of after his legislation in regard to the church and the land. And yet it seems too plain that, reasonably or unreasonably, the Irish are not satisfied with Mr. Gladstone's concessions, and that we have a very serious prospect before us for the next Parliament. Finally, I will just observe that the great Newcastle strike, which seems to be probably tending to a compromise, has been one of the most important incidents in the struggle between labor and capital. The strike was for the nine-hours system, and it is observable that the men have had public sympathy with them far more generally than has been the case in previous contests of the kind. But I have no space at present to dwell upon the morals derivable from any of these facts.

FRANCE IN EUROPEAN DIPLOMACY.

PARIS, September 27, 1871.

THE situation of France, in a diplomatic sense, is that of the most complete isolation. After her disasters, she ought to have assumed immediately the position of recueillement which was taken by Russia after Sebastopol, in a celebrated circular of Prince Gortchakoff. But quiet dignity is not the characteristic of M. Thiers. At a moment when French diplomacy ought to have been conducted by new chargés d'affaires, business men merely occupied with their duties, he has sent ambassadors to all the great courts. This new Republic will have as many dukes as possible in office. The Duc de Broglie is in London, the Duc de Choiseul has been sent to Florence; in Rome there is a Harcourt; in Madrid, a Bouillé, the grandson of the Bouillé who was in Rochambeau's army. In these aristocratic names, recalling old France of the last century, there was a feeble protest of vanity against defeat. This protestation would have been harmless, however, if there had not been at the same time some indications that M. Thiers did not intend to remain a disinterested witness of European politics. Of course, he could have no intention of interfering in the affairs of Germany, of Italy, of Russia, of Austria, with any authority; but he showed clearly that he had not renounced any of his old prejudices against the neighbors of France, especially against Italy. M. Thiers has always been the avowed enemy of Italian unity; he invented the formula which so many have repeated after him: "Italian unity has been the mother of German unity"—an aphorism now accepted throughout all France, and quite contrary to history, as the feeling of German unity was already very intense in the days of Jena, and in 1813, long before Cavour had dreamed of reuniting all Italy under the house of Savoy. In the discussion which took place on the Roman question in the Chamber, M. Thiers showed plainly his feelings towards Italy, though he admitted that France was not in a position which allowed her to interfere in favor of the Pope in the Peninsula.

Prince Bismarck found it very easy after this to draw Italy more completely on his side. There are credulous people who believe that, now that the Mont Cenis Tunnel is opened, there are no longer any Alps. Alas! Louis XIV. said, long ago, "There are no longer any Pyrenees," and the Pyrenees stand quite as high between France and Spain, especially since a young prince of the House of Piedmont has accepted the crown of Spain. One of our ministers, M. Victor Lefranc, who accompanied M. de Rémusat, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the ceremony of inauguration of the tunnel, compared the two countries, Italy and France, looking at each other through the Mont Cenis, to two rising suns contemplating each other. Now this may be a very startling figure of rhetoric, in an astronomical sense especially, but, tunnel or no tunnel, it is perfectly well understood now across the Alps that Bismarck is a better and stronger friend than Thiers.

The isolation of France has been completed at Salzburg and Gastein. I have not ceased to tell my friends here that they must not count on an alliance with Russia or on an alliance with Austria. The Emperor of Russia looks with admiration on his uncle, the Emperor of Germany; he is quite devoted to him; he is completely estranged from France since his visit to Paris, when his life was threatened by Berezowski, and he was himself insulted in the most brutal manner in the Palais de Justice by young Republican lawyers, who greeted him with shouts of "Vive la Pologne." The Czar has congratulated the Emperor of Germany on all his victories; he looks upon the French as a wicked, degraded, unruly, and mischievous people. It is affirmed that the Czarowitch has French tendencies, and that the Grand-Duke Constantine shares them with more moderation. But those who hope anything from the anti-German feelings of the heir to the throne, increased by his marriage with a Danish princess, build their hopes on moving sands. It must be remembered that all the bureaucracy, the administration, the culture of the Russian Empire is in German hands. This empire may be called a Slavic body with a German brain. It will always be very difficult to estrange seriously the two great empires, which for more than a century have been closely linked together by their common interests in Poland. Posen and Warsaw will always remind them of their old complicity. And if the Austrian Empire was broken up, the spoils would again be divided between these two empires.

This is very well felt in Austria, and explains the conduct of Austria during the war. It was thought in France, and it is even now thought by many, that Austria is anxious to avenge Sadowa, that she will take the first opportunity to unite with France in going to war with the new German Empire. It would be as absurd to rely upon the help of Austria now as it was for the Emperor to rely upon the alliance of South Germany against Prussia when he rushed into his wicked war. The German feeling is quite as deep in Vienna and in the old provinces of Austria Proper as it was at Munich, Baden, and Stuttgart. Beust is a German, of Saxon origin. If he has undertaken to keep together the Austro-Hungarian empire, he has never really thought of injuring the cause of Germany or of favoring her French adversary. There is no real Austrian left, in the old sense of the word, except perhaps the Emperor. He often says himself, with a melancholy tone, "I am the last Austrian." I remember meeting at Bordeaux, when the war was at an end, an Austrian prince, whose name is one of the historical names of Austria—one, I might almost say, of the pillars of that old state—and he told me frankly, speaking of the King of Prussia: "How could we be very angry with her for doing what we always tried to do?" When the war of 1866 broke out, the French Emperor abandoned Austria, and said: "I cannot tie myself to a caduvre." But when Beust received news of the famous speech in which the Duc de Gramont threw down the gauntlet to Prussia, he coolly said: "If he cannot tie himself to a corpse, I cannot tie myself to a madman." His German blood was up. And now he has sent a circular to all his agents, in which he explains the character of the late interviews in the most candid manner—so candid that there will be no excuse left for those in France who may continue to think of military alliances with Austria, with a view to avenging the recent defeats. We are informed that the interests of Germany and of the Austro-Hungarian Empire are nearly and almost everywhere identical; that they will act in harmony in all European questions; "that Austria will counsel peace everywhere, and thus help more usefully the true and durable interests of France with Prussia, which is now attached to herself by the most intimate bonds, than if she had assumed towards this last power a jealous or defiant attitude." Count Beust tells us that he is the "sincere friend" of France, and hopes "that the true French patriots will renounce all futile ideas of vengeance, and that they will consecrate all their efforts to gathering together the intellectual and material resources of their country, and reviving her under the protection of the general European peace."

This is clear enough for those who care to see. France is invited to keep the peace—to live under the protection of Europe. She has not one active friend left—neither Russia, nor Austria, nor Italy; nor Spain, now under an Italian dynasty. England and the United States are committed to a policy of non-intervention. Under such circumstances, common sense would point to the breaking up of the French military establishment. We only require an army sufficient to maintain order in the country; and, now that the Nationals are disarmed, a small army can do that work. We ought to drill our men by turns, and keep as few as possible at a time in actual service. But M. Thiers will not have it so; he has not consented to any economy in the war budget. The army will cost in 1872 what it cost in 1870 and 1869. Our diplomacy, like our army, ought to be reduced to a minimum, but on this point M. Thiers is also intractable. He will have ambassadors and be represented by dukes—at least in Europe.

Correspondence.

THE PRICE OF COFFEE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your correspondent, "U. C.," may be right when he asserts, in the current number of the Nation, "that the producer got the benefit in the advanced prices" in sugar. But, in regard to coffee, I think he labors under a great mistake, believing, with the correspondent of the Evening Post, that "the cause of high prices in this case was a deficiency in the crop, which, of course, produced higher rates throughout the civilized world. The producer got the benefit of the advanced prices, and the dealer has nothing more than his usual small profit for importing and distributing."

1. There is no deficiency in the crop, nor in its supply to the United States. From January to June, 1870, Rio de Janeiro exported to this country 510,169 bags of coffee, while during the corresponding period of the current year it exported to the same destination 645,749 bags—or about twenty-six per centum more than last year. Considering that Brazil supplied in 1870 more than eighty per centum of all the coffee consumed in this country, and even allowing that the supply from all other sources was none for the present year, there is no deficiency at all in the gross supply. Indeed, the crop in Rio alone is now larger by 608,000 bags as compared with the last one. We are now sending more coffee, not only to the United States, but to all other customers, with one exception.

2. The producer has not got the benefit of the advanced rates. Last January, exchange on London being at the rate of 24d. to the 1,000 réis (mil-réis), the "arroba" (32 pounds) of washed coffee was quoted at Rio de Janeiro from 6,000 to 7,400 réis. The quotations in the same month of last year, exchange being at 20, ranged from 7,500 to 10,000 réis. In June last, exchange being at 25, the "arroba" of the same grade fetched only from 5,700 to 7,200 réis, while in June, 1870, it realized from 6,500 to 8,000 réis, the exchange rate being 23d.

Thus, it will be seen that the supply of coffee this year has been larger, and its price in Rio lower, than it was last year. If its price here has been kept unchanged, notwithstanding the lower price in Rio and the reduction of two cents per pound in the import duties, it is not the producer who has got the benefit of the difference.—Your constant reader,

J. C. Rodrigues.

THE REDUCTION OF DUTY ON SUGAR AND COFFEE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your correspondent, "U. C.," attempts to prove that the reduction of the tariff upon sugar has enured to the benefit of the foreign producer, and not to the benefit of the American consumer. He alleges that our chief supply comes from Cuba; that the crop there is deficient 20 or 30 per cent.; that the price, in Cuba, of good to prime refining sugar averaged 10½ reals in April, 1871, against 8½ reals in April, 1870; and, finally, that the price of good refining sugar in this country is precisely the same as it was last year. Therefore, it appears that, notwithstanding a very great deficiency in the supply abroad, and an increase of the foreign cost of sugar of nearly 25 per cent. caused thereby, the reduction of our tariff has so affected the cost of importation here as to enable our consumers to have their supply at no higher price than they paid last year. A more perfect exposition of the benefit of reducing a tariff tax could not have been made.

Yet, if we understand "U. C.," he is not satisfied, but seems to fear that Congress will confer other similar benefits, and he asks that such a rate of duty may be maintained upon sugar, cotton manufactures, and other protected articles, "as will pay a moderate rate of interest to the owner, and such wages to the workmen as Americans insist upon having." Now, it is certain that "U. C." cannot name employments in which ten per cent. either of the capital or labor of the United States are employed which can be protected; that is to say, there are not ten per cent. of the various branches of industry pursued in the United States which are or can be exposed either to the competition of foreign slaves, paupers, or skilled artisans; the standard both of the rates of interest and of wages is, therefore, fixed substantially by the quick demand for both capital and labor in the 90 per cent. of employments which must, in the nature of things, be home industry.

"U. C." and his coadjutors, therefore, ask that 90 per cent. of the unprotected workmen of the country shall be taxed by a rate of duty on the articles they consume which shall pay "a moderate rate of interest to the owners [of the protected sugar-refinery, etc.], and such wages to the workmen as Americans insist upon having." That is to say, he declares himself and his workmen fit persons to be classed with domestic paupers, since they can neither earn average interest nor average wages without being supported in their effort at the public expense.

Gradgrind.

Boston, October 13, 1871.

Notes.

Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. announce "The American Tour of Messrs. Brown, Jones, and Robinson"; "The History of the First Locomotives in America," by Wm. H. Brown; "The Prisoners of St. Lazare," from the French, by Mrs. E. M. McCarthy; and "The Story of the Fountain," by Wm. Cullen Bryant, with forty-two illustrations by Fenn, Fredericks, Hows, Winslow Homer, and others.

—Among the thousand industries that have been put to silence by the burning of Chicago, one, in particular, will be much missed by those whom it served. By the destruction of a single printing-house, the readers of 298 weekly newspapers, published at so many different points between Chicago and New York, will be obliged for some time to come to get their news from other sources. The owner of this printing-house was Mr. A. N. Kellogg, who, about ten years ago, borrowed the English notion of supplying the publishers of newspapers in the country towns about Chicago with the current news of the world, printed on so much of the white paper as was needed for it, leaving the rest to be filled up by themselves with the local news of their villages, and with advertisements. The plan having been found to work well by the two or three for whom it was at first undertaken, others came into the scheme, and the business, at the time of the fire, had become an important one. We have never seen any of the newspapers edited by Mr. Kellogg in this singular fashion, but we understand that his work was not confined to the mere supplying of his 298 sets of subscribers with the news of the day, but that he added selected literary matter, giving, as his space permitted, entertaining reading, elegant extracts, with useful hints and suggestions looking in many directions. Of course, however, the main thing was to supply all these readers with the important news, and to divide among them the expense of collecting it. Supposing each of the country newspapers for which Mr. Kellogg did this work to have been thoroughly well edited before that gentleman took them in hand, all the labor and expense of making up the paper, the salaries of contributors, and the charges of the Associated Press for telegrams, must have been incurred by each one individually. But, in fact, we must believe that they stood, for the most part, greatly in need of good editing, and that for lack of means their managers were obliged to deprive their subscribers of many advantages that they could only get by uniting their capital or sharing the expenses, which was what Mr. Kellogg's plan enabled them to do.

—We hope soon to have full information as to the loss we have sustained in the destruction of valuable private libraries at Chicago. The New York Tribune had a paragraph, a few days ago, giving us the names of several, and some interesting particulars. The principal collections seem to have been those of Messrs. John A. Rice, E. J. Asay, E. B. McCagg, H. L. Monroe, and Perry H. Smith. It was thought at first that all these must have perished, but Mr. Sabin, the bookseller, of Nassau Street, writes the next day to the Tribune, to say that Mr. Price's library had been sold some time before the fire, March, 1870, whether dispersed or sold to one buyer we are not informed; and that Mr. Asay's collection was sent for safe-keeping while the owner was in Europe to Mr. Sabin's house, where it is now stored. It is spoken of as being the most valuable of all the libraries in Chicago, and contains 45,000 volumes. Mr. Sabin adds to the Tribune's list of those destroyed "that of Mr. J. Y. Scammon, noticeable for the large collection of books relating to Swedenborg which it contained." Mr. McCagg's library we know to have been rich in works on philology and the history of the English language. Probably the public is as much a loser as the public-spirited owners of these libraries.

— Wednesday, Oct. 11, was given up at Yale College to the ceremony of formally transferring the presidency from the hands of Dr. Woolsey to those of his successor, Dr. Porter. Dr. Woolsey, in his farewell address, spoke in strong terms of the present high state of efficiency of the college in all its departments; formally resigned his trust into "the hands of one who was perfectly well acquainted with the affairs of the college; who had been tested by an official connection with it of twenty-five years; who had honored it by his writings; who commanded, as he (Dr. Woolsey) believed, the respect and confidence of all—of the public, the trustees, the graduates, and the faculties." Without entering into any formal defence of his administration, he mentioned three matters in which the college had, in his time, been highly favored, viz.: in the confidence reposed in the college officers by the corporation; in that, without seriously disturbing the general tradition of what a college ought to be, changes had constantly been made, with the enlargement of the corps of instructors, with the raising of the standard of scholarship, and with the demand for a higher education in the country; and, lastly, in the active participation of the president in the work of instruction. He expressed the hope that these points of advantage, as he conceived them to be, would always hereafter be retained, and that with them the college would continue to be "the abode of religion; of teachers who believed in Christ, and would lead a religious life, and of scholars who felt that a noble character was something infinitely more precious than learning." He denied that in his experience he had seen any mischief or inconvenience worked by the connection of colleges with particular religious denominations. With the difficulty arising and likely to arise out of the relations between science and faith, he dealt by saying that those scientific doctrines which are not yet fully established, but are only knocking at the door of truth, "cannot have fixed relations to established truth," and that "the sciences built on observation of nature, and those built on the primary convictions of man, and on historical evidence, cannot be really hostile," and that "the Christian mind must be barren or sceptical which stands in dread of every new discovery or new theory proceeding from scientific men." As to the manner in which religious influence should be exercised by the instructors of a college on the students, that, he said, though a weighty question, was one he would not attempt to answer. Religious teaching, like all teaching, had to be largely "tentative and experimental," and the manner of it must, in the main, be determined by each teacher for himself, on a candid view of his own powers and character. Dr. Woolsey then took his leave, with the prayer "that the college might ever be Christian in the highest and best sense"; that its graduates might be men of principle, and love their Alma Mater; that its guardians might be united and devoted; that its faculties "might keep in the van of their sciences, teach with a loving spirit, and feel that life is more and higher than learning; and that its students might be manly, truthful, honorable, and able by their strength of principle to resist the debasing influences that are abroad in the land." There thus passed from the official stage, though, we are glad to know, not into retirement—for he is still to take part in the work of instruction—one of the ablest and best men of his generation, to whom thousands are indebted not simply for solid instruction, but for an example of the way in which a manly and vigorous mind should deal with the problems of our time. They are indebted to him, too, and the whole of American society with them, for the display, on all occasions, of the quality which is perhaps most wanting among our men of culture—courage. He was not afraid, either as a college officer or citizen, to say on all occasions what he thought; and his thinking was clear, strong, incisive, and well-informed. There are not many men of mark among us whom we, in these days of mental and moral squash, could not better spare. That he may live honored, and revered, and useful to the last, will be the prayer of all who know what his influence and example have done.

—Dr. Porter's address was naturally somewhat in the nature of a programme, and was mainly devoted to giving his idea of what "the higher education" should be. He said that "one of its special distinctions and imperative obligations was that it should be conversant with the past," meaning by "the past" all the contributions already made by the human race to science, literature, and art; and also the records in which these contributions have been preserved—history proper—the history of thought and the history of speech. Colleges should also be "seats of eminent and wakeful learning," in the highest sense of the term; that "in a republic like ours, wealthy, proud, and self-confident, there can be neither permanence nor dignity if the best knowledge and highest culture do not influence its population and its institutions." But, while learning from the past, colleges should concern themselves with the wants of the present. Every age has its own difficulties about truth, its own method of conceiving and applying it, its own forms of scientific enquiry and of literary expression. Teachers have therefore to keep up with the knowledge and discussions of the times. In drawing instruction from the past, and sympathizing with the present, the higher education will wisely forecast and direct the future. Dr. Porter believed that disciplinary studies could not be given up in the higher education any more than in the lower, and that the teacher was more competent to select them than the student, and that in selecting them due regard should be had to the time at command. One objection to "elective studies," he thought, was that the majority of undergraduates were unfit to choose; another and more serious one was a tendency to contract the period of university education. The higher education, too, should, he thought, concern itself with the formation of character; and therefore should teach ethics, and, as underlying all questions of reform and progress, political economy and sociology and law, as well as individual conduct, and it should be religious and Christian in its character. The remainder of his discourse was devoted mainly to a discussion of the special needs and appliances and power of Yale College. It contained nothing which the most fanatical friend of the new education could well complain of or gainsay, and it stated the claims of the past—or, in other words, of human experience and endeavor—on our study and reverence, with remarkable force and with freshness.

—No little scandal has been caused in Connecticut by the publication, in the newspapers, of the lobby-fees paid on the Capitol question by the two cities interested, New Haven and Hartford. They amounted in all to twenty thousand dollars; and considering that this sum was divided among lawyers, probably legitimately employed, "low-lived politicians," and journalists, as well as among the members and officers of the Legislature itself, it must be admitted that these last did not put a high price on themselves—or, as was said of green members of the Louisiana Legislature, "they were not up with the market quotations." It is likely, also, that they sold themselves still more cheaply than might be inferred by allowing them their one-fourth of the twenty thousand. The editor of the Windham County Transcript, who is on the lobby list, and has $275 set down against him, says that he only received "a small part of the sum named"; and there is a lively enquiry on the part of the press for the person or persons who pocketed the difference. It was evidently some one who would have had nothing to learn from the fraudulent gang whose tricks we are now unearthing in this city. The editor of the Transcript has been hard pushed to explain how he consented to take his fee for favoring the New Haven side of the controversy, and his defence is that it was handed him by a gentleman who remarked "that the people of New Haven were pleased with the stand the Transcript maintained, and wished to testify their appreciation by a gift." "No services were implied in the presentation of the money, nor recognized as having been given in its reception," and it was regarded in the same light as a box of early strawberries, or a mammoth squash, or a fat shad, coming "from our friends in this county, whom we supposed thus expressed their sympathy and satisfaction with their local paper." To show that he has no sympathy with corruptionists, the editor prints in the same number of his paper a scathing article on "Professional Lobbying." It is clear that the Hartford Post and New Haven Palladium are "barking up the wrong tree" in his case.

—It is not necessary, we suppose, to be frantic annexationists in order to feel an interest in the progress of education across the Canadian border. Nor is it, perhaps, on the other hand, a question which very immediately concerns our marriageable young men what opportunities for instruction are afforded the young women of the Dominion. Still, it is well to know that the general and world-wide movement towards a higher education for women has taken hold of Canada, and is now showing fruit in four of the principal cities—Toronto, Quebec, Kingston, and Montreal. In Toronto, the University instituted, three years ago, courses of lectures for ladies at the Canadian Institute. Those for the present season began last week, and consisted of a course on Light and Sound, by Professor Cherriman, and one on the literature of the Elizabethan age, by Professor Wilson. After Christmas, Dr. Nicholson will lecture on natural science, and Professor Goldwin Smith on English history. In Montreal, says the Toronto Globe, "a Ladies' Educational Association has been formed; shares have been issued; a substantial fund raised; and such remuneration guaranteed to the lecturers as is calculated to secure the endurance of the good work when the first blush of novelty is over." Principal Dawson, of McGill College, who opened this course with a lecture entitled "Thoughts on the Higher Education of Women," stated that "the association embraces nearly all that is elevated in social and educational standing in our city, and has thus the broadest and highest basis that can be attained among us for any effort whatever." The entire management is in the hands of the ladies of Montreal, who originated the undertaking. Speaking of the probable results of the establishment of colleges for women, Principal Dawson remarked, what is too often overlooked in discussing female education:

"They [these colleges] will also greatly increase the demand for a higher education among young men. An Edinburgh professor is reported to have said to some students who asked ignorant questions, 'Ask your sisters at home; they can tell you'—a retort which, I imagine, few young men would lightly endure. And so soon as young men find that they must attain to higher culture before they can cut a respectable figure in the society of ladies, we shall find them respecting science and literature almost as much as money, and attaching to the services of the college professor as much importance as to those of their hairdresser or tailor."

—The twelfth volume of the "Nouveaux Lundis" of Sainte-Beuve ought rather, as the editor observes, to be called "Derniers Lundis." It consists, for the most part, of articles, beginning with the first, which Sainte-Beuve wrote for the Temps in 1869, the year in which he died. Although the series was prematurely interrupted—begun in January, it came to an end in July—it has not been possible to include all the articles in this volume. It has been found necessary to reserve for a thirteenth volume the paper upon General Jomini, which was the last considerable labor of Sainte-Beuve. A letter from him to M. Nefftzer upon the Senatus-Consultum, which was published in the Temps during the month which preceded his death, will be included in a collection which is projected of his speeches in the Senate. Into this volume the editor intends to gather all the important episodes of the last years of the life of Sainte-Beuve which can serve as data for a "History of Free Thought in the Nineteenth Century." The most important of the contents of this twelfth volume are the articles upon Talleyrand and upon Madame Desbordes-Valmore. The article on the French Academy, written for the "Paris Guide" (published in 1867), is reprinted here, by permission, and there is an interesting account of Camille Jordan and his relation with Madame de Staël. The volume opens with a note by the editor, giving the history of Sainte-Beuve's leaving the Moniteur for the Temps, which made such a flurry in Paris at the time. There are also notes to the Note: one concerning the scandal of the dinner-party of Free-thinkers on a Good Friday, at Sainte-Beuve's house—the scandal of which is, to our thinking, that such a fuss should have been made, in a city like Paris, about such a mere nothing—the meeting of half a dozen friends at an everyday dinner, in a private house, on a church festival which, none of them being Christians, they were no way bound to regard, and which never is regarded, in France nor out of it, by any but strict churchmen. More could hardly have been made of this incident if, instead of the harmless thing it was, it had been such a meeting of Jews as, it was believed in the Middle Ages, often took place on Christmas Day in the houses of that wicked sect, when the principal dish at table was sure to be a little Christian child, "with throte y' carven ' and dressed like a pig, with, perhaps, the very apple in his mouth by promise of which he had been seduced into her garden by the Jew's beautiful daughter.

—The editor also gives us an official statement, fully confirming the worst that has been published in the newspapers relative to the way in which Sainte-Beuve suffered at the hands of one of the most famous surgeons of his time. We translate the whole note:

"M. Sainte-Beuve died at Paris on the 13th of October, 1869, at half-past one o'clock in the afternoon, in his house, No. 11 Rue Mont Parnasse. The persons present in the room at the time of his death were his friends Dr. Veyne; M. Paul Chéron, of the Imperial Library; M. Pantasides, his Professor of Greek Literature, with whom he had often read, and commented upon, the Iliad and the Odyssey; his secretary, M. Jules Troubat; and the faithful servant who had cared for him during many years, and through all his illness, Mlle. Marie Chicot. His executors, to whom, by will, he entrusted the carrying out of his last wishes, are M. Marc Fabre, his notary; his friend and former secretary, the poet, Auguste Lacaussade, Librarian of the Ministry of Public Instruction: and his secretary, M. Troubat. M. Sainte-Beuve was born, as is well known, at Boulogne-sur-Mer, December 23, 1804. The autopsy, presided over, on the day succeeding his death, by Doctors Veyne and Piogey, revealed the presence in the bladder of three stones, of which one was the size of a large hen's egg, while the other two resembled, in their form and size, two ordinary chestnuts. [The writer means such chestnuts as are common in France, and which are as large, at least, as two of our American chestnuts.] A first examination, made by Dr. Ricord, in 1867, at the end of the winter, a few months after the illustrious patient first began to suffer, not only resulted in discovering nothing, but caused M. Sainte-Beuve much suffering. When Dr. Phillips came to sound him again, in July, 1869, it was too late. Dr. Veyne had always believed that the disease was the stone. M. Sainte-Beuve died ignorant of the cause of his suffering, though suspecting it, perhaps, and even suggesting it, by certain comparisons and lively images based upon his painful sensations, of which medicine and surgery (too confident in their science) did not take sufficient account, coming as they did from the mouth of a mere man-of-letters. Sainte-Beuve said, one day, 'You will see; they will never know what is the matter with me until they have opened me.'"

—It is announced that the letters of the Princess Mathilde to Sainte-Beuve, which the princess herself endeavored to get legal possession of after his death, and which she did succeed in putting under a sort of perpetual injunction, are now to be published. They were said to be filled with ridicule of the Empress and her court, there being no love lost between the two ladies. If the epistolary style of this imperial amateur and blue-stocking should be found to reflect the style of conversation in vogue at the Palais-Royal, American admirers of this noble dynasty would perhaps be set to thinking. An American who, as some Americans were, was intimate at the palace, was greeted one evening by the princess, on entering, with "Have you seen that hog (ce cochon-là), the prince?" Rather taken aback, the gentleman, hesitating, sought with his eyes for a repetition of the query, and it came, but in the same form. Although he knew that, at the Palais-Royal, the traditions of Philippe Égalité were worshipped, as those of Marie Antoinette were at the Tuileries, yet he found the princess on that occasion in danger of surpassing the coarseness of her model. We should welcome the publication of her letters to Sainte-Beuve as likely to give a better view of her character, and to explain the existence of a friendship which has always been for us a puzzle.

BROUGHAM'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY—SECOND VOLUME.*

THE explanation of the method followed by Brougham in writing his life and times given in the note to the second edition of the first volume, prepares us for the meagre personal story continued in the present one. From himself we only learn what ministers he acted with and what measures he supported. But his intense devotion to public affairs did not bring out his more amiable traits. From the frank harshness of his opinions and the impetuous, erratic action here recorded, we could not infer what was, nevertheless, the truth, that he was courted in society and popular with the bar, that he was an affectionate son and careful for the advancement of his brothers, and that he was contented in the marriage he formed at the age of forty, devoted to his only daughter during her life, and unhappy at times afterwards because the honors won by his restless ambition brought little consolation to a childless man. And it is not less to be regretted that this record of his mere political activity excludes any but the slightest mention of his labors for popular education, which are, after all, his best title to fame. Earl Grey congratulates him on the public benefit likely to arise from the London University, which was his creation, when its promise of success seems to him quite secondary to a question of the hour in Irish politics. Nor is any place found for an account of his constant work in the cause during the twelve previous years, beginning in 1816 with his parliamentary enquiry into the state of education among the London poor, and followed by his exposure of abuses in managing the public charitable foundations. How many of those out of England who recollect with delight the appearance of his writings on the education of the people and his publications through the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, cared then or remember now that Brougham abused Canning in 1825, and acted the political malcontent in 1827? He fairly warns us what self revelations not to expect by declaring at the outset, "I shall not say a word upon what I have done for education, slavery, charitable trusts, or law reform, for all I did in such matters has been long before the public." If what he did is celebrated, so much the more reason is there for not disappointing the natural interest in learning how and why he did it.

It was no fault of Brougham's that he was not early and personally known in America. After our declaration of war with England, in 1812, the Government was urged by his friends among the merchants, himself being nothing loth, to send him to this country as a negotiator of peace. Forgetting other wounds to national feeling, they judged, with true shopkeepers' calculation, that since the repeal of the Orders in Council had relieved our commercial distress, the skill of the statesman who carried that repeal might succeed in averting actual war. But Castlereagh was obstinate, in spite of Brougham's opinion that the dispute might finally hinge on the impressment of seamen, and his conviction, justified by the event, that "ministers had better now make it up with America." Brougham himself afterwards agreed with Grey in considering that he had made a great escape from what might be thought a Quixotic expedition, as it certainly would have proved one. Against the Orders in Council he struggled for four years, first as an advocate, and then as a member of Parliament. He attacked them as "a wanton outrage against the rights of neutrals," equally gross with the Berlin and Milan decrees of Napoleon that called them out in retaliation. Upon their repeal, after producing nothing but mischief, he plumes himself as his greatest achievement, won unaided, "second to none in the many efforts made by me to ameliorate the condition of my fellow-men." It was during the examination of witnesses on the subject, and in the actual hearing of the committee awaiting his arrival, that the minister, Perceval, was shot in the lobby of the House by an insane assassin, whose trial and execution within a week after the act Erskine protested against with horror, and Brougham declares to be the greatest disgrace to English justice.

Immediately after this triumph, Brougham's parliamentary career was suddenly interrupted by his defeat at the general election as a candidate against Canning for Liverpool. He attributed the failure to the "absurd obstinacy and silly advice" of his managers, and did not take his exclusion, which silenced him for three sessions, in very good part. Nor did he contest another election for many years, his seat in the House being provided through pocket boroughs on his return to it in 1815, and thenceforward until his splendid canvass for Yorkshire as the leader of reform in 1830. In the interval of retirement he was active in his profession, but more conspicuously than successfully so. He writes to Grey that he shall leave London for the country "if I don't get on a vast deal better than I have for the last two years," only a few days after failing to gain a verdict for Leigh Hunt on his trial for libel in calling the Prince Regent "a fat Adonis of fifty." The brief description of the trial is very lively and curious, both for its assertion of the privileges of counsel and for its betrayal of his early and fixed enmity to the Regent. Not long before, he had become the confidential adviser of the Princess of Wales, and he seems to have seized this occasion to rehearse the attack upon her profligate husband which he was destined to repeat, before many years, with all Europe for his audience. The declaration of some among his political allies "that he had been thrown overboard to lighten the ship," denotes that he was already marked for those personal qualities which later in life did really cause his expulsion from party confidence and councils. But, while debarred from public action, he was a watchful partisan, and a bitter one, noting in his correspondence every turn of events that made for the Whigs, and criticising sharply the mistakes and motives of their opponents. The freedom of his pen indicates what must have been the license of tongue that made him so dreaded, and deepens the regret for the want of some passages from his domestic and social life that might soften the impression of harshness and self-seeking which this memoir unquestionably leaves.

Looking back over nearly fifty years at the short visit he made to Paris, when all the English who could travel flocked thither, after Napoleon's fall in 1814, Brougham repeats the opinion then formed, with emphasis confirmed by long residence and intimate knowledge, that vanity and fickleness distinguish the French character. Yet, not many years before uttering this severe judgment, and at the mature age of seventy, he had attempted to become a French citizen, and had been deterred only by learning that the surrender of his British status must precede his naturalization. It was months before the English press forgot to laugh at the runaway citizen, Brougham. He lived nearly long enough to see his own prediction fulfilled, "that Napoleon's successor may, by dynastic aspirations, or insane attempts at territorial aggrandizement, find himself, like his mighty predecessor, abandoned, vilified, and forgotten." The most interesting record of this visit is preserved in notes of conversations with Carnot, written in French that only half-deserves Macaulay's ridicule of Brougham's spoken Gallic. Carnot's estimate of the leaders and policy of the Mountain, and his views of the existing state of France, are worthy of that genuine patriot. Such lively sketches of his intercourse with men now historic forcibly remind us how much Brougham saw and was a part of. We share the everyday interests of a past age, listening to his abuse of the grand bore, de Staël, and his gossip about broken-down Sheridan's arrests. But we miss the spirit and variety that ought to enliven the memoirs of a statesman who lived to vex Gladstone after listening to Pitt, quarrelling with Canning and Eldon, and patronizing the promise, feeble as he called it, of Peel and Palmerston. He might have brought us nearer in his biography than he has done in his "Statesmen of the Time of George the Third" to their personal life, which he knew and shared. Even of those survivors of the greatest leaders who were his contemporaries and rivals, we learn little that Hansard could not tell us. Something more important might have been found than amusing scandal about Lord Wellesley's wife, or ridicule of Castlereagh for talking of the "resurrection of malt," to relieve the details of political intrigue and the history of rather unimportant political movements between Waterloo and the Reform Bill. After the greatest actors—Pitt, Fox, Burke, and Sheridan—vanished from the stage as the curtain fell on the Napoleonic wars, their successors, small by comparison, guided English politics quietly enough till the next great revolution in parliamentary reform—just as, in our own day, the almost simultaneous departure of Webster, Clay, and Calhoun left the field clear for second-rate men of talk, until the rebellion called for men of action.

* "The Life and Times of Lord Brougham. Written by Himself." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1871.
For a review of the first volume, see No. 316 of the Nation.

The solution of only one problem of national interest, Catholic Emancipation, breaks this political monotony. Upon this question, unlike most of his rivals, Brougham was always ardent and consistent. If he had no love for the church that hated education, he had still less for the Protestant intolerance that insisted on civil disabilities long after the need and reason for them had ceased. While Eldon trembled, and Lyndhurst trimmed, and Canning was dumb, the Whigs and Brougham most actively discussed and attacked until the dread of civil war forced Wellington, in 1829, to "break up the long reign of bigotry and Toryism," by conceding emancipation. Brougham passes rather lightly over the part he took in supporting Canning's Junction Ministry, without much explanation of his disagreement with Earl Grey, which the public rumor of the time, and certainly Grey's own feeling, charged to the account of insincere ambition. Yet no one ever denied him the credit he takes to himself for refusing the post then offered him of Chief Baron of the Exchequer, with an income for life of seven thousand pounds, rather than separate himself from his political friends. That the separation would have been as much to his injury as theirs, he acknowledges by repeating his well-known answer to the temptation that the office would place him on the dividing road leading either to the King's Bench or the Great Seal—"I should be left there without post-horses to carry me on either way."

More than half this volume, and that the most interesting part, is given to an account of Brougham's relations with the Princess of Wales and her daughter, Princess Charlotte. His treatment of his wife—on the whole, the most scandalous page in George the Fourth's disreputable history—loses no shades from the new touches contributed by this memoir. Among them is a remarkable letter to the Prince, of severe reproof, written by his father not long before the close of his rational life. On becoming Regent, the Prince refined on his conjugal tyranny, persecuting the daughter for the sake of wounding the mother. It was the desire of Princess Charlotte, then fourteen years old, to escape from this harsh control, that led to professional consultation with Brougham on the point of her legal majority, which she wrongly supposed to begin at the age of eighteen. The national contempt for the Regent's unmanly conduct, and well-deserved attachment for the heir to the throne, powerfully supported the Whigs in the dexterous use they made of the family scandals as a party weapon. But throughout the whole, Brougham's conduct as the adviser of the princesses seems to have been prudent, energetic, and delicate. All these qualities were conspicuous in his management of the young princess's strange escapade in 1814, when she ran away at dusk one summer's evening from her residence at Warwick House to take refuge with her mother—the Regent having threatened to remove her to a half imprisonment at Carlton House among his own creatures. Bishops, ministers, and royal dukes hurried to the scene, but she would listen to no one but Brougham, who, at last, by representing the danger of a popular tumult, induced her at sunrise next morning to return home. The princess's death in 1817, a year after her marriage to Leopold—then only a Coburg—freed the Regent from the last restraint. Brougham's opposition to him afterwards became more personal and more linked with party interests. He avows that, in embracing Caroline's cause, though mainly influenced by the extremes of injustice, cruelty, and fraud of which he considered her to be the victim, he was moved too by a strong sense of er hu sband's bad public conduct and abandonment of his principles. The story of the Queen's trial is told with great spirit and minuteness, though with a tacit admission throughout that the weakness of the adversary's cause, rather than the strength of their own, gave her advocates their famous triumph. Brougham develops more fully than in any of his former writings the meaning of the threat of something more than recrimination which proved so effectual a check on the prosecution. That defence would have involved the disclosure and proof of the king's earlier marriage to Mrs. Fitzherbert, a Roman Catholic. Such a marriage, in Brougham's opinion, would have worked a forfeiture of the crown, under the Act of Settlement, and its proof must have hastened the peaceable abandonment of the prosecution, to avoid plunging the country into confusion. But without resorting to so hazardous an attacking defence, Brougham's audacity and genius rescued the Queen, and added immensely to his popularity and fame. He thought his prestige and consequent professional success chiefly purchased by the King's long-continued and spiteful enmity. The memoir gives a vivid description of the Queen's funeral, a few months after her trial; of the procession, driven away by the military from the principal streets, to prevent a display of popular sympathy; and of the mournful scene at the embarkation of her remains from Harwich.

Brougham unconsciously throws much light on his own character by the contrast between his impulsive letters and the dignified and courteous tone marking those of his correspondents, Grey, Rosslyn, and the Marquis of Lansdowne. One particularly, on the state of parties, written by the last in 1817, hints in the most delicate manner at the qualities in Brougham which made him unfit to be a leader in the House. The most active and brilliant years of his political life remain to be described. It is to be hoped that the more continuous narrative promised of the part he took in parliamentary reform, and of his brief official term as chancellor, may be fuller than the present volume in personal details, and less vague in its reminiscences of the men who illustrated the times it portrays.

Historical Questions, logically arranged and divided: the Companion Book to Labberton's "Outlines of History." By Robert H. Labberton.—An Historical Atlas, containing a chronological series of one hundred maps, at Successive Periods, from the Dawn of History to the Present Day. By Robert H. Labberton. (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.)—These two works are marked by the same originality and careful scholarship which distinguished the "Outlines of History," and will be found very desirable companions to that work. The "Questions" are not by any means merely questions upon the "Outlines," as the title would lead one to suppose. They refer equally to "Outlines" and "Atlas"; but besides this, as many as half of the questions, if we are not mistaken, have the answers attached to them; so that this book is really a supplement to the other, adding a large amount of new material. We have not much liking for the question-and-answer style of school-book, although we admit that, when skilfully prepared, it is perhaps possible to bring out points with more definiteness and compactness by this method than by mere statement. At any rate, one must recognize the great merit of the questions and answers before us. It would, however, be impossible to carry any ordinary class through the entire work in the time usually given to this study—the volume is considerably thicker than the "Outlines," and contains in all 12,744 questions. To aid a teacher in his preparation, and to guide in reviews as well as to serve in the detailed study of particular periods, would be, we should suppose, the best way to use it.

The "Atlas" consists of forty plates, containing one hundred maps and plans, which cover the whole field of recorded history—the first gives the Chaldæan Empire under Chedor-Laomer, the last gives Europe in 1871. The plan is strictly that of outlines, with a view to dynastic and territorial changes only; and everything else is sacrificed to this. The "Atlas" is adapted to serve the wants of classes and students of the general course of history, not directly to illustrate the history of special epochs. Thus there is no attempt at showing the physical features of countries, and comparatively few towns are given. The colors, too, are not neutral tints, such as one would prefer in ordinary maps, but are pure and bright—unusually handsome colors in themselves—so that the general effect is somewhat glaring. As a whole, the result is a remarkable degree of clearness and freedom from confusion and crowding. We think it a mistake that a limited number of maps do not exhibit the leading physical features (that of Greece, No. VIII., is the only one, we believe, which gives mountain ranges—in one or two cases these are represented by purple patches); but this is the plan, and it is carried out with great success. Some of the maps, too, might contain a few more names without overstepping the line of distinctness. The maps abound in small excellences which exhibit the thorough scholarship and the ingenuity and appreciation of the needs of students which distinguish all these works. For instance, the author takes pains, wherever possible, to keep the same color for the same purpose in different maps. Thus, in the maps which show the successive divisions of Europe in 1550, 1648, 1713, etc. (probably the best and most valuable series in the book), red is used for the Bourbons, purple for the Hapsburgs, blue for the Hohenzollerns, green for the house of Oldenburg, and yellow for that of Savoy; and in each case black lines, crossing the color in one direction or another, indicate a country to which a family has been transplanted; thus Spain is at first purple-lined, then red-lined, then yellow-lined; Russia is green-lined and Roumania blue-lined, while Naples, under the Hapsburgs or Bourbons, has the lines running in a different direction from Spain.

We find very little to criticise in these excellent maps. The maps of the Roman Empire hardly satisfy us. Perhaps it would be impracticable in sheets of this size to give the 119 provinces of Constantine; but we think that it ought to appear how the East and West were divided respectively by Diocletian (who joined Illyricum with the East), by Valentinian (who attached Macedonia, etc., as well as Illyricum, to the West), and by Theodosius (who followed the natural boundary line of language). The last is the only division given. Further, the division into dioceses is not quite accurate. The prefecture of Italy was divided into the three dioceses of Italy (north of the Apennines, and including Western Illyricum), City of Rome (the rest of the peninsula), and Africa. In No. XVI. the provinces of Britain and Germany should be subdivided. In No. XXI., Charlemagne's empire, the eastern and western divisions (after 843) respectively, should more properly be called Francia Orientalis and Occidentalis, not Austrasia and Neustria, which names rather belong to the Merovingian period. In No. LXXV., Guienne and Gascony should be assigned to Charles VII., not Charles VIII. In No. XXIII., Carinthia extends too far to the south, so as to include a great part of Northern Italy. There are also a few words misspelled, as Francfort and Francford, Spiers for Spire, Lucretia (No. XI.) for Luceria, Elzass, Monthlery, La Marck (No. LXXVII.) for Mark.

One of the most interesting maps is that of the dominions of Charles the Bold (No. XXVII.) This is very meritorious and useful, but would be more so if its scope were made a little broader—if this could be done without interfering with its distinctness. At any rate, we think that the Netherlands, as they came into the possession of Philip II., would be a more generally acceptable view than those under the rule of Charles the Bold. And it seems to us that it would have been quite practicable in this way to give the entire Netherlands, distinguishing by different colors the original group of states under the rule of Philip the Bold, and the successive acquisitions of Philip the Good and Charles V., as well as those which were temporarily under the sway of Charles the Bold. Further, the provinces are not given with precision in this map. Amiens was not a province, but a city of Picardy; while Malines (Mechlin) and Antwerp were distinct states. There is some inconsistency, too, in the spelling of the names; French forms, like Malines; Dutch forms, like Antwerper; and English forms, like Ghent and Brussels, are found side by side. Besides the maps already mentioned, we will notice, as especially excellent, No. XII., which gives four comparative views of the Roman and Carthaginian provinces during the Punic wars; No. XXXVIII., which gives the dominions of Mithridates and Tigranes; No. XX., the Arabic Ascendancy; No. XXXI., which contains three useful maps—one of France, marking the several groups of provinces successively acquired; one, of the circles of Germany; and one, of the Rhenish electorates and the Cleve inheritance; and No. XXXVI., which gives the three partitions of Poland.

The Island Neighbors. A Novel of American Life. By Antoinette Brown Blackwell. Illustrated. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1871.)—This novel of American life narrates the loves of an Irish servant-girl and a red-haired sailor, who manage to wilfully misunderstand one another, and to rack one another's feelings in a way that would do credit to the most experienced hands in a desperate flirtation. The heroine, Margaret, is one of the most ideal characters we have ever met in fiction. She lives in the family of a Boston aristocrat as servant, "a ray of incarnate sunshine," and warm friend. The aristocrat, knowing the treasure he has, and probably alarmed by the groanings in the magazines about the difficulty in getting good servants, concerns himself rather freely in Margaret's love-affairs and turns off suitors with a high hand. Of course, true love knows no such obstacle: the warm-hearted sailor pines like a poet, but at length the scales are dashed from his eyes—he sees his own folly—he saves a shipwrecked crew, thereby melting the aristocrat's cold and selfish heart, and marries Margaret. There is one point which may serve to show how America is tardily growing refined. The hero, Alfred, is polishing a shell for Magaret. "His first impulse was to wet the cloth from his mouth; but no! he would not spit on anything which might ever belong to Margaret; so, slipping the shell into his pocket, he went softly down stairs, where he found an old cup which he filled from the water-pail." Who now can taunt Americans with the habit of indiscriminate expectoration? We confess we thrilled with patriotic pride on reading that sentence; the satire of English tourists has, indeed, borne good fruit.

The Lost Despatch. Translated from the German of Friedrich Friedrich. By L. A. Williams. (Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1871.)—Herr Friedrich is rather notorious in Germany for his numerous Criminalnovellen, one of which we have here translated into English. The novel may be of interest to those who still regard a detective as the most mysterious product of civilization, but to any one else, we fear, the story will seem hardly worth the trouble of translating. On the other hand, it may be said to contain nothing objectionable; it has some of the machinery that Spielhagen uses, for the villanous officer appears, but it has none of Spielhagen's offensive grossness.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books on the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Chamberlayne (Rev. I.), Saving Faith: Its Rationale	(Carlton & Lanahan)
Coates (H. T.), The Comprehensive Speaker	(Porter & Coates)
Connelly (Rev. P.), Terms of Reunion with Rome	(London)
Cornelius (Mrs.), The Young Housekeeper's Friend	(Thompson, Bigelow & Brown) $1 50
De Kroyft (Mrs. S. H.), Little Jakey	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
De Maistre (X), Journey Round My Room	" " 1 50
Einault (L.), Christine: a Tale, swd	(J. S. Redfield) 50
Farjeon (B. L.), Joshua Marvel: a Tale	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 2 00
Fetridge (W. P.), Rise and Fall of the Paris Commune	(Harper & Bros.)
Hartwig (G.), The Subterranean World	(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 8 50
Hawthorne (N.), American Note-Books	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 25
Heinzen (K.), What is Real Democracy? swd	(Indianapolis)
Holbrook (A.), School Management	(Josiah Holbrook & Co.)
Huntington (Rev. W. R.), The Church Idea, 2d ed	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 25
Illustrirte Kriegs-Chronik, No. 26, swd	(B. Westermann & Co.)
Im neuen Reich, No. 37, swd	(L. W. Schmidt)
Kelly (J.), American Catalogue of Books, 1866—1871, Vol. II	(J. Wiley & Son)
McCarthy (J.), Lady Judith; a Tale	(Sheldon & Co.)
Mudge (Rev. Z. A.), Footprints of Roger Williams	(Carlton & Lanahan)
Nast's Illustrated Almanac, swd	(Harper & Bros.) 30
Peirce (Prof. J. M.), Tables of Logarithmic and Trigonometric Functions	(Ginn Bros.)
Porter (Prof. N.), Elements of Intellectual Science	(C. Scribner & Co.)
Traveller's Guide to the City of New York, swd	(J. S. Redfield) 25
Warren (T. R.), Shooting, Boating, and Fishing for Young Sportsmen	(C. Scribner & Co.)
Washburn (J. B.), Yo-Semite; a Poem, swd	(A. Roman & Co.)
Wells (Prof. W.), The Heroine of the White Nile	(Carlton & Lanahan)
Wood (Mrs. H.), Dene Hollow; a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Yelverton (Thérèse), Zanita: a Tale of the Yo-Semite	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50

JUST PUBLISHED
BY PORTER & COATES,
PUBLISHERS,
PHILADELPHIA.

I.

AMERICAN ORNITHOLOGY;
OR,
THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE BIRDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Illustrated with Plates engraved and colored from Original Drawings taken from Nature.

BY ALEXANDER WILSON.

With a life of the author, by George Ord, F.R.S. With Continuation, by Charles Lucien Bonaparte (Prince of Musignano). 3 vols. imperial 8vo, with a folio volume of carefully colored plates embracing nearly 400 figures of birds, mostly life-size. Elegantly bound in cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, $75; in half Turkey morocco, gilt edges, $85.

II.

THOS. HOOD'S POETICAL WORKS.

2 vols. crown 8vo, tinted paper, cloth extra, $1 75 per vol.; half-calf, gilt, $3 50 per vol.; half-morocco, gilt top, $3 50 per vol.

III.

UP THE RHINE.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

Crown 8vo, tinted paper, cloth extra, $1 75 per vol.; half-calf, gilt, $3 50 per vol.; half-morocco, antique, $3 25 per vol.

JUST PUBLISHED.
A New American Edition. In one volume, crown 8vo, extra cloth, price $3 50.

WALKS IN ROME.

BY AUGUSTUS J. C. HARE.

"In this volume the Eternal City has found a worthy historian. The reader, master of them, will find himself in possession of a larger stock of information on the subject than can be found in any other single work. . . . As a hand-book to Rome, its value cannot easily be overestimated. Mr. Hare is a scholar, an antiquary, and a man to whom the masterpieces of literature are known; and in the production of these 'Walks in Rome' he has utilized his knowledge and experience for the advantage of the world."—London Bookseller.

"The best hand book of the city and environs of Rome ever published. . . . Cannot be too much commended."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"It is the most complete monograph for the traveller that has, we think, ever been published. It is a cyclopædia on the sights of Rome; it is of interest to those who are going and to those who have returned: to the one as 'guide, philosopher, and friend'—and now that it is written, no sight-seer should go to Rome without it—to the other as memento; but it is, further than this, so generally interesting that few will find it other than delightful reading."—Evening Mail.

"Invaluable in suggesting what should be seen and the best way of seeing it. Mr. Hare is evidently a man of education and refinement, with a nice sense of historical perspective and a thorough appreciation of the beautiful. The plan of his work is original in its collation of the most interesting passages from modern literature that have reference to the spots and buildings described, and it is a matter of special interest to the American reader to note how largely the writings of our own authors enter into the record."—Evening Post.

 For sale by all Booksellers, or will be mailed, postpaid, to any address, on receipt of price by the Publishers,
GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

TAINE'S ART IN GREECE.

16mo, Cloth (uniform with "Taine's Art in the Netherlands," "Ideal in Art," etc.), $1 25.

GOETHE'S POEMS AND BALLADS.

16mo, cloth (uniform with "King Rene's Daughter," "Nathan the Wise," "Frithiofs Saga," etc., and making No. VII. of the series), $1 50.

The above are just ready, and will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

HOLT & WILLIAMS, Publishers,
25 Bond Street, New York.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

PRICE, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
596 Broadway, New York.

MESSRS. DODD & MEAD ANNOUNCE FOR EARLY PUBLICATION,

THE SCIENCE OF NATURE VERSUS THE SCIENCE OF MAN.

By Noah Porter, D.D., LL.D., President of Yale College. 1 vol., 16mo.

CORALS AND CORAL ISLANDS.

By James D. Dana, Professor of Geology in Yale College. With 50 wood-cuts, and a full-page illustration in color. 1 vol. 8vo.

THE THEOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

A Hand-book for Bible Students. By J. J. Van Oosterzee, D.D. Translated by Maurice J. Evans. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 75.

A COMPARATIVE HISTORY OF RELIGIONS.

By James C. Moffat, Professor of Church History in Princeton College. 1 vol. 12mo.

BIBLE LORE.

Chapters on the Rare Manuscripts, various Translations, and notable characteristics of the Bible. 1 vol. 16mo, $1 50.

THE AUGUST STORIES.

By Jacob Abbott. Beautifully bound and illustrated. 4 vols. 16mo, $1 50 per vol.

DODD & MEAD,
762 Broadway, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED,

WOMEN;
OR,
CHRONICLES OF THE LATE WAR.

BY
MARY TUCKER MAGILL.

"The most readable book of the season."

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, post-paid, upon receipt of price, $1 75.

DUKESBOROUGH TALES.

BY PHILEMON PERCH.

"A book of rare humor."

"As humorous sketches of character, they rival the best of Judge Longstreet's in that direction."—Savannah News.

Fine cloth, price $1 50.

TURNBULL BROTHERS, Publishers,
BALTIMORE, MD.

F. J. HUNTINGTON & CO.,
103 DUANE STREET, NEW YORK.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE GREEK LANGUAGE,

For Beginners, in a compendious Grammar of Attic Greek, with copious Exercises. Second Edition. By Charles D. Morris, M.A., late Rector of Trinity School, New York, and formerly fellow of Oriel College, Oxford.

Also, by the same Author,
A COMPENDIOUS GRAMMAR OF THE LATIN LANGUAGE,

With Parsing and Reading Lessons, separate in paper covers for each work. Price, $1 75.

The critics object, but the Latin and Greek professors in Harvard, Yale, Trinity, and Columbia Colleges recommend, and many of the best schools in the country use, them, because while they confirm the able, by them feeble pupils help themselves.

NOW READY,
By the same Author,
A SERIES OF QUESTIONS,

designed to test the progress of learners in the Latin Language. Adapted to the principal Latin Grammars now in use. Price 34 cents.

NOW READY, No. 34.

THE AMERICAN BIBLIOPOLIST,

A Literary Register and Monthly Catalogue of OLD AND NEW BOOKS,
AND
REPOSITORY OF NOTES AND QUERIES

CONTENTS OF THE NEW NUMBER:
A COMPOSER OF POETRY.
BIBLIOMANIA.
CATALOGUE OF BOOKS FOR SALE.
SALE OF SHAKESPEARE'S HOUSE.
THE AMERICUM LYCEUM.
THE NEW YORK FRAUDS.
Notes and Queries—Actress at Antioch; A Laconic Note Allibone's Dictionary of Authors; Americo Vespucius; An Old Bible; Border Ballads; Chess; Junius; Literary Gossip; Literary Treasures; Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott; Luther on Dancing; Mlle. Violette; Mr. Gilbert A'Beckett; Portrait of Henderson Private Libraries of New York; "Sir, I Smoke for Corns"; Somnambulism of La Fontaine; The Washington Relics; Tom Paine Nails; Watchmaking.

Send Stamp for Specimen number.

J. SABIN & SONS,
84 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

LEE & SHEPARD'S NEW BOOKS.

FIRE IN THE WOODS. By Professor James De Mille. 16mo. Illustrated. $1 50.

THE B. O. W. C. STORIES. By Professor James De Mille. 4 vols. Illustrated. Per vol., $1 50.

THE SPARK OF GENIUS; or, The College Life of James Trafton. By Elijah Kellogg. 16mo. Illustrated. $1 25.

CRINGLE AND CROSS-TREE; or, The Sea Swashes of a Sailor. By Oliver Optic. 16mo. Illustrated. $1 25.

THE ONWARD AND UPWARD SERIES. By Oliver Optic. 4 vols. Illustrated. Per vol., $1 25.

OUR BOYS' AND GIRLS' STORY-TELler. Edited by Oliver Optic. Containing the whole of his Story. "The Starry Flag," Tales of Adventure, Choice Stories, Poetry, Puzzle Work, Dialogues, etc., etc. All handsomely Illustrated. $1 50.

DIAMOND BURNS. The Complete Poetical Works of Robert Burns. Illustrated. Cloth, $1 25.

THE CHILDREN'S ALBUM OF PRETTY Pictures. With Short Stories. By Uncle John. With about 200 full-page Illustrations. 4to. Handsomely bound. $1 75.

THE CHILDREN'S SUNDAY ALBUM. By the author of "A Trap to Catch a Sunbeam," etc., etc., with upwards of one hundred and fifty Illustrations. 4to. Elegantly bound. $1 75.

FIRST HELP IN ACCIDENTS AND IN Sickness. A Guide in the Absence or Before the Arrival of Medical Assistance. 12mo. Cloth, $1 50.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

UNDERWOOD'S HAND-BOOK OF ENGlish Literature. Intended for the Use of High Schools, as well as a Companion and Guide for Private Students and for General Readers. By Francis H Underwood (British Authors). Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2 50.

BEHIND THE BARS; or, Life in an Insane Asylum. 16mo. Cloth, $2.

THE SWORD AND GARMENT; or, Ministerial Culture. By Rev. L. T. Townsend, D.D., Professor in Boston Theological Seminary. 16mo. Cloth, $1 50.

ART: Its Laws and the Reasons for them. Collected, condensed, and arranged for General and Educational Purposes, by Samuel P. Long, Counsellor-at-Law, Student of the English Royal Academy, and Pupil of the late Gilbert Stuart Newton, R.A. 12mo. Cloth. With Steel Engravings and Wood-cuts, $3.

Sold by all Booksellers and Newsdealers.

LEE & SHEPARD, PUBLISHERS, BOSTON.
LEE, SHEPARD & DILLINGHAM, NEW YORK.

POSTPONEMENT.

MRS. H. B. STOWE'S

LATEST AND BEST.

A TALE FOR THE TIMES.

"MY WIFE AND I;

OR, HARRY HENDERSON'S HISTORY."

480 pp. 12mo. Ex. Clo., $2.

Illustrated with new Character Drawings, by H. L. Stephens.

The demand for this book has been so great in advance of its publication, the orders from Booksellers have been so large, that the Publishers have been obliged to postpone its issue until the 25th of this month, in order to print an edition large enough. To be in time Booksellers should order NOW.

J. B. FORD & CO., Publishers,

27 PARK PLACE

(and 24 and 26 Murray Street), New York.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

133 NASSAU STREET,

Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

OSGOOD'S LIBRARY OF NOVELS.

Messrs. JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO.

Begin this day the publication of a series of Novels intended to comprise the best and most readable of new English and American works of fiction. Translations from the best French and German authors will also be included.

These Novels will appear regularly from week to week. They will usually be illustrated, and will be put in a handsomely ornamented cover of new and unique design. The price will range from 25 cents to 75 cents, according to the number of pages. Copies will also be furnished in cloth binding at an addition of 50 cents. The series begins with

JOSHUA MARVEL.

By B. L. Farjeon, Author of "Grif." 1 vol. 8vo. Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.

This novel has elicited almost unanimous and very hearty praise from the English press. It is compared to Dickens's most characteristic stories, and is welcomed as a novel of profound interest and excellent moral tone.

"The tender treatment of the romance of humble life, the optimism which discerns good ore latent in uncouth lumps of rough humanity, the purity which was Dickens's unvarying and noblest characteristic, are all present in the work of his disciple. . . . Something more than 'pen, ink, and paper' has been brought to the execution of this thoroughly interesting story, and something better than a sense of literary dissipation may be experienced as the result of its perusal. A capital love-story runs its course through the chain of adventure, and forms a basis for the development of the pronounced varieties of character involved."—The Athenæum (London).

"We cordially recommend the story as one of those literary treats that have become painfully rare since the death of Dickens."—London Morning Advertiser.

LONGFELLOW'S DANTE.

The Divine Comedy of Dante Alighieri. Comprising "The Inferno," "The Purgatorio," and "The Paradiso." Translated by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. New stereotype edition. With all the original Notes and Illustrations. 1 vol. Large 12mo. Handsomely stamped in black and gilt. $3.

This single volume includes all that was contained in the three volumes in which Mr. Longfellow's Translation was originally published. It brings within reach of all this masterpiece of poetical translation, which holds unquestioned the highest rank as an English rendering of Dante.

THE AMERICAN NOTE-BOOKS

Of Nathaniel Hawthorne. Illustrated Library Edition. 1 vol. 12mo. With Illustrations. Very handsomely bound and stamped. $2.

This is the seventh volume of the Illustrated Library Edition of Hawthorne's Works, which has been received with marked favor by the press and the public.

 For Sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers,

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO., Boston.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 713 Broadway, New York, Special Agents for J. R. O. & Co.'s Publications.

PRICED CATALOGUE No. 21

OF

ANCIENT AND MODERN BOOKS,

Comprising Standard and Valuable Works in

ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, HISTORY, VOYAGES, TRAVELS, ETC. ETC. ETC.

☞ Just published, and will be forwarded FREE to any address.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,

Dealer in New and Old Books, 17 Astor Place, N. Y.

THE "JARVES COLLECTION" OF PAINTINGS, BY THE OLD MASTERS.

On THURSDAY, Nov. 9, at 10 o'clock A.M.—in the Fine Arts Gallery of Yale College, New Haven, Conn.,

The well-known JARVES COLLECTION of the OLD MASTERS, forming an Historical series of the best periods of Italian Art, from A.D. 1200—1600.

The collection embraces, besides, Altar Pieces by Giotto and his scholars. It contains others by Fra Angelico, Ghirlandajo, Fra Bartolomeo, easel paintings by the rarest masters of the Sienese, Venetian, Florentine and Umbrian Schools, some of whom, like Sodoma, Gentile de Fabriana, and Pallajuolo, are not represented in the Louvre and other great galleries: valuable historical portraits, the unique Amerigo Vespucci of his own time, Cortez, etc.

This collection, authenticated by directors of the Florentine and London galleries and best judges in Europe, obtained for the collector the honor of an election to the Academy of Fine Arts of Florence.

Full descriptive and historical Catalogues, prepared for the College, at 50 cents each, a few large paper $1.

RIP VAN WINKLE AT HOME,
RIP VAN WINKLE ON THE MOUNTAIN,
RIP VAN WINKLE RETURNED,
} Price $96.

COMING TO THE PARSON.

Price $15.

Etc., etc., etc.

Delivered at any railroad station in the United States, free of expense, on receipt of the price.

Enclose stamp for Illustrated Catalogue and Price List of his Groups of Statuary to

JOHN ROGERS,

212 Fifth Avenue, New York.

TO LET—LOW.

The Office lately occupied by THE NATION, consisting of two front rooms, on the 3d floor of No. 3 Park Place. Address

"THE NATION,"

P. O. Box 6,732.

5 Beekman St., N. Y.

YALE COLLEGE.—The Sheffield Scientific School offers professional training to Civil and Dynamical Engineers, Chemists, Geologists, Naturalists, etc., and also courses preparatory to such pursuits as Mining, Medicine, Agriculture, Manufacturing, etc. Letters May be addressed to Prof. D. C. GILMAN, Secretary. New Haven, Conn.

CHEGARAY INSTITUTE.

English and French for Young Ladies and Misses, Boarding and Day Pupils, 1527 and 1529 Spruce Street Philadelphia, Pa. Will reopen on Wednesday, Sept. 20. French is the language of the family, and is constantly spoken in the Institute.

MADAME D'HERVILLY, Principal.

DR. A. CALLISEN'S Day-School for Boys, 131 West Forty-third Street, will reopen September 20, 1871. Pupils prepared for College and Business.

IMPERFECT DIGESTION AND ASSIMILATION.—Savory & Moore's Pancreatic Emulsion and Pancreatine are the most potent remedial agents. They are the only remedies yet known for effecting the digestion of Cod-liver Oil and preventing nausea, while they also efficiently supply the place of the oil when rejected by the stomach. These facts are now attested by the published records of numerous medical men, extracts from which accompany each bottle. Price from 2s. to 21s. Savory & Moore, 143 New Bond Street, London, and all chemists. Note.—Name and trade-mark on each bottle.

SAID A. TO B. THE OTHER DAY,
Together as they sat,
Let U and I just go and buy
Some "Astral Oil" from Pratt.

Said B. to A., I plainly C
You know its safety well,
The Oil suits me just to a T,
And none can it X L.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1871.

The Office of The Nation has been removed to No. 5 Beekman Street.

The Week.

THE Civil Service Commission is reported not to be disturbed by the Attorney-General's opinion—nay, rather to be encouraged by it, as it shows, if correct, that the President has the power to do all that needs to be done, in the matter of reform, not only without the aid of Congress, but in spite of Congress; and that he can, as a correspondent of the Nation pointed out some weeks ago, impose on the heads of departments any rule of action he pleases, inasmuch as he can dismiss them if they disobey. The Commission proposes, therefore, it is said, to present the President with a set of rules for his own use; and it is to be presumed that, having received them, he will put them into operation. The commissioners—so we are led to believe by the Washington correspondent of the New York Times, who is well-informed—believe that, if he now carries into effect a system of reform, even without the sanction of Congress, it will, in the course of four years, take such a strong hold on the public mind that no subsequent Administration will dare to dispense with it. We confess we are not very sanguine on this point. No President is ever likely to come into office under conditions more favorable to civil-service reform than General Grant. He knew perfectly well, and so did everybody, that he had the power of instituting such a reform to a considerable extent, and did not need the Attorney-General to tell him about it. Nevertheless, he has made no attempt at reform whatever, and has made some exceedingly bad appointments at points in which reform was most needed and easiest. He has done this under pressure from politicians, we admit; but what reason is there to believe that his successors will be any better able to resist this pressure than he? If the whole reform is to be, so to speak, moral rather than legal, it would seem desirable to have it backed up, at least, by some legislation directed against Congressmen, such as Mr. Trumbull has suggested. By the way, we trust the Commission will not overlook Mr. Trumbull's proposition, which, we believe, originated with ex-Secretary Cox, that postmasters should be elected by the people who use the post-office. This seems an excellent idea, and would relieve the Executive of a vast amount of pressure. There is, perhaps, no office which is in its nature better fitted to be filled by election.

The movement against Tammany has made considerable progress during the week. The consent of the Attorney-General, who, though a Tammany man, is evidently frightened by the storm, to appoint Charles O'Conor counsel to act for him in any legal proceedings he (Mr. O'Conor) may see fit to institute against the plunderers of the city treasury, and Mr. O'Conor's prompt acceptance, are amongst the most favorable signs. Mr. O'Conor at once associated Mr. Evarts with him, and opened a "municipal commission office" to receive charges and get up cases in; and has announced, in reply to a deputation offering him a nomination for the State Legislature, that something important would happen "within three days." What the something is, our readers will know before this reaches them, but most probably it is Tweed's arrest. Mr. Samuel J. Tilden has been in pursuit of this personage for some weeks, and Mr. Tilden is a very unpleasant person to have following one with hostile intent. He has been rummaging the Broadway Bank, where the Ring kept its account, and we believe it is not now indiscreet to say that he has probably lighted on proof that Tweed's share of all plunder was twenty-five per cent., and that this proportion of every "haul" was regularly deposited to his credit. In the meantime, the "Boss" himself addresses his constituents nearly every evening, and is sure of his re-election to the State Senate. He said in a recent speech that he had "always endeavored to do what was right" and "to deal fairly between man and man." In conclusion, he said that "when he was in trouble, and desired their aid, he would call upon them, and when they were in trouble he desired them to call on him," a declaration which was received with "vociferous cheering."

There is great danger, however, that the various reform organizations, of which there are half a dozen in the field, will so mismanage matters as to give Tammany the victory at the polls after all. There are two Judges to be elected, for which the Reform Democrats have made excellent nominations, Judge Daly and Mr. George C. Barrett, and the "Custom-house Ruffians" have adopted them; but the "Tammany Thieves" (Republicans) hesitate over Mr. Barrett, and complain, through the Tribune, that if they do not get their fair share of what is going there will be trouble, and have adjourned without making nominations, but leaving a committee to watch the other organizations. The Ledwith Democrats have nominated their own chief, who, though an honest man, has no reputation as a lawyer whatever, for the Supreme Court, but have adopted Judge Daly for the Common Pleas. General Sigel seems to be a general favorite, we are glad to say, for the Registership. That position, involving the custody of the county records and deeds, is now held by an old ward politician, who formerly kept a low pot-house, and then reigned for a few years as a police justice, in which capacity he was known as the "Big Judge," owing to his enormous size. We heard him, towards the close of his judicial career, reject a petition from a culprit in the following terms: "Would ye hev me sully me reputation jist as I'm lavin' the binch?" We ought to add that we trust the honest men of all parties will not be misled by these various nominations for judicial offices, or forget that the badness of the judiciary is one great cause of our present troubles. There can be no question about Judge Daly's and Mr. Barrett's claims on the votes of all good citizens; there is question about those of all the other candidates as yet spoken of. Judge Daly has been on the bench for twenty-seven years, and has, through it all, enjoyed the confidence of everybody as an able lawyer and an upright judge. Mr. Barrett has been a member of the same court also for a short time, but resigned when the salaries were lower than they are now. He, also, is able, upright, and well known, and ought to be elected. It should be remembered, too, that the term of office is now fourteen years. We beg of all persons who have the interests not only of the city, but of civilized society at heart,, and who desire to see the justice on which society rests administered without sale, denial, or delay, to look well, above all things, to their vote for their judges. No man should go to the polls in a cloud on this subject, and we trust that the Bar Association will speak out in time.

The greatest piece of railroad consolidation yet accomplished is now about to take place, under a decision of Chancellor Zabriskie, of New Jersey, vacating an injunction restraining the directors of the New Jersey and Camden & Amboy Railroads, and Delaware and Raritan Canal, from leasing their roads and canal for 999 years to the Pennsylvania Central. A late act of the New Jersey Legislature empowered them to do so, by a vote of the majority of the stockholders, the dissenting minority to be paid the full value of their stock. The minority, however, refused to be paid off, and filed a bill praying for a perpetual injunction. This the Chancellor has denied in an elaborate decision, in which he affirms the power of the Legislature to authorize the lease, of the directors to make it, and of the Pennsylvania Central to take it, and remits the discontented stockholders to the acceptance of payment for their shares, and discards as of no force in the eyes of the court the objections to the transaction on grounds of public policy—such as the size and strength of the monopoly it will create. The judgment is, perhaps, one of the most important ever pronounced from the American bench; and the New Jersey courts are above suspicion, even in cases of this magnitude. The Pennsylvania Central, already a gigantic corporation, now owns an unbroken line of communication, with numerous tributaries, from ocean to ocean, has the revenues of a European kingdom of the third order, employs an army of officials, and will hereafter be practically omnipotent in the legislatures of three States, and perhaps more. The only limit to its political power may, indeed, be said to be the unwillingness of its managers to take trouble. The matter is serious, but it is not novel. It is made more serious by the fact to which we have often drawn attention, that these great corporations have in their service the ablest men in the country, while the State governments, which are to resist their pretensions and supervise their use of their privileges, are served by the feeblest and least efficient members of American society. The position of the companies is rendered all the more impregnable, too, by the practice which has grown up in many or most of the States, of keeping the ablest lawyers off the bench by low salaries, short terms, and personal abuse when they render unpalatable decisions. The legal mind and the legislative mind being of a low order, it is no wonder that the Tom Scott mind ranges untrammelled through the whole of American creation.

The present Government campaign against the Ku-klux of the seaboard, in which the United States Courts and the military act in unison, is producing at least two effects: it demonstrates the existence of the organization, and it brings a certain number of ruffians to justice —so far as the penitentiary and fines may be called justice in their case. Judge Bond has had the honor of presiding at these trials, and his conduct of them has been what we might have expected, firm, impartial, and reasonable. Certain leading Democrats of Raleigh, in a letter denouncing the Ku-klux outrages as crimes that "no right-minded men in North Carolina can palliate or deny," and admitting it to be their duty to aid in suppressing them, besought Judge Bond, last month, to postpone further prosecution till the November term, in order that they might "enlist all law-loving citizens to make an energetic and effectual effort for the restoration of good order." The Judge replied, with characteristic humor, that he was sure that the court's sitting a week or two longer to help them would not cause the petitioners to remit their praiseworthy labors. Meantime, the field is being prepared in South Carolina, which has been made the object of two proclamations by the President, the first designating nine counties as the seat of continued disorder, which the courts and civil authorities were unable to overcome, and commanding the surrender of arms and disbanding of illegal organizations within five days; and the second declaring martial law, which has been followed by arrests similar to those in North Carolina. All this, as we have said, is very effective for the time being. But what will take place when the courts and the military have withdrawn from the scene of their temporary triumph?

The schooner Horton, of Gloucester, Mass., was seized by the Dominion authorities some time in July, and the owners, being dissatisfied with the slowness of the proceedings in the Admiralty Court, sent up a party of men to "cut her out," as the men-of-war's men say, and they did cut her out—that is, stole off with her, and brought her back to Gloucester, where they were received with illuminations, salute firing, and every other token of wild joy. This lawless act is undoubtedly the result, in great part, of the teachings of the unprincipled demagogue who represents the district in Congress. The schooner will have to be surrendered if the Canadian authorities ask for her, and, in the meantime, the Treasury has refused the cool request of the owners for fresh papers. Some of our journals recommend the Dominion Government to be "magnanimous," and give her up. This might be a good thing for the Dominion to do, but it is an odd thing for us to recommend. Suppose the Canadians to be dissatisfied with the seizure of one of their vessels by Tom Murphy for a violation of what they consider our oppressive revenue laws and with the slowness of the District Court, and to run off with her in the night from the custody of the marshal; how should we treat a recommendation to be "magnanimous" and say no more about it?

The recuperative power of Chicago has not disappointed its admirers, nor, on the other hand, has any source from which it had a right to expect aid failed it. The State Legislature, convened in special session, received a message from Governor Palmer, urging the need of rendering assistance to the burnt city, and discussing the constitutional difficulties in the way of replenishing the treasury for that purpose. The new constitution, it appears, forbids the contracting of any debt by the State in excess of $250,000, unless in case of invasion or insurrection. The Governor argued that this limitation must be construed as merely an illustration of the kind of emergency which would justify incurring a greater than the fixed indebtedness; and as a tax would be too slow in its operation, he concluded that the Assembly would be justified in authorizing the issue of bonds. He suggested relieving the city of its lien on the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which would, with interest, at once put it in possession of nearly three millions of dollars; and that, if further aid was deemed advisable, the State might reassume the care of roads, schools, and other public burdens over which it maintained its right of general control. Worse reasoning than this would doubtless have sufficed; and the Legislature promptly passed several measures of relief, including the Canal Lien Bill, so modified, however, as to embrace a State tax for the next two years, and an issue of State bonds to the amount of only $250,000, thus saving the letter of the constitution as well as the spirit. This action has lent great encouragement to Chicago.

Want of space last week prevented our making mention of the remarkable public meeting in Philadelphia, on Friday, the 13th, to denounce the murder of Major Octavius V. Catto—a young and highly esteemed colored man, professor in a colored institute—in the election disturbances of the Tuesday previous. One would have to go South for a parallel instance of cold-blooded assassination, in which the police were abettors, two of them having released the murderer after he had been handed over to them, and a third, whose protection was besought by the victim, having answered him (as he himself testified on the stand), "Protect yourself; you have a pistol." Doubtless it was the complete fraternization of the police force with the rioter —not then exhibited for the first time, but then most villanously —that specially roused the indignation of the citizens of Philadelphia who met in National Hall to do what they could to retrieve the sullied reputation of the city. It was a gathering of great numbers and eminent respectability, and, considering the occasion of it, even at this distance from the Emancipation Proclamation, almost epochal in its character. Among the speakers, both white and black, Colonel McClure struck the keynote when he said that it was not the mission of the meeting "to seize the murderer and execute hasty punishment," but to invoke public sentiment against the spirit of caste which had induced this murder. This spirit has, as everybody knows, lingered longer in Philadelphia than in any other large city in the country; and, in fact, logically, there is but a single step from the exclusion of colored people from the horse-cars to the shooting of Major Catto. Remembering the class of persons who defended this exclusion, we fear that the election of a Republican city government and of a District-Attorney (who, for good reasons, ran behind his ticket) "praying to live, that he may show by his life the truth of his promise," to give his fellow-citizens "peace and security," is not going to do all that the meeting seemed to expect it would towards eradicating the vulgar prejudice against the negro. The meeting itself, as a sign of progress where progress was first needed, was worth many Republican mayors and policemen and district-attorneys.

"Civil-service reform," Mr. Conkling said in his recent speech, "is urged upon us, and all agree that we need the best measures in this regard which wisdom can devise. It is a very difficult and complex subject, but by what right do our opponents clamor about it? etc." We are greatly afraid that there is not a Democrat of them who could not "clamor about it" with nearly as good a grace as Mr. Conkling. There is something very entertaining about the way in which the souls of Republican politicians of Mr. Conkling's stamp continue to be weighed down by the magnitude of the subject. Indeed, to hear them talk about it, one would imagine that no legislature could, in the existing state of human culture, hope to deal with it, and that the final stoppage of "rotating" and "decapitating" could only be looked for in the remote future from the "Parliament of Man" or some body of similar pretensions. This is the most hopeful view. Others put down civil-service reform in the category of the Unknown and Unknowable, as one of the things which finite minds cannot grasp or comprehend. They talk of it, to be sure, but as men talk of the Origin of Evil, of the Seat of Life, and the Descent of Man. Tom Murphy, for instance, when asked by the Congressional Committee last winter his opinion of Andrew Jackson's conduct in throwing the civil-service into the arena of party politics, declared "he could not go back intelligently to Jackson's time." No wonder if he and the like of him consider reform still countless eons distant, too remote to be discussed except in the vain speculations of poets and philosophers.

Probably no result of the Syracuse Convention surprised people more than the attack of the Tribune on Mr. Andrew D. White, the chairman. It was very bitter, and that its bitterness was deliberate and intentional has been shown by that journal's recent reply to a defence of Mr. White which appeared in Harper's Weekly. We have not touched on the affair beyond mentioning the mere fact of the dissatisfaction of the minority with Mr. White's rulings, because it was very difficult to know what to say that would mend the matter either for Mr. White or anybody else. Harper's Weekly is quite right in laying great stress on Mr. White's character and antecedents as an answer to the Tribune's charges of unfairness. As to these, no man can stand higher. He took an active part in the politics of the State for some years before becoming President of Cornell University, and was the author or most active supporter of some of the best pieces of legislation of these latter years, and we believe nobody who ever heard of him did not consider his willingness to do political work, when so many men of his position were mere loungers in Europe, a piece of great good fortune for all of us. We all grumble so savagely or groan so pitifully over the unwillingness of educated men and men of fortune to touch politics, that certainly mere decency, if not gratitude, entitled Mr. White to warm support and encouragement. Everything in his career since he left the State Senate has certainly strengthened his claim on public regard. We did not approve of the San Domingo scheme, and did not estimate very highly the commissioners' report, but we did warmly approve of Mr. White's willingness to be a commissioner, because, whenever such offices are to be filled, we desire that such men as he, and not old political hacks and "war-horses" and "wheel-horses," should fill them; and we believe that his character is such that no charge of intentional unfairness or double-dealing is to be entertained against him, except on such proof as is hardly ever forthcoming in support of such charges, and is, in our opinion, not forthcoming in the present case.

We confess frankly, however, that when we saw that he had consented to be president of the Syracuse Convention, we felt satisfied that he would come to grief. In the present condition of the Republican party in this State, no man, no matter what his talents, character, or experience of politics, in the proper sense of the term, can successfully meddle between the two factions which divide it with the view either of reconciling them or holding the balance between them, unless he has personally mingled in their fights, and has personal knowledge of the strong and weak points of the warriors on both sides; and this for reasons we have given in another article. Moreover, Mr. White's speech, which was highly laudatory of the Administration, must have exasperated the Fentonites, seeing that the principal Federal office-holder in this city, the famous Tom Murphy of the Custom-house, is their deadliest foe, for whose scalp they may be said to have offered a reward. Finally, the State Committee, which, as we understand, in accordance with immemorial usage, furnished the President with the names of the committees, is also regarded by the Fentonites as an enemy and oppressor, and Mr. White's adoption of its suggestions was in itself an offence to them, though the committees were never so fairly composed. Whether they were fairly composed, we do not take upon ourselves to say. We could not form a judgment on this question without studying deeply the character and watching closely the goings and comings of a body of men in this city for whom we entertain anything but feelings of respect. All this is about tantamount to saying that Mr. White made a mistake in trying to decide between them. There is no ground to base mediation on—their differences are personal, and not political. When Bob says Hank is a thief, and Hank says Bob is a perjurer, what could you do to reconcile them, except prove that Hank is honest and that Bob tells the truth? This being impossible, there is nothing for it but to let them fight it out.

The new treaty between France and Germany has been duly signed and exchanged. According to a somewhat obscure Cable despatch, the six departments to be evacuated by the Germans are, by the terms of the treaty, declared neutral territory in a military point of view until "the stipulated payments of the indemnity are completed, and may be reeocupied by the Germans should France fail to fulfil her financial obligations." This restrictive stipulation probably refers only to the payment of the fourth half-milliard, which is to take place within three months from the conclusion of the treaty; otherwise, we could hardly understand the "general satisfaction" which the ratification of the new arrangements has created in Versailles. The result of the late elections for the Councils-General seems to have been another cause of satisfaction to the Government, as the Moderate Republicans and Liberal Conservatives—among whom all the supporters of M. Thiers are to be found—have badly beaten the Bonapartists, Legitimists, and Radicals. Gambetta, who is himself among the defeated of the latter category, consoles himself and his party by the reflection that "the same elections have extinguished the hopes of those retrogradists who desired to see France recommitted to the Bonapartists, and have shown that the advocates of a monarchy under other dynasties are lukewarm." There are, however, indications that the Bonapartists themselves do not consider their hopes extinguished, so long as they can appeal to a general plébiscite, and continue to intrigue; and the Government is—or possibly feigns to be—so much alarmed as to issue orders to its commandants on the coast of France to keep a careful watch over all suspicious movements, and be prepared to defeat any descent that might be attempted. The Communists, on the other hand, have for the time ceased to appear threatening, and the prisoners taken on the capture of Paris are consequently discharged en masse.

The crisis in Cisleithan Austria is not yet over, and Francis Joseph continues to be led in his external and internal affairs by the advice of Chancellor Beust and Premier Hohenwart, respectively, in spite of the opposite tendencies of their avowed policies. Further developments are waited for with general anxiety. The momentary chaos is well reflected in the following plain statement of facts in the Vienna Presse:

"Briefly speaking, the situation in the various diets is this: In Lower Austria, protest against the [Emperor's] Bohemian rescript; Upper Austria, withdrawal of the Liberals, general opposition against the Ultramontane rump diet; Styria, protest against the Bohemian rescript; Carinthia, protest against the Bohemian rescript; Silesia, protest against the Bohemian rescript; Salzburg and Görz, indifference as yet; Trieste, declaration of the historical rights of the city; Bohemia, Czech rump diet, protest of the Germans against its legality; Moravia, Czech rump diet, protest of the Germans against its legality; Galicia, reported address of confidence by the [Polish] majority, decided vote of want of confidence by the Ruthenians; Bukowina, address of confidence by the majority, vote of want of confidence by the minority; Istria, conditional assent to the peace policy [Hohenwart's]; Dalmatia, Bocchese address of confidence, protest of the minority; Tyrol, address of confidence by the majority, reservation of rights by the Italians, vote of want of confidence by the Liberal minority; Vorarlberg, address of confidence by the majority, stubborn opposition of the minority, unanimous rejection of the Government's project of an election law."

But while this Babel exists in the Cisleithan division of the monarchy, the Transleithan or Hungarian, under the Andrássy Cabinet, continues to enjoy the benefits of a consistent policy and steady progress.

SCIENCE AND HUMAN BROTHERHOOD.

HUXLEY, in one of his "lay sermons," devoted to showing the influence of the growth of natural knowledge in improving the moral and physical condition of the race, supposes the first president of the Royal Society of London, which was founded just after the great fire of 1666, to revisit the earth once more, and pictures his surprise on learning that although London contains tenfold more inflammable matter than it did in his day, the rooms being filled with woodwork and light drapery, and every corner of the streets and houses with explosive and inflammable gases, it had never since then been burnt down, and that, owing to the invention of engines for throwing water, not even a street is ever destroyed by fire. This sermon was delivered in 1866. If Lord Brouncker had delayed his visit, however, five years, he would perhaps have found in the burning of Chicago some reason for doubting whether natural knowledge had done for the world all that the learned professor claims for it, either in the matter of preventing great conflagrations or of mitigating their consequences. For the growth of natural knowledge has had a double set of effects on human society. There is no question as to the enormous increase of comfort and security which it has wrought, and as to the influence it has had, through this comfort and security, in "altering our modes of thinking and our views of right and wrong." But it has enormously increased the area over which any great calamity is felt, at the same time that it has increased the area from which succor and sympathy are drawn.

A more striking example of this could not be desired than is furnished by the burning of Chicago. Chicago is, perhaps, more distinctively and peculiarly than any city which exists, or has ever existed, the product of "the growth of natural knowledge." All other great cities, whether of the New or Old World, have had their foundations laid by accident, and have owed their rise to slow accretions of population, brought to them in the course of ages by all sorts of agencies, political, social, and commercial. Wars, famines, invasions, revolutions, the aimless wanderings of exiles and malcontents, the flight of criminals, the fears or necessities of sailors, the needs of barbarous tribes, or the flow of great rivers and the temptation of rich soil, have combined to build up nearly all of them in the slow course of centuries. This may be said with more or less accuracy of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and New Orleans, and Cincinnati, even, as well as of Rome, London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Venice, and Constantinople. Chicago, however, owes nothing, or next to nothing, to the past, and has no roots in human traditions or weaknesses. It is distinctly the product of steam-travelling and electrical communication, and is the work of a single generation. It was created for the express purpose of receiving and distributing the products of the Northwest, and was run up like a warehouse or factory. Without the railroad and telegraph it could not have been created, or, if it had been created, it would have been of no use. Its very existence, under all the circumstances, would probably surprise Lord Brouncker far more than the immunity of London from great fires. The invention of the fire-engine is no doubt a great thing, but the creation of a city nearly as large as London at the time of the Great Fire, in the middle of a remote wilderness, within a period of forty years, is a far greater thing, even from the merely scientific point of view.

But, then, there is something about it even more wonderful than its creation, and illustrating still more remarkably the influence of scientific progress on human society. London, in Lord Brouncker's day, though a great political and commercial capital, had little or no relations except through what we should call a feeble and straggling commerce with the rest of the world. Had Chicago existed and been burnt down in his time, the news would have reached England probably in six or eight months by means of brief allusions in commercial or other private letters, and would have been talked of as we talk of the sack of Rome by Alaric or the storming of Constantinople by the Turks. It would have taken two months to get to New York or Boston, and the most charitably disposed man in either city would have speedily dismissed from his mind the little he knew about the calamity. Relief in the shape of stores he could not send for want of transportation, and, long before relief in money could get there, the sufferers would either be past help or able to do without it, and so he would have jogged on his way more than ever satisfied that his concern was with the affairs of his own household and his own neighborhood. On the other hand, the disaster, commercially considered, would have been a disaster for hardly anybody but the inhabitants of the city. Nobody in New York or London or Berlin would have been touched in his pocket by it, or have felt his comfort affected by it. It would no more have threatened the exchanges of these cities with a panic than the burning of Yokohama five years ago. The effect of difficulty of communication in producing a sense of remoteness is one of the familiar facts of history; but the effect of the sense of remoteness in deadening and destroying the sentiment of human brotherhood is something which we only now begin to appreciate. There have occurred within a few years calamities far more terrible, as regards the resultant misery, than the fire of Chicago. Over a million of people have perished in India by famine within a single year since the close of our war, and, at this writing, vast districts of Persia are undergoing depopulation through the same agency. More horrible still, hordes of Turkomans from the great northern desert are riding on through the villages, and lancing or carrying into slavery the unhappy survivors. After making every allowance for the effect of difference of race and of civilization in creating the indifference with which we hear of all this, a large part of it must be attributed to simple distance both in time and in miles. If the railroad or the telegraph brought these awful scenes of suffering to our very doors, neither color nor creed could stop the flow of our sympathy or prevent our sympathy being really active.

It is not true, then, apparently, that the march of science has made the burning of large cities henceforth impossible. Under certain conditions of weather and material, in any modern city, fires may still break out which no machines yet invented can check. It would indeed appear, from the experience of Chicago, that when the fire attains a certain volume its power becomes something which no machine is ever likely to be able to check, and against which no habitable building can be made "proof." Moreover, when a city burns in our time, science carries the desolation over the civilized world. The terror which spread through the streets of Chicago was felt almost as acutely in the streets of New York and London. The flames which raged there threatened full as many homes elsewhere, homes in other cities, with desolation. It was not the savings of the people of Chicago only which were destroyed, but the savings of at least as many more who never came within a thousand miles of it, and with their savings nearly everything that made life sweet. There is something grand about this, but there is also something which everybody must, in his secret heart, find appalling. There is no place on the globe now to which a weary man can go for rest; no "boundless contiguity of shade" to which the storms that shake the busy world cannot find an entrance. The fortunes of the whole race are being so closely linked together by science that there is nobody, from the hod-carrier up to the millionaire, who may not any morning read in the paper news from the uttermost ends of the earth depriving him of his fortune or his daily bread.

On the other hand, while the citizens of London after the great fire, and the citizens of Lisbon after the great earthquake, were, like the famine-stricken Hindoos and Persians, left alone in their misery to battle as best they could with their sufferings and losses, Chicago, after spreading her losses over the civilized world, finds the civilized world come to her assistance. Nothing would probably have astonished Lord Brouncker more than to see countless tons of relief stores hastening, with the speed of the wind, along dozens of our highways to the scene of the disaster, while the fire was still raging, and poured out lavishly on the victims before they had fully waked up to the fact that they were really homeless and ruined. If it be true, as it undoubtedly is, that no sentiment, whether good or bad, can ever become strong which does not find expression in action, the effect of the possibility of relieving distress at great distances in stimulating the feeling of the unity of the human race, and diminishing the dividing force of political boundaries, can hardly be overrated. That this great impulse to brotherly love should come, too, from the working of two mechanical inventions is, perhaps, as marvellous an illustration as was ever seen of the way in which the most material of agencies contribute to the moral elevation of the race. "May God"—to use the words in which old Grotius closes the great book in which the doctrine of the unity of mankind found the noblest recognition it ever got from jurist or legislator—"write this lesson—he who alone can—on the hearts of all those who have the affairs of Christendom in their hands; and may he give to those persons a mind fitted to understand and to respect Rights, divine and human, and lead them to recollect always that the ministration committed to them is no less than this, that they are the governors of man—a creature most dear to God."

THE PRESS AND THE KNAVES.

We find the following, prefaced by some complimentary remarks, in a late number of the Commercial Advertiser of this City:

"The Nation, from its prejudice against General Grant, is quite as malignant as his meanest and dirtiest defamers. It stops at nothing—it stoops lower than the Sun. It reiterates from week to week the vilest slanders of a partisan press. It quotes the assertions of men of notoriously bad character—men proven to have been engaged in dishonorable practices—men publicly impeached, and who would not be believed under oath. It stays not its hand with the individual—it invades the home-circle—it strikes down the innocent and the sinless to reach the object of its malignant prejudices. Disgraceful as this sort of warfare may be to the partisan press, how much more so is it to a journal that aspires to be the most intellectual, the most refined, the most elevated and dignified of our teachers. See how the Nation shines, 'the wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind.'"

We shall not attempt to refute this, and shall not even take the trouble to contradict it. We believe the Nation is read with sufficient care to make it easy for its readers to judge of the truth or falsehood of the Advertiser's charges without hearing anything from us on the subject. We quote the passage for the simple purpose of providing ourselves with an excuse for making a very frank explanation of what we conceive to be at the present crisis in public affairs the proper rules and regulations of political controversy. We have sought, ever since the Nation was started, not to allow any difference of opinion upon any question on which respectable and civilized men in any age have ever differed, to betray us into personal attacks or comments or criticism. We have endeavored, so far as the weaknesses of human nature would permit, to see in ordinary opponents politicians or journalists simply, and take no note whatever of their private life, antecedents, surroundings, or weaknesses, so long as they themselves chose to withdraw them from observation. We have not guessed, or enquired, or inferred anything with regard to the authorship of articles in newspapers, with the view of helping out our reply by an attack on the men who wrote them. We have always firmly held that these were the resources of feeble minds and malignant tempers; that political controversy was a manly art, and that those who engaged in it should use manly weapons, or else leave it for fields in which ignorance, weakness, and spitefulness would less seriously hinder them. One of the reasons which have led us of late to question the expediency of the entrance of women into the political arena has been the fear, which the female papers and female conventions seemed to justify, that it would greatly increase the tendency, common enough among men, to neglect the merits of public questions, and neglect even the public character of opponents, in order to indulge in little bursts of catlike fury over their birth, parentage, personal habits, and circumstances. When we find a man or woman raving against an anti-prohibitionist because he drinks wine, and enquiring whether an anti-female-suffragist has a mother or sisters or ill-treats his wife, or whether a free-trader is not bribed by foreign merchants, we always long to lead him or her off to the cranberry swamp or the washtub, and forbid either of them ever reappearing again in any newspaper or on any platform.

But, as we have said, we regard this avoidance of personalities as obligatory only in the discussion of questions on which respectable and civilized men have differed in opinion. There is hardly any question of public policy which does not lie within this category, not even slavery and polygamy. As honest, and upright, and conscientious men as the world has seen have approved of both one and the other; and though the presumptions, on the score of honesty, we admit, run strongly against any man who in our day is either slaveholder or polygamist, yet we hold that, if we discuss with him publicly the rightfulness of either institution, we are bound not to fortify our arguments by personal attacks on him. We need not challenge the devil to loyal combat with lawful weapons unless we please, but, if we do, devil though he be, he is wronged by our wearing concealed armor, or poisoning our sword-blades.

The question, however, which now most seriously occupies the public mind is not a question on which there has in any age been any difference of opinion among respectable and civilized men. The question whether it is lawful to steal the public money, or any money, is not one on which any civilized community has ever been openly divided in sentiment. Nor is this community divided on it. There is in the United States, as we have often pointed out, no party which defends corruption or maintains that dishonest men ought to be put in office. The "corruptionists" exist, but they do not form, and never will form, an organization apart. Corruption is denounced on all party platforms; it is even denounced at meetings of the Tammany General Committee and of the "William M. Tweed and Richard B. Connolly Associations." If you get into the pulpit to preach against it, you will find the front pew filled with notorious knaves, their Bibles open on their knees, and their hands clasped, and eyes rolled up in devout expectation. Therefore, as we have often pointed out, preaching against corruption in the abstract does by itself little or no good in politics. We do not mean to say that denunciation of it with voice or pen are barren; if we thought so, we should despair of our civilization. But we do mean to say that, unless these denunciations are accompanied by accusations against particular persons, by proofs of their guilt, and by the prompt and relentless application to their case of such penalties as the law affords, or as public opinion and social opinion have at command, we shall make no progress towards purification. We know nothing of goodness except as displayed in the character of good men; we know nothing of badness except as displayed in the character of corrupt men; we know nothing of corruption except as it is displayed in the conduct of corrupt men. These virtues and vices may exist in the abstract; it is open to philosophers to speculate about them; but for us, as citizens, they are as if they did not exist.

This being true, the questions which occupy the public mind are not, Is there corruption?—we well know there is deep and widespread corruption—but, Are Ben, Hank, and Bob corrupt?—not, Is it right for collectors to steal? but, Has Tom stolen?—not, Is it right for judges to take bribes? but, Has George taken bribes?—not, Is it right for mayors to be receivers of stolen property? but, Has Abe received it, knowing it to be stolen? Secondary and subsidiary to these questions, but hardly less important, are the questions whether, knowing Jim to be a thief, and actually engaged in thieving, it is right to take his brief and his fee to aid him in so resisting or evading the law, or corrupting the bench, as to render his operations successful? whether, knowing Dick and Bill to be rascals enriched by plunder, and flaunting their ill-gotten wealth in the face of honest and struggling poverty, it is right to associate with them, or to countenance them by silence, or by vote, or by speech, or even by ordinary civility? whether, too, believing Dan to be a murderer, and bully, and forger, it is right for you, a high public officer, to appoint him to a place of trust or emolument? or, having done so in ignorance of his real character, to keep him in it in the face of unanswered charges of the gravest kind?

These questions, we admit, are personal questions; they cannot be discussed without personalities, and personalities of the most terrible kind. We know it, and we hate it as much as anybody; but there is no help for it. It is a detestable business, which not only every man who seeks to build up a better society, or to bring in the reign of purer manners and of nobler laws, but every man who desires to save good government on this continent for himself or his children, has to do, whether he likes it or not. A great crisis has come upon us, through various causes. The main feature of this crisis is the appearance in political positions of importance of ignorant, degraded, dishonest, and shameless men, many of whom, indeed we might say most of whom, would, if they got their due, be in the State prison. To apply to our dealings with these people the ordinary rules of political controversy is simply ridiculous. Any discussion we carry on with them is either in the nature of a warning to them to fly while it is yet possible, or is intended simply to fill up the time while we are waiting for the police. In other words, our object in talking to them or about them is not to persuade them, but to bring them to justice. They are not political opponents, but criminals.

COLLECTOR MURPHY'S CASE.

A MEMBER of the Dix Commission, which enquired into the manner in which Mr. Murphy fulfilled his hat contract with the Government in 1864, has discovered that the stenographic report of the proceedings was still in his possession, and it has been handed to us for examination. We have read it through carefully. It appears, indeed, quite true that there was something unusual, if not extraordinary, in the way in which Colonel Olcott's charges against Murphy were taken up by the Government. They were not acted on for some months, in spite of his continuous pushing, and when acted on, instead of, as usual in such cases, ordering a trial by court-martial on his representations, the War Department directed a preliminary investigation by a committee, mainly civilian, sitting in New York. That this departure from the usual routine was due to the use of political influence on Murphy's part seems very likely, and indeed is not denied by his friends; but they excuse, if not justify, it by reference to the summary and unsatisfactory way of dealing with contractors into which military courts had fallen during the war, and in which a hasty and imperfect trial often resulted in ruin for the accused. Whether the refusal of the Government to allow Colonel Olcott the aid of counsel in this case is to be accounted for in the same way we do not know; but it is certain that they did refuse him counsel, and that the refusal was, as far as he was concerned, unprecedented, and it appears probable that it entailed on him serious inconvenience. He had more business of this kind all over the East than he could well attend to, so that he went to trial with little or no preparation, and found himself matched against Mr. Evarts. Mr. John Sedgwick, who had usually been employed by Colonel Olcott in similar cases, was, it is true, present, but only as a friend, and beyond the cross-examination of two witnesses, and the making of one or two objections to testimony, took no part in the proceedings.

The enquiry was strictly limited by the order to the question, "Whether there had been any fraud or failure on the part of the contractors" in the manner of executing the contract; and in carrying out these instructions, the commission confined themselves to ascertaining whether the hats delivered by Murphy were equal in quality to a sample or standard hat produced and exhibited. On this point Colonel Olcott produced seven witnesses, who all testified that the deliveries fell below the standard. Murphy, on the other hand, produced nine, who all testified that the deliveries were as good as the standard or better. In short, all hatters who were taken by Colonel Olcott to see the hats condemned them; while all those whom Murphy took to see them were satisfied with them; and yet there did not appear to be any trace of the use of improper influence or of improper or partial selection of experts on either side.

Nevertheless, it must be conceded that, judging from the account the witnesses gave of themselves, or which was given of them by others, the weight of testimony, in so far as experience and standing in the trade give weight, was on Murphy's side. The Olcott witnesses, though apparently very respectable men, were men of less mark as hatters, and they labored under the disadvantage of having to put their estimate of the difference between the standard and the deliveries into dollars and cents, which, of course, gave Murphy's counsel an opportunity of the kind which lawyers love, of tearing them to pieces, by making them accurately apportion the measure of inferiority among the component parts of the hat—so much for the stock, so much for the work, so much for the finish, or so much for the lining, and so on. When Colonel Olcott declared, as he did declare, that he did not question the honesty of the mode in which the contract was awarded, or the honesty of the inspector who passed the hats, there was, we confess, to our minds, nothing left for the commission but to pronounce that there had been no fraud or failure on the part of the contractors.

As to the justifiability of Colonel Olcott's action, it is to be said that the hats, considered in themselves, must have been of a kind to excite suspicion in everybody's mind who had not narrowly compared them with the standard. The standard hat was furnished by Murphy & Griswold themselves, and seems to have been, like those which were modelled on it, a pitiful covering for the human head. Nearly all the witnesses on both sides agreed as to the poorness of their quality. One of Murphy's witnesses called them "miserably poor"; several said there would be no market for them if the Government did not take them; and Mr. Evarts energetically and successfully objected to the question put to one witness, whether he thought it would be possible to make poorer hats than they were? In fact, we gather from the evidence of Murphy's witnesses that he could not, if he had tried, have made worse hats than the sample, at all events, not much worse—which was a strong point in his favor. This accounts in part for the severe terms in which Colonel Perry, the Deputy Quartermaster at Washington, denounced them in the letter from which an extract was published in the Tribune of Sept. 22. He said they were of the "meanest quality," which was true; but he said also that "they could only have been received through the incompetency or collusion of the inspector," which was apparently untrue. They were received by the inspector because the standard was of the "meanest quality" too.

We ought to add that at the trial Colonel Olcott made no mention of any witnesses having been "spirited away," or of the absence of any witnesses whose evidence was other than cumulative. Moreover, the two witnesses who made affidavits, or statements in the form of affidavits, and afterwards refused to sign them, Messrs. Burr and Dodd, and whose evidence, we inferred from Colonel Olcott's language in his letter in the Tribune, was not forthcoming before the commission, really did both appear and testify at the trial. The affidavits, which were very damaging to Murphy, and gave a woful account of the manufacture of his hats and of their inferiority to the standard sample, were written out by a stenographer in Colonel Olcott's presence, although they were not signed; but the two men appeared at the investigation, and on some points mentioned in the affidavits gave an opposite account or professed ignorance, and on others were asked no questions. As they were Government witnesses, it was of course impossible for the prosecution to impugn their testimony by any imputation of collusion with Murphy. Nor was any suggestion made by Colonel Olcott or anybody else that the standard sample had been changed. Wheeler, the Government Inspector, swore it had remained in his custody the whole time; but it appeared that his "custody" was of a kind that desperate and dexterous men would not have had much difficulty in violating. However, the point was not raised in any way. In our comments on the matter we have spoken of the non-production of the affidavits published in the Tribune in the Senate, when Murphy came up for confirmation, as "incomprehensible." Colonel Olcott says that it was found they had been abstracted from the files at the War Department: Murphy's friends say the fact was that no such papers were ever put on file, and that the originals were all along in Olcott's possession. We shall not now take upon ourselves to decide between them. We have satisfied ourselves that, though Murphy did make "shocking bad hats" for the army in 1864, he did not defraud the Government, and that we have done him an injustice in asserting that he did. The badness of the hats appears, as we have said, to have been the result of deliberate choice on the part of the War Department; and the explanation of it we have heard offered is, that hats having risen greatly in price, and the war being apparently near its close, the authorities determined to provide an article which, though poor, would probably last till the close of hostilities.

We would not willingly wrong even a Custom-house politician, and as we have wronged Murphy, we would gladly say no more about him. If he was a private individual, it would be our duty henceforth to let him alone. But unfortunately the refutation of the charge of fraud in his contracts, though it diminishes the scandal of his retention in a high public office, does not do away with it. His appointment was, as we said at the time it was made, an abuse of a great public trust; we are of that opinion still; and we have not, in the course of our enquiries, met with anybody, either among his friends or foes, bold enough to allege that he was fit for the position he now holds. The opinion of men of all parties who know anything about him, of the President's course in putting him in Mr. Grinnell's place, was well expressed by the New York Times immediately after his nomination last year, when it said that his nomination was one that "set rational explanation at defiance"; that those who had rejoiced at it were those "who contributed most to the defeat and degradation of the party in this city"; "that the appointment proved that the parasites of the party were still its masters"; and that "the President had the satisfaction of knowing that he had taken a step which all his enemies would exult over and all his friends deplore." Of the influences to which Murphy owed his appointment, the same journal offered all the explanation that was necessary when it said "that Mr. Conkling had made his arrangements too well to be disappointed," and that "the whole business had been arranged nearly three months before."

Since the revelations that have been made within the past year of the state of affairs in this city, it is not necessary for a writer, addressing himself to honest men of every party throughout the country, to give the reason for his hostility to a politician like Murphy. We do not need that he should be a fraudulent contractor in order to ask for his dismissal from a place of trust and profit. All Republicans now know that when an illiterate hatter, army contractor, and speculator in real estate suddenly appears on the surface of New York politics, and becomes a favored competitor for a position in the public service which should only be given to a trusted and well-known merchant, it is neither to his talents, nor his eloquence, nor his piety, nor his business ability that he owes his good luck, but to the low arts and hidden ways which have given us Tweed and Sweeny and Hall and Connolly and their kind. Murphy, in short, was, to speak plainly, put in charge of the Custom-house of this great port for no other reason than that he was supposed to possess, in an eminent degree, that dexterity in the handling of base tools for base ends which has made Tweed the lordly criminal that he is; and Murphy has in all respects, we must do him the justice to say, answered the expectations entertained of him by his patrons. He "runs" the Custom-house as Tweed and Connolly "run" the City Hall; that is, by filling it, as far as is possible without stopping the whole machine, with unscrupulous and shiftless adventurers dependent for their bread on his will, and ready for any dirty work he may be pleased to assign them, and whom he mulcts unmercifully to pay the expenses of their own degradation. Let us not be misunderstood: we do not expect, in our day, to see the work of politics in this city or anywhere else done by saints; but country readers will admit that we are not hypercritical or oversanguine when we tell them that the two factions into which the Republican party in this city is divided, one of which is headed by Murphy, are not simply a disgrace to our politics, but to our civilization. What we mean by this we shall best explain by saying that listening to the account given of them by those who know them thoroughly (which, we are glad to say, we do not) is like reading a chapter in those old gems of criminal literature, "The Newgate Calendar" or "The Lives of Noted Rogues and Rapparees." "Politics," in their minds, has long ceased to have any connection with public affairs, in the proper sense of that term. It consists in a knowledge of the weaknesses, capacity for evil, petty vanities, and sordid desires of one or two hundred more or less obscure men, nearly every one of whom is accused of offences either against social morality or the laws of the land, and over a considerable number of whom "papers" containing revelations of more or less atrocity are held in terrorem by their antagonists. Among the offences with which they charge each other are: 1. Perjury; 2. Subornation of witnesses; 3. Levying blackmail, either as officeholders or editors; 4. Bribery of legislators; 5. Being bribed as legislators; 6. Corruption of judges; 7. Swindling the Government during the war; 8. Connection with the Whiskey Ring; 9. Complicity with the Tammany Ring; 10. Embezzlement of public funds; 11. Embezzlement of trust funds; 12. Habitual lying. The most hopeful patriot will readily perceive that New York politics will hardly repay study, and that nothing very great in the way of reform is to be looked for through the transfer of power from one of these bands to another.

We may add that the suggestion made by some country papers—that the Custom-house difficulty can be solved by giving the collectorship to some respectable Republican from some other State, such, say, as General Hawley, of Connecticut—is based on a misapprehension of the exact state of the case. No honest man, who means to do his duty to the Government, and nothing more, can, in the present state of local politics, and with the "spoils" system in full operation, hold either the collectorship or the marshalship in this district. He might possibly succeed, with more or less wear and tear of mind, and some damage to his moral sense, if the parties in the city were united; but with two factions contending for the "offices," anybody who takes either place before the civil service is reformed must make up his mind to be a thoroughgoing and unscrupulous partisan, without decency or principle, and to associate and co-operate with the principal "scallawags" of the city. General Barlow tried to administer the marshal's office on sound principles, but a deputation of politicians waited on him nearly every week to abuse him for not putting their creatures and tools in office, and finally went to Washington to denounce him to the President. At last the State Committee capped the climax by assessing him for campaign expenses, not on his salary, but on his supposed annual stealings—which they estimated at the enormous sum of $44,000, his lawful salary being only $6,000.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

LONDON, Oct. 2, 1871.

THE "Exhibition," that standing novelty of London, has just closed, having been so far a success in a pecuniary point of view that the commissioners have devoted £2,000 to the purchase of works for the national collection. This was a foregone conclusion, I believe; for any exhibition which does not cost too much in the getting up and current expenses, can be made to pay in London by dint of advertising. There is such a world of sight-seers, who will see everything before they are content, that even if the Times told the public that it was the worst thing to be seen that ever was seen, crowds would go to see it because it was the worst. On no other ground can the success of the Exhibition be accounted for. It has been ill arranged, ill managed, and is poor in things of general interest, as well as destitute of articles of novelty. The management seems to me to have been that of dilettante—a sort of close corporation of amateurs, who, by official indulgence, had been permitted to play at commissioner while their chiefs, the real commissioners, were occupied with more important things. I have not had the patience to read the reports of the official reporters, but the Times and the Pall Mall Gazette encourage me to think that I have done wisely in not spending my time or money on them; and as there was absolutely nothing of general interest and decided novelty in the rooms, I don't think the reports can be worth much to the world at large.

Nothing can be worse than the arrangement of the buildings for a general exhibition. Rooms for such purposes should be built on a plan which permits the visitor to pass at once to any gallery or room which he may desire to see, without going through a labyrinth, or even such a peripatetic struggle as it involved, to find anything one wants in the long line of rooms which form the hollow square of the Exhibition buildings. Then, to make matters worse for the general public, the Royal Horticultural Society, which has proprietary rights over the enclosed grounds, does not permit any one to pass across the square without payment of one shilling extra—one of those shoppy and characteristically British things which obtrude themselves on a foreigner in England at every turn, another being the multiplication of catalogues at one shilling each, all of them poor except as to paper and type, and made bulky by the addition of a large number of leaves of advertisements entitled "illustrated appendix," though there are in general no illustrations except trademarks. In fact, the dominant impressions which remain on my mind as to the whole thing are, first, that it is a wretchedly assorted array of incoherent productions; and, secondly, that all that could be done to turn a penny has been done—that, in short, it was a big shop, and not so well arranged as any private establishment of the same importance would have been.

The meagreness of the Exhibition is doubtless due to the war, which has absorbed all the attention and much of the industry and capital of the whole civilized world, and prevented contributions; but if contributions had been much more numerous, what would the management have done

What is, however, excellent, in spite of bad arrangement in parts and sympathetic incompetence in the whole, is the art collection, which we are assured will become a permament matter, and give us in London an annual opportunity to see foreign art; not so much for the sake of English taste, which is likely to be very slowly improved by foreign examples, but because London is a convenient place for cosmopolitan collections of every kind, and strangers here may find in such a collection most forms of modern art. In this sense, we hope that the present Exhibition is but the first of a long series, and that later ones may be still more complete. In fact, the art collection redeems the International Exhibition of 1871 from insignificance, and by its catholicity, if not by its intelligent arrangement, makes it a notable occurrence in the history of English art development. The Royal Academy is a close guild, a shop for the benefit of English artists and mainly for its members, and in which a foreigner has a poor chance of being admitted and a worse one of being seen. The opportunity which an exhibition like the International offers to foreign art is, therefore, not only a new one for the general public, and one which is likely to be most valuable, but one which will in time be of the greatest mercantile value to the artists of all the world. London is the great market for all superfluities which are in the fashion, and the sums now thrown away on English art, if wisely spent in some other countries, would change the conditions of artistic existence; and a great exchange of fine art, such as a catholic exhibition here would become, would be the market for the New World as well as the Old. It will be long before the English purchaser will become catholic, because in England there is little taste and much deference to fashion. It is impossible to make your average Englishman believe that Landseer is a dauber compared with Rubens or even Snyders, or that Millais is an eternity from Delacroix; he may admit it if you assert it energetically and contemptuously enough, overpowered by your energy if not convinced by your demonstration, but he will return to his former faith the moment after. Like an old English friend of mine, whom I assured, in speaking of the magnificent Thames (which is, after all, one of the most beautiful of rivers), that we had rivers in America which would go round England and tie in a knot, he would say, "I must believe it, my dear S., since you assure me of it, but I don't see how it can be"—and John comes back to his faith in Landseer and Millais again, his placid nature renouncing your tentative persuasion as a lake effaces the impression of a pebble. English art for the moment exhibits a most admirable illustration of the effects of protection—not legal, but sentimental—for practical free-trade would break down some of the shops, including, if I am not mistaken, the Royal Academy. Therefore, let us hope in the future of the International.

The comparative poverty and feebleness of English art in this Exhibition is to an outsider most striking; and this in spite of its being a "review" exhibition, at which all pictures of living (and, in the case of French art, of some dead) painters are included. There are here some celebrated pictures from previous English exhibitions, such as Millais's "Knight Errant," Walker's "Plough" and "Bathers," several pictures by Landseer, portraits by Watts, etc., etc.; and repeated visits to the Exhibition, passing from the English to the Continental schools, have only fixed in my mind the long-growing impression that the English intellect (and I include in the same expression the American, so far as it has not been modified by other national characteristics) is hopelessly inartistic. Now and then an isolated intellect crops out from the mass of the pure artistic temperament, good for nothing for any other use than the evangelization of beauty; but he is, like John the Baptist crying in the wilderness, without teacher or imitator—nothing but the great gospel follows him. Such was Gainsborough (and, on a smaller scale, Reynolds), such Turner, and such at the present moment Burne Jones, and no other purely English mind—Rossetti, the greatest of English painters of to-day, not being English, but Italian. The mass of painters are alike in certain characteristics, chief of these, even in the best and truest, being a complete subordination of the "notion" of a picture to its plastic element—the telling of a story, the illustration of a passage from the poets, the realization of a moral or representation of a fact, rather than the expression of the harmonies either of color, arrangement, or form, which make and distinguish the great schools, the Greek, Venetian (and Florentine ?). The English artist is hopelessly intellectual; well, if his intellect is of the nobler type, but never so ill if it is of that microscopic character by which the majority of the pictures in the English exhibitions are produced; but, in any case, he cannot cease to think out all his results, instead of abandoning himself, as a true artist does, to the emotions in the expression of which art consists.

I cannot illustrate my meaning better than by citing Hogarth as a type of the English mind in its practical application, and contrasting him with Turner. The former was a novelist on canvas, and in all his work the plastic qualities are scarcely sufficient for the logic and rhetoric of his story. He moralizes, reflects, satirizes, caricatures even, much as if he were a Swift educated with a brush instead of a pen in his hand. Turner is the other pole of art—concrete sensuousness—a being sensitive at every pore and tentacle to the beauty and multiform harmonies of the universe; but of ratiocination, philosophy, science, morals, or morality, not a particle, conscious or unconscious, save what his natural impulses bred in him. Hogarth is the father of English art, so far as it is distinctively such; and the isolated natures which are purely artistic, after the type of Titian, Correggio, and Turner, seem to have only an exceptional existence, and to leave no abiding influence either on art or the public taste, which will not be divorced from the idol, the picture-story.

Whether as the consequence of this want of appreciation, original default, or other reason, it does not matter to enquire, but the fact is that English painting almost never rises above mediocrity in plastic qualities, though in the selection and conception of subject it does show at times great dramatic power and freshness of insight into human nature. One feels on passing through the Exhibition, with an undeniable intellectual vivacity and not uncommon poetic sensibility and purity of feeling, a weakness in general treatment, a want of mastery of the material, command of the grammar of art, distinctness and simplicity of plastic treatment, which gives the impression of self-taught (always badly taught) youths, some of an energy almost frantic, but juvenile throughout—a school without a master, and, what is worse, without the feeling of the need of one; and, on passing into the French galleries, the contrast is disastrous. Here, with any quantity of triviality in conception and choice of subject, there is a mastery, an energy and directness in treatment, which, let the impression on your taste be what it may, assure you that you are in the presence of a race of artists. With the exception of some portraits by Watts, I do not find a single oil-picture in the whole English collection which could be classed with really great Continental work, and even Watts is so feeble in handling and drawing that he cannot sit beside such men as Delacroix, Wouters of Belgium, Vinck, or even the landscape painters, Troyon, Daubigny, Dupré, and a score of others, at whose work the average English exhibition-goer turns up his nose in complete indifference. There is a flower piece in the French gallery, by Diaz, which has more art in it than any oil-picture in the whole English department, reminding one of the axiom of Titian, that a bunch of grapes contained all the elements of art.

Yet I heard a very intelligent Englishman say as he passed out of the Belgian room—in which there are more noble landscapes than I ever saw in any exhibition of the Royal Academy, and three or four figure-pictures which would have furnished the whole Academy with ability—"A very poor room that is." And this seems the case generally. You cannot make the English public take anything in an unwonted package—the trademark goes for all. Yet it is extravagantly fond of artistic power when it has the Academy stamp. Millais, who passes for the R. A.'s best man with οἱ πολλοί, has in the International a picture which he calls the "Knight Errant," a naked woman tied to a tree (the tree dividing the picture in two) and a knight cutting the cords with a huge double-handed broadsword which he has thrust downward between her and the tree at the imminent risk of her skin—he looking the while intently at her face, which she as steadfastly and with propriety turns away. A swordsman would have drawn his weapon across the cord from the outside; if a clever man he would have taken his dirk to do the cutting with; but in any case he would have looked where he was cutting. The knight is a lay figure in armor, the woman an ordinary model with every imperfection of the model on her, and even traces of her obedience to the fashion of the day. Every dramatic quality, every common-sense consideration, is omitted from the picture. Neither ideality nor imagination is in it. Yet one heard, and hears continually, unqualified praise of it as a masterpiece of modern art, and I doubt if any critic for a London paper would care to speak out the plain truth, which is, that it is a clever piece of brush-work, mediocre in knowledge of drawing, forced and artificial in composition, strong to garishness in color, with incompleted and failing harmony, utterly devoid of point, and palpably only a clumsy pretext to make a picture out of a cleverish study from a nude model. Yet its bravura and brush-work made it the picture of the season to the vast majority of R. A. exhibition-goers. English art is not by any means without value—some forms of it are of great value; the best being in the comic papers and the pictures which follow that vein—the greatest being pictorially what Thackeray hinted at in his wonderfully clever designs, and realized perfectly in words. But this is a light not from the firmament where Titian, Correggio, Turner, even Phidias and Michael Angelo, burn.

Belgian art in the Exhibition has surprised me, even with a certain knowledge of it for many years. There is, especially in the landscape department, a directness of manner and simplicity of appeal which quite equal French painting, though nothing in power approaches Daubigny and Dupré, and there seems to me more of the peculiar English love for pure nature, as nature, which makes so delightful a feature of the English water-color exhibitions—the impersonality of the Englishman before nature. Two landscapes by a woman, Marie Collart, interested me especially for simplicity, purity, and directness of painting, but the grandest landscape after those of Daubigny and Dupré, and even more tender and true to the theme—a real autumn twilight—was a picture by Lamorinière, "Near Hastière."

The German collection shows nothing new—the same prescriptive treatment of the same natural proprieties, dull and uninteresting, which we know from Düsseldorf so long ago—neither great art nor simple nature—scholarly, academic, and stupid, it must be said, even if honest and true up to a certain range. W. J. Stillman.

Notes.

Macmillan & Co. will shortly issue three text-books remarkable even amid the general excellence of the well-known Clarendon Press Series, to which they belong. These are: "The Philology of the English Tongue," by John Earle, M.A., sometime Professor of Anglo Saxon in the University of Oxford—a manual constructed on the elementary method, "the aim of which has been to find a path through most familiar ground up to philological principles"; "Livy—Books I.–X.," with introduction, historical examination, and notes, by Prof. J. R. Seeley—Book I.; and "Elements of Roman Civil Law," by Gaius, with a translation and commentary by Edward Poste, M.A.—an edition of the palimpsest MS. treatise discovered by Niebuhr at Verona in 1816, "partly addressed to law students, and partly to those who consider some initiation in the principles of jurisprudence as an essential part of a liberal education."——The American edition of Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," edited by Professor Hackett and Mr. Ezra Abbot, originally issued as a subscription book, has now been put by the publishers, Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, in the regular trade, and may be bought and ordered like any other book.——Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. announce that Mr. Bayard Taylor will edit for them a "Library of Travel and Adventure," profusely illustrated, and that Drs. Henry B. Smith and Philip Schaff will edit a "Theological and Philosophical Library"—"intended to cover by means of at least one standard book every principal topic under these general heads," and beginning with Ueberweg's "History of Philosophy." A third library—a second series of the "Wonder Library," but mainly edited by American writers—is also in contemplation. The same publishers republish Jowett's "Plato," and have in press a new novel, "Richard Vandermarck," by Mrs. Sidney S. Harris, author of "Rutledge."——Mr. G. Wharton Hammersley, editor of one of the best papers published in Philadelphia, the Germantown Chronicle, has begun an enterprise which has been often undertaken in this country, but heretofore not with flattering success. His weekly Public Opinion is a compilation of the current sentiments of the leading journals in this country and in England, on all topics that interest intelligent readers. It is convenient in size and well printed, and ought to find support.

—Our Chicago exchanges slowly reappear, more or less like their former selves. Among them we are glad to receive again the Chicago Legal News, which, indeed, though its office was burnt out, was issued punctually, with only the difference of a half-sheet. It was more fortunate than some of its contemporaries in saving its subscription list, but sustained a severe loss in its library of nearly two thousand volumes. This paper is remarkable for being edited by a woman, Mrs. Myra Bradwell, and we believe that it is esteemed by the profession as the best law journal in the country. The issue before us thus states the condition of legal matters in Chicago: "The members of the bar are most of them ruined. Not a single law office remains, either in the North or South Divisions of the city. . . . A large number of the members of the bar are without offices, without books, without money, without business, and with no immediate prospect of any. The records of the courts, State and Federal, have been consumed as well as the records and the deeds. . . . Every volume of the library of the Chicago Law Institute, which was the pride of the bar of the West, was destroyed."

—The Schwabe Gallery of Fallen Heroes has been sold in Boston under foreclosure of mortgage. This collection of about a hundred portraits of officers and soldiers was made in part just before the close of the war, and in part very soon after. Mr. L. B. Schwabe, otherwise known as Count Schwabe, appeared as the former of the collection; but we are unable to say what proportion of the whole work was at his own expense. Some of the pictures and some of the frames were paid for, wholly or in part, by the regiments, or families, or companies of the dead, but some were paid for by Mr. Schwabe, as well. During the four days preceding the sale the pictures were on exhibition. Their condition is dreadful; many of them are wholly ruined by the alteration of the colors, and many have their surfaces cracked all to pieces, and are covered with a network of white lines. This may be caused in part by storage in cellars and the like; but it is caused in great part, also, by their bad painting. Many more than half of the pictures in the gallery are absolutely worthless. So bad a collection of paintings can hardly be found elsewhere. It is to be hoped that it will be broken up very speedily. It is now held by the buyer, Mr. Walker, of Chicago, one of the mortgagees, but it ought not to be kept together. It is reported in the Boston papers that the pictures will be valued, and offered at the valuations to the families interested. If in this way the mortgagees can get back their money, and the family of each soldier whose portrait is in the collection can get their picture, and destroy it, it will be well, and one more wholly unsuccessful scheme will thus pass away and be forgotten. Our memories of our soldiers are too precious to be spoiled by association with it.

—On both sides of the water the present season is marked by great dulness in the book trade, and the paucity of notable literary productions or even expectations. Col. Yule's "Marco Polo" is perhaps the most scholarly and exhaustive, as it is, unfortunately, one of the most costly of recent works. Mr. Darwin's promised "Facial Expressions of Animals" is much the most interesting of works yet to come. From both classes we select the following titles: In biography and history, "A Group of Englishmen (1795–1815)," being records of the younger Wedgwoods and their friends, embracing a history of the discovery of photography, by Eliza Meteyard; "Raphael of Urbino and his Father, Giovanni Santi," by J. D. Passavant, with twenty illustrations; "English Artists of the Present Day," essays by various critics, with twelve photographic illustrations; "The Homes of Other Days," a history of domestic manners and sentiments during the Middle Ages, with profuse illustrations from contemporary manuscripts and other sources, by Thomas Wright; "Popular Romances of the Middle Ages," by Geo. W. Cox; and the "History of the Newspaper Press," by James Grant. This last is one of the most amusing specimens of bad writing and commonplace—and plenty of it, as the work is expanded into two volumes—that have appeared in a long time. The author, who was formerly editor of the Morning Advertiser, is not incapable of a sentence like this, for example: "Whoever may have been the author of those letters, this one thing is certain—namely, that his real name was not Junius." There is the usual proportion of works on India: "Eastern Experiences," by Lewin B. Bowring, Lord Canning's Private Secretary; "Western India before and during the Mutinies"—pictures drawn from life—by Maj.-Gen. Sir George Le Grand Jacob; "Wild Men and Wild Beasts," scenes in Indian camp and jungle, by Lieut.-Col. Gordon Cumming; "The Indian Mussulmans: Are they bound in conscience to rebel against the Queen?"—a question of some importance to our British cousins—by W. W. Hunter. With the foregoing Eastern narratives may be classed "Among the Huts in Egypt," scenes from real life, by M. S. Whately; and "The Daughters of Syria," an account of the missionary labors of the late Mrs. Bowen Thompson, edited by the Rev. H. B. Tristram. Illustrated works for the holidays are of good quality, embracing some mentioned above and these others: Carl Werner's "Nile Sketches," mounted fac-similes of the original water-colors, with descriptive text; "Portfolio of Cabinet Pictures," reproduced in colors after Turner, Callcott, Constable, and Birket Foster; "Children in Italian and English Design," by Sidney Colvin, with twelve photographs; "Gems of Dutch Art," twelve photographs from the finest engravings in the British Museum; and "St. George's Chapel, Windsor," in eighteen views by the Woodbury process. A few miscellaneous titles will close our summary: Prof. Jevons's "Theory of Political Economy"; "Spiritualism and Animal Magnetism," by Prof. G. G. Zerffi, a disbeliever in supernatural manifestations; "The Southern States since the War," by Robert Somers; "Lord Bantam," by the author of "Ginx's Baby"; "China's Place in Philology," by the Rev. Joseph Edkins, of Peking; "The Slaves, their Ethnology, Early History, and Popular Traditions," by W. R. Morfill; and a "Catalogue of Dictionaries and Grammars of the Principal Languages of the World" (which can be obtained without difficulty)—a very useful compilation which we owe to Mr. Trübner.

—The Cornhill Magazine for October contains a very interesting and ably written article, called "Notes on Flying and Flying Machines," perhaps by a member of the Aëronautical Society—for it seems that such a society exists in England. The four conditions of the problem of air-navigation—buoyancy, extent of supporting surface, propulsion power, and elevating power—are briefly but suggestively discussed, and the following conclusion arrived at; "Iron and steam have given man the power of surpassing the speed of the swiftest of four-footed creatures—the horse, the greyhound, and the antelope. We have full confidence that the same useful servants place it in man's power to outvie in like manner the swiftest of winged creatures—the swallow, the pigeon, and the hawk." Most persons will probably be surprised to learn that the wing-surface of flying creatures is not proportioned to their weight, but to the surface of their bodies; that, for example, "the sparrow, which weighs 339 times less than the Australian crane, possesses seven times more relative [supporting] surface"; and that man, consequently, if his muscles were only adapted for the work, would need about such wings as are "commonly assigned to angels by sculptors and painters." The writer seems to be of opinion that buoyancy is much less a desideratum in a flying-machine than equipoise, without which the sustaining force of the air (in resistance of gravity) cannot be made available for swift horizontal flight; and he observes of constructions thus far proposed, that "in nine cases out of ten (if not in all) the machine would be as likely to travel bottom upwards as on an even keel." He does not make any allusion to the most promising invention yet tried in this country—the Californian "Avitor"—which secures, by means of a cigar-shaped balloon, enough buoyancy to just overcome gravity, and relies on machinery for elevation and propulsion. Possibly, however, he had it in mind when he penned the sentence just quoted. The "Aërial Steam Navigation Company," which has allowed two years to elapse since the trial of its model "steamer," ought to make some report of its progress, for the comfort of those who believe in the ultimate success of aëronautics.

—Art and the Portfolio for October, which are sent us by Brentano, are both of less than ordinary interest. Art is the more permanently valuable of the two, by reason of its very clear copy of Albert Dürer's print of St. Eustachius; but what is the use of giving, now and then, a masterpiece like this, when the general run of illustrations is drawn from such commonplaces as "La Bella Giardiniera" of Gordigiani, or such worthless productions as the Hélène of Clesinger? From an editor who can find nothing better than things like these to give his subscribers, not much in the way of instructive writing is to be looked for, and we are not surprised, therefore, to find the letterpress of little worth. The writing in the Portfolio is more seriously instructive, though we must record our inability to read Mr. William B. Scott's English. Either his ideas are not clear, or he totally lacks the power to express them. His page of illustrations from Blake, in the July number of the Portfolio, was a valuable contribution, however. We wish the article in the October number, on "The Domestic Furniture of the Eighteenth Century," could have been illustrated. Such an essay is almost without value unless accompanied by copies of the designs criticised. The Art Journal is very barren this month, but it is never of any great value as an artistic authority or treasure-house, It appeals essentially to the average English art-manufacturer, and to the people who look upon him and his doings with admiration.

—They are discussing in some of the London newspapers and journals the question of a national theatre; whether there cannot be established in the city of London, either by means of a stock company, or by a Government subsidy, a theatre where the best of the old plays, and the best plays that can be written by Englishmen to-day, shall be acted in the best possible manner. The recent visit of the admirable company of the Théâtre Français to London, where they have been very successful, and where they are much missed since their return to Paris, would seem to have set our cousins to thinking whether they cannot have an institution of the same sort in their own country. M. Planché, Mr. Tom Taylor, Mr. R. H. Horne, and Mr. Godwin, the editor of the Builder, have all been writing, and it seems as if something might come of it. One writer suggests that London will never have anything so good as the Français unless it be insisted on that no play shall be accepted in the ideal institution that has been written by a professional dramatic critic, and that no professional actor shall ever write criticisms upon theatrical performances.

—The Revue des Deux Mondes for September 15 contains the first part of an account, by his lifelong friend Guizot, of the late Duc de Broglie (Achille-Léonce-Victor-Charles, Duc de Broglie, born at Paris, November 28, 1785; died at Paris, January 26, 1870). It is not so much a notice of the Duke's whole life as of that part of it after Guizot became intimately acquainted with him—the Duke being at that time thirty-three years of age and Guizot thirty-one—and until they both withdrew from active political life. M. Victor Cherbuliez continues his novel, "The Revenge of Joseph Noirel." M. Charles Broillard contributes a valuable article on the growing scarcity of wood for building and manufacturing purposes (have we a term equivalent to the French "bois d'œuvre"?) all the world over. M. Edmond Planchut continues his "Round the World in One Hundred and Twenty Days," begun in the number for September 1st. M. Mézières endeavors to tell us the truth about the "Blockade of Metz," and arrives at a conclusion strongly condemnatory of Bazaine, expressed, however, in very temperate and dignified terms. The Revue contains the usual political chronicle and book-notices. Subscribers are informed that the numbers for the end of 1870 and the beginning of 1871, of which, in consequence of the two blockades of Paris, there was only printed a small edition, and which could not be distributed to outside subscribers, are now ready.

—It is hardly necessary to call the attention of the readers of the Revue to the story of Victor Cherbuliez, "La Revanche de Joseph Noirel," which has just been finished in the number of Oct. 1. There may be others, however, who will gladly hear of a new novel from his pen, and one which is in many respects—in fact, upon the whole—the best that he has yet written. Even "Prosper Randoce," with all its subtlety, is not so interesting. In that story our chief interest centres upon Didier, who, even if he is not a pathological study, comes so near it that the book will seem to many more interesting than admirable. "Ladislas Bolski" is one of the cleverest novels one can find in a long summer's day, but even this falls below this last story, which is not only quite as clever but far more poetical. Nowhere has Cherbuliez drawn a character so fascinating as "Marguerite." The way in which she is represented, first as a young girl at home, as charming and lovely as possible, then married and in trouble, but growing in fascination as in character with every affliction, retaining in spite of all her suffering her wonderful innocence and purity, warrants us in declaring that Cherbuliez has shown here a power which, previously, it was only in one's power to predict. To draw a charming woman is no light task; Cherbuliez has done it not only with the cleverness with which he gave us Didier's self-analysis and Ladislas Bolski's fiery passion—a quality in which, by the way, he stands almost alone—but with a pathos and sympathy far superior to any such cheap gift as cleverness. While Marguerite stands first in merit, Joseph is not to be forgotten; indeed, there is no weakness shown in the treatment of any of the characters. The plot, which for the last three months has been baffling the readers of the Revue, is one of the sort in which Cherbuliez delights, it being complex and not to be easily unriddled, but yet one not too heavy for its author—he is never weighed down by its demands, it seems to trouble him as little as the utterance of one of his numerous witticisms. Some of the descriptions, as, for example, that of the old castle, and the meeting between Joseph and Marguerite in the snow, are models of beauty. One of the peculiarities of Cherbuliez's novels is evident in this, namely, their joyousness in spite of a tragic end—we hope the reader will pardon us for throwing even so much light upon the plot; it tells him but little. This quality seems to us one of the greatest an author can have: to give us sadness, but yet, without cheap consolation, to leave in our minds the impression that there is something beyond it, something which no sadness can touch—a state of mind which is neither hope nor indifference, but the certainty of the grandeur of the world outside of our own petty misery. This Cherbuliez has done. If this praise seems fulsome, we hope that the fault-finders will read the novel, which will soon, of course, appear in book-form. The admirers of Cherbuliez do not need this advice.

—Nature quotes from the Revue Universelle the statement that "the German Empire, in acquiring an extended frontier from France, has traced the new boundary line not from a topographical plan, but, in all probability, from a geological map edited at Berlin. In fact, it is to be observed that the new boundaries between France and Germany absorb, for the benefit of the Empire, all the rich deposits of the mines of oölitic iron-ore in the basins of the Moselle and the Meurthe, with the exception of the Longwy group. Save this, which has been reserved, Germany has made herself mistress of the larger portion of the best part of the most important mineral beds in France. These beds extend under the vast plateau which forms the east of the departments of Moselle and Meurthe, and crop out in the valleys from Longwy, in the north, as far as Pont St. Vincent, Meurthe, in the south, and comprise a full quarter of the mineral riches of France. The new determination of boundaries will have the effect of introducing into the productive industry of Germany, according to the statistics of 1867, 23 blast-furnaces, capable of producing 205,000 tons of metal; 9,000 hectares of iron country, yielding 500,000 tons; 14 iron-works, turning out 127,000 tons; and 22,000 hectares of coal-field, from which can be got 180,000 tons of coal." If this be true, the French have evidently been "betrayed" again.

—In the Chinese Recorder for July, lately received, we find for the first time an authentic statement of the missionary regulations proposed by the Chinese authorities. A former incorrect report of the contents of this important document has furnished a text for a very general denunciation of the retrogressive policy of the Chinese Government, the justice of which, in the light of the present version, is not so clear. That these regulations are directed mainly against the Roman Catholic missions appears both from the general nature of the acts which they are designed to restrain and from the preamble, in which the "religion of the Lord of Heaven," as the Roman Catholic faith is termed, is expressly distinguished from the "religion of Jesus," or the Protestant faith; and the fear is expressed that, in case of an outbreak, the latter also might suffer, the ignorant multitude not being able to distinguish between them. We are not to suppose that the Government is particularly friendly to Protestant missions, but neither the manner in which they are conducted, nor the small number of converts, compared with those of the Roman Catholic missions, is calculated to arouse in anything like the same degree the hostility of a people which, in matters of religion, is rather indifferent than intolerant. Against the Roman Catholics, on the other hand, their grievances are many and serious, and to the truth of some of them, e.g., the state and authority assumed by the missionaries in the interior provinces, we have as unimpeachable witnesses the missionaries themselves. The following extracts from the preamble put the Chinese side of the question very forcibly:

"When an outbreak occurs, foreigners think only of force to repress it, caring little how they can convince and win the minds of the people, and thereby secure lasting harmony. But the repression of these evils can best be brought about by mutual deliberation, with a full knowledge of the facts; and this is proposed by the members of the Government as the means most likely to secure friendly relations between China and other countries. They have learned that missionaries in other countries get along quietly, making it plain that there must be some rules, and that both they and their converts conform to the usages of these lands; and do not, as in China, arrogate to themselves the state and dignity of officials, oppose the orders of the local rulers, and incite animosity by injuring the people. . . . To have a number of foreigners in the country acting in this independent way is to have so many enemies in the land, and the consequences of such conduct will necessarily ere long produce evils which neither party can repress nor endure. The question is one of the greatest moment to all countries having dealings with China, and the foreign ministers should most carefully consider it in all its bearings. If they decline to come to some arrangement, they cannot excuse themselves, in case another rising should occur, that they had not been made aware of the merits and hazards of the subject; these eight rules are, therefore, now put forward for them carefully to examine."

—The substance of these rules, each of which is followed by a note explaining more fully the nature of the evils which it is designed to remedy and giving in some cases individual examples, is the following:

1. The orphan asylums, if not closed altogether, should at least receive only the children of converts, and the number, ages, etc., of all admitted should be reported to the authorities. The secrecy hitherto observed, and the refusal to allow parents to see their children when once admitted, have caused much suspicion.

2. Chinese women shall not be allowed to visit the churches, nor Sisters of Charity to act as missionaries; both these practices offending against Chinese ideas of propriety.

3. Missionaries should respect the laws of the country, and not set themselves up as independent, nor interfere in behalf of their converts with the execution of the laws. The Government cannot excuse these converts from the payment of taxes or other civil duties, nor can the missionaries release them from the obligation.

4. Missionaries are not to interfere in criminal cases to screen their converts from punishment, nor demand indemnity where punishment has been inflicted.

5. Passports issued to French missionaries are not to be transferred to natives, or to be otherwise improperly used.

6. The character which the converts have previously borne should be carefully enquired into; frequent reports should be made to the authorities of all persons admitted, and any subsequently convicted of crime should be excommunicated. It is charged that criminals frequently join the sect for the sake of the political protection afforded.

7. Missionaries are not to use official seals, or write official despatches to the native authorities, but in their intercourse with the officials are to observe the etiquette prescribed for native scholars.

8. No claim shall hereafter be set up for lands on the ground that they once belonged to the Roman Catholic Church, and in future, when lands or houses are bought or leased for church purposes, the transaction must be public, and the deed must be executed in the name of the church.

The document adds in conclusion that these form only a portion of the grievances against the Roman Catholics; that the Government has no desire to destroy or persecute this faith; but unless some remedy is found for these evils, there is great danger that the indignation of the people will break out in excesses which the Emperor cannot restrain. That this is not an imaginary danger we have recent evidence in the disturbances at Fatshan, in the province of Kwantung, which the vigorous action of the Government only prevented from being in its issue, as it was in design, another Tientsin affair. Reports were spread of certain pills, said to be distributed by foreigners, which caused a mysterious swelling of the body, only to be relieved by embracing Christianity. The excitement reached Canton, and there was at one time imminent danger of an attack on the foreign quarter.

SUBURBAN HOME GROUNDS.*

Not one in a thousand, probably, of all those who, in this country, every year set about the preparation of a suburban home for their families, can readily obtain the aid of a landscape-gardener, properly so called. To those who cannot, Mr. Frank J. Scott, of Toledo, Ohio, undertakes to give elementary instruction in the art, which he defines to be that of "creating lovely examples of landscape in miniature," but which, in its application o such small spaces of ground as he has more particularly in view, might, perhaps, better be stated to be that of preparing agreeable passages of andscape scenery. This work is in two parts, the first relating to questions of site, extent, plan, and method; the second, to the special qualities for landscape planting of each of several hundred trees and shrubs. The two parts are of about equal bulk, and might very well have been bound apart; together, they form an inconveniently heavy volume. The advice given in the first part is copious and distinct, and may be understood and applied by most town-bred men. The principles of art are freshly, if incompletely, stated, and although a new and elaborate series of symbols is used, the numerous illustrative plans, upon which it is evident that much study has been spent, are intelligible and instructive.

In one respect, Mr. Scott abandons the usage of the established authorities, and adopts, to the fullest extent, what he regards as an improved, popular American practice. It has generally been thought desirable by the older landscape gardeners, in forming their plans, that certain objects standing outside the ground placed under their control should be given a greater apparent distance, or, perhaps, without entire concealment, should be rendered partially obscure from points of view within it. For this purpose, a plantation is generally laid out along the boundary which s designed eventually to establish a verdant middle distance in the landscape. Perhaps still more frequently, it has been desired to shut out completely objects which were originally in view, but which were discordant with more important landscape elements nearer the points of view, in which case plantations have been planned with the design of forming complete new backgrounds. Skilful use of boundary plantations for these purposes was originally made by Kent and his immediate associates and successors, but the practice being followed, in a mechanical way, by the famous Brown and other stupid pretenders, gave rise to "the belt," so unmercifully ridiculed by Uvedale Price in his prolonged discussion with Repton and others. Mr. Scott uses no boundary plantations, and, unless to shut out some special deformity, would merge the surface of his grounds with whatever may lie beyond them. He would do without a fence if he could, and, not being allowed to, would have it as nearly as possible transparent. It may be said for his plans that, in attempting to secure even miniature passages of landscape of a complete character within the usual limits of a suburban building lot, the inexperienced planter would be so likely to run into fussy confusion, that it would almost always be better for him to accept whatever objects there may be on or across the street or boundary as primary matters of interest, and that the main motive of his planting should be to gain elegance of foreground only. There is a sweet passage in the last work of Repton in which he justifies the pleasure he had taken in a design of this simple character. But Mr. Scott argues that the practice of planting closely along the boundary is a bad conventionalism, handed down from a period of "rude improvements and ruder men"; that it is a peculiarity of English gardening, which "it would be as unfortunate to follow as to imitate the surly self-assertion of English travelling manners"; and, finally, that not to lay our private grounds open to the public gaze is ill-bred, inhospitable, unneighborly, and unchristian (pp. 51 and 61).

* "The Art of Beautifying Suburban Home Grounds of small extent, etc., etc. Illustrated by upwards of two hundred plates and engravings of plans for residences and their grounds, of trees and shrubs, and garden embellishments, with descriptions of the beautiful and hardy shrubs grown in the United States. By Frank J. Scott." New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1870.

We are confident that Mr. Scott, in the passages to which we refer, has got upon a wrong road, and as he has, in general, evidently studied his way with care, we are anxious to see what has led him astray. On reflection, it appears to us that so far as there is a distinct American practice in the respect indicated, it has grown out of the fact that the motive of what Mr. Scott calls home grounds in this country has hitherto been, in most cases, almost exclusively a motive of decoration. They have been designed to be looked upon from a window, or from the street; much less generally than in Europe to be familiarly and frequently occupied and lived in. The difference of custom in this respect has been often remarked, and generally attributed to differences of climate. We are disposed, however, to think that it should be connected with a considerable series of tolerably well-marked distinctions, now passing away, with which climate has had little to do—with habits of more constant, more desultory, and, with individuals, more varied labor; with the habit of looking with suspicion upon anything tending to withdraw attention from productive occupations, unless it were to distinctly religious exercises; with the customs which have forced young people generally to seek social enjoyment much more apart from their parents than is thought necessary, desirable, or prudent, in old countries; and, in short, with many direct results of the necessary privations and hardships of the pioneer period. It is not impossible, even in this country, with patience, ingenuity, and skill, to establish conditions under which, while engaged in many common domestic occupations, we may spend a good deal of time out of doors, but it is much more difficult than in the old countries, and while our emigrating fathers had their full stent to keep the wolf and savage from their doors, it is not surprising that they did not undertake the task. Their houses were commonly built, at most, with but two doors, of which one opened upon a working yard, always more or less blocked up with logs saved for fuel or timber, and the larger implements of the farm, the other upon the trail, which afterwards became a high road or village street. After a certain period, some one in each neighborhood would acquire an enviable distinction by "slicking up" a place, and planting some slips of lilac or poplar, obtained from the older settlements, or perhaps direct from the mother country. The most available ground for such a purpose was just within the door opposite the working yard, where, accordingly, to protect the plants from cattle, a space would be fenced in. As a better class of houses were substituted for the original cabins, with increasing security and prosperity, front-door yards increased in number, until, at length, the distinction was reversed, and it became almost disreputable in many districts to live in a house without such an appendage. The notion of furnishing them with broad, clean, smooth floors of gravel, or carpets of fine, close turf, with sewing and reading seats; of coaxing nature to decorate their convenience, or protect them from sun and wind, or to give them any degree of seclusion or coziness: or of ever using them as al-fresco parlors, or tea-rooms, or workrooms, or kindergartens, was not at all entertained. Regarded simply as ornaments of the house front, or as badges of respectability, like chaises and green blinds, it would have been folly to hide them behind walls, hedges, or thickets.

Between home-grounds of this class, however enlarged and improved, and the characteristic miniature pleasure-grounds of the suburban villas of any part of Europe, there can be no comparison. The private planting of public roadsides, and the contribution of a small piece of decorated ground in front of every dwelling to public use, is an excellent custom; and, in contrast with it, the habit of regarding the highway as a strictly government or parish affair, and its improvement in any respect as no man's private concern, and the somewhat stern and often rude face which suburban homes often present to the street in Europe, seems churlish and clownish. But between this extreme and that of forbidding all family privacy out of doors, there is a wide range. Croquet is doing something to unsettle the traditional idea that the only use of a home-ground is to set off the house; but few among us yet suspect how much time can be spent profitably, agreeably, and healthfully, or how large a share of our ordinary household duties, as well as our recreations, can be attended to in the open air, provided we have grounds suitably arranged and furnished.

There is reason for questioning whether women in this country are not gradually becoming disqualified for much enjoyment of nature. We have spent some months in a neighborhood so famed for its landscape beauty that it was, at the time, visited by hundreds of strangers. Notwithstanding the fact that there were the most inviting groves, ravines, and mountains on all sides, far and near, that the temperature was generally agreeably cool, and the walks in several directions not at all difficult, it was rare to meet women on foot a mile away from the houses at which they were staying; rare to meet them out of doors at all dressed otherwise than as for church or a shopping expedition in Broadway. In their driving and sailing, it was obviously the social opportunity, not the scenery, that was sought. A flower in the grass, a bunch of ash-keys, a birch trunk, the bark of which suggested the making of a house ornament, the most commonplace objects thus associated with indoor life, would at once take, and completely withhold, attention from the finest view. To have been once upon a certain road, or to a certain point, was a reason for not going there again. We have seen also, recently, seven carloads of people wait at Suspension Bridge, the greater part all the time in their seats, for half an hour of a fine autumn afternoon, but two of the whole number, and these men, taking the trouble to step the length of the train ahead, where, instead of the gloom of the station-house, there was a view that would repay a voyage across the Atlantic. To be sure, the greater number had been over the road, and had seen it before, from the car-windows, as they passed the bridge. Not one in a hundred of the women who can command a carriage in the Central Park has ever been in the Ramble; not one in a thousand has cared to walk in it twice. This lack of interest in nature is not often found in Europe except among the lowest peasantry. The vulgarest Englishwomen make at least an effort to appear superior to it, and they cannot do this without benefiting their children. At places of resort in Great Britain and Germany which may be compared with that we have referred to, go where we would, within a good half-day's walk, we have always found scores of women and girls, many of them showing by their attitude and occupation that they were not only really enjoying but studying nature with earnestness and deliberation. If there is such a defect, and it is growing upon us, how is it to be accounted for? We are inclined to think that the too exclusively indoor life, with intervals of church, lecture-room, and street, to which the better part of our women have been hitherto led, tends to disqualify them for observing truly, and consequently for enjoying, the beauty of nature on a large scale. With constant training of his faculties, no artist feels that he can appreciate or fully enjoy a landscape the first time or the first hour that he looks upon it.

Our American homes are, in some respects, the best for women in the world, but they are far from faultless, and they do not, in all respects, compare favorably, class for class, with those of the Old Country; and the weakest point of our suburban and rural homes is their lack of open-air family apartments, adapted to the climate and other conditions of our country—pieces of ground designed not so much to form pretty pictures from the windows, and thus add to our wall decorations, or from the street, and thus add to our cheap and showy house-fronts, but to be enjoyed from their own interior; to be occupied and lived in as an integral part of the home, as the grounds of Old-Country homes so much more commonly are. In suburban building-lots of the ordinary dimensions, the space between the building line, established by a good custom, if not by law, and the street is not often a suitable one to be used for this purpose, while the limited space in the rear of the house is commonly required for other necessary purposes. Mr. Scott urges that building-lots should generally be laid off twice the depth they usually are; but his plans are adapted to the customary conditions, and the question of attempting to secure family privacy out of doors by means of close plantations, under these artificial conditions, may, as we have already admitted, be considered as an open one. We simply protest against the principle involved in his argument. His work is intended and adapted to have a large influence in cultivating out-of-door habits and a love of nature, and the apparently unqualified support given in such passages as we have cited of a common prejudice against out-of-door domestic privacy is the more to be regretted.

In the second part, some seven hundred species and varieties of trees and shrubs are enumerated, and, as far as practicable, their landscape qualities indicated. The report made in regard to many of the acquisitions of the last twenty years is the best that we have seen; and it is gratifying to observe that, in numerous instances, it is based on observations of specimens found in our public grounds. In regard to many novelties, the mature character of which in this climate cannot be known for some years to come, we are glad to notice a commendable and unusual caution observed. The foliage of many of the new conifers, which is most attractive while they are in the sapling stage, changes character so greatly when they begin to bear seed, as to render them quite valueless for home plantations. With regard to shrubs, Mr. Scott truly says that if half a dozen of the commonest of the old kinds are thrown out of the long and bewildering series named in the catalogues of the great foreign nurseries, we shall find it difficult to select as many that will be their equals in beauty of form, foliage, or bloom. But it should be known also that, notwithstanding the number of high-priced and far-fetched novelties now offered, for some of the bushes that are of the highest value for landscape planting, we shall ask both our own and the foreign dealers in vain. We must look them up, as Mr. Scott shows that he has done, in our woodland pastures and along our neglected roadsides.

Of each part of Mr. Scott's work it may be said that it is the most valuable of its class that has been published in America since Mr. Downing's "Landscape Gardening."

SOME NEBULOUS PROCEEDINGS.*

The American Association for the Advancement of Science is among the best supported of our scientific societies, being not only the largest in numbers, but one of the very few able to publish an annual volume of proceedings with the current contributions of its members. Founded in 1848, it bore upon its rolls nearly all the names most illustrious in American science. It was the chosen assembly before which the highest problems of science were discussed, and to which such men as Agassiz, Bache, Henry, Peirce, and Silliman communicated their choicest investigations. At first, membership was, we believe, somewhat select, being confined to the ranks of the known cultivators of science and learning. For several years respectability, if not eminence, in some branch of knowledge continued to be a condition of membership. But the standard then began to be lowered, and, as every batch of new members admitted had a voice in subsequent elections, it continued to drop, until nothing was required but social respectability. We are not sure but that even this requirement is now abandoned in favor of willingness to pay the admission-fee.

We do not object to any of these steps, except the last. The number who, by properly combined effort, can do something for the advancement of knowledge is very great. Nor do we think such an association has anything to fear from the introduction of men of high character sufficiently intelligent and educated to appreciate a scientific discussion. There are few speakers to whom a large audience is not more attractive than a small one, and a certain attendance is necessary to give a meeting that social interest which forms one of its chief attractions. But there is a class who form the pest of all our scientific associations, and, indeed, of every learned society the world over which does not sit with closed doors, and who ought to be rigidly excluded. We refer to a class of sciolists, who, possessing no knowledge of the facts or principles of science, or the methods of scientific investigation, except what they have picked up from antiquated school-books, are yet anxious to gain a temporary notoriety by reading long papers before the Association. They form a not uninteresting study in human nature. The subjects to which they seem to take naturally are the nebular hypothesis and the constitution of the ethereal medium. They are never known to observe any fact in the realm of nature, or to attempt an investigation of any natural law. Their Pegasus stoops not to such drudgery. His fields are the celestial spaces, where he disports, untrammelled, amid ether, atoms, and nebulæ. In spite of every precaution, the Association frequently finds itself compelled, through courtesy, to listen to the lucubrations of these charlatans. Fortunately, one of the rules requires the printing only of such papers as are approved by the "standing committee," and no notice, "even by title," is taken of papers not approved. By this rule the lucubrations in question have hitherto been kept from circulating beyond the limits of the local newspaper, and the society has not been compromised. But we now find, from the volume before us, that every rule has become insufficient to prevent the publication of a mass of matter most discreditable to the Association.

After a couple of very short papers, we meet Mr. Jacob Ennis with "The Discovery of the Force which originally imparted all their Motions to all the Stars." His periods are smoothly rounded, but we have searched in vain for anything like a "discovery." We find only a commonplace account of many things, possible and impossible, which he thinks might have happened while the universe was condensing from a supposed nebulous mass, not one of which can be proved. A regard for Mr. Ennis's reputation for intelligence and sanity prevents our making illustrative quotations from his paper. In all, thirty-four pages are occupied by Mr. Ennis and Mr. L. Bradley with baseless speculation about "Matter and Force," "Ether," "Nebula," "Motion," "Nebular Rotation," etc., without advancing a fact, principle, or idea of interest to any seeker after knowledge. When we reached "Aurora Borealis," by L. Bradley, we hoped for something better, because the spectroscope has shown that the aurora must be something more than electricity moving through rarified air, as was formerly supposed. But, far from being able to throw any light on the question, Mr. Bradley does not seem acquainted with the existence of spectroscopic observations, and the most important thing he does is to collect a few of the older and more doubtful suppositions, at second-hand, to support an untenable theory of his own. When the scientific investigator has to deal with forces, he is under the disagreeable restriction of allowing them to act only in accordance with their own laws, while the writers referred to have the happy faculty of making them do anything that may be required. Thus, Mr. H. F. Walling not only ignores the law demonstrated by Newton, that a solid body cannot be formed by gravitation between its particles, but dispenses with impenetrability and repulsion as properties of matter, making gravitation do everything!

For vacuous writing and independence of grammar the palm must be awarded to Mr. S. J. Wallace's paper on "Elasticity as a Feature in Physics," unless, as we suspect, Mr. Wallace be some humorist who has been hoaxing the learned body, with the aid of a technical dictionary. His division of springs into "fluent springs" and "compress springs" gives color to this suspicion, as every one knows that such puns are not knowingly admitted into the transactions of learned societies. We can hardly imagine a more earthy subject than elasticity in ordinary bands. But it carries Mr. Wallace through the ether at a rate that leaves Ennis and Bradley behind. For example:

"In Vacuity. There are two forces, gravity and radiance, which pass the interstellar space with forcible fulness and variety. Their passage is by far the most rapid of known actions, and shows no change of directions, and no loss or change of kind, of the forces, and other clear facts. These give important elements of the problem. They require of vacuity the highest possible condition of substance for conveying force with rapidity and purity: the free motion of a body in space, the most pure transmission of force; and there is no known limit to its possible speed through vacancy. But, as the interstellar space contains continuous actions in an infinitude of directions, there must be interminable interferences. This becomes a feature of the problem, and requires a review of the essential and potential terms involved."

He concludes a dozen such flights by alighting on the earth in this tame fashion:

"Conclusion. If gravity and its congeners—adhesion, cohesion, mass-motion, and, perhaps, others—as principals, and the other forces as secondaries, all interchangeable, with different degress of facility, hold masses of matter together, or in particular states, by constant action, as reviewed in these statements and suppositions; then we have a basis for the theory of elastic action, but requiring yet the laws to be developed and discovered."

Nearly half that part of the volume devoted to physical science is taken up with the matter we have reviewed. When we pronounce it discreditable to American science, it must not be supposed that we are measuring it by a high standard. Not one of the papers referred to can, from the most liberal standpoint, be regarded as a contribution to any department of knowledge. In no respect do they rise above the average standard of a village lyceum, except, possibly, in smoothness of diction and fertility of imagination; and here they can be outdone by the productions of any respectable trance medium. We hope the leading members of the Association will do something to prevent its falling into the public contempt which inevitably awaits it if the standard of its proceedings continues as low as is indicated by the present volume.

Lectures on the Study and Practice of the Law. By Emory Washburn, LL.D., Bussey Professor of Law. (Boston: Little & Brown. 1871.)—Mr. Washburn's object is not to show from books what legal learning is so much as to offer hints upon its acquisition and practical use, derived from his own experience and observation. He aims at something more useful than a manual of reading or an essay on professional ethics. And he gains his end, without formal didactics, in illustrating the routine of a young lawyer's everyday work, point by point, by the principle and self-respect that ought to inspire it. The fact of speaking literally ex cathedrâ perhaps disinclines the author to press earnestly the advantages of schools as a means of legal training. There may be deeper reasons, drawn from historic analogy, than any he suggests, why the usage of ancient states in that respect should become general among us. Since the days of Rome, even after the Republic, there has been no country in which lawyers took the lead in public affairs as they do in ours, and therefore none in which their complete education is so peculiarly a matter of concern for the state. England, with her sharp division of the profession into classes, knows nothing of law-schools. In Germany, the necessary preparatory course at a gymnasium ensures the mental discipline which so many students of law on entering our schools want. But any one who considers the headlong haste with which young Americans rush into active life, and their utterly false and foolish theories of the honor due to "self-educated" men, must admit their vital need of institutions that will give them definite and comprehensive ideas of legal science, and a just estimate of their own powers as compared with those of others. Besides, the misleading attractions of political life for our young lawyers do not need to be heightened by contrast with the dulness and narrowness of solitary reading or office-training.

* "Proceedings of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. Nineteenth meeting, held at Troy, N. Y., August, 1870." Cambridge: Published by Joseph Lovering. 1871.

Teaching how to study, and what to study, is the chief use of a law-school, and of these topics the lecturer's treatment is full, apt, and direct. Instead of prescribing the catalogue of a library, he shows the pupil how to choose one for himself, and use it with judgment when chosen. After the sound advice to buy all the best books possible before anything else, he leads the young practitioner carefully, with encouragement and warning at every step, through all the variety of work in court and office to which the early years are likely to call him. His precepts for the practice are directed exactly to the points in which a beginner most needs the light of experience, and the illustrative anecdotes are pertinent and new. He inculcates a just contempt for mere fluency, enforcing the effectiveness with juries of logic, plain statement, even temper, and fair dealing. And he dwells encouragingly on the assured results, from constant habit, of confidence, facility, and even a fair degree of oratorical power. Of course, the occasion is not lost for condemning caucus-made judges, and simplifying codes, with their sixty attendant volumes of practice reports. The chapters on the examination of witnesses are full of practical counsel, especially in regard to the testimony of experts, of whose fallibility the attentive reader of New York cases will recall some strange instances. But we confess surprise at the statement, which will hardly command general assent, that intelligent women make the best witnesses, although the sex in New England may possibly be "privileged beyond the common walk of life" in respect to unprejudiced accuracy.

Most clever youths loftily accept the sheepskin from our colleges with a conviction that the world is waiting for them, and they have only to step into their place. These lectures, if they fail to teach modesty beforehand, will soften the shock of disappointment on learning that the business world cares nothing for diplomas, and will keep their owners waiting long years for the proof of their qualities. They will show how patience may be well employed, and the first steps to success wisely taken. Even the greater part of practitioners, if not too old to unlearn, may gain from them useful hints as to conduct. If the high standard this volume holds up is closely copied, the legal profession in America will not need to wait a generation for the recovery of its ancient prestige and influence.

Behind the Veil. By the Author of "Six Months Hence." (Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1871.)—In spite of its melodramatic title, and a certain amount of melodrama in the action, with a mysterious murder in Australia, and consequent suspicions and complications, this is an interesting novel. And just those parts are best for which the author apologizes. The simplicity and charm of the family life, the attractiveness of the girls, the manliness of the boys, in short, the whole account of this simple, domestic, innocent household is much more entertaining, because evidently drawn from the life, than the unravelling of mysterious murders in the bush of Australia. The love passages are not particularly well done. The lovers misunderstand one another persistently, and nearly die of broken hearts when a single word would have set all right, in a way that people in the flesh can seldom be accused of doing. This is more especially true of the younger sister and Mr. Beresford. There was some excuse for the others. As for the men, we think we can recognize in the way in which they are described a woman's hand, in spite of the use of "he" and "him" in the preface. The astounding declaration of love on page 83 was never written by a man, or, if it was, he is very simple. Mr. Beresford and Noel have such curious arrogance in their manners, such a way of pretentious bullying towards the poor women, who seem awe-struck by their mysteriousness—they are, in short, so much less well drawn than the two girls—that there can be but little doubt on the subject. But be that as it may, the novel on the whole is worth reading, more, perhaps, from what it promises than from what it gives us. If the writer will not search heaven and earth for horrors, but will record the calmer scenes of life with which she is more familiar, she will be able to give us very readable novels. There are, too, faults of style which it would be well to avoid. For instance: "A solitary figure moving along the track, carrying something. Time enough to observe what, dusk as it is; for the burden is heavy, and the motion slow in proportion," etc. This is too much like Walt Whitman to be commended.

The Last Knight. A Romance Garland. From the German of Anastasius Grün. Translated, with notes, by John O. Sargent. (New York: Hurd & Houghton, 1871.)—There is something about poetical translations of second-rate books which demands the indulgence of the critic. They hardly make any further claim than that of exhibiting a certain amount of leisure and dexterity with the pen on the part of the translator; and in this case the analogy which is pointed out between the change in Germany during the last year and the subject of this poem is extremely vague, hardly strong enough to tempt the most ardent admirer of German principles. Then, too, a poem of remote wars, written in the enthusiasm of the year 1830, by an author who is said to belong to the school of Heine, but who shows unmistakably that Heine's fame as a poet will outlast that as a teacher, and translated with such an occasional lack of the true poetic fire as is shown in the following lines:

> "By his bedside Convalescence, the beautiful matron, stood,
> Kissed him on the cheek and forehead, and staunched the flowing blood.
> Without, a harp once sounded in the evening twilight dim,
> And thus the winds of the Occident wafted the song to him:
> 'From many an arrow woman the heart of the loved one shields,
> And but when the storm is over to the flood of suffering yields;
> So the hero beckons his army where danger and glory be, such a poem, we say, needs no earnest denunciations against indiscreet admiration. The public is unwilling enough of itself to be taught history when it demands amusement, and it is always cold enough about the best translations to avoid those which are of inferior importance. This translation is accurate; and if it is often unpoetical, that is as much the fault of Grün as of the translator. German is a language in which it is so easy to write poetry that is poor, but yet bears a strong resemblance in form to really good poetry, that the original has a certain likeness in the simplicity of its words and constructions to what Heine did so much towards introducing into German poetry. But that is only the husk; the poem lacks interest, wit, and, in a word, poetry. For the printing, we can praise the publishers. In this respect, the original is surpassed. That, however, is no eulogy; let us rather say that this is really a very handsome book.
> Before they bandage his wounds with the banners of victory'"—

Cameos from English History. The Wars in France. By the Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." Second Series. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1871. 12mo, pp. 415.)—Miss Yonge, in transferring her energies from fiction to history, has carried with her at least one most serviceable quality from her former field of labor. She tells a story remarkably well; and inasmuch as it is from a well-told story that the spirit and manners of an age can be best learned, she has produced a book—a series of stories—from which one can derive a very vivid and accurate idea of the times. Her intention was to bring the work down to the close of the Middle Ages; but her materials so grew upon her hands that the volume covers only the period of the "Hundred Years' Wars"—the last "cameo" being the "Congress of Arras," in 1435. The title cameo is rather a misnomer. It would lead us to expect a series of independent and almost disconnected sketches; whereas, in point of fact, they form a tolerably consecutive narration, with many digressions and episodes, to be sure, but on the whole giving a quite complete history of these wars. The titles of the several "cameos" are attractive and suggestive, if sometimes a little over-romantic, but the chapters are rarely confined to the subject thus indicated, which is only the principal or most interesting topic treated; indeed, in the Table of Contents, each has a date covering something of a period (as "Death of Du Guesclin, 1377–1380"), so as to show that the chapter is really a history of those years.

One must be fresh from all Miss Yonge's special studies to criticise the accuracy of these multitudinous details. So far as we have examined, her work appears to have been the result of conscientious industry. It is no discredit to any one to confound the several Burgundys that puzzle the student of mediæval history; but it may be worth while to notice that (on p. 3) Artois came into the hands not of the Duchess, but the Countess of Burgundy. That is, the Countess Mahault (Matilda) married the ruler of the county (Franche Comté), of Burgundy, which had nothing to do with the Duchy of Burgundy, but was a part of the empire, as the Duchy was a fief of the French crown. This marriage united under one rule the two widely separated counties of Artois and Burgundy; her grand-daughter, their heiress, married Louis, Count of Flanders—the one against whom James van (not von) Artevelde revolted, and who was killed at Cressy; thus was formed that group of provinces, Flanders, Artois, and Franche Comté, which passed to the Dûcal House of Burgundy by the marriage of their heiress to Philip the Bold.

Fine Arts.

MUSIC.

MRS. CHARLES MOULTON'S CONCERTS.

THERE are doubtless very few of our readers who have not at some time heard of Mrs. Charles Moulton. No amateur has made herself so widely or so favorably known. Even while she was still Miss Lillie Greenough, and before she had passed her teens, she was the delight and wonder of many a musical party, both in Cambridge, Boston, and New York. When she went abroad, her studies in this art were taken up with new vigor. Stories of her triumphs, social as well as artistic, were constantly floating about in society. She had become the protégée and friend of the great composers; Rossini and Auber had set the seals of their commendation upon her. She was the companion of an Empress; walked with her, dined with her, skated with her. She was the intimate of princes, and the Emperor of the French never tired of paying her attention.

It is not to be wondered at that, when she came back to this country, society hastened to pay homage to talents so conspicuously honored. Nor is it matter of surprise that one who had used her gifts with such effect before so many private audiences, should desire to step upon a broader stage, and strive for wider and more varied conquest. Of course, an impresario was not long wanting who was willing to guaranty the lady a sum that the most renowned prima donna might be glad to command.

Accordingly, on Monday evening of last week, Mrs. Moulton commenced her professional career. Society, of course, followed her from the drawing-room to the concert hall. Three concerts and a matinee were given in the course of the week, and at all of them the culture, intelligence, and refinement of the city were largely represented. Not only had the singer a multitude of personal friends, but the report of her talents was widespread, and a natural interest was excited in many, who did not know her personally, to hear the famous amateur of whom so many marvellous things had been said, who, it was prophesied, would lend new lustre to American art, and take her place among the foremost singers of the world. Indeed, the programme announced her in anticipation as "America's most gifted songstress," and the pamphlet published in her honor asserts that "Mrs. Moulton unites to a voice of extreme sweetness a soul of fire, and, at the same time, an extreme tenderness and sensibility. She phrases like a master, and she pronounces every language in which she sings so perfectly that we cannot discover her own nationality. Add to all this the most exquisite amiability, the most charming grace, the refinement and grace that are patrician, and the wit of a Parisian, and you will have a feeble outline of the ravishing queen of society whom they call Madame Moulton."

The four concerts of last week furnished a sufficient opportunity to test the accuracy of this somewhat glowing description and to determine the place that Mrs. Moulton will be likely to hold in general critical estimation.

The first thought that probably came into the minds of many of those who then heard Mrs. Moulton for the first time was in regard to the reposeful character of her art. Whoever looked for startling effects was disappointed. That is not the direction in which nature has endowed her. Her effects are quietly produced, and are the results of purity of voice and perfection of method, and not of any phenomenal range or power. Those who look to be astonished by either wealth of voice or intensity of method will look in vain. Mrs. Moulton's art must be enjoyed by giving one's self up in a quiet spirit to the appreciation of beautiful tones beautifully produced. Every phrase will then be found to be charmingly sung, and every passage, however intricate, perfectly vocalized. Work, however, of such fineness is not of the kind that commands most fully popular applause, and we doubt very much whether Mrs. Moulton will be found to possess the quality of talent that most surely excites the enthusiasm of the public. Her voice is neither large, nor powerful, nor vibratory, nor of great compass and extent, and her style is not dramatic. There is nothing electric in her singing, nothing vivid in the color that she gives to the music. Her own manner is calm and dispassionate, and she fails to quicken the pulse of her hearers or to excite any other emotion than that of contentment at the perfection of the art.

We recognize in Mrs. Moulton a voice of delicious softness, rich and warm in its quality—though her singing is not warm—flexible, and under perfect training. She possesses, also, the capacity of singing with demi-voix more perfectly than any other person we have ever heard, together with true intonation and personal characteristics that are in her favor. But, on the other hand, her style, though a highly cultivated one, does not seem to us in the highest sense artistic. That art is only truly noble which subdues the personality of the singer to itself, and puts the sentiment of the music first in importance, the vocalism second, the artist last.

We also find Mrs. Moulton, as an artist, lacking in earnestness of purpose. Miss Wynne, a much inferior singer so far as natural endowments were concerned, through the possession of this quality impresses herself far more strongly upon her audience. Hearing the two singers at the same hall on consecutive evenings, the difference in effect upon their audiences of their ballad-singing could not fail to be remarked. The latter seemed to forget herself, and to desire to impress only her musical thought upon the listeners, the latter to interpose herself between the song and the audience.

Mrs. Moulton is, undoubtedly, a very perfect parlor singer, but her capacities do not seem to have expanded themselves as yet to the limits of the concert-room, and, unless her art deepens and broadens itself, we greatly doubt whether she will meet with those triumphs that her friends have so confidently predicted for her.

TAINE'S ART IN GREECE.

16mo, Cloth (uniform with "Taine's Art in the Netherlands," "Ideal in Art," etc.), $1 25.

GOETHE'S POEMS AND BALLADS.

16mo, cloth (uniform with "King Rene's Daughter," "Nathan the Wise," "Frithiofs Saga," etc., and making No. VII. of the series), $1 50.

The above are just ready, and will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

HOLT & WILLIAMS, Publishers,

25 Bond Street, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE MIGHTY WORKS

OF

OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Meditations from the Works of Augustine, Chrysostom, Bishop Andrews, and other writers.

WITH TWELVE PHOTOGRAPHS

after Raffaelle, Rembrandt, Ary Scheffer, Overbeck, and other Masters.

Small 4to, cloth, gilt and illuminated, $6.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.,

Cooper Union, New York.

LADIES DESIROUS OF LEARNING TO sing in the pure Italian School, will address SIGNOR GIANNETTI, care of Wm. Hall & Son, 751 Broadway.

PRICED CATALOGUE No. 21

OF

ANCIENT AND MODERN BOOKS,

Comprising Standard and Valuable Works in

ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, HISTORY, VOYAGES, TRAVELS, ETC. ETC. ETC.

☞ Just published, and will be forwarded FREE to any address.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,

Dealer in New and Old Books, 17 Astor Place, N. Y.

NEW LAW BOOKS.

DANIELL'S CHANCERY PRACTICE.

FOURTH EDITION.

3 vols. 8vo, law sheep, $22 50.

PLEADING AND PRACTICE

OF THE

HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY.

By E. R. DANIELL, Esq.

Adapted to the present practice of the English Courts, by Thomas Emerson Headlam, M.P. Fourth American Edition, thoroughly revised and corrected, to which are added several entirely new Chapters and copious Notes, suiting the work to American Practice in Chancery, together with Appendix of Forms of all the Proceedings in the Prosecution and Defence of Suits in Chancery, and a Full Collection of Forms of Decrees, collected from the latest and best English Precedents and from the Records of the American Courts. By Hon. J. C. Perkins.

This American Edition of Daniell's Chancery Practice has been adapted to the great and important changes recently made by Acts of Parliament, and Rules and General Orders of Court, in the Chancery Practice of Great Britain. But, in all cases where these recent changes in the English practice have resulted in the omission of any part of the former editions of Daniell, which has been found to be still useful in American practice, that part has been carefully restored, or the omission of it supplied in some other way; and no part of the last (fifth) English Edition has been omitted which bears upon the present practice in the American Courts of Chancery, or which may furnish models for future changes in this country, if found desirable.

An entirely new feature in this work is the Appendix of Forms.

The editor has also added to the Appendix an entire collection of the Rules of Practice for the Courts of Equity of the United States—those adopted and promulgated by the Supreme Court of the United States, in January, 1842, and all those that have been adopted by way of amendment or otherwise since that time. No other full collection of these is known to exist in any other publication.

The substance of the recent General Orders, of February, regulating the mode of taking testimony to be used in Chancery suits in England, has also been added to the Appendix.

Over sixteen thousand cases—about ten thousand in the English edition and over six thousand in the American edition—have been cited and referred to in this work.

During the time necessarily consumed in the progress of this edition through the press, important decisions have been made, which could be availed of only in the shape of addenda; and, in order that the benefit of these decisions may not be lost to the edition, a department of Addenda has been prepared and inserted in the second volume.

LANGDELL'S SELECT CASES

ON

THE LAW OF CONTRACTS.

8vo, sheep, $7 50.

A Selection of Cases on the Law of Contracts, with References and Citations, by C. C. Langdell, Dane Professor of Law in Harvard University.

Prepared for use as a Text-Book in Harvard Law School.

This volume begins the subject of contracts, and embraces the important topics of Mutual Consent, Consideration, and Conditional Contracts.

CURTIS'S CONVEYANCER.

Crown 8vo, sheep, $2 25.

New and enlarged edition. Containing a large variety of Legal Forms and Instruments in use throughout the United States, with Forms and Directions for applicants under the Patent Laws of the United States. By George T. Curtis. Revised and enlarged by M. H. Durgin.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,
PUBLISHERS.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE

ON THE

BANKRUPT LAW.

THIRD EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

F. J. HUNTINGTON & CO.,

103 DUANE STREET, NEW YORK.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE GREEK LANGUAGE,

For Beginners, in a compendious Grammar of Attic Greek, with copious Exercises. Second Edition. By Charles D. Morris, M.A., late Rector of Trinity School, New York, and formerly fellow of Oriel College, Oxford.

Also, by the same Author,

A COMPENDIOUS GRAMMAR OF THE LATIN LANGUAGE,

With Parsing and Reading Lessons, separate in paper covers for each work. Price, $1 75.

The critics object, but the Latin and Greek professors in Harvard, Yale, Trinity, and Columbia Colleges recommend, and many of the best schools in the country use, them, because while they confirm the able, by them feeble pupils help themselves.

NOW READY,

By the same Author,

A SERIES OF QUESTIONS,

designed to test the progress of learners in the Latin Language. Adapted to the principal Latin Grammars now in use. Price 34 cents.

BRET HARTE'S NEW VOLUME.

PUBLISHED THIS DAY:

EAST AND WEST POEMS.

BY BRET HARTE.

1 vol. 16mo. Uniform with "Poems" and "The Luck of Roaring Camp." Bevelled boards, $1 50.

The book includes the poem pronounced before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard University in June last, The Lost Galleon, numerous poems that have appeared in periodicals since the publication of Mr. Harte's last volume, embracing "Truthful James's Answer to her Letter," "Further Language from Truthful James," "Sequel to Maud Muller," "A Newport Romance," "A Greyport Legend," and several poems that are now first printed. The volume is a fresh proof of the varied genius and poetic power of the author, and will be cordially welcomed by the multitude of Mr. Harte's admirers.

For sale by all Booksellers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers,

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO.,
BOSTON.

JUST PUBLISHED,

WOMEN;

OR,

CHRONICLES OF THE LATE WAR.

BY

MARY TUCKER MAGILL.

"The most readable book of the season."

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, post-paid, upon receipt of price, $1 75.

DUKESBOROUGH TALES.

BY PHILEMON PERCH.

"A book of rare humor."

"As humorous sketches of character, they rival the best of Judge Longstreet's in that direction."—Savannah News.

Fine cloth, price $1 50.

TURNBULL BROTHERS, Publishers,
BALTIMORE, MD.

OLD AND NEW.

THE PEOPLE'S MAGAZINE,

EDITED BY

EDWARD E. HALE.

NOVEMBER NUMBER NOW READY

Containing Chaps. VI.–IX. of

GEORGE MACDONALD'S

NEW STORY,

THE VICAR'S DAUGHTER,

Published in America, by our special arrangement with the author, as a serial in "Old and New."

This story is one of Mr. Macdonald's happiest efforts, and being autobiographical, makes it doubly interesting.

The November number also contains:

THE MODERN ENGLISH NOVEL. Henry W. Bellows.
THE LANGUAGE OF BRUTES. Leonard A. Jones.
THE DANGERS OF DISCOVERY. D. A. Wasson.
UPS AND DOWNS. (Chap. X.) E. E. Hale.
FROM DRY GOODS TO STOCK-RAISING.

And various other papers of practical interest.

For sale by all Book and Newsdealers.

THREE MONTHS FREE.

New subscribers for 1872 will receive the October, November, and December numbers of 1871 FREE.

TERMS: (payable in advance) $4 per annum; $2 for six months; single numbers 35 cents (mailed post-paid).

☞ Subscriptions should be addressed to GEORGE A. COOLIDGE, care of

ROBERTS BROTERS, Publishers,
142 Washington Street, Room 26, Boston.

TERMS OF REUNION WITH ROME.

8vo, pp. 48, price 1s. 6d.

A Reply by the Rev. Pierce Connelly, M.A., to the Memorial presented by Rev. Noah H. Schenck, D.D., and others to the Rt. Rev. Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States.

ROBT. JOHN BUSH, 32 Charing Cross, LONDON.
R. TURNER, 596 Broadway, New York.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

133 NASSAU STREET,

Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

THE "NATION" ABROAD.

Subscriptions and Advertisements for the Nation are received in Europe by the following

AGENTS:

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE COLONIES: George Street, 30 Cornhill, E.C., London.

FRANCE: Bowles Brothers & Co., 12 Rue de la Paix, Paris.

SWITZERLAND: Vérésoff & Garrigues, Place Bel-Air, Geneva.

ITALY: Furse Brothers & Co., 9 Piazza di Spagna, Rome.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL.

Is the Oil you burn reliable and safe? Few families appreciate the importance of this question. You can obtain a cheap and perhaps good light from unsafe oil, but endanger your life and property by using it. Be wise in time, and avoid the possibility of danger by burning only Pratt's Astral Oil.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1871.

The Week.

MR. SAMUEL J. TILDEN has brought Tweed's guilt home to him by a remarkable piece of work, which fully justifies what we said last week of the unpleasantness, if one had been erring, of being pursued by him. The Ring got inserted in the charter a clause creating a county "Board of Audit," composed of their precious selves. The "Board" met once for but ten minutes, and turned the whole "auditing" business over to Tweed. This sounds like a joke, but is true. Tweed then went to work ,and "audited" as hard as he could, Garvey and other scamps bringing in the raw material in the shape of "claims," and he never stopped till he had "audited" about $6,000,000 worth. Connolly's part in the little game then came in, and that worthy citizen drew his warrants for the money, which that simple-minded "scholar and gentleman" the Mayor endorsed, without having the least idea what was going on. Another citizen named Woodward, holding a subordinate office in the Supervisor's office, but living in luxury at Norwalk, Connecticut, then took the warrants down to the Broadway Bank, having forged on the back of them any names of which his own or Garvey's graceful fancy had suggested the insertion in the body of the document. Here he divided up the sum among the confederates by making deposits to their credit. Uuluckily for Tweed, he, Garvey, and Ingersoll kept their accounts at the same bank as Woodward, and Mr. Tilden, getting hold of the books of the bank, "decomposed" the deposits, as he says, and brought Tweed's share of the plunder home to him—about $1,000,000 in all. The Joint Committee have reported on the condition of the city's finances, and declare that the discoverable stealings of three years are $19,000,000, which is probably only half the real total.

It is probably no fault of Mr. George Ticknor Curtis that he has come before the public with an opinion denying the right of the State to sue Tweed, Hall & Co., and reserving that right to the city and county of New York, inasmuch as he has only answered questions propounded to him by the Corporation Counsel. But it is unfortunate for him that his views have been published just now, inasmuch as the public has not got quite over that other "opinion" of his about the Erie litigation, which showed that the proceedings therein were, from first to last, as harmless and edifying as a prayer-meeting, and Judge Barnard as pure as a sucking dove. Moreover, he has, in this instance, brought himself within reach of Mr. Charles O'Conor, whose grasp is unpleasant, and who shakes him up in a somewhat remorseless fashion in a letter to Mr. S. J. Tilden, in which he insinuates that the questions and the opinion are parts of an attempt to impede the Attorney-General's action, and to turn the public mind away from the fact of the thefts to technical quibbles about the proper mode of punishing them. Mr. Curtis's opinion on the point of practice Mr. O'Conor treats almost contemptuously, and instructs him that the State, "as parens patriæ, has power to correct by action at law or in equity abuses of corporate and official authority, and may exercise that right in pecuniary matters, though the money abstracted or misapplied should belong to a municipal corporation." Mr. Curtis's "little technical point," as Mr. O'Conor calls it, did occur to the Attorney-General's counsel, he says, and they duly considered it, but passed it by as of no weight. We cannot question Mr. O'Conor's law, but we take leave to remind him that Mr. Curtis is a fellow-creature.

Mr. Charles O'Conor has been offered a nomination for the Assembly, but has declined in a letter of great power, in which he reviews the whole situation, and throws the main responsibility touching reform on the Legislature. He refuses to go into it himself, on the ground that he expects to be occupied closely for some time to come with the legal pursuit of the thieves, and is unwilling to have any suspicion roused about his disinterestedness by appearing in the political arena. Mr. Horatio Seymour will probably be offered the nomination in his place. There is nothing very new in the rest of the field. Two excellent nominations have been made for the Superior Court Judgeships, William E. Curtis and John Sedgwick, by the Reform Democrats and Custom-house Republicans. Mr. Ledwith, who has been figuring ever since last year as an indomitable reformer, and a convert from Tammany, has "sold out" for a Tammany nomination for the Supreme Court. His resemblance to Judas Iscariot and Benedict Arnold now occurs to a great many people. Mothers will frighten their children by the mention of his name, and when he goes to church the other worshippers will "mutter a prayer" for him, as some papers told us they would do for Winans.

The Tribune thinks that, in acquitting Murphy on the charge of cheating the Government in his hat contracts, we only do him "shoddy justice." We, however, do him all the justice the case admits of, or requires at our hands. We by no means present him to the public as an innocent and much injured man. There are some incidents in his career which the Dix Commission leave just as they are, and which are, to our mind, very little short of cheating in contracts—his appearance, for instance, in Tweed's Broadway Widening Commission. We are told that the commission which took the place of the one in which he served made higher awards than his did, but we are not affected by this little circumstance. In matters like this, we walk by faith, and not by sight. We are sure, and sure with a sureness which it is not in Murphy's power to shake, that Tweed did not put him or any other man upon that commission because he thought him honest, and Tweed is not a bad judge of dishonesty. We will go further, and say that no man is fit to be collector of this port or to hold any Federal office, high or low, whom Tweed has put on a commission for the awarding of compensation or assessing of damages. We are, too, of the same mind as ever about Murphy's appearance in real-estate speculations with Sweeny, Tweed, and Connolly. He cannot persuade us, and he has, let us tell him, persuaded nobody, that a combination of this kind was accidental or innocent. We have all got past the stage in which illusions of this kind were possible. We have to repeat that he owes it to the President, who has been extraordinarily kind to him, to resign; and if he will not resign, the President owes it to the community whose affairs he administers to dismiss him.

The Administration has again made a happy stroke about the Washington Treaty in appointing Messrs. William M. Evarts, of this city, and B. R. Curtis, of Boston, as counsel for the United States, to appear with Caleb Cushing before the Geneva Board, in place of Mr. Meredith, who declines on account of ill-health. It would have been difficult to make two better selections if we put aside Mr. Richard H. Dana, Jr., whose non-participation in this great contention everybody must regret. Messrs. Evarts and Curtis were the only two men who achieved any distinction in the Impeachment trial, Mr. Curtis's speech, in particular, being a remarkable piece of forensic oratory, and they made the intellectual poverty of the "managers" painfully manifest. And it is rather odd, and shows how sane views of politics are gaining ground, that after being savagely abused as confederates of "the greatest criminal of this or any other age," they should now be sent by a Republican Administration to represent the nation in the weightiest cause of modern times.

We do not think any good is done by refuting Mr. B. F. Butler. There is probably no more worthless character "in politics," which is saying a good deal, and we doubt very much whether he has, in his speeches or other performances, any object in view beyond notoriety, and the gratification of a satanic love of mischief, which seems to be part of his moral constitution, and of which, at his age, he probably could not rid himself, even if he tried. Moreover, we doubt whether he has any influence anywhere outside of his own district, or can ever acquire any influence anywhere, by voice or pen. His power over men, such as it is, like that of his great master, is acquired by subterranean personal intrigue and activity, and, of course, the area over which a mere man can use these instruments is necessarily very limited. Therefore, we do not believe it was worth anybody's while arguing against his late utterances at Philadelphia on the Treaty of Washington. Nevertheless, we are not sorry that they called out an article in last week's Independent, in which an able hand takes up the few points in the treaty which Butler managed most grossly to misrepresent, and sets them in their true light before the country. It shows, in the first place, that Butler did what the Tribune calls "telling a wicked lie" when he said that, "as appears by the protocol, the British commissioners demanded that they the [three rules] should be enforced on every other maritime nation before they [Great Britain] would be bound by them." There is no mention of any "other nation" in the protocol to which Butler refers, and the treaty itself simply binds the parties to "bring the rules to the knowledge of other maritime powers, and invite them to accede to them"—a wise and humane and enlightened pledge, which must have made Butler's master roar and scratch terribly when he heard of it. Butler also said that the treaty "does not settle, in terms nor by implication, how far the claims of British subjects shall be recognized in property to their slaves freed by the war and by the proclamation of President Lincoln." Now, he had before him, as the writer in the Independent shows, the very protocol which reports that the American commissioners asked the English commissioners what they were to expect on this very point, and that the English commissioners replied, "that, by the law of England, British subjects had long been prohibited from holding slaves, at home or abroad," and that "no claim on behalf of any British subject for slaves, or for any property in slaves, would be presented by the British Government."

In illustration of what we said last week about the low opinion entertained of each other's morals by the two factions of the Republican party, we may mention that since then the Tribune, having called attention to the fact that Bob Murray, late United States Marshal of the district, offers "to go into court" and prove Tom Murphy guilty of bribing detectives to abandon the collection of evidence against him on a charge of defrauding the Government, the Times replies by calling attention to the fact that Hugh Hastings offers "to go into court" and prove Senator Fenton guilty of selling his veto when Governor of this State. Would that all the gentlemen who have charges against each other, or hold "papers" over each other, could be induced "to go into court" together, and make a clean breast of it! If they would appoint a day when they would all march in procession to the City Hall for that purpose, we think we could promise them as large an escort of delighted citizens as ever turned out on any public occasion. The only possible objection we can think of to their all rushing to the bar together is the interruption it would cause to the regular judicial business of this great commercial community. But we would heartily support a measure creating a court for their special use. It would, however, in order to be thoroughly effective, have to be armed with every kind of procedure known to human jurisprudence—civil, criminal, and military.

The end put to the isolation of Utah by the building of the Pacific Railroad proves to be, as every one must have foreseen that it would, the beginning of the end of the Mormon State. The same joint action of the military and the United States courts which we are witnessing in North and South Carolina has brought the Mormon leaders within the reach of the law, and in the past ten days a prominent elder, the Mayor of Salt Lake City, and Brigham Young himself, have received sentence as criminals, or been held for trial. Elder Thomas Hawkins, an Englishman, was convicted last Friday of adultery, on the complaint of his first wife, who came over with him, and sentenced to imprisonment with hard labor for three years, and to pay a fine of $500. A Mrs. Cook has been successful in a suit against Brigham Young, which was tried before a mixed jury of Mormons and Gentiles, in recovering certain trust moneys for which he had failed to account. Mayor Wells was arrested on a charge of murder committed some time ago, but was allowed bail by the judge, that he might continue to attend to his official duties. These three suits illustrate very well the three sides of Mormonism on which it is exposed to attack. As for polygamy alone, a better mode of disposing of it could hardly be selected or desired, and its death promises to be easy and natural. The class among which the saints found their dupes so readily is likely to be cowed by the arraignment, through superior force, of their prophets and rulers, and the disposition either to migrate again or to resist has no longer any support in their geographical relation to the rest of the country. But there will be neither statesmanship, justice, nor humanity in pushing on this process without regard to the effect on families, and particularly on women, of a sudden break-up of the Mormon social organization. What is to become of the women who are to be thus driven from their husbands? As they have been led into this organization with the connivance or countenance of the United States, Congress should certainly offer them some temporary refuge, at least, from destitution. This consideration is made all the more imperative by the fact that we are outraging the religious feelings of a large body of people in carrying out our views of social propriety. One's satisfaction, also, in the suppression of the Mormon contrivance for the unlimited gratification of lust is tempered by the thought of the easy divorce arrangements of so many Northern States, which contribute to the same end.

The Ku-klux arrests in South Carolina continue lively, and on a large scale. Those made in Spartanburg consisted mainly of "low white trash," who implicated, however, leading citizens and politicians, so that some of these have deemed it expedient to quit the State abruptly. We believe it is to be said, in justification of the application of martial law, that the number of disturbances was very much greater than the telegraph or the newspapers have ever reported. The aggregate of violence has not, perhaps, been underestimated, but this is owing to the exaggeration of the few outrages that have come to light, and the suppression of the rest. Business men who have had dealings with South Carolina have been enabled to judge more correctly of the widespread demoralization of society in that State; and they will not deny that this chronic disorder, rather than any exceptional and sporadic atrocities, demanded military intervention, if that remedy was to be used at all. Here, as in North Carolina, and a fortiori, we must be allowed to doubt the permanence of the cure. With much good material and good-will among the better class of Southerners, in Charleston and Columbia particularly, there is wanting a grasp of the situation, a perception of the only way out of it, and even a slight movement towards that way; and the spectacle is anything but encouraging. All the weakness of the State might be summed up in one word—ignorance; and there is as yet no party which can be called the party of light. The poor whites and the negroes who are arrayed against each other are companions in that intellectual and moral darkness which the school-house can only partially dispel, and which must probably be left to the slow-working agency of death.

We seem to have conveyed the impression by our remarks last week on General Barlow's experience in the marshalship of this district that he was driven into resigning by the importunities of the local politicians about offices. It was, however, not our intention to do anything of the kind. The fact was, we understand, that their complaints produced no effect whatever on the President, and their impudence and assiduity produced none on General Barlow, or, as he might say, if he wished to be "scathing," only excited his pity and contempt. He went out of the office solely because it required a greater pecuniary sacrifice than he was willing to make—the salary being small, apart from the stealings, which an active and unscrupulous patriot can make considerable.

Judge Pearson, of Harrisburg, has discharged Mr. Evans, the Pennsylvania claim agent, from arrest on the charge of embezzling State funds. He said he would have held him to answer before a jury if he had been a State officer, which he was not, but an attorney-in-fact, with a right to withhold his compensation from money in his hands belonging to his principal. The court said that he was not entitled to ten per cent. on his collections under the Governor's power, but the State authorities erred when settling with him in refusing to allow him any compensation whatever. In the civil suit, which is also pending, the Court reduced the bail from $400,000 to $100,000. The counsel of Mr. Evans in this city wrote to us after our last paragraph appeared, complaining that we insinuated that Mr. Evans had made an improper use of the first $2,000,000 he collected for the State, whereas he paid it over to the United States, to whom it was due. We did not intend to insinuate anything of the kind. We simply charged Mr. Evans with making no reports for four years about a fiduciary transaction on which he had bound himself to report half-yearly, which we said, and say still, was suspicious behavior, and gave anybody a right to make any surmise he pleased about the motive of his silence.

There is an unusual lull in French politics, owing to the recess of the National Assembly, the somewhat indefinite, and, therefore, little-exciting, result of the elections for the councils-general, and the conclusion of the triple convention with Germany, which seems to have settled the relations between the Republic and the Empire for a long period to come. In accordance with that treaty, the Germans are evacuating —if they have not completely done so—the six departments in the East, "the occupation of which, according to the terms of peace, was to last until next May"—to use the words of the Emperor William, in his late opening address to the Reichstag, who paid M. Thiers the compliment of stating that he permitted their immediate evacuation, "relying upon a steady, continuous development of the internal condition of France." The principal obstacle in the way of this development is, and unfortunately will be for a long time still, the "steady, continuous" flow of indemnity money into the treasury of the accommodating emperor, which not only tasks the resources of France and the financial ingenuity of her statesmen to the utmost, but has also created a very unpleasant scarcity of the circulating medium in commercial circles. Could M. Thiers for a moment forget the difficulties of the financial situation, his political position, in the present juncture of affairs, might appear to him favorable and encouraging beyond expectation. The reorganization of the army is steadily advancing; the political prisons are being emptied; the invaders are rapidly withdrawing from French territory; the relations with foreign powers daily becoming more friendly; affairs in Algeria are slowly improving; and, what is more, none of the parties contending for the future rule of France is at present in a condition, or even in a mood, to trouble her peace. The Bonapartists themselves seem to have determined upon a reconquest of their former glory by the slow process of a peaceful propaganda, beginning with the exaltation of their fallen chief into a "martyr of Sedan." Their main organ, the Ordre, has already made a number of converts to this new imperialistic dogma.

Paris is having the cost of going to war, and then setting two revolts on foot, and standing two sieges, placed before her eyes in a way that is quite new to her. A report on the actual condition of her industry has just been made to the Municipal Council, and it is indeed a dismal tale. The hotels are less than two-thirds full; a large number of the smaller restaurants are closed, the customers being dead or gone. Of 30,000 persons engaged in the fine-boot manufacture, 6,000 were foreigners, who have all fled, and of the 24,000 French 12,000 have disappeared, "slain, imprisoned, or in flight." Of the 30,000 tailors, one-third have disappeared, and the trade has fallen off one-half. Of the cabinet-makers, 5,000 out of 20,000 are missing, and their places are being supplied by Germans, but the best workmen have emigrated, and for good. The best jewellers and goldsmiths have gone to Brussels, London, and New York. In short, Paris has lost about 100,000 of her most skilful workmen and half her industry. Orders which now come into Paris for work for which she used to be famous cannot be executed, and the probabilities are that in many branches her supremacy is permanently lost. The empire has at last fairly closed its existence, by the sale at auction of the Emperor's and Empress's old clothes left in the Tuileries, among them what one French paper calls "les objets les plus intimes de la toilette." A more appropriate ending to that great imposture could hardly have been devised, though it would have been more effective if some of the raiment of the court-circle could have been knocked down too, including the gorgeous robes of the "Americans in Paris," who were amongst the humblest and most grateful of the hangers-on of the Tuileries.

The late French Minister at Berlin, Benedetti, who was one of the best abused of all the men connected with the outbreak of the late war, has written a book in his own defence, which has just appeared. He says the story of the insult to the king on the promenade at Ems is pure fiction. His intercourse with the king was pleasant throughout. He asserts and proves that, so far from leaving his government in ignorance of what was going on at Berlin, he kept them well informed as to the formidable character of the new Prussian military organization, and this, coupled with Colonel Stoffel's reports, makes the conduct of the Emperor still more inexplicable. M. Benedetti maintains his old position as to Bismarck's having dictated the famous draft of the "secret treaty" to him, and strengthens it by bringing to light his own report of a hint received during or just prior to the Austrian war, that France might compensate herself for Prussian aggrandizement by the annexation of some French-speaking territory (either Belgium or Geneva), but that the king would not cede any portion of Prussian soil. He adds, moreover, that he distinctly warned his government that something in the nature of an alliance was being projected between Prussia and Italy in 1866, but nothing seemed to rouse Napoleon from his lethargy, and when he did rouse himself he found Bismarck utterly indifferent to his feelings or his action. M. Benedetti distinctly fixes on the French government the ultimate responsibility for the war, by showing that they were lashed by the taunts of the Opposition press into making the absurd demand, not only that the king should obtain the withdrawal of the Hohenzollern candidature, but should promise never thereafter to permit it, and that they rushed into hostilities because, being conscious of want of preparation, they were anxious to anticipate the Prussians, and get the first blow, and therefore hurried to the Rhine half-organized, and ripe for the ruin which came right speedily.

We have heard as yet little from the German Reichstag, opened a fortnight ago. The Government, as the Imperial opening address, now before us in full shows, will introduce at this session no project of a new army budget, which, as was feared, would have given rise to very serious, and perhaps very untimely, debates, but demand "that the period of transition for the military budget, which, according to the constitution, expires at the end of this year, shall be extended to the coming." The reference in the speech to the relations with the Austro-Hungarian empire, though not couched in the words transmitted in the Cable abstract, is as friendly and decided as reported. These relations, placed on so "friendly and neighborly" a footing by the late imperial and diplomatic meetings at Ischl, Gastein, and Salzburg, are now likely to become the more undisturbed, as the German policy, represented by Chancellor Beust, has finally achieved a decided triumph in the councils of Francis Joseph over the Slavic policy inaugurated by Count Hohenwart and his Cisleithan Cabinet. The Czechs, flushed by the victories of the Slavic populations in the recent elections in various provinces of the empire—victories achieved with the aid of Ultramontanes, Feudalists, and Government officials—pressed their claims to national autonomy, in the address of the Bohemian Diet, to a degree which Francis Joseph, after having made them extraordinary concessions in his opening rescript, deemed incompatible with even the feeble remnant of integrity and centralism he intended to preserve for the Cisleithan half of his already divided monarchy. Count Andrássy, the Premier of the Hungarian half, in vain proposed a compromise. His mediating scheme was rejected by the Czech leaders. The resignation of the Hohenwart Ministry was the consequence, and the Emperor—much to the surprise of the Czech hotspurs, we presume —accepted it.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.

The strike at Newcastle-on-Tyne, which has at last come to an end, has been in many ways the most remarkable of all strikes. Its magnitude as well as the costliness of this method of settling disputes between labor and capital, may be inferred from the fact that, according to the estimate of a competent authority, it caused a loss to the trades during the five months of its duration of $1,200,000 in orders, and to the shipping of $500,000, to say nothing of the enormous sums spent in the support of the workmen, of the severe injury inflicted on the small subsidiary industries, and of the departure of some of the best mechanics to other fields of labor. That the suffering among the strikers must have been very great in spite of the unprecedented efficiency of the trades-union organization by which the strike was supported, and of the liberality of the contributions made to its funds by men of other trades all over the kingdom, may be inferred from the fact that the death-rate at Newcastle rose, during its continuance, from 25 to from 40 to 50 per 1,000—that is, nearly doubled. In short, the struggle was marked by almost as much destruction of life and property as if it had been an armed conflict. It must be confessed, too, that when one comes to examine the points in dispute, and the results finally attained, it makes on one almost the same painful impression of waste, barbarism, and absurdity as the plan of deciding international controversies over questions of legal or moral right by killing large bodies of young men.

What the men sought was the same pay for fewer hours of labor; what the masters sought was the same amount of work for the same amount of wages in a season of unusual prosperity. After trying desperately for nearly half a year to ruin each other, they have ended their differences by a compromise. The men sought to make nine hours instead of ten in five days, and nine on Saturday, or fifty-four hours a week instead of fifty-nine, the limit of their labor; they now go to work for three months at fifty-seven hours a week, and from the first of January at fifty-four; that is, they have carried their point as to time, but not immediately. The masters, on the other hand, have won the concession that overtime, which is paid for at an extraordinary rate, shall not count until the man has made his fifty-four hours in the week; that is to say, that it shall not be open to a man to idle one day and work overtime the next. The principal result of the struggle is that nine hours becomes a day's work in the engineer's trade.

This is the dark side of the strike; the bright side we find in the fact, which even journals which have as little sympathy with the working-classes as the Pall Mall Gazette acknowledge, that in the conduct of the controversy—in patience, in temper, and in skill—they had decidedly the advantage over their antagonists; they produced from their own ranks advocates who, at nearly every step in the discussion, put the masters in the wrong, by their courtesy, self-restraint, and dialectical ability. In particular, they exposed, without directly calling attention to it, the absurdity of the double mode of treatment in which the masters, in these disputes, have frequently indulged, which consists in treating a strike as at one and the same time the mutiny of an army against its officers, and a quarrel in open market between buyers and sellers over the price of a commodity. If labor be, indeed, as the masters strenuously insist, a commodity, it is folly to treat the exorbitance of the men's demands for it as disrespectful—ground which, at the opening of the strike, Sir William Armstrong, the celebrated gunmaker, who conducted the masters' case, seemed to take. We may assume now, that when disputes of this kind occur hereafter, masters and men will treat each other in form as what economists say they are in fact—equal parties to a bargain. The London Economist, as sensible and considerate a paper as exists, was at the outset disposed to treat the complaints of the men in the Newcastle strike on this score as silly, and perhaps from a purely philosophical point of view they were silly; but the divisions between classes which are the bane of modern society and of modern industry are not to be settled from a philosophical point of view simply, and are largely affairs of sentiment and of manner. At all events, sentiment and manner have a good deal to do with keeping them alive. The sensitiveness of the working-classes on this point is hardly to be found fault with, seeing the enormous part manner plays in regulating the intercourse of the members of the employing class with each other; and we doubt much whether this division will ever be bridged over without greater assimilation than now exists in the forms of intercourse between class and class, to those which prevail among members of the employing class. The somewhat brutal self-assertion of the democratic workingman will never disappear until the democratic capitalist gets rid of some of his arrogance.

The Newcastle strike is perhaps most valuable, however, as an illustration of a point which we have often raised in these columns, that is, the fallaciousness of the doctrine that the law of supply and demand can be relied upon to settle the rate of wages at a given place and within a reasonable time, as long as there exists the present gross ignorance as to the condition of the market on the part of one of the parties to the bargain. One of the peculiarities of modern industry is, that seasons of prosperity come suddenly, and are often brief in their duration. The increased demand for labor which they create may not, and mostly does not, make itself felt in the market until they have passed away. In such a trade as that of the mechanicale ngineers, for instance, requiring enormous plant and capital, it is sheer nonsense to talk of sudden increase of profits creating a corresponding competition for labor on the part of capitalists within any reasonable period. No doubt steady and prolonged increase in the demand for the products of this industry would gradually draw into it a greater quantity of capital, and thus raise wages, supposing, as it is fair to suppose, the quantity of skilled labor like this undergoes no correspondingly rapid increase. The rule, however sound it may be in the long run, does not work in brief periods of prosperity, such as English industry is now enjoying, and in the fruits of this prosperity English workmen, being human, desire a share. Perhaps on a general view of the profits of capital through a series of years, they are not entitled to share in it, but, like the rest of the world, they want to make hay while the sun shines; and if the masters have to make provision for seasons of depression, so have they.

No plan has yet been discovered of preventing the working-classes from expecting and demanding, and seeking to obtain by every means in their power, a share in the profits resulting from increased briskness of trade, however brief. Legislation, denunciation, admonition, have all been tried for this purpose in vain. The sole protection which the master now enjoys againt their exactions is their ignorance of the condition of the market, if indeed this can be called a protection, for we venture to assert that it leads nearly as often to strikes for an increase of wages when the state of trade will not admit of it as when it will; that is, the workingmen strike half the time in vague suspicion that the master is making money rapidly. They are sometimes right, but they are sometimes wrong; and, whether right or wrong, this mode of getting at a simple business fact is a disgrace to our civilization as well as to our industrial organizations.

Nobody can watch any strike without seeing that, after making all allowance for defects of temper from the operation of class-feeling on the part of the men, the one thing needed, either greatly to reduce the number of strikes, or to do away with them altogether, and, in fact, to destroy the feeling of antagonism between labor and capital, is the provision of some means of making the workingman familiar with the machinery of industry. The responsibility of this for the present lies mainly with the capitalist. It is pretty plain now that he does not retain the control of his business by hiding his affairs from observation. He conceals the amount of his profits from his laborers at present at a cost which threatens before long to leave him with little or no profits. It seems as if it was for him to discover some rational mode of letting the workingman know when a rise in wages can be borne, and when it cannot. But we confess we doubt still whether any complete solution of the difficulty will ever be reached except through the conversion of a large proportion of the working-class into co-operative associations or "industrial partnerships." The difficulties and conditions of business cannot be understood by persons of small education and little used to speculative enquiry except by practical acquaintance with it. The trials of a capitalist will never be understood by a workingman until he shares them in a greater or less degree. The talk one hears at labor conventions about the tyranny of capital seldom comes from men who have "been in business for themselves." The horror which is expressed at the meetings of these bodies over the accumulation of large masses of wealth in the hands of few individuals, curiously enough seems to be rarely inspired by the obvious objection that great wealth gives a man great power. On the contrary, it seems mainly to flow from a vague belief that the great mill-owner or railroad man or coal-miner lives in the gratification of his sensual appetites; in other words, in pure luxury; while the poor man is starving on the sidewalk or shivering in his garret. How very little reflection those who say most about this matter have really bestowed upon it, is revealed by the question which they never ask themselves, and never answer—What do the rich men in our industrial world do with their money? Why, they invest it; that is, use it in production, just as a co-operative association would do; and it is of the highest importance to the community that such men should have great sums to invest, because they have proved themselves good judges of what will pay and what will not; that is, of the best mode of employing the wealth of the country so as to produce more. The notion that workingmen would, if they had the money, turn it to better account for themselves even, is utterly baseless. So is the notion that what the capitalists spend on themselves forms any considerable portion of the returns of industry. We doubt if it is an exaggeration to say that the annual amount devoted to the personal expenses of the great capitalists of the United States would not, if divided, give the workingmen a dollar a piece. That great capitalists often abuse the power that money gives them, we do not deny, but we doubt very much whether any of these abuses has as yet resulted in the material injury of the working-classes.

One of the curious signs of the times was the active participation of a lady in the Newcastle controversy, by means of a pamphlet of remarkable ability, showing the absurdity of the workingman's prejudice against capitalists, as such, and of the belief that the possession of capital in large quantities by individuals was injurious to working-class interests. It had a very wide circulation, and is said to have exercised a good deal of influence in producing the remarkable calmness and self-restraint which characterized the labor side of the conflict. We are being treated on this side of the water to an equally favorable indication of the growing supremacy of good sense, in the appearance of Miss Anna Dickinson with a lecture in the form of an assault on the noisy male windbags who now go to and fro through the land stirring up the workingmen against their employers, and driving all rational views of life and social organization out of their heads with vapid declamation about "wrongs" and "rights." If Miss Dickinson can stick a pin in these "organs," she will do the state some service, and make us all regret the labor she spent on "caste" and other airy abominations.

JUDGE UNDERWOOD AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

An important fact was recently made public. Judge Underwood, of the United States District Court in Virginia, has pronounced an opinion—extra-judicial, it seems—that through the operation of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, women have now the full and absolute right to vote at all elections, State and national, and that the cause of woman's rights, so far as it has a political aspect, is thus already won. When Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull announced this doctrine to the amazed advocates of woman suffrage, and was thereupon, with only a murmur of opposition from the "Boston clique," placed at the head of the movement, we must confess we gave little heed to the new gospel, because we did not then know that she received her inspiration directly from the angelic and spiritual world, and was assisted in getting up her arguments by Demosthenes himself. When General Benjamin F. Butler gave his adherence to this latest constitutional construction, we still doubted; because, for some reason or another, there is "a feeling abroad in the land," as the reporters say, that the General's convictions do not always keep pace with his utterances. But now, when that great and good jurist Underwood ranges himself on the side of this doctrine, we confess we feel shaken. We must pause and examine the ground on which we stand.

Still, even at point-blank, some impertinent questions suggest themselves, and will not be suppressed. Why, for instance, did the Judge make choice of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments as the basis of his opinion? Why did he not take other amendments, and read them large enough to cover Woodhull, Claflin, and all their disciples? There, for example, is the Thirteenth. To be sure, it does not say a word about women nor about voting; but that should be no difficulty in the way of a free interpretation in the interests of progress. It declares that slavery shall not exist within the United States; and is not the condition of women that of slavery? And is not the deprivation of the right of self-government, the electoral franchise, one of the plainest badges of this servitude? In fact, if Judge Underwood will only examine it, he will find this Thirteenth Amendment full of matter from which a hundred different reforms could be constructed by those vigorous minds which, like his, are liberated from the authority of base precedent, which despise the inconvenient trammels of intention and design, and work under the broad rule, "they builded better than they knew." Nor is it to be doubted that most of the other amendments would, upon a careful scrutiny, be found to contain, in a germinal and undeveloped form, the very same principle which, we are told, is fully expressed in the latest additions to the Constitution. Another of the impertinent questions that will suggest themselves is, why is the operation of these fruitful amendments confined to women? They make no mention of women; they ignore the existence of sex; they speak only of "persons" and "citizens." It was natural that Mrs. Woodhull should have overlooked this point; her nature, we are told by a sympathizing biographer, is airy, seeking solitude upon the house-top. But Judge Underwood is a jurist; he has a judicial mind, trained by study, and by forensic disputations, to look at every side of a legal or a political doctrine. He knows that a babe just born into the world in these United States is as much a citizen of this great—and, out of deference to the Judge, we will say glorious—country as his grandmother who is just about to drop into her grave. The Judge knows, also, that whatever rights the amendments in question confer upon "persons" or "citizens" belong to that little babe as fully, as completely, and as absolutely as they do to Mrs. Woodhull or to the grandmother to whom we have referred. Why, then, we repeat, did the Judge restrict himself to women? Does he think that great movements, stupendous reforms, should be made by instalments? Can he have adopted the cowardly opinion, hateful to all true professional reformers, that a part, though not so good as the whole, is better than nothing? We cannot believe this of the Judge; it is a doctrine which savors too much of the blind conservative; it is altogether foreign to the nature of the true disciple of progress.

We shall, though we feel that we owe our readers some apology for doing so, now say a few words on the matter, because the preparations for the winter campaign already begin to be heard in the woman's rights camp, and because, as experience proves, there is a considerable number of tagrag politicians, both at Washington and elsewhere, awaiting conquest and conversion. We do not care particularly whether these people give in their adhesion to "the cause" or not, but they are men, and we desire, for the honor of their sex, that, if they do so, they shall give some better reason for it than that with which Demosthenes has supplied Butler and Underwood. The whole thing is a farce, but farces in which American Congressmen and judges play a part reflect discredit on the whole country.

The original movement which had for its object the attainment of political capacities and rights by women was legitimate, and entitled to respect. It fought its way by argument, and could only be successfully opposed by argument. In constitutional governments, every great reform has been accomplished by a long-continued and skilfully-managed agitation, which has finally brought the truth and conviction with it home to the whole people. It was in this manner that the Reform Bill, Catholic emancipation, the repeal of the corn-laws, legal reform, and many other causes triumphed in Great Britain; it was thus that preparation was made for the overthrow of slavery in the United States. An agitation, therefore, in favor of woman's political rights was proper; it commanded respect even where it had not produced conviction; and it is possible that it would have accomplished its object. But now this agitation is abandoned; the old leadership is surrendered, and a new policy is adopted which seeks success by a trick. We are told that woman suffrage has already been conferred, and that all a woman has to do is to insist upon voting. This claim is in itself hardly worth the trouble of an argument to refute it. It is based partly upon ignorance and partly upon effrontery. It ignores or denies all that has been settled in the public law as to civil rights as distinguished from political capacities and rights. It seeks to force itself upon a people which is unconvinced, and upon courts and legislatures which are hostile. But there is another and graver aspect of this matter. The advocacy of the doctrine tends to bring the Constitution into contempt, and to weaken the popular belief in it as the fundamental legislation of the land. If this doctrine were pushed to its legitimate results, it would simply destroy the Constitution as a conserving element and influence in the national jurisprudence and politics. Many persons, when they hear that Butler and other legislators, or Underwood and other judges, pronounce in favor of the interpretation which was conceived in an adventurous woman-stockbroker's office on Wall Street, are ready to give up all faith in any form of sound words, and to adopt the popular whim or impulse of the hour as their only political guide. This, and not any anticipated adoption of the heresy we are examining, is the danger to be met. The organic law should be treated as a collection of broad general principles, easy to be understood and to be interpreted by a common-sense standard. It should not be treated as a pettifogger in a horse suit would construe a statute.

We have said that the interpretation to which General Butler and Judge Underwood have given their adhesion is a mere trick. This is evident when we recur to the history and design of these two amendments. Congress had passed a statute known as the Civil Rights Bill, with the avowed object of protecting colored persons against lawlessness and against the injustice of State legislatures and courts. This statute defined citizens, and placed them, so far as their civil rights are concerned, upon an equality. A doubt existed whether this statute was valid. The first section of the Fourteenth Amendment was proposed to remove such doubt, and to be the broad and equitable foundation for a protection of civil rights against State usurpation. Not a word does it contain in reference to the electoral franchise or any other political capacity or privilege; nor, while pending before Congress and the States, was a suggestion made that it interfered with, or had any effect upon, the matter of voting. That matter was, so far as this first section is concerned, left where it had before been, under the control of the States. But if the States were to remain supreme in respect to the electoral capacity of their inhabitants, it was feared that, in all the Southern States and in many Northern ones, the blacks would be excluded from the polls by local legislation. This contingency was provided for by the second section of the amendment, not by taking away the power of such legislation, but by imposing a penalty upon its exercise. When the right to vote "is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State," etc., the representation in Congress is to be lessened. This section, it will be observed, is the only one which expressly refers to voting. By its penal provisions, it declares that the first section does not have the effect now claimed for it—does not confer the electoral franchise among the rights and privileges of citizenship; for, if the first section has such a wide effect, it reaches negroes as well as women—for both are citizens—negroes are enfranchised by it, and the State power of legislation is taken away. The second section, therefore, becomes useless—a blow aimed at a State power which had just been utterly destroyed. If, then, General Butler and Judge Underwood are right, this second section is not only unnecessary, but is contradictory to the first, and very much weakens its meaning and effect. But, again, the second section, by confining its penalties to those States which prohibit "males" from voting, either recognizes the fact that women are not at all within the purview of the amendment, or else expressly authorizes States to deny the franchise to women without incurring any penalty. We care not upon which horn of this dilemma Judge Underwood transfixes himself; each is equally sharp and fatal. The history of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, its object, as openly expressed by its friends while it was pending, and its intent, as gathered from its clauses, are all opposed to the construction which is now placed upon it. It is this very running in the face of historical fact, this very denial of obvious intent, which tends to make all constitutional interpretation, in the eyes of the public, a farce.

Passing now to the Fifteenth Amendment, the testimony given by its history and design is equally convincing. It was seen that the penal consequence of a State's refusing to admit the blacks to the electoral franchise was not sufficient for the political protection of the colored man; the door was kept shut, and the penalty endured. To remedy this evil, to override the State resistance, to secure for the negro the full rights of suffrage, was the design, and the only design, of the Fifteenth Amendment. Conceding that it accomplishes this purpose; conceding that, without the aid of Congressional legislation, it sweeps away all local statutes and affirmatively clothes a class of persons with a new capacity and a new right, it does no more. "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Unless women are a "race," or unless their feminality constitutes a "color," or unless they were, as a sex, in a "previous condition of servitude," no suffrage right for them lies concealed in this language.

When we look at the Constitution as a whole, the conclusion is so obvious that argument seems impertinent. Citizenship always existed as it now is. The theory of our Government did not, except in one or two instances, link political rights and citizenship by an inseparable bond of union, so that the one should flow from and be badges of the other. The whole matter of the electoral franchise was entrusted to the States, to be regulated according to their notions of policy, with the single restriction that a republican as opposed to an aristocratic or an autocratic form of government must be preserved. The States have no settled policy and adopted no uniform rules. In none was the suffrage granted to all citizens, for it was everywhere withheld from women and from minors of both sexes. In a few, it was not conferred upon any naturalized male citizens. In many, it was denied to all male colored citizens. On the other hand, in certain States, it was once bestowed upon male persons who were not citizens, upon resident foreigners who had not been naturalized. This general theory yet remains exactly as it stood before the war. There has been no attempt to change it as a whole. The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments only limit its operation in one direction; they take the blacks out from its effect, and place them under the protection of national legislation. We have seen that the Fifteenth Amendment and the second section of the Fourteenth have reference solely to negro citizens, and that the use of the word "male" in the latter completely cuts off any application of it to woman suffrage. We have nothing left, then, but the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, which only professes to protect the "privileges and immunities of citizens," and to preserve for all persons the rights of "life, liberty, and property," and the "equal protection of the laws," against State tyranny and injustice. The electoral franchise is certainly not involved in the preservation of "life, liberty, and property," nor of "the equal protection of the laws." To say that it is one of the "privileges and immunities of citizens," is to falsify our history, and to overturn the theory upon which the whole Government is based, and to destroy the distinction which exists in every nation and under every form of government, and nowhere more broadly and plainly than with us, between civil and political rights; between rights which make up the legal status of the citizen (civis) irrespective of all other considerations, and those rights which are conferred by the State upon a class—large or small—as a part of its public policy and of its system of politics.

CHRISTIANS AND THIEVES.

WE are unable to discover, in the authorized report of Henry Ward Beecher's late sermon on municipal corruption, any justification for the severe strictures passed on it by the Times and the Independent, both of which must, we imagine, have based their judgment on the newspaper summary of it. The whole discourse is, in fact, the ablest and most searching examination of the real cause of the operations of the Ring we remember to have seen anywhere. It passes condemnation on them in language full as strong as anybody has employed, but it urges, and with great force, the view, which we believe to be thoroughly sound, that it will not do to treat the members of the Ring as isolated criminals; that they are the product of a corrupt social state which we have all helped to create, by looseness in our commercial dealings, by connivance at small frauds and falsehoods, and by the persistent pursuit of low aims. Therefore, we are all in a measure responsible for Tweed, and Connolly, and Hall, although it is true and just that Tweed, and Connolly, and Hall, having stolen, ought to be punished. The passage, and the only one in the whole sermon, in which Mr. Beecher has furnished excuse for the strictures on him, is the following:

"You know that I have been blamed for severity and vehemence and denunciation. Yes, when everybody else was still, I did speak, and I spoke loud; but now, when everybody else is making a racket, I feel more like comforting those who are cast down. So far as I can do it in consistency with public justice, I would stand by their side, that they be not overwhelmed. For they are men; and they suffer, many of them, doubtless, as you never suffered. I would never forget in the culprit the humanity. I would look as I suppose God looks upon the great sinning world, abhorring iniquity, and longing to save men out of it. I look upon men who in many respects have good qualities, and long for their redemption. And I would take part of the blame myself. I would also distribute part of it on you."

The italics in the above are ours. It is hardly fair to read or comment on this passage apart from the rest of the sermon. Nevertheless, there are one or two points in it which will, just as they stand, bear criticism. Mr. Beecher here takes what we may call a professional view of the sinner, which ministers, discoursing of these matters, often feel bound to take, but it is not one which, in our opinion, can be properly offered to any citizen, as such, as a rule of conduct. It is not possible, the world being what it is, to stand by Tweed's or Hall's side without weakening the righteous indignation on which the execution of "public justice" depends; and this would be true even if these men had submitted themselves to the law. In addition to this, we doubt the theological soundness of Mr. Beecher's position, though we do so with proper lay diffidence. We deny that there is in the Christian system, or any other system of ethics on which it is possible to base human society, any obligation to pity, or sympathize with, or succor any wrong-doer who has not repented of and sought to atone for his offense. A contumacious thief, who does not deny his theft, but brazens it out and holds on to his plunder, is, we affirm, not entitled to a Christian man's "comforting" or support. As long as this state of facts lasts, the Christian's place, as Christian, is at the side of those whom the thief has robbed, and any pity or sympathy he has at command is their due. We believe there is no Christian sect which does not make repentance a condition precedent to reconciliation, and we believe, further, that there has been in the practice of the church, from the earliest ages, no departure from the sound and wholesome rule that a "notorious evil liver" is not a fit subject for a Christian man's company and countenance. Mr. Beecher is not entitled to assume, as he does assume, that Hall and Tweed have "suffered," in any sense of that word on which they can base a claim to forbearance or protection. They have given as yet no evidence of any suffering, except such as a criminal necessarily undergoes when he finds himself hard pressed by the police. Tweed does not give any sign even of this. Connolly is the only man of the party who has established the smallest title to any sympathy which a Christian can really give—that is, sympathy with a man who has done wrong, and is sorry for it, and shows that he is sorry by seeking to make amends. We deny altogether that there is in Bible, canons, or traditions, any warrant for the doctrine that sympathy with the perplexity of a criminal who is trying to escape without abandoning his "swag" is a Christian duty, even of imperfect obligation. We may add that any one who finds himself haunted by any such feelings may be satisfied that his moral vision is perverted, and that his breast is the seat of emotions which, from whatever quarter they come, do not descend from heaven.

We will go a little further and say—and we mean no pleasantry in saying it—that the practice of trying to look at the world and at our fellowmen "as God looks at them," in which so many excellent people indulge, is a failure, and had better be given up. There are one or two obvious objections to it. The first is, of course, that God's eyes are all-seeing, while our range of vision is very narrow, and that his voice is almighty, while ours is very weak. That is, when he looks at Tweed, and Hall, and Connolly, he sees the very secrets of their hearts, and knows exactly the degree of their guilt, and can in no wise be deceived by their conduct or their talk. Moreover, it is a matter of complete indifference, so far as the ends of divine justice are concerned, whether they repent now or fifty years hence. From that justice there is no hiding-place, and it is barred by no statute of limitations—an idea which is expressed in the often-quoted saying that "the mills of God grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small." When, therefore, we see a rogue prospering through long years, proud of his roguery, and revelling in the luxuries it brings him, we have no right to assume that the forbearance of Providence, which is displayed in his case, furnishes a model for our imitation as citizens. In fact, the more firmly a man holds to the theory of the moral government of the world by a personal deity, the further from him should this notion be put. God is not under the necessity of influencing the elections, or bringing the Democratic party to shame, or even of "saving the Republic." Indeed, for aught we can tell, it may be in the courts of heaven a matter of no consequence whatever whether the Republic lasts to the end of a century or not. It may be part of the plan of human education that the experiment which is now being made on this continent, fair and full of promise as it seems to us, should fail utterly at the very outset, and leave behind it chaos and despair. Things not unlike it have happened in the world's history, and after-ages have recognized in them, after all, steps in that tremendous march out of mystery into mystery in which the race is engaged, and which, marked though it is by faltering here and falling there, and much weariness everywhere, is, we know, on the whole an upward march. To any man who looked out on the world at the close of the fifth century, it seemed as if endless night was settling down on the earth, and yet in the very horrors of that time the foundations of a better civilization were being steadily laid. We doubt indeed if there be any weakness which has done more to bring about the corruption and looseness which we are all mourning over, than these Sentimentalist attempts to imitate the Divine government in the matter of dealing with offences against social morality. God can well afford to let a thief run, because he can catch him whenever he pleases, but we must catch him before he takes the steamer or disposes of the goods. God can indict and convict him now, or half a century hence, with the certainty of doom; we must indict him while the witnesses are living and the courts sitting. It is, of course, open to any of us, as a matter of private moral and religious discipline, to pity him, or forgive him; but our duty as citizens is none the less to join the sheriff in pursuing him, and while on the track to refrain from demoralizing or discouraging the posse, by expressing doubts whether, as we are all sinners, it is worth while to chase him; or whether, when God has borne with him so long, we ought not to bear with him too; or by enquiring how we should like to be hunted down ourselves, or whether his father or mother, or society in general, was not to blame for his thieving.

The government of the world, and the government of human society, as far as Christians or any other men have to do with it, is a government of consequences from first to last. Every man is educated, in large part, and guides his conduct in large part, from the cradle to the grave, by the consideration of consequences. In fact, the work of civilization consists mainly in the diffusion through the human species of an increasing knowledge of and regard for consequences. The more of them a man has, the better citizen, father, and husband he is. We know there are higher motives for right-doing than the consideration of consequences; but they are motives as yet which influence but a few individuals. Ages hence society may possibly be built on them; but at present there is no society which is not held together by the thought of consequences; and the goodness of the government is in the direct ratio of the strength with which the majority of the members of the community are influenced by it. We do not care, therefore, what the reason may be, for which any Christian refrains from cheating and stealing; we hold that he is bound, as a citizen, to take cognizance of the fact, that the reasons for which most men refrain are the fear of legal penalties, and the fear of losing the good opinion and friendly intercourse of their neighbors, and to govern himself accordingly both in his political and social action and in making his contributions to the opinion of his time. Whenever this fear for any reason disappears, Tweeds and Halls spring up at once, and the business of honest men is not to determine the exact degree of their guilt in the eyes of Supreme Justice, both because no men are competent to any such task and because Supreme Justice may safely be left to do its own work; but to see, first, that there is a stop put to their thieving, and, secondly, that the stop is of such a kind as to discourage others from engaging in similar enterprises. The only way of doing this is to take care that adequate legal penalties are annexed to this class of offences—that is, penalties which experience warrants us in believing to be deterrent and capable of enforcement, and that behind the officers of the law there is maintained a sufficient social reprobation of thieves and receivers, and of the aiders and abettors of thieves and receivers, to keep the officers of the law up to their work, to afford a proper moral basis for legislation against thieving and receiving, and to impress the minds of the young in their tender years with a wholesome horror of them. If we are right in these positions, any man who receives thieves and their confederates at his house on a friendly footing, or shares their "swag," or finds excuses for them in public or private, or seeks to moderate the public indignation which is sometimes necessary, as in the present case, to give the law momentum enough to override their strength and audacity, undoubtedly does a grievous injury to the state, and, as we believe, if he be "a professing Christian," does incalculable injury to the church.

We say incalculable injury to the church, because it is useless to try to conceal the fact that there is a widespread and growing feeling amongst a very valuable portion of the community, that there is springing up between religion and morality a divorce, or want of connection, like that which swept paganism away seventeen hundred years ago. The early church achieved its triumph by making war on immorality, and it made war on immorality, not simply by preaching against it, but by seeing to it that its members were chaste, temperate, honest, at all events, to all outward appearance. It allowed no man to remain in its fellowship or communion who did not prove his sincerity by his works. That is, it was not open to an early Christian to maintain his standing without purity of life; nor was it open to any man to come into the fold, on the ground that, though not good, he was trying to be good, while all the while stealing and whoremongering. The answer of the church discipline was plain and prompt: "It is possible you really desire to mend your ways; but we must have something more than your word for it; you must give up your particular weakness. If it be swindling, you must from this moment desist; if it be impurity, you must from this moment abandon it. Otherwise, you must depart. We cannot have you here; if we did, the heathen would all laugh at us; our religion would become a byword and a reproach, and you would gain nothing by our society, while we should lose much by yours. We shall not stand by you, or sympathize with you, or pity you. You are a bad fellow as you are; we shall not help you to become a hypocrite also. Be off."

If religion is to retain much influence on human affairs, the church must return to its ancient ways. Not only must it rebuke immorality, but it must not furnish a sanctuary for criminals. It fell into that error once before, in evil days, and it atoned for it heavily. For, although it is doubtless true that the spectacle of corruption, and of successful and unabashed corruption, in every variety of form, is very debauching, and that the state of things in this city is very likely to demoralize profoundly a very large proportion of the generation which is growing up under it, and which retains no traditions of the earlier and better time, it is also true that the great cause of morality is never left without champions and defenders. The sight of ruffians on the judgment-seat, selling justice with ribald jokes; of ruffians in the legislature, selling laws; of ruffians stealing millions of poor men's money every year, and spending it in "toys and lust and wine"; of great bankers and merchants conniving at their theft and smiling on them, as they gorge themselves; of church members taking their wages to do their bidding and further their schemes—may well be believed to be playing terrible havoc with the manners of the millions of young men and women who, standing on the edge of the arena, are asking themselves the tremendous question, What weapons are lawful in this great battle of life? But, then, it must not be forgotten that spectacles of this kind disgust and rouse, if not as many as they seduce, enough both to save society and avenge it. We believe that there are coming forward enough young men, horrified and outraged by these exposures, to make the story of the Ring as strange to the next generation as the story of the Parc aux Cerfs is to us in this. It will be a bad thing for religion if they find the thieves and peculators clinging to the horns of the altar, for they will assuredly tear them away, and with much damage and desecration to the holy place. And when that day comes, too, we would advise all Butlerite "divines" and "good Christian men" generally, who support rascally adventurers for office, if they are in the city, to flee to the country, and if they are in the country, to flee to the city; at all events, to avoid their usual haunts.

ENGLAND.—CONSERVATIVE TACTICS.

LONDON, Oct. 13, 1871.

THE various agencies for the reformation of the world by means of unlimited talk are just now in full operation. The clergy are having a congress at Nottingham; they yesterday settled to their own entire satisfaction the proper mode of confuting the infidel, who, however, will perhaps have a kick or two left in him still. The Social Science philosophers have been employing themselves at Leeds in even more sweeping reforms. No kind of reform escapes their searching gaze. The Times has day after day filled five or six columns with inaugural addresses from the presidents of sections which I can neither read nor criticise, because, like Sam Weller's vision, my knowledge and my patience are limited. The Social Science Association has in fact succumbed to the evil which from the first appeared to threaten it. It has been turned to account by two disagreeable classes of mankind, the bore and—to speak in the Carlylese dialect—the windbag. Gentlemen of the heaviest respectability, stump orators on the look-out for a good method of advertisement, and strong-minded ladies, too glad of a seat in even a mock-parliament, contribute chiefly to swell the flood of oratory. Of course it sounds cynical to ridicule people many of whom are doubtless actuated by the most sincere and amiable desire for the good of their fellow-creatures. Yet there are times when flesh and blood revolt against the dreariness and the pomposity and the emptiness of such gatherings. It may be urged with undeniable force that a bore may be a good man, and is very often an extremely useful one; but after endeavoring to reconcile myself to the association by that and similar reflections, I must confess that it seems to me to have been hitherto of remarkably little use—unless it is useful to flatter the vanity of a few second-rate politicians.

Meanwhile, another association, intended for more practical purposes, has just been announced. The composition of this body is remarkable in the extreme. One branch of it consists of Lord Salisbury, Lord Carnarvon, Sir J. Pakington, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, and several other ex-ministers of the same persuasion, that is to say, of the strictest sect of Conservatives. The other branch is formed by several of the men who have recently made themselves most prominent in defence of trades-unions and the rights of labor. You may perhaps remember the names of Mr. Applegarth and Mr. G. Potter, and, if so, you will wonder, as the British public is wondering, what has brought together so strange an alliance. It would seem that the two opposite extremes of political party are being brought into contact. The bitterest aristocrat in England is Lord Salisbury;* his new companions are amongst the most violent democrats; on what terms and for what purposes can they join? The answer is supplied partly by seven resolutions which they have passed: affirming, first, the importance of removing the poor man's home from the back lanes of a city to country air; secondly, the need of an improved organization of local boards, with a view to carrying out the above object; thirdly, the desirability of limiting a day's labor to eight hours; fourthly, fifthly, and sixthly, the importance of providing good schools of a superior grade, "places of public recreation, knowledge, and refinement," and markets for the sale of goods in small quantities at wholesale prices; and seventhly, the desirability of providing "a great extension of the organization of the public service, on the model of the Post-office, for the common good." It is not a little puzzling at first sight to understand the true bearing of this remarkable announcement. No one will deny that it is highly desirable to improve the condition of the English poor, to give him better lodging, purer air, shorter labor, more education, and greater means of refined enjoyment. Neither will any one deny that it would be an excellent thing for the English aristocracy to employ itself in a really vigorous effort to confer some of these blessings upon its poorer fellow-countrymen. But it is rather difficult to understand the nature of the machinery brought into play for the purpose. The composition of the board gives it the appearance of being a political trick.

Why should no Liberal peers have been asked to join a movement which is avowedly to be free from political purposes? Radicals will naturally suspect that the scheme is a mere manœuvre intended to take the wind out of the present ministry's sails. The Conservative nobles, it will be thought, are trying to bid against Mr. Gladstone by offering to carry out social reforms in which they are to have the lead, whilst diverting attention from political changes. However this may be, it is at least highly improbable that an association resting on such a singular basis can be successfully worked; and, indeed, the language of its promoters has a rather impractical sound. Meanwhile, I will simply remark that whatever becomes of the new project, it is significant enough that men like Lord Salisbury and Mr. Gathorne Hardy should have put their names to propositions so strongly tainted by communism. What is meant by the "extension of the organization of the public service on the model of the

* Lord Salisbury has since denied all knowledge of the movement.

Post-office" is more than I am able to understand; but in a general way its leading ideas seem to be that Government is to undertake to make everybody rich and happy, and give most people places; and that on that condition it is tacitly understood that the Government is to be the aristocracy. Leave us our places in the legislature, say Lord Salisbury and his friends to the artisans, and we will do our best to satisfy all your social demands. The plan as now put forward is obviously very crude; and I should have presumed—were it not published on apparently official authority—that there must be some misconceptions in the statement. But in one way or other it indicates an intimation on the part of the aristocracy to say, Don't abolish the House of Lords, and we will back labor against capital.

However ill-considered the present scheme may be, it is in other respects not an unfavorable symptom. Radicals have begun to discuss the propriety of abolishing the House of Lords. Mr. Fawcett has an article in this number of the Fortnightly, setting forth the terms on which a second chamber may be permitted to exist; and more than one member of Parliament has discussed the matter in recent addresses to constituents. I doubt whether people at present care enough about the matter one way or the other to allow an agitation to be sustained. If the Lords ventured to oppose any strong current of popular feeling they might get into difficulties, but neither the Ballot Bill nor the Army Bill was really supported by any popular enthusiasm. Popular interest is more and more drifting away from political to social questions; the relations of capital to labor are felt to be of much greater importance than the precise constitution of our Legislature. If it were possible for the House of Lords really to put itself at the head of any great movement for social reform, political objections to the principle of hereditary legislation would be easily overlooked. Probably any such vision is chimerical; but it is as well that the need of entertaining social questions should be recognized in any way by our statesmen, for good or for evil. They will have to face serious difficulties. If any of your readers would like to see the state of mind of the English working-classes painted in the blackest colors, but by a man of ability and knowledge of his subject, they may turn to an article in Fraser for October, by Mr. Wright, who calls himself "the working engineer." The misery of large classes in our great towns, their growing discontent with the institutions of the country, and their despair of any improvement at home, and their consequent tendency to look to America and Australia as the only places of refuge, are set forth with considerable force. That such evils exist and that a dangerous degree of discontent is being generated, is, of course, undeniable; the spirit of the International is spread too widely to be pleasant. To what extent, however, this description is true in general may be a matter of doubt; and better symptoms are not wanting. I do not think much, to say the truth, of the coquetry between Lord Salisbury and Mr. Applegarth, the typical English peer and the typical artisan, for such unions are generally of brief duration. But I think it would be hard to deny that in many ways the feeling between the two classes of which these are specimens has been distinctly improved.

It has been very remarkable, to any one who looks back for a few years, to observe the progress of the recent strike at Newcastle. The workmen have on the whole triumphed; though the conclusion ultimately reached was called a compromise. They have established the direct reduction of the hours of labor. The curious thing, however, was the skill with which they fought the battle and the remarkable extent to which they were backed by public opinion. There were none of the old appeals to the "inexorable laws of political economy," or the condescending assurances to the workmen that they were cutting their own throats. Indeed, I should be induced to say that political economy was treated rather too superciliously, even by those who professed to believe in its teaching. But the workmen, as represented by a Mr. Burnett, the chairman of their league, succeeded in convincing people that they were sincere in desiring a reduction of time rather than an increase of wages; and in the controversy which was carried on between the combatants in the Times, they had, to a remarkable degree, the advantage in style as well as in argument. It was clear that they had very able leaders, and that the old plan of treating them de haut en bas was singularly misplaced. They knew, in short, how to get the public ear, as well as to carry their point. This, I think, is a remarkable fact, and, amongst other reasons for this, whatever revolutions may be taking place in this country and whatever reforms may be imperatively needed, it seems to be pretty clear that the working-classes, as trained by trades-unions, are rapidly becoming a power which will be able to make its demands heard effectually in Parliament. Violent revolution is improbable, because under such circumstances it is unnecessary. If, then, the artisans thoroughly make up their minds to carry a political change, it will be carried. It would be well if we were as sure that it would be a wise change, and that the same common sense which has been shown at Newcastle would be exhibited in other fields of action. But I must not be drawn into further speculation.

It seems desirable to say, however briefly, that the news of the burning of Chicago has just reached us. Every effort will, I am sure, be made to give a fitting practical expression to the sympathy which is everywhere felt. I will not repeat to you the commonplaces which fill the papers as to the sensation produced in various English towns; but I may say briefly that I hope and believe that this terrible disaster will at least contribute incidentally to illustrate the good feeling which is springing up in this country towards the United States.

Notes.

Messrs. J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, announce new editions of Hood's "Tylney Hall," Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," and Tennyson's Poems; the "Dessert Book," and "How to Make Confectionary."——Mr. Amasa Walker's "Science of Wealth" will be republished, in a condensed form, by J. B. Lippincott & Co., who also have in preparation "Seven Decades of the United States," by Governor Henry A. Wise, and "Legends and Lyrics," by Paul Hayne. The same publishers state that they have purchased, "at a large price," the advance sheets of the promised "Life of Charles Dickens," by John Forster.——Messrs. Rivington, London, have announced for publication, in October, the following among other theological works: "A Short Treatise on the Holy Catholic Church: Its Divine Ideal, Ministry, and Institutions," by Edward Meyrick Goulburn, D.D., and, by the same author, "The Gospel of the Childhood" (Luke ii. 41 to the end); "A Key to the Knowledge of Church History (Modern)," by John Henry Blunt, M.A.; also, edited by the same, "Dictionaries of Sects, Heresies, and Schools of Thought," by various writers; "Elements of Religion," lectures by Canon Liddon; Neale's "History of the Holy Eastern Church," edited, with a History of the Patriarchs of Constantinople, and an introduction, by the Rev. George Williams; "Fables respecting the Popes of the Middle Ages," from the German of Döllinger; "Physical Facts and Scripture Record; or, Eighteen Propositions for Geologists," by Rev. W. B. Galloway; and these three works, already named by us in previous summaries: Rev. Orby Shipley's "Glossary of Ecclesiastical Terms"; Dr. John Steiner's "Theory of Harmony"; and Miss Maria Francesca Rossetti's "A Shadow of Dante: being an Essay towards Studying Himself, his World, and his Pilgrimage," with illustrations.——Messrs. Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger have in press "Homo vs. Darwin;" "The Organization of Labor in accordance with Custom and the Laws of the Decalogue," by M. F. Le Play; "Living Female Writers of the South"; and a number of novels and juvenile books.——We have so often expressed our opinion of the value of the Jarves collection of paintings by the old masters, and the desirability of its being kept together, that we need only call the attention of our readers to the approaching sale of it at its present place of deposit, the Fine Arts Gallery of Yale College, on Thursday, November 9 (this day week), at ten o'clock A.M.

—Readers of the North American Review who take an intelligent interest in the body of speculations and hypotheses known under the comprehensive name of "Darwinism," will remember a remarkable article by Mr. Chauncey Wright, of Cambridge, published in the number for last July, in which, under the form of a review of a recent book by Mr. St. George Mivart, the Darwinian doctrine itself and certain of its developments are explicated, and the general position of the Darwinian forces improved by the pretty complete baffling and defeat of such attacks as Mr. Mivart and his friends and other assailants have for a long time been making upon it. It has not been Mr. Darwin's habit to go into the arena of controversy and defend the views of the Darwinists when assailed—partly, it is possible, for the same reason that made John Wilkes decline to defend the Wilkesites, because, namely, he himself had never been one. Whatever the reason has been, and whether Mr. Darwin is a Darwinist or not, he has been content usually to put his work before the scientific world and such other worlds as found themselves interested in it, and let it stand on its merits, without polemical championship on his part; but he, nevertheless, may have been pleased to find of a sudden so thorough a master of his books and so able an expositor of them as Mr. Wright doing battle for him of his own motion, and doing it with such effect. This pleasure may reasonably have been the greater because it has not always happened that Mr. Mivart, in combating Darwinian hypotheses, has been at pains—or, at all events, he has not always been successful—in stating with exactness the position which he was assailing. On the appearance of Mr. Wright's article, then, Mr. Darwin got leave from Messrs. J. R. Osgood & Co. to reprint it in a pamphlet, of which he has struck off a small edition for distribution among men of science interested in the subject. The pamphlet contains a page or two of matter which is not in the article as printed in the Review, but the addition, while worth having for itself, cannot be said to have importance as regards the purpose of the argument, and the Review article is quite as good as the pamphlet for the use of those who wish to inform themselves of Mr. Wright's views. The essay, we warn intending students of it, will not be found easy reading, though the writer evidently consulted the interests of the unlearned Darwinist in writing it, and in great part it is as clear as needs be, and almost a model of scientific exposition. Other parts of it, however, will be more readily understood at first reading by a scientific man who has spent some time and much thought on Darwinism and kindred subjects than by a wayfaring man. Such are the inherent difficulties of the subject that, unless care is taken in the reading, it is possible to err therein. Mr. Darwin's opinion, that it is the best deliberate or systematic reply that has yet been anywhere made to the opponents of the doctrine of evolution of itself, makes the article attractive.

—On Thursday, Oct. 26, at Lancaster, Ohio, died Thomas Ewing, senior, one of the most venerable and respected statesmen of the old school still remaining among us. He was born in West Virginia, Dec. 28, 1789, so that his life embraced the momentous period in modern history which opened with the French Revolution and closed with the conquest of France by Germany, and which is also co-extensive with the constitutional existence of the United States. In the government of his country, Mr. Ewing played a prominent part, twice as U.S. senator and twice as a member of the Cabinet—singularly enough, in administrations where the Vice-President succeeded upon the death of the President. He was Harrison's Secretary of the Treasury, and withdrew with his colleagues (save Webster) under Tyler; he was Taylor's Secretary of the Interior (the first incumbent), and retired under Fillmore. He was, while in political life, identified with the Whig party, and had anti-slavery leanings, if not strong convictions. His second case as a lawyer, in the town where he has died, was handed over to him by Mr. (afterwards Judge) Sherman, whose son, the present General, Mr. Ewing subsequently adopted, becoming at last also his father-in-law. He followed his own father to Athens Co., Ohio, early in 1798, at a time when Eastern emigrants had just begun to open up the wilderness and to plant there a "university." By his own efforts he acquired an education at this institution, and was its first A.B. Prior to this, as he himself has said, "the excessive use of alcohol was the indirect means of furnishing him with school-teachers," who were scholars, as he explains, "banished, no doubt, for intemperance." The changes which Mr. Ewing saw wrought on the face of this continent are marked by his passage down the Ohio in a flatboat, and the completion, in his lifetime, of the Pacific Railroad. He could, even at the age of eighty, remember well the first beef he tasted, which he thought "coarse and stringy, as compared with venison." He recalled, too, how, as a boy of twelve, reading aloud to his father and his hands, he found attentive listeners to a translation of the Æneid, and how

"At that point in the narrative where Æneas discloses to Dido his purpose of leaving her, and tells her of the vision of Mercury bearing the mandate of Jove, one of the men sprang to his feet, declared he did not believe a word of that—he had got tired of her, and it was all a made-up story as an excuse to be off, and it was a d——d shame, after what she had done for him. So the reputation of Æneas suffered by that day's reading" (p. 399, "History of Athens County").

—We do not know whether, with the literary forces at its command, the new German politico-literary weekly, Im neuen Reich ("In the New Empire," simultaneously with the rise of which, January, 1871, it was started), could not be made much more interesting, especially to non-Germans, than it now is; but we do know that it is a very readable and instructive periodical, which we should be glad to find in such American homes as are not unfamiliar with the language and current literature of Germany. Im neuen Reich is by its full title, if we understand it aright, limited to things connected with the activity of the German people in politics, literature, and art; but, in reality, it far transcends that sphere, and embraces subjects as foreign to it as the following—to notice only articles contained in the last ten numbers before us: "What makes Darwin popular?" (treated by Alfred Dove, the editor); the "Origin of the Dead Sea" (by Th. Nöldeke, the celebrated Biblical critic); the "Treaty of Washington" (correspondence from New York); "Shakespeare as an Observer of Insanity (by M. Bernays); the "History of the Capitoline Museum" (by Justi); "Russia in Asia" (by F. Marthe); "Periclean Structures" (by R. Schöne). The principal topics, however, are such as refer to the past and present of Germany, the development of the new empire claiming, of course, attention above all other topics. Gustav Freytag is one of the leading contributors. The tendency of the journal is liberal, with a slight and not very consistent leaning towards radicalism. Its tone is very moderate, its style clear and elevated, though occasionally tinctured by a sentimental optimism, mainly the result of the late great achievements of the Germans; and not a few of the articles betray how far these achievements have not only dazzled the eyes of the German people, but also perverted the sense of justice of many a German liberal. A correspondence on "universal military duty in Alsace-Lorraine" (in No. 30), which advocates the immediate conscription of the French youth in those provinces for service in the next war against their brethren and fatherland, is a shocking instance of patriotic perversion. Mr. L. W. Schmidt, of this city, is an agent of this periodical, which recommends itself by its form and print no less than by its contents.

—An article by Didolff, in the Historische Zeitschrift, calls attention to the interesting fact that the year 1870 was the thousand-year "Jubilee" of the territorial unity of Germany. In 870, after the death of Lothaire, Charles the Bald was obliged to agree to a partition treaty (at Mersen) with Louis of Germany, by which the German part of Lotharingia, east of the Meuse, was incorporated with the German kingdom. If for a few years it was somewhat wavering in its allegiance, submitting now to the king of the East-Franks, and now to the king of the West-Franks, yet on the whole this essentially German territory continued a part of the empire until modern times; and the events of last year have restored at last those portions of it which France had got into her possession, and made the political boundary coincide with the line of nationality. Another article, without signature, and therefore, it is probable, by the editor, Von Sybel, himself, discusses the Vatican Council from the point of view, in general, of Döllinger and the anti-infallibilists. After a sketch of the history of the Council and of the dogma of infallibility—in which the striking point is made that this was the first Council in which only ecclesiastics sat, and, since the theologians were excluded, only the higher clergy—the writer proceeds to speak of the future. He shows that the treaty which has heretofore existed between church and state assumes the Confession of Trent as its basis. If the church discards this traditional character, and its relation to the state and to other confessions is essentially altered, the contract is virtually broken, and the other party is freed from all its obligations. It is for Germany to say, then, whether the primacy of Rome is any longer to be acknowledged. Here comes in another historical anniversary. The year 70 severed the connection of the Christian church and the Jewish synagogue; the year 1870—witnessing the destruction of old Catholicism at the hands of the Pope himself, and of the temporal power at the hands of Victor Emanuel—opens the way to a new and free organization. "Andere reissen nieder"; he closes, "Du, Deutschland, baue auf!"

—Just at present, there seems to be no great activity in Paris among the publishers of books relating to the fine arts. Mr. Christern has received the parts that have been issued of the "Archives of the Commission on the Historic Monuments of France," published by order of his late Excellency, M. Achille Fould, Minister of State. For the present, this publication is suspended. It consists of folio plates, with a letter-press illustrating the restorations of the churches, palaces, and public buildings of France, undertaken and carried on by the late government, with the assistance of the ablest architects. The work of restoration in which Napoleon III. was so much interested, and on which he spent so much money, was one of the chief elements in the bread-and-circus policy with which he kept his people quiet so long. It appealed to the educated, art-loving worshippers of the past with which France abounds, and it was always splendidly, often tastefully, though, it must be confessed, sometimes barbarously carried out, as in the case of the château of St. Germain. Other publications, relating to the fine arts, received lately by Mr. Christern, are "Instrumenta Ecclesiastica: Choice Objects of Religious Art, belonging to the Middle Age and to the Renaissance, exhibited at Malines in September, 1864." The objects in this work, which does not bear the imprint of any publisher, are all photographed, and though the mechanical part of the work is not done in the most satisfactory manner, the objects photographed are very interesting to the lover of such things, and to the man instructed in them. Such a book will form a valuable additional atlas of plates to Viollet-le-Duc's encyclopœdia of architecture or to his book on furniture. "Studies for Funeral Monuments suited to Modern Times," by J. Boussard (Paris: Baudry), is a pretending atlas of designs, very few of which we find pleasing, though we confess to a taste in such matters that is far from catholic. We confess, too, to thinking that the French taste, in the matter of monuments to the dead, is the worst in the world, its only rival in affectation and in ostentation being the American. Among French designers, M. Boussard is not the worst we could name, and, if this should be thought damnably faint praise, it is the best that, in our judgment, he deserves.

REVISION OF THE UNITED STATES STATUTES.*

In the year 1866, Congress authorized the President "to appoint three persons as commissioners to revise, simplify, arrange, and consolidate all statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, which shall be in force at the time such commissioners may make the final report of their doings." The law establishing this commission provides for a systematic arrangement of matter, for the omission of redundant or obsolete enactments, and for the "making such alterations as may be necessary to reconcile the contradictions, supply the omissions, and amend the imperfections of the original text"; but it does not contemplate any substantial change in the provisions of the statutes themselves, similar to that made by the revisers in New York. The work of the commissioners is, therefore, not creative; it consists chiefly in devising and executing a plan of classification, by which all the existing and permanent statutory matter shall be brought together, condensed, and arranged. The Board, which now consists of Mr. Victor M. Barringer, Mr. Benjamin Vaughn Abbot, and Mr. Charles James, has made public the results of its labors as far as reached. It is proposed that the revised statutes of the United States shall be divided into five parts. Part first will contain the revision already described, and will be separated into seventy-six titles. Part second will simply be a list of acts repealed. It is conceded that these two portions will exhaust the authority given by Congress. The commissioners will prepare, however, a third part, which will comprise all such public acts as cannot be included in the revision, and which will be republished without alteration, merely for purposes of convenience; a fourth part, relating exclusively to the District of Columbia; and a fifth part containing treaties. Of the seventy-six titles into which the revision proper is to be divided, they have already drafted, printed, and distributed for examination Title I., "General Provisions," containing three chapters; Title II., "The Legislative Power," containing nine chapters; Title III., "The Executive Power," containing two chapters; Title LXXIII., "Of Crimes," containing nine chapters; and titles relating to the slave-trade, to the flag and seal, to the militia, to the seat of government, and to arms, armories, and arsenals. Messrs. Barringer and Abbot, without the concurrence of the third commissioner as it appears, have addressed a circular letter to the committees of Congress having the matter in charge, reporting with great minuteness the methods pursued by the commission, with the present results, and urging that Congress take speedy or immediate action upon the revision as far as completed.

We fully recognize the importance, and even necessity, of such a revision as the statute contemplates; we go further, and desire that this commission should be clothed with authority to propose some radical changes in the body of the law itself. We cannot, however, agree with the Messrs. Barringer and Abbot in the suggestion which they make; and we hope that Congress will postpone all final action in the matter until the system which the commissioners adopt has been completed by them, and has been subjected to the close and discriminating scrutiny of professional and business men throughout the country. We purpose to offer some reasons in support of this position, and these will necessarily involve a partial discussion and criticism of the plan recommended by the Board and of the work already done by them.

Congress, through the means of this commission, is about to legislate for a long future. The system accepted by them will for a considerable period of time be fixed. We cannot anticipate any substantial changes in it when once it has passed into the condition of positive law. For better or for worse, it will give form and character to the permanent jurisprudence of the nation. It will be the nucleus about which further additions will be grouped, the foundation upon which the subsequent structure will be built. These facts show that if a revision is important, and even necessary, it is no less important and necessary that the revision should be as perfect in its outlines and general principles as knowledge, experience, and care can make it. As we have already remarked, the principal duty of the commissioners is to devise and execute a system of classification. Simple and easy as this task may seem to some, it is in the highest degree difficult. The very fragmentary nature of the national legislation increases this difficulty. We do not hesitate to say that, with all the aids to be derived from the experience of other countries and from the labors of jurists, it would be easier for the commission to frame a complete code of jurisprudence upon a basis at once scientific and practical, than to frame a satisfactory revision of the United States statutes. The commissioners plainly appreciate the difficulty. They tell us, in their notes to the first title, that five systems of classification have been suggested: the chronological method, an alphabetical arrangement, an arrangement based upon the order of clauses in the Constitution, the logical or philosophic method, and the practical or manual method, which, they say, deserves consideration. This last "would consist in a collocation of acts guided by the convenience of those who are chiefly concerned in using them; thus placing, as far as possible, statutes guiding the action of courts and judicial officers in one division, statutes affecting those concerned with the collection of the revenue in another, and so with other topics." Among these different plans we are told that "the decision reached has been to employ the logical method as governing the general arrangement of the work; modifying it freely in all questions of detail by the considerations of the practical convenience of those who are to use the statutes." The result which the commissioners must aim at is to make the particular enactments of the revised statutes easily accessible to business men, to lawyers, to courts, and to legislators.

We learn from the preliminary remarks to one of the titles that, "in classifying the various provisions of the statutes for revision, the commissioners have followed the unvarying rule that no provision may be repeated; none may be inserted twice under different titles." How shall that provision be placed in order that its position may be natural or necessary, and that it may be turned to almost as a matter of course, with a reasonable certainty of finding it? This is the problem which the gentlemen must solve. From the antecedents of some of the commission, and from the titles themselves which have been published, we are afraid that too much reliance will be placed upon what has been described as the "practical" method of arrangement. The fault of this method is that it is based upon and follows no conceivable system. If it was possible to ascertain the practice of all the persons who shall have occasion to use the statutes, and if there were any uniformity in this practice, then we should have a basis of common convenience. But it is impossible to ascertain any such practice, nor would there be any uniformity in it when discovered. In fact, the gentlemen of the commission have no standard of personal convenience upon which to proceed except their own. If the revision is arranged upon the basis of "practical convenience," as described by the commissioners, it will represent simply the habits of Mr. Barringer, of Mr. Abbot, and of Mr. James, and perhaps of no one else. In the portions already drafted, the commissioners have yielded too much, we fear, to the notion that such or such a man would look for a particular provision under a certain head; and the result is a lack of system, and an absolute antagonism of principles in the arrangement of some important titles. One example will illustrate our meaning. Title III. is concerning the "Executive Power." It contains two chapters; one on "Presidential elections," and one on "the powers and compensation of the President." By the "practical method," as before described, we should expect to find in the latter chapter a complete enumeration of the powers which the chief magistrate may wield. In the text, however, the only powers mentioned are to appoint an official household, to remit part of a double punishment, to treat with a State for the acquisition of land for public buildings, and to control or dispose of land conveyed to persons for the use of the United States. This is certainly a meagre show. Turning to the preliminary remarks, we learn that "the powers of the President, and the mode in which it is his duty to act with reference to given subjects, are placed under the titles comprising the subject-matter of his official action"; that is, are scattered through the whole revision. Assuming this to be correct, all of the four topics just enumerated, except the first, should be taken from the chapter in which they are found, and distributed under other titles. But is the same principle carried out in treating of other subjects? In the list of seventy-six titles we find one called "The Judiciary," and no other one having the slightest reference to the practice and proceedings in courts. The preliminary remarks to the title "Crimes" inform us that "what commonly passes under the name of 'Criminal Procedure' will not be found in the present draft of this title. The place of trial, and the manner of trial, and the like particulars, have been allotted to the title on the 'Judiciary,' which is in the course of preparation." The same is evidently true of civil procedure. Everything, therefore, pertaining to a civil action or remedy, or to a criminal prosecution, is to be found in the "Judiciary." We are confident, in the first place, that no lawyer would ever think of looking for these particular subjects under that head, and, in the second place, that the commissioners have abandoned the principle which they professed to take for their guide in preparing the title upon the executive. We urge upon them that one system must be pursued throughout the entire revision. Better a faulty method than no method at all; better any principle than the abnegation of principle. The "practical convenience" scheme will produce universal inconvenience.

* "Revision of the United States Statutes, as drafted by the Commissioners appointed for that purpose." Sundry Titles. Washington. 1871.

Our space will not permit an examination of each title that has been completed; we shall, therefore, confine our further discussion to the one on "Crimes," because it was first published, and is surpassed by none in importance. The commissioners say that as the legislative power of Congress is of special and limited jurisdiction, the system of classifying crimes which has been usually adopted in general codes and by judicial writers is practically impossible. "It has been deemed best to attempt a scheme of arrangement founded rather upon the grants of legislative power contained in the Constitution, as near as may be, or upon the considerations which, under the general operations of the fundamental law, have led Congress to denounce and punish particular offences." They have, therefore, separated the title into nine chapters, of which the following are the heads indicating the matters contained in each: General provisions; crimes against the existence of the Government; crimes arising within the maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the Government; crimes against justice; crimes against the operations of the Government, including forgeries and frauds, counterfeiting coin, postal crimes, etc.; official misconduct; crimes against the elective franchise and the rights of citizens; punishment of accessaries; concerning discipline and treatment of prisoners. It is due to the commissioners to say that this scheme is not satisfactory to themselves. To this whole plan of classification there are many and grave objections, and we are confident that it should be abandoned. The facts which have been chosen as the basis of the arrangement have no connection with the nature of the crime; they are mere jurisdictional facts, and do not in the least indicate what the crime is. We might as well, in framing a penal code, divide crimes into those over which a court of sessions has jurisdiction, and those over which a court of oyer and terminer has jurisdiction. Again, the system proposed by the commissioners makes it necessary that provisions defining crimes of exactly the same name, nature, and grade should be repeated. Thus, we might have murder or robbery on the high seas, or within districts under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and murder and robbery in resisting the operations of the Government. The title, as completed, contains several instances of this reduplication, and Congress will be constantly increasing their number. But, in fact, the difficulty in the way of a comprehensive classification, according to subject-matter, does not exist. The title should be framed with a view to what Congress may do, what powers it possesses under the Constitution, not with a view merely to what it has done. Congress possesses ample powers of criminal legislation, but has not, as yet, exercised all of them; that it will in future exert them more freely, and legislate over a wider range of subjects, the experience of the last few years makes certain. Within the maritime and admiralty jurisdiction, certainly if without the jurisdiction of any particular State, and within districts and territories under its exclusive control, it may denounce and provide for the punishment of every species of offence. Here, then, is ample opportunity for the outline of a complete system of classification. Again, by virtue of its powers to enact laws on a large variety of subjects, and to provide for the enforcement of these laws and for the punishment of resistance to their enforcement—in other words, within the sphere of resistance to the operations of the Government—it may certainly define and provide for the punishment of all crimes of violence against the person, from homicides down to assaults and batteries, excepting a few which can by no possibility have any connection with the administration of the laws, such, for example, as rape. Again, because the United States is the owner or custodian of property, and because, by means of its system of national banks, a vast amount of private property is brought under its jurisdiction, almost all crimes against property fall within the scope of Congressional legislation. We have thus suggested enough to show that a comprehensive and orderly system of classification of penal offences is possible, and, if possible, then necessary. The basis of such a system must primarily be the essential nature of the delict itself. This being determined upon, all the accidental facts could easily be provided for. Thus, murder should be once defined, and then the places where or the circumstances under which murder may be committed, so as to be justiciable in the national courts, should be stated. The same method should be followed with other crimes.

In looking through the substance of this title, we find a few matters which we cannot pass by without comment. The second chapter relates, of course, to treason, misprision of treason, sedition, and the like. The only provision concerning treason is a section declaring its punishment. The commissioners say, in a note, "The Act of 30th April, 1790, is omitted as redundant. That statute is a mere re-enactment of Article III., Section 3, of the Constitution." If, therefore, this title should be adopted as it stands, there would be no statute defining what treason is and who may commit it. The Act of 1790 omitted by the commissioners was passed at the very first session of Congress, and provides that, "if any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States shall levy war, etc., such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of treason." If this clause is finally rejected, could there be any conviction of treason, and would the crime itself exist? We doubt it. We cannot conceive that an indictment could be based upon the constitutional provision itself. That provision is not so much a grant of power as a restriction. "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them," etc. The meaning is clearly the same as though the section read, "Nothing shall be treason except levying war," etc. The language is negative, not affirmative. The general grant of judicial power in the first and second sections of Article III. is far more positive in its terms; and yet it is settled that, without a statute giving effect to this grant, the courts could do nothing. But even if the Constitution does in terms create the offence, it does not declare who may be guilty of it. Here the statute comes in, and, in accordance with the common-law doctrine, says that the offence can only be committed by persons owing allegiance to the United States, which allegiance may undoubtedly be that of a citizen or the temporary duty of a denizen. We can conceive of no reason for dropping the old Act as redundant. Even if there only existed the vaguest doubt, that doubt should be removed by restoring the statute of 1790.

Passing to other provisions of the title, we find a very general absence of definitions and descriptions of crimes. Thus: "Every person who [within the territorial jurisdiction or on the high seas] commits the crime of murder . . . shall suffer death." We know that all these sections are taken from old statutes. The commissioners have not been directly authorized to make substantial modifications and improvements. This leads us back to a point mentioned at the commencement of our review. We hope the power given to the board will be enlarged. These statutes merely mentioning the crime "murder," and the like, require the courts to apply the old common-law definitions. The penal laws of nearly all the States have long ago been reformed; they have become the expressions of higher principles than those which animated the Draconian code of the ancient common law. It is disgraceful to the nation that its penal legislation, alone among the enlightened states of Christendom, still reflects the temper and ideas of a barbarous age.

We must add, in conclusion, that what we have said has been in no captious and fault-finding spirit. We know somewhat of the difficulties which the commissioners have to encounter; we appreciate the magnitude and importance of their work; we can plainly see how thorough and conscientious have been their labors. They have asked for criticism, and we have responded candidly, certain that, if there be any merit in our suggestions, the board will give them their due weight.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR OCTOBER.

THE opening paper of the October North American is by Professor J. D. Whitney, and is entitled "Volcanism and Mountain Building." Scientific men will not need our commendation of it, but we may properly bespeak for it the attention of general readers. Such readers will find in it a spirited presentation of a great mass of facts gathered together by a geologist whose extensive experience, in fields affording most excellent examples of the phenomena he discusses, give him a weighty claim to be listened to as having authority. The article abounds in suggestions concerning the physics of the exterior of the globe which will make it of great value to the student, while the vigor of the criticism which it applies to some of the most considerable contributions made to orographic geology, cannot but provoke among the magnates of the science a discussion which may or may not be warm, but which can hardly be otherwise than profitable. Incidentally, Professor Whitney attacks the modern theories of the metamorphic origin of granite rocks; but his principal object appears to be first to call attention to Richthafen's theory of volcanic activity, and, secondly, to demolish all existing theories of mountain building, especially those put forth by Messrs. H. D. Rogers and James Hall. Doubtless this article, and two that have preceded it in the Review, sooner or later, will be obtainable in book-form.

Much as may be everywhere read on the subject, by far the best essay that we have anywhere seen in the controversy between the friends of "modern science" as a means of education, and the friends of "classical training," is Professor W. D. Whitney's essay, entitled "Language and Education." It is an essay for which the writer will, we think, receive the thanks of almost every one who has tried to bring the discussion to a conclusion satisfying to his own mind. Professor Whitney sets out by saying that we, in this country, cannot wish too heartily and cannot work too earnestly for the success of all efforts towards improving the lower grades of education: "We have undertaken to let our government and the constitution of our society represent the average of virtue and intelligence in the whole community. We cannot now abandon the plan if we would, and we ought not to flinch from it if we could; but it is an undertaking fraught with danger; we shall tear one another in pieces if we do not succeed in restraining and transmuting, by educational influences, the aggressive selfishness of individuals and communities, of wider but limited classes, and of aristocracies. Men will strive after what seems to them happiness; and to raise the ideal of happiness, to make men really love better things, is the object at which we are directly to aim, if we would benefit and save our country." But, he continues, the progress of the lower education depends in no small degree on that of the higher, so he proceeds to examine briefly the condition of university education in America, and, of course, is obliged to offer for the consideration of educators his views as to the lively if not violent contest going on here and in England between classical and scientific studies; and, ranging himself on the side of linguistics—which has certainly been put upon its defence by many extremists of one sort, as it has certainly been put in needless jeopardy by pedants of another sort—he devotes his essay to taking "such a view of education on the one hand, and of language on the other, as to show us what is the relation of the latter to the former, and what the place of linguistic and philological study in the general scheme of human training." He is, however, not in the least polemical, in the bad sense of the word; and of the two classes of disputants who might be profited by what he has to say, if they would carefully peruse it, we do not know that those persons who make the old-fashioned "disciplinary" claim for the classics will not find themselves more specifically rebuked than those friends of the sciences who regard Professor Whitney as "a consumer and not a producer," and those others who, with Professor Huxley, are inclined to think that poetry is, for the most part, "sensual caterwauling." "The essence of discipline is simply preparative," he says; "that is a disciplinary study which duly leads the way to something that is to come after"; and he sums up under this head by saying: "No discipline without valuable knowledge; all valuable knowledge available for discipline; the discipline in proportion to the amount and value of the knowledge acquired: these are fundamental truths in the theory of education."

We have not space to quote from the more interesting parts of the essay in which Mr. Whitney deals with that particular phase of his topic as to which he is qualified by his own special training to speak. We would gladly do so, for we fear the Review will be seen by too few of the readers whom it would most benefit to become acquainted with Mr. Whitney's thoughts on this important subject, and we are sure we should be doing good service in assisting to disseminate them as widely as possible. Still, ideas of this degree of value, though it may be impossible to pour them in directly where they seem most needed, are yet sure to be infiltrated sooner or later, and that, no doubt, is the best mode of imparting them to the public mind. We may remark that the essay gains on a second and third perusal, and that it will be found to repay close and heedful study.

"The Misgovernment of New York" is an article in which Mr. Charles Nordhoff seeks to find a remedy for the evils under which this community is laboring. In fact, he suggests a remedy, which in substance is this: The people of the city of New York are fit for self-government, and should be entrusted with the management of their own affairs, instead of being, as now, to a very great extent, under the control of officers and boards of officers whom the Legislature at Albany has made independent of the citizens. Let the people elect a mayor who shall hold office during but a short term, who shall appoint all his subordinates, and who shall be directly responsible to the citizens both for himself and for the men he appoints. The city judiciary also the mayor shall appoint, the judges holding office for life, unless removed for cause. As for the legislative department of the municipal government, it should consist, Mr. Nordhoff thinks, of a common council composed of councilmen elected not on what is called a "general ticket," and by the voters at large throughout the city, but on a district ticket, by the voters of the district in which each individually dwells. Obviously, Mr. Nordhoff's scheme of applying to New York the form of government which has been found satisfactory when applied to the whole Union has its good points, and no one will doubt that if it were put into a charter and tried in this city, it would, for a certain length of time—be the same shorter or longer—work better than some other forms of government that have been tried here within the twenty years last past.

It is hardly worth mentioning, but it is odd to find the writer of an essay such as this we have just been glancing at stopping all at once to put into his enumeration of the blessings a responsible mayor would bring in his train this boon—that he might even by-and-by be goaded into abolishing the absurdity of ringing the bells when a fire is discovered, the telegraphic alarm having already informed the firemen, who alone can usefully appear at a fire. There is something of an absurdity in it, no doubt; if absurdity is precisely the term for a practice which, as Mr. Nordhoff points out, signals thieves and pickpockets to favorable fields. But we should say that it would have occurred to but few writers, curious in their art, to enumerate this particular evil among those which are to be destroyed when once we have secured local autonomy and our rights as freemen.

"French and German Diplomacy after Sadowa" is a clear, intelligible, and, as we judge, correct and true account of the diplomatic contest—to call it so—between Napoleon and Bismarck, from the time just preceding the war of 1866 to that just preceding the war of 1870. It is by a writer unknown to most of our readers, Professor C. K. Adams, who fills a chair of history in the University of Michigan. His article deserves the praise—not too commonly deserved by this sort of articles—of being to all appearance not only well informed, but also candid and unbiassed. The "quidnunc" of a hundred years ago, who knew "What the Swede intends and what the Turk," and the secret article in the Spanish treaty, is nowadays pretty thoroughly gone out of literature, except, indeed, as a despatcher of telegrams; but it is still certainly not rare to find in literature of more pretensions than newspaper literature the self-blinded partisan who, whether or not he is full of misinformation or information as to political facts, is as good as an insane man or a seventh son of a seventh son when he comes to moralize events and prophesy results. Unusually large the crop of such prophets and philosophers has been during the past two or three years, and it is agreeable to come upon a writer who, without taking occasion to say anything very profound, treats sensibly of the matter. The North American's critical notices, by the way, include one which handles cleverly and amusingly a fair specimen of the wild kind of political writing to which we refer. It is the one which appears in the table of contents as "The Fall of England," and which reviews the "Dorking" literature.

"The Regeneration of Italy" is an essay by Mr. E. Gryzanowski, a gentleman who has been for years a philosophical student of European politics in the narrower as well as in the wider sense, and who, so far as we know, has never written anything that is not exceptionally worthy the attention of those who are interested in the topics which interest him. He has, too, an exceptional gift of attracting and holding attention, for there are not many foreigners—or Englishmen or Americans either, for that matter—who use our language with more at once of precision and force than he, and not very many writers for the periodical press whose opinions and reflections better deserve to be well presented. The opinions are, to be sure, sometimes a little pronounced, we think, and put forth with too little limitation, and the reflections do not in absolutely every instance strike the reader as perfectly sound, though they are almost sure to be, at all events, interesting. It is, for example, not what would be called very profitable speculating to ponder the question why the island of Sardinia makes no great figure in history; not a very valuable conclusion to conclude that the island has no history because it has never had a sovereign of its own, and is at some distance from the mainland. It would seem as if a question to which that is the answer were hardly worth asking. It is many generations since navigation brought Sardinia near the mainland, and kings were never scarce where subjects were of a desirable kind, and numerous enough.

Perhaps a more favorable illustration of Mr. Gryzanowski's tendency to philosophizing is afforded by this passage, though we confess to a fear that in quoting it we may somewhat discredit our praises of a moment since. That it completely explains the fact, if it be a fact, that the lettered Italian is a passionless being when compared with his unlettered compatriot, is something to which we have not committed ourselves. Still, as we have said, it is, at all events, interesting, and no one will mind saying that it has a great deal of truth in it: "It may not be generally known, but it is true beyond question, that the natural rapidity of human thought and emotion is enormously retarded, first by the habit of articulate speech, later by the power and habit of reading and writing. Deaf and dumb persons [deaf-mutes] are generally quick, passionate, and vindictive. With them, sight, resentment, and action follow each other with such rapidity that bystanders sometimes fail to discover their logical connection. And people who cannot read or write have this in common with the deaf and dumb, that their speech is not strictly articulate. They do not think in sentences, but in ejaculations, and they get through a long string of successive emotions with a rapidity unknown to those who cannot help distinguishing between nouns and verbs. The changes wrought by elementary education in the Italian savage are, indeed, surprising. The writing Italian not only loses the remarkable retentiveness of his memory, which is, of course, a great loss, but he also loses his quickness of resentment and of action, which is a gain and a blessing to him. The educated classes in Italy are altogether sedate, and seemingly passionless," etc., etc. Perhaps, however, now that the reading and writing Italian has a country, and something to do besides archæology and the emendating of Petrarca, and other sedentary pursuits, he may become more violent. Mr. Gryzanowski's readers may, by the way, find it well, after reading what we have quoted from him in regard to the power of self-restraint which is gained by learning to use articulate speech, to compare the passage with what Professor Whitney has to say concerning the influence exerted on the individual and on the race by the learning of a language.

There are six critical notices this month, and they compare favorably, for weight and learning, with the rest of the number, which, taken altogether, is a very good one, with nothing bad in it, and much that is very good, and having, indeed, no fault except the good-sized fault, that it is deficient, almost to destitution, in purely literary matter, and that, for a "Review," it notices not many books. Those which it does notice, however, it treats with all the customary care. They are these: Delbruck's "Uses of the Conjunctive and Optative in Sanskrit and Greek"; Dr. J. F. Clarke's "Ten Great Religions of the World"; the sixth edition of Professor Max Müller's "Lectures on the Science of Language"; the second and third volumes of Greene's "Life of Major-General Nathanael Greene"; Professor A. C. Fraser's edition of "Berkeley's Works"; and the "Battle of Dorking"—to the remarks upon which we have already referred. The initials "C. S. P." are appended to the review of Berkeley, and, doubtless, they stand for Mr. Charles S. Peirce, who, it is probable, has of all men paid most attention to the subject which he handles in this essay. It is much more than a mere notice of Mr. Fraser's volumes, and we must reserve till next week what we have to say about it.

Of the other book reviews, the most noticeable is that in which Professor Max Müller is put in anything but an agreeable position. It would seem sometimes as if, in England also as well as in the United States, the constant attitude of condescension which is imposed upon the savan in his intercourse with his inerudite neighbors is apt to induce in him a frame of mind which is hostile to a graceful humility, not to say injurious to sound habits of thinking and writing. Over here we see plenty of it, and have seen more than one distinguished person's usefulness impaired by a long course of arrogance and of pity for us. And there have been signs before now that something of much the same kind was happening in England.

THE MAGAZINES FOR NOVEMBER.

THE November Galaxy has several articles that are worth reading, and one that is a contribution to history. It is the beginning of an account, by Ex-Secretary Welles, of the measures taken by the Navy Department for the capture of New Orleans, and it has very much of the satisfactory quality that belongs to writing done not for its own sake but because the writer is in possession of facts which it is important should be known. Its business-like character makes it good reading, and, apart from any such pleasure that it gives, the reader finds himself thinking better of the navy and of the Ex-Secretary than was common when, nine or ten years ago, we all in our haste were denouncing the navy for inefficiency, cursing the Alabama, and stigmatizing Mr. Welles as the "old man of the sea," forgetting that he was a Secretary without a navy, necessarily ignorant as to the loyalty of very many of the officers in service, and burdened with the almost overburdening task of setting on foot naval workshops and stores for the preparation of all kinds of supplies. It will be surprising if it does not turn out that public opinion concerning him is not to undergo thorough revision, as already it has no doubt been in part revised. Comparatively impassive as Mr. Welles seemed during the war, and free from anxiety as to his popularity at all events, not to say his reputation, he now shows an honorable solicitude to stand justified in the second thought of his countrymen and before history. Equally now and then his course is of good and needed example. Without dwelling upon it too much for the interest of his own dignity, Mr. Welles lets us know one of the causes why he got fewer good words than some others, and was, indeed, roundly abused at the time when Mr. Cameron, for example, was nothing less than our "patriotic and energetic War Minister." In speaking of the naval successes at Hatteras Inlet and at Port Royal, he says that > "Both expeditions originated in the Navy Department. They were quietly planned, and matured with a secrecy unknown to the military operations of that period. Hence, probably, the correspondents and writers of the day, who usually obtained their first information of events through the War Department, or from army officers, misstated and gave erroneous accounts of these and other expeditions, and not unfrequently awarded credit to military officers which strictly belonged to naval commanders. Naval officers were invariably prohibited from giving information of naval movements for publication, and newspaper correspondents, always inquisitive, and generally intelligent, were, for this reason, carefully excluded from the expeditions, and, as far as possible, from all knowledge in regard to naval operations."

Hence arose heartburnings, and piques, and perversions of fact, which are now embodied in the histories, so that we have, for instance, not "Flag-officer Stringham's Expedition to Hatteras," but "Maj.-Gen. B. F. Butler's Expedition to Hatteras," and the like. There is to be more of Mr. Welles's article, which will be more interesting in the next instalments than in this, but which is good from the beginning.

Another article relating to the war is by General Imboden, of the Confederate service, who sets down with straightforwardness some reminiscences of General Lee and General "Stonewall" Jackson, which are not particularly valuable, but which it is, nevertheless, well and pleasant to have. General Lee, it appears, was certainly never sanguine of success for the Confederacy, and we should say, taking General Imboden's testimony as conclusive, that he can hardly be said to have ever been so much as hopeful. Of General Imboden's reminiscences, also, there are to be further instalments.

We believe there is not much else in this number of the Galaxy that will attract any but habitual readers of magazines. Mr. "Carl Benson" has some sensible remarks to make on various topics; but there surely seems to be a vastly disproportionate deal of creaking in the vehicle that carries his thought when the intrinsic value of the thought is considered. There is actually a woodcut, "a simple diagram," to illustrate the truth, or rather the occasional falsity, of the saying, that a man is known by the company he keeps—or "the Noscitur a Socio Fallacy," as "Carl Benson" calls it. "Socius," he justly remarks, must be construed with a certain reasonable sense of proximity. The example of a man who lives in Russia, or who lived two centuries ago, will hardly be relevant for the State of Massachusetts, A.D. 1871. Still, as we say, if there is sometimes something to laugh at in "Carl Benson's" way of presenting his opinions, they usually embody some sound sense. Another good article is on "The Pike Poetry"; that is to say, its criticism of Messrs. Hay and Harte is not good criticism of poetry; but it appears to be honest and careful throughout, as well as right more often than wrong. It is, however, easily possible to be radically wrong in criticism of poetry, and, when that happens, to be right in places is not to make good criticism, but is only to be very much less tiresome than the mass of writers who welcome or denounce new poets on account of their religious views, say, or for this or that entirely superficial reason. Why, for instance, in talking about poetry, should one say that there is more poetry in Mr. Harte's stories than he will put into his verses if he writes verses for a lifetime? The fact seems to be that in all essentials the verses and the prose are one and the same thing, but that the author succeeds in being perhaps more objective and less sentimentalistic in his verse than in his prose, while, on the other hand, he makes more obvious failures in verse than in prose, because in his verse he attempts poetry, and has more or less ill-success according as he goes further or less far away from the figure-painting which is the work he does best, if, indeed, it is not the only work in which he can be said to do well at all. In other words, it should not be said that either in prose or verse has he anything to do with poetry, nor that "The Heathen Chinee," with its moral, is not much better than all the "dialect" verse and all the noble-gambler prose. The sentiment or sentimentality in that piece is nothing; and the figure-painting is coarse and hasty enough; but what there is of the latter, conjoined with the fortunate embodiment in phrase of the brutal Caucasian "platform-plank," that "we are ruined by Chinese cheap labor," and that as soon as we cannot cheat the Chinaman, we must knock him on the head—these two elements make "The Heathen Chinee" infinitely better than anything else of Mr. Harte's. The cynical humor and brutality under the exaggeration of Truthful James's "Society upon the Stanislaus," entitle that to the second place; and these two of Mr. Harte's performances are confirmatory of the opinion, to put it briefly, that the less of himself there is in his work, the stronger and better it is likely to be. However, we had only meant to say that the Galaxy critic of "The Pike Poetry" says several things worth hearing.

For the rest, the Galaxy has more of Anthony Trollope's and Mrs. Edwards's continued stories; a short story by H. James, jr., not of his best; a scientific miscellany; a "Galaxy Club Room," or humorous department, of a feebleness that forebodes demise; and an article by Mr. Justin McCarthy on "The Two Newmans." This last is like most that is written by Mr. McCarthy, who must be extremely useful about a magazine office. Apparently he would write with equal readiness on Miss Pauline Markham or the procession of the equinoxes, accordingly as there should be demand at the news-depots for articles on the one more than the other. John Henry Newman and F. W. Newman, "par nobile fratrum," as he calls them, form Mr. McCarthy's subject in this article. We may say here that it is doubtless a mistake to suppose that J. H. Newman is less known in this country than his brother. There are the old Abolition circles, to be sure, who knew Professor Newman as a sincere and courageous though crotchety "friend of the country"; but, on the other hand, there are the Anglicans whose communion J. H. Newman left, and the Romanists whose communion he joined, amid loud welcomings from them and loud laments from his former fellow-believers, and, besides these, there are large numbers of readers of the best English literature, or, rather, the best English writing of our time, who hold J. H. Newman in honor while they know his brother mainly as one of the translators of Homer. This is not a great matter. But a man should be on his guard even when he is writing only for the magazines. Again, Mr. Disraeli is a very wicked man, no doubt, and no supporter of Garibaldi, as Mr. McCarthy is, but that is not a reason for saying that he does not know English. In his "Lothair," Disraeli says that Newman's going over to Rome is an act that "has been apologized for, but never explained"; in spite of which witticism, Disraeli probably has Latin and Greek and English enough to know that Newman's "Apologia" was not an apology for his course, but a defence of it. And, indeed, not all men who have read that book will say that Disraeli's characterization of it is unjust or untrue. It may be worth while, too, to say, as we think we have said before, that the often-quoted passage in praise of "England's Saxon Bible" of which Mr. McCarthy speaks, was not written by Newman, but by F. W. Faber. That is not the sort of "noble and touching apostrophe" that Newman writes.

In Lippincott's, Mr. Whymper's "Scrambles Among the Alps" continues to be the most readable article, and the illustrations also are good, being well reproduced. In these chapters Mr. Whymper gets a fall of two hundred feet or so, not sheer, but in seven or eight twenty-five foot stages, and which he says was, in some respects, not disagreeable. His memory, however, is not now so retentive as formerly, and he lost permanently the tips of both his ears, as well as received some cuts, which were painful temporarily, for the guides rubbed vinegar and salt into them, after the custom of the country. "Ouida" begins a short story which has promise, and which will be finished in the December number of the magazine. Mr. Charles Warren Stoddard writes with customary smoothness and good feeling of "A California Seaside"; and Mr. Amasa Walker, in a short article which will bear quotation in all the country papers, asserts and maintains that the currency of this country to-day has no more relation to gold than it has to potatoes, and enquires how long the people are going to tolerate this engine of impoverishment.

Readers of Tennyson will be pleased with Mr. E. C. Stedman's article in the Atlantic. Mr. Stedman, who has been for some years working at "Theocritus," undertakes to point out those poems and passages of the Sicilian's which Mr. Tennyson has done him the honor—that appears to be somewhere near Mr. Stedman's view of the matter—to make use of in writing "Dora," and "Audley Court," and "Edwin Morris," and "The Golden Year," and "Walking to the Mail," etc. So far as we know, Mr. Stedman discovers in "Theocritus" more of Mr. Tennyson than has ever before been found of him in one place. Mr. Stedman, we are glad to see, is a warm friend of "a broad and elegant culture," as distinguished from that idolatrous worship of the Second Aorist which is preached by so many instructors in our so-called institutions of learning.

Other articles in the November Atlantic are the Fifth Part of Mr. Howells's "Wedding Journey," with the disastrous quarrel of the newly-wedded pair—Isabella going upstairs to her room, away from Basil, and sitting down desolate "with all her things on"; more of Mr. De Forest's "Kate Beaumont," and of Mr. Fields's "Whispering Gallery," which still talks of Dickens; an article by Mr. Clarence King about a family of Missouri Pike County wanderers, whom he fell in with somewhere in the Far West; the Fourth Part of Mr. H. James's "Watch and Ward"; some rather laudatory book-notices, and a description of the mad-houses in Constantinople which bears the title of "The Bedlams of Stamboul." This last has a quantity of desultory but apparently correct and reasonably useful information, conveyed with a sort of smartness that is not altogether pleasant, nor wholly unpleasant. It reminds one of the conversation of the mess-room, where, in the scarcity of topics of conversation such as can be freely handled in an unselected company of persons who yet must live together, each gentleman is expected to play the good companion, and pay a fair quota of such jokes as he may be favored with into a fund for the general amusement. Mr. King's article has evident truthfulness, but gives, too, the impression of being overcharged with "local color." The young Yankee artist, as set before us by Mr. King, has something of that look of incredibility which the fact that he actually existed does but little to diminish. One should be able to make affidavit to one's description of such a person, or else should utilize him. In "Kate Beaumont" the interest flags, there never having been much in any of the other characters, and the reader having had almost too much of Peyton Beaumont's movable eyebrows, and chivalry, and brandy-and-water, and of the pistol-practice and whiskey-drinking of his sons and neighbors. Neither the heroine, nor the hero, nor the plot is of a kind to make one interest one's self too long in the views of Southern society, which Mr. De Forest certainly does give with very much truthfulness. This admirably serviceable material for a volume or two of Southern sketches, wholly or partly true to fact, is of less service to him in a novel; yet it is upon this material that his novels, if we are to judge by "Kate Beaumont" and its predecessor, must, to a very great extent, depend for any noticeable goodness that they will have.

Old and New promises, in that prefatory part of it called "Old and New," a novel which is to be written jointly by Mrs. Stowe, Miss Susan Hale, Mr. F. W. Loring, Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, Rev. E. E. Hale, and a Mr. Perkins. The "Record of Progress" has an obituary notice, by J. P. Lesley, of the late Mr. Joseph Lyman, who appears to have been in many important respects a man worthy of admiration. In the same department of the magazine may be found something, by Mr. Francis Gardner, about the system of pronouncing Latin now finding favor in this country and England; a lively description of stock-raising under difficulties in Newton County, Missouri, where a Boston dry-goods man has been trying his hand at roughing it in the roughest fashion; and a word or two about Scottish preparatory schools. The body of the magazine is filled with contributions by Dr. H. W. Bellows ("The Modern English Novel"); George Macdonald ("The Vicar's Daughter," a serial story); Rev. E. E. Hale ("Ups and Downs," a serial story); poetry, by "H. H.," Rev. J. W. Chadwick, and others; "Talk About the Tea-Table," by some writer to us unknown; some reviews of books, and various other matters which we do not know that we can describe very accurately.

In Harper's, Mr. Curtis quotes some verses from a forthcoming volume of poems by Mr. W. E. Channing, a nephew of the famous Unitarian clergyman of that name, and a man known to one set of readers as a companion of Margaret Fuller's, Hawthorne's, Thoreau's, and Emerson's, and to quite another set, and a much smaller one we suppose, and an inferior one, as a verse-maker, laughed at by Poe in his now almost forgotten criticisms. It might not be hard to find a reason why Mr. Curtis, who knew Mr. Channing when both were younger, should rate him higher than he will be rated by any one who, coming entirely from the outside, attempts to form a judgment of the poet on his merits. Who can judge dispassionately of poems that were a part of his youth—a part, too, of that manhood which we have in youth, in dreams, the poet helping us—and which never comes so near realization as when, with him to help us, we dream of what is to be? But if the value of Mr. Channing's poetry may fairly be measured by these specimens which Mr. Curtis offers for consideration, we should say that his verses reveal a native capacity for receiving poetical impressions; and an ability to express them when they either are such as may be expressed by one or two more or less incoherent poetical images; or when they are such as require to be expressed with more or less certainty and precision than a too brief snatch of rhythmical melody vaguely can afford. Thoughts of wide comprehension and of a depth and subtlety not usual; purity of feeling, without any alloy of earthiness, and yet intense; fine susceptibility and much delicacy of sympathy with nature if not with man—these, it is probable, are among Mr. Channing's endowments. But it would seem that talk he cannot. It may doubted if he can talk even to himself; or, at any rate, if he has ever had the patience to do so, setting clearly before his mind his thought and feeling. However that may be, if poems of the kind before us are the only kind that Mr. Channing writes, it seems plain that he cannot talk very intelligibly to others certainly, unless when he has other helps than printed words can give him. In the face of this fundamental limitation of his nature—or his nature's refusal to submit to limitations, if that is a better way of putting it—it is not much worth while to say with Poe, that metres and the useful art of grammar Mr. Channing is apt to disregard. That he does; but his real difficulties are deeper, and these but the surface indications of the real ones. To his private friends he may be much —we may be allowed to say so; for it is his avowed private friends who bespeak for him the respect of the general public. But the world has to look for a poet in his pages. That it will find nothing in Mr. Channing's pages we are not able to say; but for whatever reason, whether that there was not much in him, or that, like some of his school, he was better pleased to see his thoughts and feelings pass before him than he was to reduce them to order and train them—for whatever reason, less will be found in him by the world at large than some have been asserting would be found. Yet this little poem, entitled "Gifts," is too good to throw away:

"A dropping shower of spray
Filled with a beam of light,
The breath of some soft day,
The groves by wan moonlight.
Some river's flow,
Some falling snow,
Some bird's swift flight.

A summer field o'erstrewn
With gay and laughing flowers,
And shepherd's clocks half-blown,
That tell the merry hours;
The waving grain,
The soft spring rain,
Are these things ours?"

Other articles in Harper's are an unexpectedly good one, considering the quantities that have been written about it, on the Oberammergau Passion Play; an illustrated article describing the pretty town of Stockbridge, Massachusetts; "Edouard Frère and Sympathetic Art in France," by a writer who appears to us to make quite as free with Mr. Ruskin in print as most people would like to have done in their case by a person whom they had received with hospitality; a piece of verse by J. G. Saxe; and much other matter.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Abbott (J. S. C.), History of Louis Philippe	(Harper & Bros.)
Abbot (E.), Literature of the Doctrine of a Future Life	(W. J. Widdleton)	$2 00
Aytoun (W. E.) and Martin (T.), Poems and Ballads of Goethe	(Holt & Williams)	1 50
Ball (Prof. R. S.), Experimental Mechanics	(Macmillan & Co.)	6 00
Bryant (W. C.), Poems	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Catholic Family Almanac, swd	(Catholic Pub. Soc.)	25
Chambers (Dr. T. K.), Restorative Medicine	(Henry C. Lea)
Demonstration in Honor of the 25th Anniversary of Pius IX	(J. Murphy & Co.)
Dickens (C.), Old Curiosity Shop, and American Notes	(D. Appleton & Co.)	75
Farjeon (B. L.), Joshua Marvel: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	40
Harte (B.), East and West Poems	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)
Harris (Mrs. S. S.), Richard Vandermarck	(Charles Scribner & Co.)	1 50
Illustrirte Kriegs-Chronik, Part 27, swd	(B. Westermann & Co.)
Im neuen Reich, Nos. 38, 39, swd	(L. W. Schmidt)
Jowett (B.), Dialogues of Plato, 4 vols	(Charles Scribner & Co.)	12 00
Lazarus (Emma), Admetus: a Poem	(Hurd & Houghton)	2 00
Letter to an Alarmed Friend, swd	(Pott, Young & Co.)	05
Life of the Rev. Mother Julia	(Cath. Pub. Soc.)	1 50
Littell's Living Age, Vol. CX	(Littell & Gay)
Nast (T.), Miss Columbia's Public School, swd	(F. B. Felt & Co.)	50
Neill (E. D.), Memoir of Rev. Patrick Copland, swd	(Charles Scribner & Co.)	50
Powers (E.), Artificial Production of Rain	(S. C. Griggs & Co.)
Sand (Mme. George), Monsieur Antoine, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	75
Fanchon, the Cricket	" "	1 00
Smith (P.), Ancient History of the East	(Harper & Bros.)
Taine (H.), Art in Greece	(Holt & Williams)	1 25
The Land of Lorne	(F. B. Felt & Co.)	2 00
The Workshop, No. 10, swd	(E. Steiger)	40
The Great Fires in Chicago and the West, swd	(J. W. Goodspeed)	50
Whitney (Mrs. A. D. T.), Real Folks	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	1 50

TAINE'S ART IN GREECE.
16mo, Cloth (uniform with "Taine's Art in the Netherlands," "Ideal in Art," etc.), $1 25.

"One feels at moments as if, before this writer, there had been no critics, no travellers, observers, or æsthetic inquisitors."—Nation.

GOETHE'S POEMS AND BALLADS.
16mo, cloth (uniform with "King Rene's Daughter," "Nathan the Wise," "Frithiofs Saga," etc., and making No. VII. of the series), $1 50.

AROUND A SPRING. By Gustave Droz. Translated by M. S. 8vo, paper, cloth-lined, 75 cents.
"A masterpiece of fiction."—Nation.

KEY TO THE PENTATEUCH.
Part I.—GENESIS. By Dr. Solomon Deutsch. 12mo, cloth, $1 50. Parts II. and III., completing the work, will soon be issued.

"This work is very elaborate and very carefully done, and its Hebrew portions are remarkable for distinctness and correctness."—Nation.

NEARLY READY.
TAINE'S ENGLISH LITERATURE. 2 vols. royal 8vo.
TAINE ON INTELLIGENCE. Royal 8vo.

HOLT & WILLIAMS, Publishers,
25 Bond Street, New York.

PRICED CATALOGUE No. 21
OF
ANCIENT AND MODERN BOOKS,
Comprising Standard and Valuable Works in
ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, HISTORY, VOYAGES, TRAVELS, ETC. ETC. ETC.

☞ Just published, and will be forwarded FREE to any address.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
Dealer in New and Old Books, 17 Astor Place, N. Y.

VALUABLE WORKS ON GEOLOGY.

GEOLOGY OF PENNSYLVANIA. A COMplete Scientific Treatise on the Coal Formations. By Henry D. Rogers. 3 vols. 4to. Plates and Maps. Boards, $30.

GEOLOGICAL RECONNOISSANCE IN California. By William P. Blake. 4to. Illustrated. $6.

ACADIAN GEOLOGY. NOVA SCOTIA, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island. By J. W. Dawson. Second Edition. 8vo. Illustrated. Cloth, $7 50.

GEOLOGY OF NEW JERSEY. By George H. Cook. Illustrated. 8vo. Cloth, $6 50.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF ILLINOIS. Illustrated. 4 vols. 4to. Cloth, $24.

GEOLOGY OF LAKE SUPERIOR. By Foster and Whitney. 2 vols. and Maps. Cloth, $25.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. Reprinted from THE NATION, and in some measure supplying the place of the first two volumes of the paper, now somewhat scarce. Price $1 50. Address, Publisher of THE NATION, Box 6732, N. Y.

NEW FINE ART GIFT-BOOKS.
JUST PUBLISHED.

GEMS OF MODERN BELGIAN ART. A Series of Cartoon Photographs from the Pictures of eminent living Artists. With remarks on the works selected, and an Essay on the Schools of Belgium and Holland. By William B. Scott. Uniform with "Gems of Modern French Art," by the same Author. 4to, cloth, elegantly gilt and gilt edges, price $10.

NAOMI: or, The Last Days of Jerusalem. By Mrs. T. B. Webb. With photograhic illustrations after drawings by David Roberts, R.A. 4to, cloth, elegantly gilt and gilt edges, $10.

A THOUSAND-AND-ONE GEMS OF English Poetry. Selected and edited by Charles Mackay, LL.D. A new edition, containing many beautiful illustrations from designs by T. E. Millais, John Gilbert, John Tenniel, Birket Foster, and others. Demy 4to, cloth, elegantly gilt and gilt edges, $5. Handsomely bound in tree calf, $10.

 For sale by all booksellers, or will be mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

LADIES DESIROUS OF LEARNING TO sing in the pure Italian School, will address SIGNOR GIANNETTI, care of Wm. Hall & Son, 751 Broadway.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1871.

The Week.

THE election on Tuesday in this State resulted in a signal overthrow of the Ring, the Legislature having been secured for the Republicans by a nearly two-thirds majority, and the Tammany candidates, except Tweed himself, having been beaten at all points. The bench has been strengthened by the election of Judges Barrett, Daly, and Curtis, and the German element has given General Sigel an emphatic token of its revolt against the thieves. It is needless to comment on the value of this entirely peaceful triumph, which has been followed by the immediate resignation of Sweeny as Commissioner of Public Parks. Elsewhere the Republicans have been generally successful, if not gainers. Mr. Washburn was elected, as a matter of course, in Massachusetts, the Labor Reformers and the Prohibitionists making a feebler demonstration even than last year. In New Jersey, the Republicans failed to elect their candidate for Governor, but still control the Legislature. Another Governor Washburn is elected in Wisconsin over Mr. Doolittle, the Democratic candidate. From Minnesota, Mississippi, and Illinois Republican majorities are reported, and Chicago has made an excellent choice for mayor in the person of Mr. Joseph Medill. In Virginia, the Conservatives have rightfully held their own, but in Maryland the Republicans have made some progress.

The War on the Ring continued up to election day without any marked incident beyond the issue of the order of arrest against Thomas C. Fields, a notorious old politician of the worst stamp, and the colleague of Peter B. Sweeny and Judge Hilton in the Ring Central Park Commission, on a charge of swindling the firemen of the old organization by getting a bill through the Legislature paying them over four hundred thousand dollars in compensation, most of which he pocketed himself. As Mr. Tilden says Sweeny is as bad as any of them, and as Mr. O'Conor says the same thing, and he has virtually confessed that he is, by resigning; and as Fields will soon be under bonds, if he is not so already, we should think Judge Hilton would begin to feel nervous, not, of course, through any consciousness of guilt, but through lonesomeness. We think it might not be amiss for Mr. A. T. Stewart to call the Judge off from his now perilous and exposed position, lest some accident should happen to him. Both his flanks are exposed to the onslaught of a sleepless and determined enemy, and the Judge is too useful a man to be sacrificed in this way. Besides, the popular confidence in his integrity is becoming disgracefully weak. In these days nobody is safe. Mr. Charles O'Conor's labors, in the meantime, perhaps do more to keep up public confidence and ardor than any other feature in the struggle. He has enjoyed, and deservedly enjoyed, for nearly thirty years, the reputation of being the very foremost man in his profession in this State—we believe most members of the bar here would say, in the Union. In learning, in acuteness, and in vigor, he has certainly for many years had no rivals, and he has, what is better than all in these days, a character of absolute purity. He is now displaying, what we confess we did not look for, the mastery of an English style of extraordinary vigor and incisiveness, and a power of condensed thinking on questions of general politics which, at his age and among men of his intellectual training, one does not generally look for. All this, and with it a scornfulness which shrivels up a charlatan or cheat like a flash of lightning, he is bringing into the service of the public, at the cost of repose which he has richly earned.

There has been nothing more remarkable in the municipal canvass than Tweed's speeches, which he delivered nearly every evening up to the day of the election. He carefully abstained from any attempt to answer the charges against him, treating them, as usual in such cases, as the inventions of "unrelenting, bitter, unscrupulous, prejudiced, ambitious, partisan foes." He said he had faith in their (his constituents') "sense of justice, in their intelligence, devotion to their party and its principles, and, above all, in their gratitude for four years' faithful services." As a general rule, he acknowledged that the press expressed the voice of "the people"; but, in his particular case, he thought the will of "the people" was more faithfully represented by the public meetings which he addressed. He was always vociferously applauded, and, as the result of the election showed, his confidence was not misplaced. "The people" certainly do approve of him, and approve of him on grounds with which the Sentimentalist brethren can hardly take exception, viz., that though (as he himself says) he has made mistakes—as who has not?—he has always been "sound on the main question," which, in the lower wards, consists in the liberal distribution of coal and flour. His "heart," too, "has always been in the right place," or, as one of his champions said, "even if he is a thief, there is more blood in his little finger, and more marrow in his big toe, than the men who are abusing him have in their whole bodies." In short, on the widely-received view of the character and functions of "the people," and of the part played by "the heart" in politics, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that William M. Tweed is a whole-souled, faithful man, who follows after "the truth," not, indeed, with "a legal mind," but with a good "human mind." He may not be in favor with the judges or with the Epicureans of the Fifth Avenue, but the hard-fisted bruisers, and crimps, and pimps, and groggery men of the First Ward love him dearly, and appreciate his sterling worth. They say that the fuss made about his character is very ridiculous, seeing that all the politicians, male and female, in other parts of the country, "accept aid from any quarter," and make no secret of it.

The President has corrected a clerical error in his first proclamation suspending the habeas corpus in certain counties in South Carolina, and, relieving Marion of this suspension, has given five days' warning to the Ku-klux in Union to come in and surrender their arms. The trials of the Ku-klux in North Carolina appear to have furnished very trustworthy evidence against their confederates across the border, and the dispersion of those who justly or unjustly fear arrest continues to be very great, and to embrace the most prominent citizens. The majority of the prisoners, who confess freely, are the degraded whites. One result of this campaign against the outlaws is the complete interruption of business, which has thrown great gloom over the communities where the arrests are made. But, as we remarked last week, trade had already been thoroughly demoralized by the perils to which Northern men found themselves exposed, whether they sought to make business connections, to lend their capital, or collect their just dues.

The bonds of South Carolina, known as New Sixes, have been running gently down since October 1 from 52 to 32, or thereabouts, owing to the widespread belief that the financiers of that State had got a large stock of them ready for the market, which, like our Connolly, they were going to put off as their needs might dictate. What foundation there is for this belief, except the general character of "the governing class" in that unhappy State, we are unable to say. The probabilities are that the proclamation of martial law has helped the decline; but a card, which appeared in the New York papers on Tuesday, from Governor Scott, Treasurer Niles G. Parker, and Mr. John B. Dennis, Chairman of the Committee of State Accounts, will hardly do much to arrest it. The signers acknowledge that $20,040,000 of the State bonds have been printed, but they say that $9,000,000 of the amount are still on hand, and "have never been signed or issued." They were not printed, these gentlemen say, with the intention of increasing the State debt, but are in the possession of the State authorities. There are also $3,500,000 sterling bonds in the same place, and $2,500,000 of registered stock. All these bonds were got ready, the writers say, under Acts of the Legislature, "to pay the indebtedness of the State," and "for the conversion of its securities." We are afraid this statement will not restore public confidence. It reminds us of a story recently told us by a lawyer, of his taking his client, who held a considerable sum in the bills of a broken bank, to see the receiver, a notorious politician of this city, who had given notice to all holders to bring them in to him. On being asked what disposition was to be made of the bills after he got them, the receiver pointed jauntily to his own safe, and said they would lie there; whereupon the client, who knew the man, arose and left the room in solemn silence, taking the bills with him.

Governor Bullock, of Georgia, has resigned, in a very entertaining letter, addressed to the whole Georgian people. The reasons he gives are that he found that the lower branch of the Legislature, which he gives us to understand is largely composed of unprincipled men, was going to impeach him, and that the majority in the Senate, also composed of unprincipled men, were going to unseat as many of their fellow-members of the righteous kind as would give them two-thirds in favor of his conviction. In order to prevent all these persons from thus disgracing themselves and sinning their souls, the good man has actually vacated his office and run off into private life, leaving the governorship to the President of the Senate the very day after he heard of the wicked conspiracy against him. We doubt if a more remarkable example of self-sacrifice to prevent others from doing wrong was ever heard of, in politics at all events. The charges against him are not savory, and are not unlike those made against our own Ring, such as frauds in the purchase of the State House and of the Governor's mansion, and in the management of several railroads, and in the issue of State bonds in aid of railroads. As we have several times within the last three years called attention to his corrupt practices in Washington, and his success in imposing on the Radical majority in Congress, we need say nothing more about his general character. He is one of the worst of the gang whom the reconstruction process raised into power at the South, and he will probably endeavor to figure in Washington this winter as a Unionist "martyr." The most entertaining part of his farewell letter is that in which he warns the Union men of the State that they will soon be eaten up by the rebels. The Legislature has, since his flight, passed a resolution denying the truth of his statements, which was hardly necessary.

Brigham Young has not chosen to abide the result of the prosecution which, by his prompt appearance in court, he seemed determined to face. He has, with a few wagons and a small armed escort, departed southward, whether to select a new refuge for his people, or simply to betake himself to a place of safety, does not yet appear. An expedition, it is said, will be sent in pursuit of him. If what we hear of his prosecutors be true, a better man than Brigham would have been justified in getting out of their way; and, indeed, we may say, generally, that if the present crusade against Mormonism be "the Lord's doings," he is making use of instruments that an honest man could not touch with a forty-foot pole. Mr. George Alfred Townsend, who has been writing some very graphic letters from Salt Lake City to the Cincinnati Commercial, undertakes to enumerate and describe the members of the anti-Mormon ring, beginning with Judge McKean, of the Federal court, whose behavior on the bench "has been despotic and extra-judicial to the last degree, and who has also been unfortunate enough to compromise his reputation by mining speculations which have come before his court, and received influential consideration there." His prosecuting attorney, R. N. Baskins, is the author of what was called in Congress the "Cullom Bill" to suppress polygamy—a bill which, Mr. Townsend says, "the court enacts, and prosecutes under it, by the very man who wrote it."

The Mormon view of the conduct of the recent trial is well expressed in the clever satire in which Judge McKean is represented to have addressed the jury as follows:

"You have your duties, gentlemen, and I have mine. My duty is to pick you out and pack you in; to fix the trial at such a time as will be least convenient to the defendant; to exclude all evidence that may help him, and to admit all evidence that may hurt him; to rule all points of law against him; to pick out from Acts of Congress and Acts of the Utah Assembly those laws which combined may convict him; to be first a United States Justice's Court, and then a Territorial Justice's Court, and vice versa, as the exigencies of the case may demand; to dramatize the case and elocutionize my opinions; to follow my instructions from Rev. Dr. Newman, and avenge his defeat at the Tabernacle; in short, gentlemen, my duty is to secure a conviction."

The charge of patching together parts of Federal and Territorial statutes relates to the use which is made of a Mormon enactment against adultery, which could not by any stretch of interpretation be supposed to have been levelled against polygamous marriages So the definition of adultery is boldly drawn from another source. Even were this wanting, however, Judge McKean could, and probably would, fall back on the simple "builded-better-than-they-knew" doctrine.

The bill emancipating the slaves in Brazil has at last passed the Senate, and become a law. It emancipates, forthwith and absolutely, slaves belonging to the Government, or given to it in usufruct, not over 5,000 in all; slaves belonging to unclaimed heritages, and slaves abandoned by their owners. Apart from these, the act gives liberty to all children born hereafter of slave women; but the owners of the mothers are bound to take care of them up to the age of eight. At that age the owner must elect whether he will retain the minor's services till he reach the age of twenty-one, or receive $600 compensation from the Government for liberating him. If the mother is liberated before her child reaches the age of eight, she can take it with her; if she is sold before it reaches twelve, the child must also go with her; and the courts can order a minor's absolute liberation on proof of ill-treatment by the master. All minors liberated under the act in any way may be delivered by the Government to associations—voluntary and charitable, we presume—charging themselves with their maintenance and education; and these associations are to form out of the funds coming to them, either by Government grant or by donations, legacies, or otherwise, and out of the results of the labors of the minors, a "peculium" for each slave, to be delivered to him at the age of twenty-one, by way of starting him in life. The associations are also to find him employment when he leaves them. The slave can also contribute to the peculium himself in any way in his power. These are the main features of the measure, and it will be seen that it is in form very far from being a measure of emancipation. The number of slaves whom it liberates at once is a very small proportion of the whole, which is 200,000. Its main value lies in the fact that it deprives the system of the character of permanency, and is, therefore, likely to hasten voluntary emancipation by slave-owners. Its probable influence in this direction is foreshadowed by the immediate liberation of their 1,500 slaves by the Benedictine monks, the richest religious order in the empire.

It is almost of as much importance to the International to seem powerful as to be so, and accordingly its friends and supporters are very ready to claim some of the responsibility of every tumult, revolution, uprising, strike, riot, and conflagration that occurs in any part of the world. They are willing, in short, to accept a bad reputation for the sake of inspiring terror. We have not as yet heard that they claim for it any share in the burning of the Wisconsin woods, but they have darkly hinted that it had something to do with the burning of Chicago, and we should not be surprised to hear that it was at the bottom of the next great earthquake. It certainly claimed a larger part in the troubles of the Commune in Paris than it had any title to, and we suspect that the great strikes which have recently taken place in Europe would have occurred if it had never existed. That it does exist, however, and that it is rapidly extending its organization, there can be no doubt; but it must be remembered that such organizations do not become stronger in the ratio of the increase of their numbers—on the contrary, they become weaker; they gather in the beginning the élite of the class among which they seek their recruits. As the work of propagandism goes on, the accessions decline in quality, and the cohesiveness of the body diminishes. It is not difficult to foresee that the International will go to pieces under the weight and vastness of its own designs. A correspondent of the Cologne Gazette furnishes an account of a convention of the body, consisting of twenty-five delegates, held in London about six weeks ago, at which it was reported that there were one hundred and eighty thousand enrolled members of the Society in England, furnishing a revenue of about thirty-five hundred dollars a year. The French delegate said that the organization had been swept away in several French towns after the Communist revolution, and it was decided to take special measures for its restoration in these places, and to make Russia the field of energetic missionary effort. Secret societies and conspiracies were vigorously denounced, and political agitation, as it is in England, strongly recommended. The object of this agitation seemed to be the conversion of "capital and land" to the use of the workingman; in what manner was not described.

There seems to be a mischievous notion growing up in the minds of some of the European Governments that the International can, and ought to be, put down by force. An attempt of this kind is probably the only thing that could make it permanently powerful and dangerous. But its existence is a symptom, and a striking one, of the tendency of all political questions everywhere to merge themselves in the labor question, and the main result of the work of the International will probably be the rooting in the working-class mind all over Europe that this is really the only political question of any moment. A statement was made by Mr. Nutall, a well-known leader of the co-operative movement in England, at a recent meeting of the British Social Science Association, revealing a prospect for the laboring classes which makes the schemes of the International and of the "Labor Reformers" very unimportant. He showed that in the manufacturing borough of Oldham, with a total population of seventy thousand, there were co-operative societies numbering seven thousand members. They had a capital of eight hundred thousand dollars in their six co-operative stores, and a hundred and fifty thousand dollars invested in other places. They had built seventy-five workingmen's houses in the last twelve months. They have a corn-mill, large halls, and five libraries, and consultation rooms where they meet weekly for discussion. They have a capital of fifteen hundred thousand dollars, invested in cotton-mills and loans, and in one of these cotton-mills, which represents a capital of half-a-million of dollars, nine-tenths of the shareholders are workingmen. A good question for our "labor reform" conventions to discuss would be, how many years of perorating and gadding about the country it would take to produce such results as these.

France, in spite of the very untimely blustering demonstrations of her Ultramontane faction on one side, and of some as yet unaided guerre à outrance Radicals on the other, is certainly not in the condition nor—as far as her present rulers are concerned—is she inclined to disturb the peace of Europe by a sudden warlike attempt, be it in the direction of the Alps or the Rhine. She needs peace more badly than any other state, and Thiers knows it but too well. What the ulterior aims of his foreign policy are, is now indifferent. What he aims at in his domestic policy is still a matter of much surmise and comment; and though he acts consistently, as befits the President of the Republic, suspicions of concealed Orleanism have lately found frequent utterance. The appointment of Casimir Périer as successor to Lambrecht, the suddenly deceased Minister of the Interior, gave particular offence to uncompromising Republicans. And yet, the tenor of the official circular of the new Minister to the prefects of the departments may be considered an additional ground for the belief that M. Thiers earnestly clings to what Gambetta, in his late half-wise manifesto, calls the "insolent" idea of founding the Republic by non-Republicans. M. Périer seems clearly to speak the thoughts of the President when he says of his policy, "That policy will manifest itself more and more, and will be strengthened not only by the adherents which it will daily attract, but also by the very attacks of those whose culpable designs it thwarts"; or, when referring to the common activity of the writer's father and M. Thiers, on the foundation of the Orleans throne, he says, "Revolutions have, since that time, changed many things, and the men who then entered public life have been able to profit by the lessons of experience, without having anything to repudiate of their past."

The acceptance by Francis Joseph of the resignation of the Hohenwart Cabinet has been followed, in rapid succession, by the more or less complete formation of a new Cisleithan ministry, under the presidency of Baron Kellersperg, former Governor of Bohemia; by a new imperial rescript to the Bohemian Diet, which half reverses the situation created by the preceding one; and, finally, by the resignation of Count Beust, the Chancellor of the Empire—a fact of historical importance, for which we have received, as yet, no explanation. The new rescript emphasizes the supremacy of the fundamental laws of the empire over the special statutes of the provinces; declares that those fundamental laws can only be altered in a constitutional manner—that is, by a two-thirds majority of the central Vienna Reichsrath, to which the Czechs now ruling the Diet of Prague refuse to send representatives; warns that Diet against the threatened attempt to nullify or disregard them on the ground of asserted Bohemian sovereignty rights, and makes its members responsible for the grave political consequences which would result from their persevering in keeping aloof from the Reichsrath, and ignore its resolutions. This new policy, the official organs of the new Cabinet declare, is to be vigorously pursued, no compromise being in contemplation, or likely to be made. This declaration, however, can be correct only in a relative sense, as the Czechs have it in their power to compel a compromise, by appearing in the Reichsrath, and thereby reducing the German party in the assembly to a small minority, which all the influence of the Government, and perhaps the Imperial veto itself, would be required to save from being absolutely overruled by its Slavo-Federalistic opponents. Nor is the composition of the Kellersperg ministry, as now reported likely to be constituted, such as to indicate a determination to break with the Czechs, for the Slavic element is rather conspicuous in it. The solution now obviously rests with the Diet of Prague, and it appears to us that so propitious a moment to make it as favorable to themselves as the circumstances may allow, the Czechs will not easily find hereafter.

As the parliamentary way of Francis Joseph is rugged, just so smooth is the path of the other Kaiser in his dealings with the representatives of his provinces. William meets with ready yielding to his will, even on points on which the Germans are generally the least tractable. His war fund, emptied during the late struggle with France, had been replenished with indemnity money taken from the vanquished, but Bismarck, Roon, and Moltke very easily convinced the "thrifty Hohenzollern," as Carlyle would say, that its enlargement, from the same source, was demanded by the enlarged proportions of his empire and its altered position in Europe; and the Reichstag, enlightened about the facts by the Imperial Chancellor, has hastened to comply with the demand. During the debate on the subject, Prince Bismarck urged upon the Assembly "the necessity, in the present aspect of European affairs, of strengthening the country by empowering the Emperor to act promptly and freely under any adverse or threatening circumstances . . . and of placing Prussia in a position to act either upon the offensive or defensive, . . . though no complications were at present apparent." The truth of the latter statement is proved in some degree by the general applause with which the Emperor's peaceable utterances in his opening address to the Reichstag were received, both in diplomatic and civil spheres all over Europe. Such is, in fact, the situation in Europe, that if William and Bismarck want peace they will have it; and, fortunately, there is every reason to believe they want it.

THE RISING AGAINST THE RING.

THERE has not been in the history of the country as fervid and vigorous an "uprising" against bad government as that of which this city has been the theatre during the past month. All its features have been in the highest degree encouraging. Party differences have been forgotten in a common determination to put an end, if possible, to fraud and rascality in the management of municipal affairs. "Respectable citizens" have laid aside all business and excuses to attend to their political duties. The decent portion of the press has been heartily on the right side; the best lawyers have gone actively into the work of denouncing, exposing, and prosecuting the knaves. The amount of hard labor which many busy merchants have given to the task of ferreting out the frauds of the Ring has been great, and, we may add, unprecedented. No such attempts to put the affairs of the public in order, on the part of private, non-official volunteers, have, we venture to assert, ever been witnessed anywhere. The pulpit has thundered, too, against the "corruptionists," Sunday after Sunday, with more than usual vehemence. There has been "political preaching" where political preaching was never heard before. Behind all this, too, there has been plenty of popular indignation. We doubt if so many men have ever before, in any city, swelled with a common rage and shame. Usually there is in times of great popular excitement either enough fear, or enough division of sentiment, to furnish a sedative which makes the average passion moderate. Here there has been nothing to fear, and there has been no diversity of opinion. The only sign of division has been among the newspapers, and this has been due, not to any sympathy with criminals, or lack of zeal in the pursuit of them, but to commercial jealousy of those who had got first on the scent.

This has been all the more remarkable because the direct results to be obtained by the election of Tuesday were not of great importance. None of the principal municipal offices were to be filled. Not one member of the Ring was before the public for re-election as a municipal officer. There was a place on the bench of the Supreme Court to be filled, it is true, but not a place which had been occupied by a corrupt man. Judge Sutherland, who retired, though a Democrat, and more bound towards the Ring than a judge ought to be, had no stain on his character. Judge Daly, who was up for re-election in the Common Pleas, was a man of unimpeachable integrity; and in the Superior Court, though the Reform candidates were to take the place of inferior men, neither was to take the place of the great rascal of that tribunal. In short, the changes in the judges, though they were part of the great work of reform, made no direct or immediate contribution to it. The elections bearing most closely on the condition of the city were those of the members of the State Legislature; but in all these cases the result depended not on the voters of the city so much as on those of the State at large. Indeed, it may be said that it was through the vote for the Attorney-General that the popular indignation here most nearly reached the Ring, and the Attorney-General, after all, is only a prosecuting officer, and neither judge nor executioner. We mention these things, not for the purpose of depreciating what has been accomplished, but for the purpose of magnifying the force and depth of the tide of honest wrath which has accomplished it.

Nevertheless, the work of reform has only been begun; and, when we look at the facts which have been necessary to produce this uprising, it will be clear enough that this work will have to be both long and hard. It must not be forgotten that when the Ring went up to Albany and procured the charter under which their enormities have been perpetrated, they were neither unknown nor unsuspected. Every man of them was an object of the deepest distrust to the intelligent portion of the city population. Nobody—literally nobody—believed them to be honest. The leading newspapers denounced them daily. Two of them had grown enormously rich within a few years, and the Comptroller had actually ceased to publish his accounts. Nevertheless, they were able to go to Albany and procure a charter, which not only differed from all charters granted in the United States, but was a more glaring violation of the principles of popular government than any charter ever granted anywhere. It actually took away from the citizens not only the power of displacing the municipal administration en bloc, but deprived them of all control over the amount and disposal of the taxes. This measure was passed through a legislature which was universally believed to be grossly corrupt, but which was well known to Republican politicians to be managed by Tweed, and it was not opposed by the Republican press on either of these grounds. Indeed, the most influential portion of the Republican press supported it out-and-out. Now, apart altogether from the consequences which have since followed, it must be admitted that all this proved in a striking manner the deep demoralization in this State of the class (of all parties) which devotes itself to the management of the political machinery. Nobody who knows anything of the history of the legislation under which the Ring has done its cheating, can doubt that the work of reform, in order to be effective, must go far beyond the removal of the Ring from office, and must last far longer than the punishment of its members.

There are two facts in the history of these city troubles which must not be overlooked, and they are facts of the highest interest to American citizens in all parts of the country. One is that Tweed is by no means the first of his kind who has appeared on the surface of municipal politics. He has risen to higher eminence than his forerunners, but forerunners he has had. In fact, he is as distinctly the result of a process of evolution as any other phenomenon in nature. His audacity in appearing as a candidate for the State Senate with charges of theft from the public treasury resting on him strikes many people as something amazing, but it is not amazing to anybody who goes below the surface. The discovery which put the government of this city into the hands of the criminal classes, and which gives Tweed his audacity and indifference, was made fourteen years ago with the advent to the mayoralty of Fernando Wood, in the face of the fact, which was laid before the citizens in every possible way, that he was guilty of embezzlement and forgery. He was a man of the Tweed kind; emerged from obscurity through the lower grade of ward politics, and first became known to the general public in a prosecution for cheating his partner by altering the figures in accounts, in the way since practised so extensively by the Ring. He did not deny the charge even in court, but made his escape under the statute of limitations, and soon after ran for the mayoralty, and, in spite of the badness of his character, was recommended for re-election in a testimonial signed by a large number of leading merchants, much in the style in which Messrs. Astor, Roberts, Taylor, and others certified the correctness of Connolly's accounts.

Now, in Wood's repeated election, under such circumstances, the arcanum imperii, as Tacitus calls it, was revealed to the mob of this city as it was to the Roman soldiery after the death of Galba. Wood's success, in spite of his infamy, first made known the fact that not only was good character not necessary to success in city politics, but that bad character was no hindrance to it. This drew into it at once large numbers of adventurers of the Tweed stamp, who had failed in other callings, and who were sufficiently superior to the common roughs in intelligence and dexterity to be sure of being able to manage them. Wood retired from the arena, however, as soon as he had made a fortune, or, at least, transferred himself to "another sphere of usefulness," but Tweed, with more courage and "loftier aims," as the Tribune says of his confederate Sweeny, kept on along the old track, and soon got control of the State Legislature, and began to pocket his millions. But, with his experience, it would be wonderful if he were now timid, or bashful, or minded being called a "thief." From the same combination of circumstances which has produced him issued also Fisk, Gould, and the band known as the "Erie Ring," who really form with Tweed one gigantic corporation. Tweed is one of the directors of the Erie Railroad, charged with the duty of seeing that the other swindlers are not interfered with by the Legislature; while they, on their side, see that their dependants and employees vote for the Ring; and the most striking characteristic of the whole gang is that indifference to public opinion or shamelessness which is exciting so much astonishment when displayed by Tweed. Fisk's riding round the city in a coach-and-four, purchased with stolen money, in company with a batch of harlots, is but one manifestation of the same quality which in Tweed's case found expression in running for the Senate while under arrest for fraud. The obvious inference from all this is that it will take some years of steady repudiation of men of bad character in politics, and of the display, on the part of the majority, of a regard for the character of candidates, to destroy in the Tweed and Fisk class that audacity and hopefulness which forms the principal element in their success.

The second point to be borne in mind is the fact that the city money has been largely used to debauch both the politicians and voters of the country districts. There is no doubt that a large proportion of the twenty millions which we know to have been stolen have been used in the corruption of electors, and the payment of managers of both parties, all over the State. We are only saying what all "the men inside politics" know well, that there has for the last few years been hardly a town or county caucus, between this city and the Lakes, in which Tweed's hand has not been felt. He has his agents everywhere—some stationary, some itinerant—and they are as numerous in the Republican as in the Democratic ranks. To some he pays salaries, to others he makes donations, and others he holds by "taking care" of a son or brother, or other relative or friend, in the city. In this way he has influenced largely the return of members of the Legislature. Under his manipulations, a considerable number go to Albany ready to be seduced. The virtue of the others does not stand very long after he has arrived with his money-bags, and their return to their constituents enriched no longer excites shame on the one side or indignation on the other. We believe it was the experience of the Reform Democrats at the late Convention at Rochester that the country delegates were little if any superior in tone to the band of jail-birds which Tammany sent up from the City. As regards the Republicans, we shall only say that Tweed has a book in which he has entered the sums paid last winter to the various Republican legislators for their votes, and that it is expected and believed that, if he finds that the game is really up as far as he is concerned, he will publish it. Let us hope and pray that he will. It will be the most striking "literary event" of the season. One entry in it at least has already been revealed by him with his usual cynicism, and has been used against a prominent politician in the western part of the State during the late canvass.

The moral of all this is, that the corruption in which Tweed is the most prominent agent has eaten too deeply into our society, and is too widespread, to permit us to hope that one election or one legislature can cure it. It will take at least ten years of the proscription, and punishment, and incessant pursuit of rascals, and the appearance of a fresh generation on the scene, to effect a radical cure of the disease; and we sincerely trust that those who have just taken up arms in the struggle, and especially the young men, have "enlisted for the war," and not for this one conflict. The next step is plain enough. The Legislature must devise a charter which will stop the supplies of money from this City for corrupt purposes; this is essential at the very outset. The tonics and alteratives come afterwards, and what they should be will need the gravest consideration of the wisest and shrewdest men in the State. This time, however, we trust, the a priori Blatherskites will absent themselves. We have had enough of them and their works.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

It has been plain enough during the last ten years that there was not the least chance of an international copyright treaty with Great Britain as long as the disputes arising out of the war were unsettled. The public on this side of the water was, until the Treaty of Washington was concluded, in no mood to take up any difference with England which did not in some way bear on the Alabama question, and was, in fact, rather disposed to consider anything claimed by Englishmen as prima facie disadvantageous to the United States. We, therefore, we confess, in spite of our hearty concurrence in most of their views, took but moderate interest in the efforts made a few years ago by an association of authors and publishers in this city to press the subject on the attention of Congress. We felt satisfied that Congress would do nothing about it, and that the people would not be much troubled by its inaction. The movement having called Mr. Henry C. Carey from his retirement, however, with a reprint of an old pamphlet, in which he took the ground that no author had any real property in books at all, inasmuch as he only rearranged facts which were the common property of society, we took occasion to say (Feb. 20, 1868) how fallacious in point of logic, false in point of fact, and delusive and mischievous in point of jurisprudence, and obnoxious in point of morality, this view seemed to us to be. The dislike of legislators to concede the absoluteness of literary property, and to deal out only a qualified and limited protection for it, is undoubtedly the result, in part, of the traditional inability of barbarous and illiterate ages to conceive of the existence of property in an intangible commodity, in no way attached to the person of the producer, and passing from his possession in the very act of exposure for sale. Consequently, the author has been steadily refused all title to the gains resulting from the sale of his works, except as much as seemed necessary to induce him to produce at all. But the only way for authors to put an end to this discreditable notion is to insist strenuously that their property in their works differs from other property, not in its own nature, but in the nature of the machinery required for its protection. A man can have his house and furniture and money protected by the police, or, if worst comes to worst, he can arm himself and his friends for that purpose; but his property in his books, being the product of high civilization and extended intelligence, needs for its protection special, delicate, and costly apparatus, which a civilized community is bound to supply, and just as freely to the foreigner as to the native.

The question is now once more coming before the public, and we believe in a shape which promises before long to lead to its practical solution. The public mind, both in England and America, was never before so ready for a candid discussion of it; and for various reasons. The foremost is, of course, the revival between the two countries of good feeling based on mutual respect. Of such good feeling as prevailed before the war this could hardly be said. Next to this must be placed the fact that American authors have begun to lose at nearly the same rate as English authors by the absence of international copyright. We do not believe this has seriously influenced the former in forming their opinions about the matter; but the fact that Americans apparently gained by the present state of things, while the English lost, did undoubtedly, at one time in this country, as it would have done in any country, render the general public less sensitive to the claims of abstract justice than it would otherwise have been. Indeed, so late as 1867, the head of an American publishing house of repute gave, in a pamphlet, as one reason for refusing an English author property in his books republished in America, the fact that the American book-market, being larger than the English, the Americans gained more at present by stealing than the English did, and would do well, therefore, to retain the power of stealing. This was an odd basis for the relations of two great civilized nations touching the interchange of ideas, and would, in reality, furnish a strong savage tribe with a powerful argument for refusing to adopt, with regard to a smaller and less warlike neighboring tribe, the doctrine of international law which recognizes the absolute independence of separate states.

The authors on both sides have long been disgusted by the existing state of things, and by them the discussion of it has been periodically renewed; but from the publishers, who are nearly as much concerned in the matter, less has been heard; and the impression has prevailed widely on both sides of the water that they were too much absorbed in the game of mutual pillage to care much about it. The controversy has just been renewed with great vigor in the English press, opening as usual with a grand attack on the American publishers from divers discontented authors, supported by the Times, in which these letters appeared, with a question-begging heading, designating the American publishers as "pirates." At this point, Mr. Appleton, head of the firm of that name in this city, appeared in the field with what we cannot help calling the most important contribution yet made to this discussion, because it is the first clear statement of the exact position of the American publishers which has yet been made, and it will, we cannot help believing, do much to bring about a settlement. He shows that, in the practice of his own house, every English author who has sought and received their services as publishers, has received from them by way of compensation exactly what he would have received had he been born in New York. English authors who have not taken any pains to bring to their notice their title to their property have been treated, too, precisely as an American would be treated who neglected to register his book—that is, to adopt the legal formalities necessary to secure him legal protection in the enjoyment of what may be called an intangible possession. The fact is, though Mr. Appleton does not touch upon it in express terms, that at present an English author has nothing to sell to an American publisher, or an American author to an English publisher. By conceding to him the right to publish his works, he bestows on him nothing of the least commercial value. What he gives him is pure compliment, expressive of personal preference simply. He does not give him any protection against competition by other editions; and this is the only thing that a publisher can on business principles be expected to pay for. Now, in practice, we believe there is no doubt that American publishers have displayed far more honesty, or, to speak more correctly, far more magnanimity, in dealing with foreign authors than their English brethren. The less there is now said in England about piracy, the better. There was a time when the reproach levelled against America on this score was well grounded; but at that time there was nothing here worth pirating. As soon as American literary wares became marketable in England, we regret to say the national horror of living off other men's labor ceased in this particular field to display itself; that is, English publishers did not pirate as long as there was nothing worth pirating; but the minute rich prizes began to put out from American ports, they hoisted the black flag without hesitation.

The state of the case at this moment appears to be this: The American publishers are quite willing to concede copyrights to British authors, but they are not willing to concede free trade to English publishers. That is, they propose that a British author shall be at liberty to come into the American market with his manuscript on precisely the same footing as the American author, but they insist that for the supply of that market he small make his contract with an American publisher, and that the English publisher shall be shut out from it. The reason Mr. Appleton gives for this is that the English publisher prepares his wares in a dear form, or, as he expresses it, "The American people believe earnestly in their policy of cheap books, and will not expose it to the peril threatened by an English publisher's copyright. They know their obligations to English thinkers, and they will be glad to do them justice when the way is shown; but they hold themselves perfectly competent to manufacture the books that shall embody the English authors' thoughts, in accordance with their own needs, habits, and tastes, and in this they will not be interfered with." In support of this view, he mentions the fact that the Canadians, though British subjects, prefer the American cheap reprints of English books to the "honest [English] editions," and they are allowed to gratify this preference by the Government, which, indeed, imposes an import duty of ten per cent. on these reprints for the benefit of the author; but he adds that money from this source would by English authors or publishers be considered "a curiosity."

Now, this being true, and we have no doubt it is true, the question becomes a plain one enough. If the American people, who for the purposes of this discussion may be called the American publishers, are really willing to give English authors all the rights as against themselves now possessed by American authors, as Mr. Appleton says they are, and if they have given strong proof of their sincerity in so saying by hitherto paying English authors money which legally they did not owe them, the charge of "piracy" might as well henceforth disappear from the controversy. Moreover, the controversy, in some important respects, changes its character. It is no longer a controversy between English authors and American publishers, but between English publishers and American publishers, and the point in dispute is not ethical, but economical; that is, it does not relate to property in ideas, but to free trade in books. Whether English publishers shall be allowed to sell their books in this market, with which American publishers are forbidden to compete, even on paying the author for his contribution to the manufacture, is a question to be settled in the main by the same considerations as the question of "protecting" all other products of American industry. But there is, it is to be observed, an important and obvious distinction between the case of the English manufacturer bringing in his cutlery, or his woollens, for free sale in the American markets, and that of an English publisher bringing in his books. In the former case, he is exposed to successful competition. An American manufacturer may make cheaper or better knives and cloth, and drive him out of the market, but he cannot make better or cheaper "Pickwick Papers" or Grote's "Histories of Greece." Anybody who has the right of reproducing these enjoys a veritable and impregnable monopoly. To assimilate free-trade in books to free-trade in other articles, the author should be allowed to make his contract where he pleased and the reader to buy of whom he pleased, and this is the only arrangement with which a free-trader can be satisfied. Mr. Appleton's plan, on the other hand, is the one which will naturally commend itself to protectionists, and it is the one which, as long as the present revenue system of the United States is maintained, American publishers have a right to insist on.

As regards the objection to allowing English publishers to come into this market because they produce their books in a dear form, we doubt its soundness. We presume dealers of all countries adapt their wares to their customers. English books are dear because English readers are a small and comparatively well-to-do class; American books are cheap, because American readers are a very large and comparatively poor class. But, on this point, the market in both countries is rapidly assimilating. The cheap newspaper press and the spread of education are rapidly creating and multiplying readers in England as they have done here, and, before very long, English publishers will have just the same interest in the production of low-priced editions as our publishers have. If they had the American market thrown open to them, it is safe to argue that they would adapt themselves to its needs. The argument drawn from Canadian practice is hardly as forcible as it seems. The Canadian market is too small to affect the conditions of English bookselling, even if it were possible to keep the American reprints from crossing the border, which it certainly is not.

CHICAGO IN DISTRESS.

CHICAGO, November 2, 1871.

I HAVE had an opportunity of looking at Chicago at the beginning of the fourth week after the fire, and, as you requested, will give you a few notes of my observation.

Chicago had a central quarter, compactly built, mostly of brick, stone, and iron, and distinguished by numerous very large and tall structures, comparable to, but often more ostentatious than, Stewart's store in New York. They were mostly lined, to the fourth, fifth, or sixth floor, with pine-wood shelves, on which, or in pine-wood cases, a fresh stock of—larger at the moment than ever before—dry goods, or other inflammable materials, was set up, with plentiful air-space for rapid combustion. This central quarter occupied a mile and a half square of land. On one side of it was the lake; on the other three sides, for the distance of a mile, the building, though irregular, was largely of detached houses, some of the villa class, with small planted grounds about them, and luxuriously furnished, but generally comfortable dwellings, of moderate size, set closely together. There were also numerous churches and tall school buildings, and some large factories. At a distance of two miles from the centre, and beyond, houses were much scattered, and within a mile of the political boundary there was much open prairie, sparsely dotted with cabins and a few larger buildings. It will be seen that a much larger part of the town proper was burned than a stranger would be led to suppose by the published maps.

The fire started half a mile southwest, which was directly to windward, of the central quarter, rapidly carried its heights, and swept down from them upon the comparatively suburban northern quarter, clearing it to the outskirts, where the few scattered houses remaining were protected by a dense grove of trees. The field of ruin is a mile in width, bounded by the lake on one side and mainly by a branch of the river on the other, and four miles in length, thus being as large as the half of New York City from the Battery to the Central Park, or as the whole of the peninsula of Boston. The houses burned set ten feet apart would form a row over a hundred miles in length. I judge that more than a third of the roof-space and fully half the floor-space of the city, the population of which was 330,000, was destroyed.

Familiar with these facts and comparisons before I came here, and having already seen many who had left the city since the fire, I now feel myself to have been able but slightly to appreciate the magnitude of its calamity. Besides the extent of the ruins, what is most remarkable is the completeness with which the fire did its work, as shown by the prostration of the ruins and the extraordinary absence of smoke-stains, brands, and all débris, except stone, brick, and iron, bleached to an ashy pallor. The distinguishing smell of the ruins is that of charred earth. In not more than a dozen cases have the four walls of any of the great blocks, or of any buildings, been left standing together. It is the exception to find even a single corner or chimney holding together to a height of more than twenty feet. It has been possible, from the top of an omnibus, to see men standing on the ground three miles away across what was the densest, loftiest, and most substantial part of the city.

Generally, the walls seem to have crumbled in from top to bottom, nothing remaining but a broad low heap of rubbish in the cellar—so low as to be overlooked from the pavement. Granite, all sandstones and all limestones, whenever fully exposed to the southwest, are generally flaked and scaled, and blocks, sometimes two and three feet thick, are cracked through and through. Marble and other limestones, where especially exposed, as in doors and window-dressings, especially if in thin slabs, have often fallen to powder. Walls of the bituminous limestone, of which there were but few, instead of melting away, as was reported, seem to have stood rather better than others; I cannot tell why. Iron railings and lamp-posts, detached from buildings, are often drooping, and, in thinner parts, seem sometimes to have been fused. Iron columns and floor-beams are often bent to a half-circle. The wooden (Nicholson) asphalt-and-tar-concrete pavements remain essentially unharmed, except where red-hot material or burning liquids have lain upon them. Street rails on wood are generally in good order; on McAdam, as far as I have seen, more often badly warped.

Where houses stood detached, and especially where they were surrounded by tall trees, there is less evidence of intense heat, charred wood and smoke-stains being seen in the ruins. I had heard it surmised that, by furnishing numerous small brands, the planted trees of the North Division would have helped to scatter the fire, but I find them generally standing to the smallest twigs, so inclined and stiffened, however, as to show perfectly the action upon them of the wind at the moment of death. It is evident that they would have been an efficient protection to the houses they surrounded had the buildings to windward been a little less tall, or the gale a degree less furious. For the wind appears not only to have been strong, but gusty and whirling. There is evidence of concentrated slants, eddies, and back-sets. This partly explains the small salvage. Many, a moment after they had been out to observe the flames in the distance, and had judged that they had still a chance to save their houses, were suddenly driven by a fierce heat, borne down upon them apparently from above, to flee, leaving even their choicest property, though previously packed and ready to be carried by hand. The radiated heat from the larger buildings was so strong that it scorched men ten rods away across the wind. Families were driven from one place of refuge to another—in several cases, to my knowledge, four times, and, finally, a few into the lake; many thousands into the open country. Some were floated or swam across the river.

Burning fragments of wooden parapets, sheets of roofing metal, signs, and scuttle-doors were carried great distances, and, with blazing felt, tarred paper, and canvas, and myriads of smaller sparks, sometimes swept down upon the fugitives with a terrific roar. Very sensible men have declared that they were fully impressed at such a time with the conviction that it was the burning of the world. Loose horses and cows, as well as people of all conditions on foot and in wagons, were hurrying half-blinded through the streets together, and it often happened that husbands and wives, parents and children, even mothers and infants, were forced apart and lost to each other. Sudden desolation thus added to the previous horrors, made some frantic who would otherwise have maintained composure. In general, however, the people, especially the households of the north side, appear to have manifested a greater degree of self-possession and of considerate thoughtfulness one for another, under these circumstances, than can be easily believed. Almost every one holds the remembrance of some instance of quiet heroism, often flavored with humor. The remains of only about one hundred human bodies have thus far been recognized in the ruins, and the coroner and others are of the opinion that not more than two hundred lives were lost. That the number should be so small can only be accounted for by the fact that there was an active volunteer rear-guard of cool-headed Christians, who often entered and searched houses to which they were strangers, dragging out their inmates sometimes by main force, and often when some, caught unawares, were bewildered, fainting, or suffocating. One still sees burned garments and singed beards.

Of course, a state of mind approaching insanity followed with many. After the lost had been found, as in most cases they soon were—children especially having been almost invariably taken up, tenderly cared for, and advertised by strangers—and after food and rest had been had, there was a reaction from desperation. For a time men were unreasonably cheerful and hopeful; now, this stage appears to have passed. In its place there is sternness; but so narrow is the division between this and another mood, that in the midst of a sentence a change of quality in the voice occurs, and you see that eyes have moistened. I had partly expected to find a feverish, reckless spirit, and among the less disciplined classes an unusual current setting towards turbulence, lawlessness, and artificial jollity, such as held in San Francisco for a long time after the great fire there—such as often seizes seamen after a wreck. On the contrary, Chicago is the soberest and the most clear-headed city I ever saw. I have observed but two men the worse for liquor; I have not once been asked for an alms, nor have I heard a hand-organ. The clearing of the wreck goes ahead in a driving but steady, well-ordered way. I have seen two hundred brick walls rising, ten thousand temporary houses of boards, and fifty thousand piles of materials lifting from the ruins; but, on Sunday, although there were other reports, in a walk of several miles among the ashes, I saw no hand-work going on, except that in two half-made cabins German women were holding boards while their husbands nailed them to the framing. It is obvious that the New England man is taking the helm.

There are respectable citizens who hold to the opinion that the fire was started and spread systematically by incendiaries, and I have seen one, lately from Paris, who is sure that it was part of a general war upon property. Numerous alleged facts are cited to sustain this view, but I believe them generally to be delusions growing out of the common excitement, or accidental coincidences. It is certain that the origin, progress, and all the unusual general phenomena of the fire can be reasonably accounted for in other ways.

You will have heard bad symptoms reported among the workingmen since the fire, but, on the whole, their conduct seems to have been as satisfactory as could have been reasonably expected. An unusual proportion of them are Germans, Swedes, and Norwegians, and, what is of great consequence, they were the owners of a lot and cottage. There has been an advance of about twenty per cent. in wages, and this has occurred without strikes or any general ill-feeling. Laborers now command $2 a day, carpenters and masons $4 to $5. Good mechanics are wanted, and many hundred more than are now here will be required in the spring.

The responsibility of leading affairs is felt to be too great to be trifled with. Even in politics this is true; perhaps, on the principle of locking the stable-door after the horse is stolen. City officers are to be elected next week, and citizens who have heretofore been unable to spare time for public from their private business, are exhibiting some concern about the character of the candidates. The old knots of dirty, overdressed men waiting for something to turn up seem to have had enough, and have disappeared. I have seen no soldiers, nor the slightest occasion for them. The police, as usual, except those regulating the passage of the crossings, seem to have nothing on their minds but a lazy looking forward to the arrival of their reliefs.

Although few of those who were men of substance yet know where they stand, and the work of general permanent reconstruction must, from loss of land titles and other reasons, be postponed till next summer, there has been no delay in deciding upon and starting efficient temporary arrangements for nearly all the old business of the city, except that of the courts. The shipping, railways, telegraphs, are all doing more work than before the fire, and will probably continue to. The city is again supplied with water, most of it with gas; it is as well sewered and paved as before. Omnibuses and street-cars are running on all the old lines; newspapers are published, schools are open and full, and half the numerous churches of the past are working more than double tides—the sensible, economical Roman Catholic custom of successive congregations and relays of clergymen having been adopted; while every day in the week the most effective preaching of the Gospel, in the form of bread, beef, and blankets, is uttered from each. Theatres, concerts, and lectures are advertised, and a new public library is started in the basement of a Baptist meeting-house. Three hundred of the burnt-out business concerns advertise themselves in new quarters, and new stocks of goods are constantly seen coming from the Eastern railway stations. In but few respects will the market a week hence be much worse, either to buy or sell in, than before. There is no difficulty in handling the crops, and, fortunately, they are large and excellent. Chicago, in short, is under jury-masts, and yet carries her ensign union down, but she answers her helm, lays her course, is making fair headway, and her crew, though on short allowance and sore tried, is thoroughly sober and knows its stations.

You ask whether it is in the power of man adequately to guard against such calamities—whether other great cities are as much exposed as was Chicago? All the circumstances are not established with sufficient accuracy for a final answer, and one cannot, in the present condition of affairs, make full enquiries of men who must be best informed; but to such preliminary discussion as is in order, I can offer a certain contribution.

The prevailing drought was, I think, a less important element of the fire in Chicago—whatever may have been the case as to those other almost more terrific fires which occurred simultaneously in Wisconsin and Michigan—than is generally assumed; yet doubtless it was of some consequence. As to the degree of it, I learn that there had been no heavy rain since the 3d of July, and, during this period of three months, it is stated by Dr. Rauch, the Sanitary Superintendent, the total rain-fall had been but two and a half inches. The mean annual rain-fall at Chicago is thirty-one inches. With regard to the cause of the drought, it is to be considered that millions of acres of land hereabouts, on which trees were scarce, have been settled within thirty years by people whose habits had been formed in regions where woods abound. They have used much timber for building, for fencing, railroads, and fuel. They have grown none. They are planting none to speak of. The same is true of nearly all parts of our country in which a great destruction of forests has occurred or is occurring. If the reduction of foliage in any considerable geographical division of the world tends to make its seasons capricious, as there is much evidence, the evil both of destructive droughts and devastating floods is very likely to extend and increase until we have a government service which we dare trust with extensive remedial measures. It is not a matter which commerce can be expected to regulate.

I can obtain no scientifically definite statement of the force of the wind. Several whom I have questioned recollect that they found it difficult, sometimes for a moment impossible, to make head against it; but I think that no year passes that some of our cities do not experience as strong a gale, and that every city in the country must expect to find equal dryness coinciding with equal force of wind as often, at least, as once in twenty years.

The origin of the fire was probably a commonplace accident. The fire started in a wooden building, and moved rapidly from one to another, close at hand, until the extended surface of quickly-burning material heated a very large volume of the atmosphere, giving rise to local currents, which, driving brands upon the heated roofs and cornices of the tall buildings to leeward, set them on fire, and through the rapid combustion of their contents, loosely piled tier upon tier, developed a degree of heat so intense that ordinary means of resistance to it proved of no avail. Under an old law, wooden buildings had been forbidden to be erected in or moved to the locality where the fire started. In 1867, upon the motion of men who wished to dispose of buildings they had contracted to move out of the more compact part of the city, the Common Council consented to a modification of this law. The Board of Health at the time urged the danger of doing so, and was told to mind its business. Underwriters, merchants, and capitalists were silent.

Chicago had a weakness for "big things," and liked to think that it was outbuilding New York. It did a great deal of commercial advertising in its house-tops. The faults of construction as well as of art in its great showy buildings must have been numerous. Their walls were thin, and were often overweighted with gross and coarse misornamentation. Some ostensibly stone fronts had huge overhanging wooden or sheet-metal cornices fastened directly to their roof timbers, with wooden parapets above them. Flat roofs covered with tarred felt and pebbles were common. In most cases, I am told by observers, the fire entered the great buildings by their roof timbers, even common sheet-metal seeming to offer but slight and very temporary protection to the wood on which it rested. Plain brick walls or walls of brick with solid stone quoins and window-dressings evidently resisted the fire much better than stone-faced walls with a thin backing of brick.

There has been no court-martial called for the trial of the fire service of the city. I understand that it was under the same board with the police. Most of the so-called police force of Chicago whom I had seen before the fire appeared in dirty, half-buttoned uniforms, and were either leaning against a door-post in conversation with equally disreputable-looking friends, and incessantly spitting on the sidewalk, or were moving with a gait and carriage which can be described by no word but loafing.

No one can be sure that with reasonably solid brick walls, reasonably good construction, and honest architecture, this fire could, once under strong headway, with the wind that was blowing, have been stopped at any point in its career, even by good generalship, directing a thoroughly well-drilled and disciplined soldierly force of firemen and police. But that the heat thrown forward would have been less intense, the advance of the fire less rapid, the destruction of buildings less complete, the salvage of their contents greater, and the loss of life smaller, may be assumed with confidence.

The walls least dilapidated are those of the Post-Office. They are of brick faced with stone, and two to three feet thick. It is stated that the fire entered by the upper windward windows, which, strangely, were not protected by iron shutters. The interior is thoroughly burned out. The windward side of the exterior is scaled and seared with heat, but the leeward side is scarcely injured at all; the glass even remains in the windows, and the sidewalks, rails, and lamp-posts are essentially unimpaired. It appears to me that this one building stood for a time a perfect dam to the fiery torrent. It was far from fireproof; but had there been a dozen other as well-built walls standing in line across the wind, and had there been no excessively weak roofs and cornices to leeward of them, I should suppose that half of all that was lost might have been saved.

The two most important buildings in the city were the Court-House, which was also the City Hall, and the pumping-house of the Water-Works. The Court-House was a costly structure with a stone exterior, ostensibly fireproof, standing in the midst of a public square. No respectable structure in the same situation would have been seriously injured. Large additions had been made to it two years ago, and the design for them is said to have been bargained for under such conditions that no respectable architect could have been employed. The result, architecturally, was at all events very bad. There is much more beauty in the walls now, where they have been chipped and crumbled by the fire, than ever before. It has also been publicly charged that some of the legislators of the city were interested in the building contracts, and that much money was made on them. The first fall of snow after the roof was put on caused it to fall in, and other parts of the structure were so thoroughly shattered that it was feared that the whole would come down. A proposition to tear it down and rebuild it was seriously entertained, but, as one of the gentlemen who decided the question told me, in view of what it had already cost, the taxpayers would not have stood it, and it was determined to patch it up. On the top of it, a tall wooden, tin-clad cupola was set. The fire, true to its mission of instructive punishment, made a long leap forward to seize upon this; it soon fell in; and, before the nearest adjoining commercial blocks to windward had even taken fire, it had been completely burnt out with all its invaluable contents.

I have neither seen the Water-Works nor the justly distinguished engineer who is regarded as responsible for their construction, and who may be depended on to give the reason of their unfortunate break-down with the utmost accuracy and candor. The roof of the pumping-house, of metal, I believe, is publicly stated to have been upheld by wooden timbering, which was charred by heat from firebrands which had fallen above. Breaking down, it broke some part of the pumping-engine, and thus the city was left without water. The main battle, such as it was, had been before this fought and lost, but that much might still have been saved had the flow of water continued, a single experience will sufficiently indicate.

A friend who had, with other treasures, a choice library of several thousand volumes, tells me that he had thought much of the danger of fire, and was prepared to meet it. His house stood apart from all others, and was surrounded by trees. He had a strong force of instructed assistants, with private hydrants, hose, wet carpets, and buckets, well distributed. He had horses and wagons ready, but to the last was confident in his means of resistance. All houses to windward of him had nearly burned down, and he had extinguished every spark that had fallen upon his own, when the water failed. Five minutes afterwards his roofs and walls were on fire in a dozen places, and he had all he could do to save the lives of his household.

Considering the circumstances under which the arrangements for relief were formed, they appear to be admirably good. In the midst of the most pressing demands of their private affairs, men of great good sense and well informed have taken time to devise and bring others into a comprehensive and sufficient organization, acting under well-guarded laws. Chicago, when all did well, exceeded all in her manner of providing for the sick and wounded, prisoners and refugees as well as friends; and now the bread she then floated is truly returning to her under natural laws; for men and women more fit to be trusted in every way than those to whom the control of the contributions for relief have at length, after, it is said, a hard struggle with political speculators, been given, could hardly be found in any other city. The most scrupulous caution is taken to guard against waste or imposition, and to avoid encouraging improvidence, indolence, or a disposition to mendicant habits. Among hundreds of women drawing rations, I saw few who did not appear to have been decent, tidy, motherly persons—nearly all were European born.

The most costly and best form of charity has been that of supplying, either as a loan or as a gift, a limited amount of building materials with printed plans for a rough cabin of two rooms to be made of it, together with a stove, mattresses, and blankets, to men having families, and able by their work to support them. This has already been done in 6,000 cases. Great eagerness is shown to obtain this favor, especially by those laboring men who were burned out from houses of their own, and who can thus at once reoccupy their own land. The thankfulness expressed by these men—thankfulness, as the Mayor says, "to all the world"—is sometimes very touching. The cost of the cabins, lined with heavy paper and supplied with a chimney, is, according to size, from $90 to $120. Besides the shelter thus provided, the public squares are filled with temporary barracks, and the whole number of those who have been housed by means of contributions received is, I believe, about 35,000. Wherever it is possible, persons not of families able to at least partly support themselves by labor, are helped to leave the city. The number of those to whom aid is thought needful to be administered has been rapidly reduced, every care being taken to obtain work for them and to avoid feeding those who avoid work. It is now a little over 60,000. With the coming on of winter, work will fail, and the number needing assistance increase. The funds thus far promised are not enough to meet the requirements of the barest humanity, and, especially if the winter should be severe, larger contributions than there is now reason to expect will be sorely needed.

Arrangements are made for searching out and privately and delicately administering to such sufferers as will not ask or be publicly known to receive charity. It is easy to see that the number of such must be very large. It was a maxim in Chicago that a fool could hardly invest in city real estate so badly that, if he could manage to hold it for five years, its advance would fail to give him more than ten per cent. interest, while there was a chance for a small fortune. Acting on this view, most young professional men and men on small salaries, if they had families, bought a lot and built a small house for themselves, confident that by hook or by crook they should save enough to pay the interest as it fell due on the necessary mortgage, together with the cost of insurance. To accomplish this they lived pinchingly, and their houses and lots were their only reserves. In thousands of cases, they have lost their houses, their insurance, and their situations all at one blow. Fifty of the insurance companies doing business here have suspended payment, seven of them being Chicago companies, whose directors were men of local influence and often employers.

The Sanitary Department has a list, known to be as yet incomplete, of 180 regular physicians who were burned out. Many, if not most of these lost house and furniture, as well as office, instruments, and books, and the families in which they practised are dispersed. Judge Wilson reckons the number of lawyers, mostly young men, whose libraries were burned at five hundred. Many of both classes, for some days after the fire, took their places in the lines in order to get the rations of biscuits served out by the relief agents.

But even the condition of young men with families who have lost everything is hardly as sad as that of many of the older citizens, much overworked men who had fairly earned leisure and affluence. Owing to peculiar commercial conditions here, the number of such who have lost everything is larger than it would be in an older city. Cautious men averse to the general habits of speculation were most disposed to invest in buildings, and patriotic men, who had grown up with the city, and who had the most interest and pride in it, were most apt to insure in the local companies.

Amidst all the material prosperity of Chicago, there had always been a few of her citizens who had really bonded themselves to have no share in it, in devotion to higher pursuits. As examples of these, the Kinnicut brothers, as both are dead, may perhaps be named. There were others, their instructors, leaders, supporters, and followers, who, like them, had travelled frugally and far, studied devotedly, and who, aided by a few worthy men of greater wealth, were laying the foundations of a true seat and school of art, science, and learning. Several special collections had already been gathered which money can never replace. These, with libraries, many series of notes, the work of half a lifetime, and some unpublished books, more or less nearly complete, are lost; and most of those who had supplied the funds to sustain these most interesting and important bases of the higher civilization for the great Northwest, are thrown back to struggle again for the decent maintenance of their families.

But great as is this loss, it will be consciously felt by comparatively few. Even more appalling, in view of the long years of weary labor of many educated men involved, is the destruction of important papers, contracts, agreements, and accounts, notes of surveys, and records of deeds and mortgages. It is estimated that nine-tenths of the papers held by attorneys were kept in various patent safes on upper floors, and were destroyed. The same is true of those held by surveyors, real-estate agents, etc. The city and county records were, I believe, in vaults built, like those of the Custom-House and Post-Office, on stone slabs, supported on iron columns, which, soon yielding to the heat, tumbled them into a pit of fire, and all were lost. How the city is to recover from this blow no one can yet see, but the difficulty is engaging the study of its best and most conservative minds; and that in some way it will recover, and that it will presently advance even with greater rapidity, but with far firmer steps, than ever before, those most staggered and cast down by it have not a shadow of doubt.

FRED. LAW OLMSTED.

POLITICAL APATHY IN FRANCE.

PARIS, October 13.

THE elections for the Councils General have taken place in the most perfect order all over France. But this may be said of all elections: there never occurs a riot on election day. To be sure, sometimes the day afterwards there comes a revolution. There is in the character of the people the strangest admixture of lawlessness and of respect of forms and regulations. I have it from one of the deputies who were arrested on the 2d of December, that he found himself in a crowd, surrounded by people who not only did not offer him any help against the policemen who were taking him to prison, but were laughing and joking at his expense. "Gentlemen," said one of the policemen to these lookers-on, "respect your representatives." The policeman was willing to insult the constitution, but he would not have his prisoner insulted.

The second and certain characteristic of all elections now in France is the apathy and general abstention of the middle classes or the wealthy Conservatives. In many cantons, not more than a third of the electors went to the ballot-box. The Radicals, on the contrary, being a combative party, and better disciplined, muster all their forces, and seem to understand their duties better. The indifference of the Conservatives, of the bourgeois of the towns as well as of the peasants of the country, is very much to be blamed, but, in the present instance, there can be found some excuse for it. The peasants and bourgeois are completely bewildered by the results of universal suffrage. In the latter part of the Empire, they were asked to vote a plébiscite, and they were told that this plébiscite would assure for ever peace and order. A few months afterwards, war broke out, and its fatal results were not more of a surprise to the country than its rash opening. When Paris was forced to capitulate, when part of France was given up to the Germans and the rest to the wild administration of Gambetta, France was again called upon to hold a general election. There was an instinctive effort made throughout the country towards peace and constitutional monarchy: the Chamber signed the peace, but did not build up a constitutional monarchy. It is idle to recall all the reasons, personal and general, which brought on the defeat of the monarchical party in the Chamber and the revival of the Republic, which had been as completely condemned as the Empire by the rule of success. But it is clear that, politically speaking, France is no more advanced than she was a few months ago; that she does not know her own future; that she has no definite institutions. What is the use of voting? is the expression of disappointment of most electors. The machinery of the election is not so arranged that there is a definite relation between the will of the electors and the action of the elected. As soon as the deputies met at Bordeaux, they renounced the right which had just been confided to them by their constituents to establish a settled government and to frame institutions for the country. The passiveness of the deputies is now reflected in the mind of the country; and this passiveness is the third characteristic of the late elections.

With the exception of the Radicals of the great towns, of some Legitimists and Bonapartists, almost all the councillors now elected are what I may call passive politicians. They have generally assumed in this last election the denomination of Conservative-liberals; but these words must not be understood in the common English sense. Our Liberal-conservatives belong to every shade of opinion. You will find among the fifteen hundred councillors who have been elected under this name, gentlemen who would restrict the liberty of the press, if they could, maintain the temporal power of the Pope, and enact all sorts of illiberal measures. You will find among them, also, men who, having had a hand in four or five revolutions, have hardly a right to call themselves Conservatives. But this Janus-faced mask of Liberal-conservatism and Conservative-liberalism really represents the actual state of the country. The country is so far Liberal that it does not desire any return to open despotism, such as followed the coup d'état of December. It is so far Conservative that it lives in dread of revolution, and would rather keep its actual government, weak and impotent as it is, than run the risk of new commotions, even with the view and the hope of something better. The spirit of obedience of the country shows itself under a republic as it did under an empire. The Liberal-conservatives are nothing but obedient instruments of the administration of M. Thiers. Don't ask them if they prefer a monarchy to a republic, or a republic to a monarchy; if they would have the President elected by universal suffrage or elected by the Chamber; if they want one or two legislative chambers. They prefer what M. Thiers prefers, because M. Thiers is the actual tenant of power; because, not having the means, or thinking that they have not the means, of directing his policy, they are contented with obeying his direction; because the "illustrious old man" is the fountain of honor and grace, and wields the largest and most uncontrolled patronage in the world.

"Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Our sceptical bourgeoisie is sleeping now more or less quietly on the pillow of a "republic without republicans." It has found a "saviour" in M. Thiers. But may he not die, as did poor M. Lambrecht the other day? Is he not seventy-four years old? Is he immortal? These are very indiscreet questions, but they don't trouble much the minds of our Liberal-conservatives. They have, or think they have, another saviour on the shelf, who, as soon as M. Thiers disappears, will appear like a deus ex machinâ. On the strength of this, we have become very optimistic. We fear nothing from the Reds, though we walk every day before our ruined monuments. We fear nothing from the Bonapartists, though their papers make open warfare on the Republic and a constant appeal to the people. This strange optimism shows the elasticity of the French nature; and it is really difficult to argue on politics with people who are led by instinct rather than by reasoning. I sometimes almost feel like admiring and envying this curious indifference of mind, which carries so many people, always contented and satisfied, over (or below—which shall I say?) the current of daily politics; which makes them so complacent to the power of the day, so forgetful of the sufferings and the lessons of the past, so hopeful and confident of the future. But a single walk in front of the ghastly ruins of the Hôtel de Ville, a look at a photograph-shop where I always find people gazing at heroes of the Commune, a ride through the melancholy Bois de Boulogne or along the gloomy fortifications, the sight of a maimed young soldier, looking like the ghost of the Army of the Loire, fill me with a sentiment of revolt against this complacency, this optimism, this passiveness, which has brought France where it is now. The spirit which now rallies round the equivocal government of M. Thiers is the same which supported the Empire during eighteen years.

One of the deputies of the majority, who now is in his country place, writes to me that, in the solitude of his park, under his old trees, he has been seized with a profound melancholy. "What have we done, after all, at Versailles? We have done all we did not wish to do, and all that we wished to do we have left undone." And he will return to Versailles, and probably vote again for the government, and give longer life to a republic which he wished to overturn. Casimir Périer, the son of the minister of Louis Philippe, has joined the cabinet of M. Thiers. He never showed much of the spirit of his father, but he is a very honest man in his private character, laborious, well versed in finance. As reporter of the Commission of the Budget, he advocated strongly the establishment of an income-tax, which M. Thiers opposed. He was, during the whole Empire, a personal friend and confidential adviser of the Count de Paris. Now he enters a Republican cabinet. Does he sacrifice his affections, his political views? It would be better if he did than if he did not. For the morality of a country has less to suffer from the treachery of a few men than from the establishment of a political code which allows a man to serve all parties without losing caste in his own. The example of M. Thiers has found and will find many imitators. Public men are no longer asked to bring their views, their doctrines, into power; they are asked to leave them at the door before entering. The less doctrinaires they are, the better. Is it to be wondered at if the country is becoming less and less interested in politics, if the very word of politics smacks of corruption and treason? The great mass of the country craves peace and order; but it has ceased to believe in the politicians. We speak of the "illustrious old man" who has saved France from the Commune; of "honest" Casimir Pé but a secret feeling of contempt underlies these official expressions of adulation. The country knows that in the hour of need it has found no better statesmen than generals. The Empire had destroyed all the germs of vitality in the country; but the historian must look much further back than 1870 to find the signs of this impoverishment of the political genius in France. The Empire would have been an impossibility if the country had had political virtues. But in 1830 as in 1870, the Republic was only a truce between contending parties, who aimed at nothing but the possession of power, and the exclusion of all rivals from office. The theory which has destroyed public morality is that which allows a man to be a servant of the "state," whoever is the representative of the state. In free countries, an honest man thinks he cannot better serve his countrymen than by working faithfully and untiringly for the political and social doctrines which appear to him most adapted to the necessities of the time. Here, the occupation, the tenure of office, seem more important than the objects of government. And our actual bastard government, if it lasts long, will entirely destroy whatever remains of political morality. Our motto will become, "Live and let live."

Correspondence.

A PROTECTIONIST'S CHARITY.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I read with interest the article in your issue of October 26, entitled "Science and Human Brotherhood," but was somewhat struck throughout it by what I cannot but consider as a disingenuous avoidance of one aspect of the Chicago calamity. I refer to the singular illustrations its sequel affords of the beautiful accuracy, if so I may call it, of the protective system as applied to American industry, so constantly and so adversely criticised in your columns. You say in the article I refer to: "The fortunes of the whole race are being so closely linked together by science that there is nobody, from the hod-carrier up to the millionaire, who may not any morning read in the paper news from the uttermost ends of the earth depriving him of his fortune or his daily bread."

Now, sir, let me suggest one way in which protection steps in to modify the asperities to which you refer, and I cannot do so better than by calling your attention to an article in the Tribune of the same date with your issue from which I have quoted, entitled "Fire and Free Trade." Referring to the low tariff in operation at the time of the great New York conflagration of 1835, Mr. Greeley says: "To replace the machinery and fabrics destroyed by the fire we had to send abroad; . . . the money to replace what has now been burned will not be sent abroad to enrich foreign manufacturers; but, thanks to the wise policy of protection which has built up American industries, it will stimulate our own manufactures, set our mills running faster, and give employment to thousands of idle workmen." One fact is worth many theories. I am myself in a small way interested in certain lumber and iron enterprises. Stimulated by the suggestive article in the Tribune, I at once, after reading it, sat down and calculated how much the people of Chicago, in rebuilding their city, would have to pay me individually for iron and lumber in excess of ordinary profit because of the commanding position which our tariff legislators had secured me and my associates. I estimated it at $200, and, consequently, I forthwith drew my check for half that amount and forwarded it to the Chicago Relief Fund.

Now, Sir, how can you get over such a fact as this? Here all parties were bettered by protection. I was enabled to send a handsome sum to suffering Chicago, which otherwise I could not have sent, and was yet richer by the fire in an equal sense; while Chicago received a sum in charity which, without the tariff, it could not have received. Thus we both were enriched, and no one but the foreigner was the poorer.

I hope that you will frankly confess that here at last both theory and fact favor protection. Mr. Greeley has fairly indicated, and I have proved in my own case, how a great calamity may by judicious legislation be not only materially alleviated, but actually converted, in certain respects, into a healthy and stimulating national benefit. Deeply as I should unite with you free-traders in deploring such a disaster, on humanitarian grounds, the present destruction of half of the cities of the Union could, under our present system, hardly result, as Mr. Greeley shows, otherwise than to my individual emolument. That such a system, robbing calamity of half its bitterness, must contain some beneficent features, I think that you will scarcely deny.

A. P. A.

Boston, November 1, 1871.

Notes.

A COLLECTION of poems by Mrs. Celia Thaxter, which have mostly or wholly been in print before, will be published shortly by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, and will doubtless be as favorably received as the rest of this lady's writings in the magazines have been.

—Mr. Langworthy, of Boston, recently found in Bristol, Vermont, and has presented to the Congregational Library of Boston, a clean and perfect copy of Roger L'Estrange's Observator. The Observator has been well described by Macaulay in the first volume of his history. It may be classed among the Newsletters, although, as Macaulay says, "their business was to publish news without comment, whereas the Observator published comment without news." It was published from 1679 to 1687, and appeared irregularly, sometimes two and three days in succession, and again dispersedly, two or three times a week. 904 numbers were issued, and, of these, not one is missing from Mr. Langworthy's copy. The fortunate finder of this collection, rare even in England, thinks it likely that this of his is the only copy in the United States. We may add that the Congregational Library of Boston is one that is being formed by the united efforts of the Congregational societies of that city—if, indeed, the Massachusetts Congregational societies generally do not take an interest in the affair—to illustrate the history of the whole come-outer movement against prelacy, called by whatever name, Nonconformist, Separatist, etc. Although no money has thus far been set aside for this library by the societies for whose use it is created, it is growing steadily from voluntary contributions, and several rare and valuable books have lately been added to it.

—A correspondent informs us that the people of Lisbon were not, as we stated in a recent article, left alone after the earthquake of 1755 "to battle as best they could with their sufferings and losses." "The news," he says, "produced the greatest sympathy throughout England, which was shown by the most extensive donations of money and clothing sent immediately to the sufferers. The City of London alone voted, if I remember aright, the sum of fifty thousand pounds as a measure of relief, an amount quite equal in purchasing power to a half-million of dollars at the present day. The same spirit that is manifested to-day in the subscriptions for the aid of the Chicago sufferers was abundantly manifested in the British metropolis in 1755." Our correspondent is right, as examination has proved to us. Dunham, in his "Spain and Portugal" (vol. v., p. 257), speaks of "the promptitude with which England despatched money, clothing, and provisions for the relief of the sufferers," a generosity which "was the more honorable, as the English Government had little reason to be satisfied with the King, who, from the commencement of his reign, had interposed whatever obstacle he could devise to the trade of the country." He adds that the Portuguese "received the relief, but cursed the heretical hands that afforded it." Horace Walpole wrote on December 5, 1755, to Sir Horace Mann: "We are despatching a ship with a present of an hundred thousand pounds in provisions and necessaries, for they want almost everything." The English share of the loss "is reckoned by some," says Walpole, "at four millions." The House of Commons, on the formal recommendation of the King, voted supplies in aid of the people of Lisbon.

—A prominent clergyman in a neighboring town in New Jersey writes us that, it having been reported that he was not going to vote for the Republican candidate for Governor at the coming election, some anonymous person has sent him an abusive and insulting letter, bearing the frank of the Hon. J. C. Platt, M.C. He justly remarks that this is a prostitution of the franking privilege which deserves public condemnation, and none the less because the Congressman in question probably "intended to do nothing more than render a general service to his party when he gave the use of his name to save his party postage, at the expense of his Government, in the circulation of campaign documents in New Jersey." Our informant adds that he has no personal knowledge of this Congressman; and, in fact, he has probably misspelt his name, for we presume he can be none other than Hon. James H. Platt, one of the representatives from Virginia. This renders the business still more edifying, and we trust that the Postmaster-General will not fail to treat Congress to the spectacle of one of its members freely lending his frank for electioneering purposes in a State not his own, at the risk of burdening the mails with blackguard letters addressed to inoffensive citizens.

—The death of Mr. Charles Babbage, the inventor of calculating machines, is announced. He was born December 26, 1792. The analytical power of his mind was early manifested. In 1815, when he was only twenty-two years old, appeared his remarkable "Essay towards the Calculus of Functions," a very general and profound sort of algebra, of which he was the chief author. About 1822, he made his first model of a calculating machine. It was a "difference engine," that is, the first few numbers of a table being supplied to it, it would go on and calculate the others successively according to the same law. This, at least, is as correct as so short and easy a statement can be. In the following year, at the request of the Royal Society, the Government made a grant of £1,500 to enable Mr. Babbage to proceed with the construction of his machine. In 1829, the Government largely increased this sum, and in 1830 assumed the property of the machine, and declared their intention of defraying the cost of completing it. This Mr. Brunel estimated at £12,000 at a time (February, 1831) when from £8,000 to £9,000 must have been spent. It was in 1830 that Babbage published his "Enquiry into the Causes, of the Decay of Science in England," a savage attack on the management of the Royal Society; on Mr. Pond, the Astronomer-Royal; on Captain Sabine, and other influential scientific men. But it was after the publication of this book that Government agreed to furnish the engine. In 1833, a portion of the engine, sufficient to illustrate the working of the whole, was put together. It was a wonderful piece of workmanship, of a precision then unknown, and since unrivalled. To make it, it had been necessary not only to contrive new tools, but to lay a scientific foundation of the principles of tools, and to educate the mechanics who were to use them. Not a penny of the money paid by the Government ever went into Mr. Babbage's pocket, but, on the contrary, he had always advanced the money to pay the workmen until the Treasury warrants were issued, so that he was usually in advance from £500 to £1,000. In 1833, Mr. Babbage declined to continue this system, and, in consequence, the engineer discontinued the construction of the engine, dismissed the workmen, and took away all the tools. During the suspension of the work caused by this circumstance, the great misfortune of his life befell Mr. Babbage. He discovered the possibility of a new analytical engine, to which the difference engine was nothing; for it would do all the arithmetical work that that would do, but infinitely more; it would perform the most complicated algebraical processes, elimination, extraction of roots, integration, and it would find out for itself what operations it was necessary to perform; and the principle of this machine was such as immensely to simplify the means of attaining the object of a difference machine. One would suppose that, finding himself so unlucky as to have thought of such a thing, Babbage would at least have had the sense to keep it strictly to himself. Instead of that, he wrote immediately and communicated it to the Government! Before that, all was going smoothly; after that, they never would advance another penny. But it must be admitted that Mr. Babbage himself does not seem to have been very ardent to go on with the old machine after the new one was invented. Of course, neither has been constructed. Another difference engine has since been made by a Swede, named Scheütz. This machine is now at the Albany Observatory, and a duplicate of it is used in the office of the Registrar-General in London. Recently, an important new plan for such an engine has been invented in this country; and careful estimates show that it could be constructed for at most $5,000. But the analytical engine is, beyond question, the most stupendous work of human invention. It is so complicated that no man's mind could trace the manner of its working through drawings and descriptions, and its author had to invent a new notation to keep account of it. This mechanical notation has been found very serviceable for simpler cases.

—Mr. Babbage wrote some works which come within the department of political economy. He has introduced several principles of rather subsidiary importance; but his books are more valuable for the striking facts which they contain. He was also the author of one of the Bridgewater Treatises. He was a single-minded and honorable man of science, who hated intrigues and charlatanry. He was witty and entertaining, and knew how to make himself agreeable to the public, but he did not do it by anything verging upon claptrap. He would invent a ballet or invent an automaton to play tit-tat-too, but he did not confound such things with his scientific claims. He was a real genius, but with a not infrequent fault of genius, an egregious and lamentable vanity. There is a trace of it, perhaps, in the following sentence, which may be taken as his epitaph: "If," he says, "it is the will of that Being who gave me the endowments which led to the discovery of the analytical engine that I should not live to complete my work, I bow to that decision with intense gratitude for those gifts, conscious that through life I have never hesitated to make the severest sacrifices of fortune, and even of feelings, in order to accomplish my imagined mission."

—A very handsomely printed and well-arranged collection of "Three and Four Place Tables of Logarithmic and Trigonometric Functions," by Professor James Mills Peirce (published by Ginn Brothers, Boston), which lies upon our table for notice, reminds us of another debt which the world owes to Mr. Babbage. The publication of his logarithms in 1826 makes an era in the art of computation. They were the first ones in which the proper pains were taken to avoid errors, especially by the thorough examination of the stereotype plates. They were also the first ones of which the arrangement, shape, and size of type, manner of ruling, and color of ink and paper, had been determined upon only after careful experimentation. Babbage tried fifty different colors of paper and ten of ink, and found that the blackest ink upon light buff paper was the least fatiguing to the eye. Much attention has since been paid to all such points which facilitate or expedite computation, and some principles of dividing the page by ruled lines have been discovered which were unknown to Babbage. In 1841, Mr. De Morgan called attention to the great advantages of four-place tables. They can be used with twice the speed of five-place tables, and with four times the speed of seven-place tables, and, as De Morgan pointed out, for navigation and most ordinary purposes have all the accuracy which is desirable. Three-place tables are a later notion. They were strongly advocated by Mr. T. Chappelier in 1863; and we know those who have used them for the last four years with unspeakable comfort for all rough approximate work. For ordinary people who do not have enough calculations to make to keep them in practice in using even five-place tables, the three and four-place tables may, in many cases, be of real utility, if the use of them is once learned.

—Sir Roderick Impey Murchison, Bart., died in London on Sunday, the 22d ult. Geological and geographical science loses in him one who in his day of active labor did a full share of the work in both departments, and who, in his later years, has worthily filled the place of a Nestor. Born in Ross-shire, in Scotland, nearly eighty years ago, he was fortunate enough to add to the natural aptitude which his countrymen seem to have for geological studies the acquired skill of an engineer, by an education at the military school of Marlow, so that he came with good preparation to his work. His first important work was done under the guidance of Dr. Buckland. At that time the great task of the geologists was to unravel the confused masses of rocks which lie below the coal measures, and which had been left under the general name of Grauwacke after the separation of the more clearly distinguished overlying formations. Nowhere in Europe could the study of those groups of rocks known as Devonian and Silurian have been so well undertaken as in Great Britain. Murchison and Sedgwick began about the same time to determine the relations of these rocks. Working somewhat independently of each other, they were fortunate enough each to work out a great division in those beds—Murchison the Silurian, and Sedgwick the Cambrian rocks. Naturally enough, they quarrelled about the sharing of their discoveries, each claiming the Lower Silurian as his own property. Geologists have pretty generally given Sedgwick an equal share in the honor to be gained by the division of the old Grauwacke and the interpretation of those early stages of the earth's history, but to Murchison unquestionably belongs the credit of having done the work as well from the study of the organic remains as from the purely physical data; and this at a day when the use of fossils as agents in determining rocks was a decided advance in the science. The record of this, the most important work of his long scientific life, was given to the world in his "Silurian System of Rocks" (imp. quarto, pp. 768, London, 1839), republished in the fourth edition of the "Siluria," in 1867. In 1846, Murchison advised the miners of Cornwall to emigrate to Australia and dig for gold, basing his prediction upon the coincidence in geological structure between the cordilleras of Australia and the gold-bearing rocks of the Ural. There can be no doubt that the discovery of gold had been made over six years before by De Strzelecki, and again by W. B. Clarke in 1841, but the whole matter having been hushed up by the local authorities for fear of spoiling the morals of the colony by the migration which the publication of such facts would bring, it had never come to Murchison's ears. It remains, therefore, one of the few pecuniarily valuable vaticinations of geologists. He was also singularly successful at a later date in his anticipation of the physical geography of the interior of Southern Africa from the geology of the region about Cape Town. Next to the Silurian discoveries, his greatest work was the "Geology of Russia in Europe and the Ural Mountains," which he, together with De Verneuil and Keyserling, published in 1845. This work, in two volumes quarto, with map and sections, is one of the greatest contributions to geology of its time. In it Murchison divided the Permian from the carboniferous, as he had proposed to do in 1841, in a publication of some of the results of the survey. This was an addition to the science of the same kind as his Silurian researches, but showed far less critical ability, inasmuch as he confounded the Trias and Permian to such an extent that the very town of Perm, whence the name was taken, rests on the former rock. Jules Marcou first called attention to this considerable error, and so completed the discrimination of the newly discovered stage of our history. Besides these two chefs-d'œuvre, there are over a hundred and twenty other distinct works from his pen, mostly in the shape of memoirs contributed to the learned societies of Great Britain. All these are valuable; some of them among the best essays of British geologists. As Director of the Geological Survey of Great Britain, and President of the Geographical Society, both of which grew to their greatness under his charge, he did not the least of his work. Knowing Africa after the fashion that Ritter knew Asia, he has been able to do much to direct the zeal of the explorers who of late years have struggled into its recesses. By the death of Sir Roderick, the convulsionist school of geologists loses its greatest leader; to the last, he strove against the views which Sir Charles Lyell has made so thoroughly his own. He died with the conviction, that the world was the product of a series of great revolutionary changes, unlike in character or in energy the changes which are now taking place before our eyes. The last man who could claim to have studied with William Smith, the father of English geology, he was a bridge over the half-century which separates us from the early days of the science he did so much to build.

—Mr. J. W. Bouton has on hand a most curious specimen of book-making: ten large quarto volumes of mounted scraps relating to tobacco. The contents of this remarkable production of industry and enthusiasm comprise prints and wood-cuts, portraits of renowned smokers, tobacco-papers, newspaper cuttings, and several pamphlets and poems, including Mr. Fairholt's little book on tobacco, but, oddly enough, not including King James's "Counterblast." In turning over this singular omnium gatherum, we have come upon a few things interesting to other men beside smokers and chewers of tobacco. Here is a charming portrait of Hogarth, engraved from the original in the possession of the Duke of Bedford. The title adds: "This portrait of Mr. Hogarth was made me a present of by him in friendly return for a tobacco-box I gave him. Sm. Graves. Chiswick, 29th Dec., 1761." There is also a portrait of Jean Bart, from a painting by Rigaud, engraved on copper and colored. Two tracts—one in prose, "A Treatise concerning the taking of the Fumes of Tobacco. By To. Venner. London, 1650"; and the other in verse, with the odd title, "Tobacco Battered and the Pipes Shattered about their Eares that idly idolize so base and barbarous a Weed, etc., etc."—will interest those who love to rake among forgotten things.

—The squabbles of men of science have been long as notorious for their ferocity as the squabbles of theologians, and are fully as amusing. There is perhaps nothing more amusing in this line than Büchner's defence of his celebrated book, "Matter and Force," against his critics, in his preface to his third and subsequent editions, the English translation of which appeared last year. The assault made by the book on established beliefs was so terrible that it naturally drew forth a host of replies in Germany, many of them doubtless vituperative enough, but one hardly expected the great materialistic preacher to meet them with their own weapons. The editor of the Frankfurter Katholisches Kirchenblatt, "the parish priest," Beda Weber, he "dismisses," on account of the "melancholy notoriety" he has acquired, but not without pronouncing him a "theological cut-throat," who would revive the Inquisition if he could. The Allgemeine Zeitung, Dr. Büchner says, is "well known to be better informed of everything which passes in heaven and on earth than God himself." Mr. Karl Gutzkow, who attacks the book from "his domestic hearth," is advised to apply himself "to learning something from popular books, instead of criticising them." But Mr. Wolfgang Menzel, having called the Doctor's theories, in his Literaturblatt, "most vulgar blasphemy," making "man the son of a monkey and a bestial machine," and also "meanest empiricism" and "contamination of youth," the Doctor declares he is not surprised by such expressions, Menzel "having long been accustomed to find them in his own vulgar writings," and he denounces him as "a former demagogue and devourer of the French." The Kirchener Zeitung is informed that "its pious ejaculations and heart-rending groans" are ludicrous; and "the pious poet of the Frankfurter Anzeiger, who," says the doctor, "on our account paid for two insertions of his verses, is hereby informed that we have not been favored with a visit from his little angel." The insinuation that the verses were only published by the author's paying for their insertion is peculiarly cutting. In the preface to the fourth edition, the author comes back to the wretched Gutzkow, who appears to have rallied and returned to the charge. We are now told that Dr. Büchner has only spoken to him twice, and "has for the last five or six years moved in a sphere quite inaccessible to him," and that he (Gutzkow) writes from a "pothouse." Dr. Wilhelm Schultz Bodmer, of Zurich, "only showed by his witticisms how little he could prevail on himself to hold his tongue concerning things which are beyond his sphere of vision." His jokes are pronounced "miserable," and the Doctor "prefers not to mention the effect they produce on him." Schultz's assault on the author's assertion that the male brain is heavier than the female, he impudently supports by the assertion that Dr. Büchner, "being a bachelor, can know nothing of the matter empirically." To this the latter replies that there are women who have more intellect than their husbands; but exceptions prove nothing against a rule, and "the personal experience" (this is very cutting) "of Mr. Schultz might prove sufficient for him, but not for science." Dr. Weber, a grand-ducal physician at Ulrichstein, is handled with almost equal severity; but nobody catches it like Mr. H. Langenbeck, of Göttingen, who attacked the Doctor in a work written "for the benefit of indigent Hanoverian physicians." "It might more fittingly," Dr. Büchner says, "have been written for the benefit of an asylum of idiots," and he says the contents show that the inside of Mr. Langenbeck's head "must somewhat resemble the cabbage-market of Göttingen after market-day."

—Not art, exactly, but the work of a man very clever with his pencil, is "The Communists of Paris in 1871: Types, Physiognomies, Characters," by Bertall, editor of the Soir during the Commune. The illustrations appear to be engraved on wood in a free style, touched up afterwards with color. They are rather more of the nature of caricature than they should be to make them a valuable contribution to the history of the time, but, considering how much human nature there is in Frenchmen, they are all we can expect until the lion himself is allowed to paint the picture. While caricatures of all sorts—some so monstrous as to be suited only for a society of Houyhnhnms—are allowed to be sold freely all over Paris, the photographs of the Communists are not permitted to be sold, which is a thoroughly French idea of justice. Among the caricatures, however, since it is these that must stand us in the place of truth, the pictures of M. Bertall are the best that we have seen. Here are the General-in-Chief, Bergeret; the Procureur, Raoul Rigault; Delescluze, the Minister of War; Vallès, member of the Commune; the General Commandant, La Cecilia; Assi, Colonel délégué aux munitions de guerre, with others of less importance. The book is worth an examination.

—The Moniteur des Architectes has reached its fourth year, and contains in its latest numbers many hints and suggestions in design that will find a ready hearing among the New York idolaters of the modern French "style laid," as we once heard an intelligent blouse characterize it, in speaking of the new opera-house. But, more remarkable than any of the designs in this work, we have found the frank admissions of the Introductory Note. "Our country," says the editor, "has trusted too much in these later years to its glorious past; even before our military reverses, the world had begun to question our supremacy in the arts and in science. A neighboring nation, which, since then, has made us feel, and that terribly, all the weight of her strength, was showing us with pride what she, too, could accomplish while we were slumbering in an over-confident vanity. To-day it is necessary for us to fight foot-to-foot against an enemy who, after having humiliated our arms, is endeavoring to rob us of our moral crown. Let us seize with vigilance every part of the field of human intelligence, that no German may ever penetrate it without finding there the footprint of some Frenchman who has been there before him. This is the way in which we can avenge ourselves, the way in which we ought to do it. This is how France can buy back her past glory, and make it greater than ever. It is not in rushing again into new hazards before we are fully armed for revenge; it is in showing ourselves superior to Germany in science, in industry, in art, and, above all, in morals."

THOMAS JEFFERSON.*

We have had occasion from time to time to moralize over the caducity of fame, and the swiftness of oblivion to settle down upon the memory of men who once filled the public scene, almost as soon as they have left it. And thus not merely the common herd of politicians, to most of whom forgetfulness is the kindest boon survivors can bestow upon them—

"Heads without name, no more remembered—"

but such as had been general benefactors to those that have come after them, who are the better that they have lived. No such reflections, however, are suggested by the celebrated name with which we are briefly to deal here. Jefferson is one of those lucky heirs of fame who enter into their inheritance while they yet live, and, more fortunate than many others, his has increased and multiplied as years have gone on their course. It was his fortune to put into words the cardinal idea on which the history of the world has turned ever since, and never more rapidly than now. That "all men are created equal; that they are endowed with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," was no invention of Jefferson's. Many great and good minds in all ages had entertained it as a beautiful vision, a dream too blessed to come to pass, like the return of the Golden Age or the discovery of the Islands of the Blest. The freethinkers of the eighteenth century had made it abstractly familiar to the minds of the men of Jefferson's generation. But he was the first to formulate it, so to speak, epigrammatically, so that all men could understand and remember it. And at a most critical moment of the world's history, at the moment of the birth of the latest-born of nations, he breathed it into the infant Republic as the vital principle by which she was to live and move and have her being. He could not foresee whither his idea would lead mankind, but he believed in its divinity, and was willing to trust his country and the world to its guidance. Though the evil passions and imperfect intelligence of men have blackened and impeded its path with many crimes and infinite follies, we may be sure that it will at last vindicate itself, though through much tribulation, as able to lead mankind into rational freedom, general prosperity, and intelligent happiness.

Jefferson's hold upon the memory and gratitude of mankind will finally depend on that immortal sentence, and the influence it has had and will have on the destinies of the race. As his public life and actions are subjected more and more critically to the analyses of history, the less will he be found to deserve the name of a great statesman. He was what Napoleon used to call an idéologue, or what was called in Louis Philippe's time a doctrinaire. Such minds are essentially unstatesmanlike, for they are so possessed of their ideas and theories that they cannot make the allowance for human nature and existing circumstances that is essential for the adaptation of measures to the necessities and the possibilities of human conditions. It is lucky for us, and for his memory, too, that Jefferson was in France at the time of the formation of the Federal Constitution, or it might not have come out of the alembic of the Convention the quintessence of political common-sense that it is, now that it has eliminated the slave-clauses, which were all that ever really endangered its perpetuity. And, dangerous as the element of slavery was, we can now see, looking at the state of affairs at that day from this distance of time, that it could hardly have been better managed than it was. His official action as Secretary of State to Washington, and afterwards as President, has left not a single beneficial trace on the history of his country. The narrow school of plantation politics in which he had grown up, taught him when President to adopt a line of conduct at once fatal to the prosperity and dangerous to the safety of the nation while it was committed to his charge. In obedience to the passions and prejudices of the party that had raised him to power, which he doubtless shared, in favor of the French and against the English in the great conflict for the deliverance of Europe from the ambition of Bonaparte, he pursued a course of policy which naturally tended to provoke the war which broke out after his retirement, while refusing to make any preparation for it. For commerce Jefferson felt the contempt of his class, and early in his career had written that he wished that the United States could be surrounded with a Chinese wall to separate them from the rest of the world, and that all the inhabitants might be husbandmen. So he made the weapons of his warfare with England out of the ruins of trade, by means of non-importation and non-intercourse and embargo acts, while resisting any addition to the navy, which the planting interest regarded as of use only to the seaboard, and notably to New England. The misery he thus occasioned was extreme and widespread, weighing with cruel oppression even upon the Slave States, until his own followers rose in rebellion against him; and the navy was enlarged, and the commercial restrictions abolished, in spite of his resistance, and to his great mortification, just before he gave way to Madison.

The recuperative energies of the North, however, enabled it to rise out of the prostration to which Jefferson's policy had reduced it, to a higher point of prosperity than ever before reached, as soon as it was freed from the legislative shackles which weighed it down. But the lasting and almost fatal injuries which Jefferson inflicted on the country, and under the effects of which it yet suffers, were of a more organic nature. The first of these was the purchase of the foreign province of Louisiana by a mere confirmation of the treaty of acquisition by Congress, though he had beforehand stated his conviction that it could only be lawfully done by an amendment to the Constitution authorizing it. Having sworn to maintain the Constitution, which he admitted gave no power to Congress to acquire territory outside the original limits of the nation, he could write to his constitutional legal adviser, the Attorney-General, "The less that is said about any constitutional difficulty, the better. Congress should do what is necessary in silence. I find but one opinion about the necessity of shutting up the Constitution for some time." And this, not because there was the slightest doubt of the ratification of the proper amendment, for there was no division of opinion as to the necessity of the command of the mouth of the Mississippi. But the slaveholding instinct of Jefferson's advisers, if not his own, discerned the advantage to be gained by the precedent, which would place the indefinite extension of slave territory in the hands of a majority of Congress, in which the united South were always sure of holding the balance of power. The purchase of Florida, the annexation of Texas, the Mexican war, and the enormous addition of territory consequent upon it, were all engineered by means of Congress, and all in the interest of slavery. And hence the pride that went before its fall of the slaveholding heart, and the bloody war that was necessary to put an end to the mischiefs which were the logical and natural sequence of Mr. Jefferson's Louisiana precedent.

* "The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson. Compiled from Family Letters and Reminiscences. By his Great-granddaughter, Sarah N. Randolph." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1871.

"Hac fonte derivata clades
In patriam populumque fluxit."

The other enduring mischief which Jefferson bequeathed to us, and which if not abolished is almost as ominous of national dishonor and ruin as negro slavery itself, was making the national offices the price of political services. It is true that he did not carry out the principle to its logical results as thoroughly as Jackson did thirty years afterward, at the beginning of his disgraceful administration. But the principle was established by Jefferson which Marcy afterwards reduced to the infamous formula that "to the victors belong the spoils," and which has made the paid service of the nation for the last forty years a corruption fund from which to bribe the people with their own money to do the dirty work of politicians by profession. These two fatal precedents were all Jefferson left for the guidance of those that were to come after him. They are the only lasting impressions his hand made upon the history of his country during the eight years of his administration.

We have consumed so much of the modest space allotted us in considering the use which Mr. Jefferson made of his power when he had reached it, that we have none left to speak of his methods of approaching and attaining it. His way of managing the purchase of Louisiana was characteristic of his underhand and tortuous political course from his return from France forward. But we must pass by his intrigues against his colleagues in Washington's first cabinet, of which he was the head, and his secret encouragement of a malignant opposition press; his imputations of traitorous designs to such men as Adams, Hamilton and Jay, and his endeavors to blacken their characters and destroy their influence; the duplicity of his conduct towards Washington, who refused to believe what was told him of it until the letter to Mazzei, ricocheting back across the Atlantic, brought proofs which even his generous and unsuspicious nature could not reject. It is pleasanter to turn to the side of his character presented to us in the work which has suggested what we have said. Every one who reads it, however rooted may be his disapprobation of Mr. Jefferson's public career, must allow that, in his private life, he was entirely amiable and charming. It introduces us into the bosom of his family, and conducts us through his long life in the society of his children and friends from his boyhood to his death. We have no room even to indicate the course of his career, which led him from the obscurity of a remote plantation and the practice of a country lawyer to Independence Hall and his immortal part therein performed, thence to the Court of France in the last days of the ancien régime, and so back to the Cabinet of Washington, the Vice-Presidency, and the Presidency. This brilliant picture, of course, is not without its necessary shadows. Bereavement and sorrow chastened alike the tranquil happiness of his private life and the triumphant successes of his public life; and these successive domestic calamities he encountered with a manly fortitude and resignation truly admirable. No one can read without emotion the account of the death of his beautiful and beloved daughter Maria, at the triumphant moment of his second election, for whom one cannot help feeling a personal affection after reading his letters concerning and to her in her childhood. His letters to his daughters are simply charming, and place him in a most amiable and admirable light. He had a genuine love of a country life, though we think that his devoted great-granddaughter will hardly persuade her readers that he would really have preferred ruling over a plantation of a hundred and fifty slaves to being the head of a nation, or that he could have enjoyed the monotonous retirement of a plantation more than the varieties of society which the capital afforded him. His manners were polished and engaging, and his conversation full of variety and entertainment. His general information and knowledge of literature were extensive, though it must necessarily have been largely superficial. His amiable descendant is, perhaps, hardly aware of how great is her demand on the faith of her readers when she asks them to believe that her ancestor issued from William and Mary College at twenty "a fine mathematician, a finished Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Italian scholar!" Of course it was impossible that a fourth-rate little provincial college could have supplied the means, could Jefferson have found the time, for acquisitions which have rarely been reached in a long life spent in the midst of every facility and advantage for knowledge. As to Latin, if the touching epitaph he wrote for his sister was meant for verse, as the arrangement of the lines would seem to indicate, we think it would be hard to reduce them to any form of poetry known to Latin prosody. As to French, he himself admits, in a letter from France, p. 106, that he was not a master of it. Speaking of the progress of his daughter Martha in the language, he says: "She speaks French as easily as English; while Humphreys, Short, and myself are scarcely better at it than when we landed." Still, we have no doubt that he had acquired a passable reading knowledge of those tongues, which, though creditable to his industry and love of literature, is very far from a mastery of them. It is painful to read how the latter days of Jefferson were clouded over by narrowing means. Embarrassed in his circumstances, run down by merciless hordes of visitors, and oppressed by the exactions of insatiate correspondents, his closing life might well have been a burden to him before he laid it down had it not been for the natural cheerfulness and elasticity of his temperament. Of the particulars of his life after his retirement from public affairs, Miss Randolph gives a clear and agreeable narrative. Her book is one of singular interest, which has extorted from us the unusual compliment of a second reading. She has done her work well, leaving her famous ancestor to describe himself as far as possible, and filling up the interstices with skill and grace. He will be better known and more mildly judged because of her pious tribute to his memory.

SIBERIAN ADVENTURE.*

No expedition can be called a failure which has given to the world four such narratives as those of Messrs. Whymper, Dall, Kennan, and Bush, by which our knowledge of both shores of the Pacific, from the mouth of the Amoor River to Sitka, has been immensely increased. All of these works, except the last, have been reviewed in these columns, and Mr. Bush's experience has been to a great extent anticipated by his fellow-explorer, Mr. Kennan—not, be it understood, in respect of incidents, for they were not companions, but of a common field, viz., from Ghizhiga northward to and along the Myan and Anadyr Rivers. But considerably more than half of the book is occupied with an account of Mr. Bush's adventures in reaching Ghizhiga by skirting the difficult coast of the Okhotsk Sea. This part of his journey he performed truly in the character of a pioneer, and on taking leave of Mr. Kennan at Petropavlosk he entered upon much the longest, most tedious and disagreeable, if not the most dangerous, route to their rendezvous. In fact, it would be difficult to imagine much more disgusting travelling than that which the author and his party endured among the marshes, lakes, rivers, and mountainous divides which lay in their course from Nikolayefsk to Oudskoi Bay. In the plains the weather was as sloppy as the footing; in the gorges, the deep new-fallen snow made progress an equally hard matter for the reindeer and their riders; on the rivers, the smooth ice, or, where the tide could act, rough hummocks, interposed delays; and, great as were the hardships of the mountain trail from thence to Okhotsk, they are far less depressing to read about, and were probably less so in reality.

It was on this dismal trip that Mr. Bush first made the acquaintance of the reindeer, and it proved to be as little the reindeer of his imagination as Kamtchatka the desolate and inhospitable region he had pictured it:

"About half a mile distant, picking their way along the rocky beach, approached a long train of awkward, clumsy-looking animals, most of them white, which one would readily have mistaken for cows at a distance. In the first place, such a thing as a white deer had never occurred to me, at least. As they drew nearer, we distinguished their large antlers, but the troop was a regular Falstaff's brigade, as far as uniformity was concerned. Most of them were white, the remainder having brown backs and light-colored bellies. Two or three of the band had fine, large, complete antlers; but of the remainder some had the right horn missing, and others were minus the left; a few had both horns chopped off about six inches from the skull, leaving a savage-looking, fan-like prong projecting over the forehead, shaped something like a person's hand. These last were all bucks, and were trained for riding, their horns having been cut off for fear of injury to the rider. There were still others that had no antlers at all, having lost them fighting each other, or broken them off in the woods."

These deer followed one after the other, tied together with halters of sealthong, and the leaders being ridden by men whose fur clothing made them seem quite disproportionate burdens, and whose bodies "swayed from side to side with each step of the deer." This motion resulted from the looseness of the skin on the deer's shoulders, and made riding an accomplishment which Mr. Bush was slow to acquire. He thought himself to be congratulated when his falls did not average more than one in every half-mile or so, though one of them, he admits, occasioned him some mortification. "The deer was standing perfectly still at the time, which put me off my guard, and, by simply turning its head to one side, I lost my equilibrium, and the saddle turned." For many weary miles behind this slow creature, whose gait, in spite of the rider's unceasing exertions with hand and foot and throat, was seldom faster than a walk, our author pursued his cheerless and frozen way; and it was with a great sense of relief that he exchanged this mode of travelling for dog-teams, which accomplished the latter half of the journey to Ghizhiga in nineteen days instead of four and a half months, the distance in each case being twelve hundred miles.

* "Reindeer, Dogs, and Snow-Shoes: A Journal of Siberian Travel and Explorations made in the Years 1865, 1866, and 1867. By Richard J. Bush, late of the Russo-American Telegraph Expedition." With illustrations. New York: Harper & Bros. 1871. Pp. 529.

Mr. Bush was favorably impressed by the Russian character at the various settlements which he visited, and with good reason, for they not only contributed everything in their power to promote his success, but refreshed him with the sight of a civilization scarcely different from that of the mother country, and a hospitality which knew no bounds. The priesthood of these remote colonies were likewise true to their prototypes west of the Caspian—lazy, dissolute, and addicted to gambling. The Cossacks proved admirable servants, and of them Mr. Bush tells some stories which nobody will charge him with inventing nor yet believe until confirmed by seeing:

"This day," he says, "we had an opportunity of witnessing one of those marvellous feats of strength of which people frequently hear, but few are permitted to see. In fact, we were somewhat dubious ourselves as to the correctness of our eyesight, nor did we believe until there was no other alternative. The hero of the occasion was Yakov, our Cossack, himself a small man in stature; but, as the feat was accomplished with his teeth and jaws this, perhaps, is not to be considered. It happened in this wise: While discharging our cargo from the Gonets, one of the leather-covered panniers was badly broken. This had to be repaired before it could be used in packing, and we were at a loss to know where to procure nails for the purpose. At length, among our articles, part of a box was found in which several nails were tightly driven; but then the difficulty of extracting these without breaking them off presented itself. Our hatchet was tried, and so was every other means at hand, but without success. Finally, the Cossack deliberately kneeled, placing his knees upon the fragment so as to hold it perfectly steady, and with his teeth extracted the only two remaining unbroken. Upon our expressing astonishment at this, Swartz informed us that most of these people have powerful jaws and teeth. Always, in purchasing an axe, they test its quality by trying to bite the edge off. This test is so effective that they are rarely imposed upon."

This obliging fellow, not long after, when the feet of the party were swollen and boots shrunken to such an extent that they despaired of getting them off at all, "came to the rescue, and by the application of his teeth to the toe of each boot (which were fortunately long), aided by his hands at the heels, effected his purpose with surprising ease."

The native tribes form an interesting feature in this narrative, but not much that is new is told about them, and they have most of the characteristic failings of savages. Their improvidence especially, of which their almost incredible gluttony in times of plenty is the complement, is here fearfully illustrated in more than one instance of winter famine. Life is then sustained by such last expedients as boiling the seal-thongs of their sledges, while their poor dogs perish unless they furnish food for each other. A particularly harrowing case at Markova, on the Anadyr, is thus related:

"A few hours afterwards another man came, and wanted my advice on a matter that he said had been troubling him for several days, and which he was unable to decide upon for himself.

"'You know, barin (sir),' he said, 'the winter has hardly commenced. I have a wife and seven children, and seven dogs to support, and not a pound of meat or fish to give them. But I have some deerskins and eight fathoms of seal-thong which I can boil up. These are not enough to sustain the family and the dogs too until the Tchuctchus come to trade, and I don't know where to get any more, as my neighbors are all starving too.'

"Here he hesitated a moment, and, with a faltering voice, said:

"'If my children perish, I shall have my dogs left; but if my dogs perish, how can I go to the Tchuctchus to get deer? Then my family will starve, and I shall have neither family nor dogs.'

"What he wanted me to decide was whether he should let his family or his dogs starve. This only serves to show the desperate straits to which some of them were reduced."

We must close our quotations from this instructive book with a passage relating to the perpetual daylight in midsummer on the Anadyr:

"What struck me as being most singular was the regularity with which birds and animals observed the hours of rest and activity. Upon emerging from our quarters, at one time, all would be full of life and activity; wreaths of smoke curling from the mud chimneys of the different habitations, and the natives constantly passing back and forth with sled-loads of dry sticks for fuel, drawn by teams of wide-awake dogs. Strings of women would be wending their way to the water-holes, and returning with their tubs full to the brim, and suspended to poles carried across their shoulders; while loose dogs could be seen prowling about the village, catching field-mice, or contesting with the magpies for the possession of some stray morsel of food. In the neighboring trees grouse and numerous other birds fluttered about from limb to limb, plucking fresh buds from the twigs, and filling the air with their notes. Intermingled with these could be heard the sound of the axe, the shouts of the dog-drivers, and the laughs and songs of the girls going to the well. Everything and everybody was alive and awake.

"A few hours afterward, I again step from my quarters, and, though the sun is shining as brightly as before, all is hushed, and a death-like silence prevails. No smoke, no people, are to be seen. Here and there, coiled up in the snow, with their bushy tails covering their faces, lie the village dogs wrapped in oblivion; and the magpies, with drooping tails and closed eyes, sit nodding on the sled-bows and rough projections of the houses. Not a movement is visible among the bare limbs of the neighboring forest, but here and there, on all sides, the white grouse may be seen with their heads nestled under their wings, and their snowy feathers hugged closely to their sides for warmth. With the regularity of a clock, at just such times, all nature retires to rest, and, with equal precision, each morning she arouses herself."

The above is a favorable specimen of our author's descriptive powers. Of his journal as a whole, we may say that it is too nearly a journal, or diary, to possess all the interest that a briefer story would have had; but nevertheless a more skilful writer might have failed to impart so clear an idea of the country traversed, the obstacles overcome, the people encountered, and the feats accomplished, as Mr. Bush's readers who will be patient enough will certainly have. Add to this a style perfectly modest and without affectation, and there is little for which we cannot praise the author and his book.

A History of England: Political, Military, and Social; from the Earliest Times to the Present. By Benson J. Lossing, author of "Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution and War of 1812," etc. (New York: G. P. Putnam & Sons, Association Building. 1871. 12mo, pp. 647.)—Mr. Lossing has done good service in American history, and is an authority in his own department of it. His defect as a writer arises from the extent and minuteness of his information, joined with a lack of what we may call the power of perspective. He does not give too much incident, but too many incidents; so that the general impression is crowded and indistinct. When he sets out to tell a story, he tells it with animation and clearness; but, in general, he has so many things to relate that he fails to tell any one of them in his best manner; so that he neither interests nor instructs the reader as much as he might. He is destitute of that most important gift, knowing what to omit. The "History of England" before us exemplifies all these characteristics. In many parts it is excellently told. We will instance, as particularly good, the account of the reign of Henry VIII., and the descriptions of the character of many of the kings; for instance, of Stephen and of Richard II. But, as a whole, the book is deficient in point and emphasis. We have not a very high regard for chapters upon manners and customs, of which Mr. Lossing makes quite a specialty. Manners and customs have no vitality apart from the men and women who practise them; and such chapters are generally nothing but the dry bones of daily life. A good historical novel, or a graphic story from history (like those of Miss Yonge), and a few genuine illustrations (like those in the "Pictorial History of England") or anecdotes, such as Mr. Lossing occasionally introduces, are worth far more than pages of description. On the other hand, he somewhat neglects a branch which would be of real service—the history of government and of constitutional usages; much of which would be appropriate even in a school history, which this is designed to be. For instance, no intimation is given that Henry I., Stephen, and John were formally elected as kings. Again, in matters which would seem to come exactly in his way, he has omitted points of the first importance; as, of the effects of the "Black Death" upon the price of labor, and of the act in Queen Elizabeth's reign upon which all pauper legislation, down to the present century, has been based.

In a book which covers nearly two thousand years of time, it is not to be expected that all periods will be treated with the same ease and success; and we find that Mr. Lossing is relatively fuller and better in the middle period than in either the earliest or the latest; and, again, that he is less accurate the further he is removed from his own times. There are two or three unaccountable errors. On page 45, Judith, the widow of Ethelwolf, is said to have been the mother of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror, who lived two centuries later. On page 76, we have the death of Earl Godwin; but on page 78 he is represented, thirteen years later, as procuring the coronation of his son Harold, with the statement, which is not a correct one, that this was done "without waiting for the consent of the great council of wise men," which, as it happened, was in session at the time. We object, also, to a very sweeping style of assertion which is occasionally employed in cases where it is not by any means justified. For instance, Mr. Lossing inclines to favor Richard III., as he has a perfect right to do if he sees reason; but it is surely not true of his crimes that "probably not one would have been heard of had he, instead of Richmond, been the victor at Bosworth." If he reigned well, as he certainly appears in some measure to have done, it is no more than many a bloody and unscrupulous usurper before him has done when once the throne was gained. Again, it is rather strong to say of Henry VII. that he "had really not a shadow of right to the crown." Nor do we see with what right Raleigh is called a "bad man"—an epithet which should be reserved for such men as Strafford, Lauderdale, and Sunderland. Mr. Lossing, like some other writers, speaks of the Angevin line of kings, which came in with Henry II., as the "Saxon line restored," on the ground that Henry's grandmother, Matilda of Scotland, was descended from the Saxon kings. He might almost as well give this name to William II., for he, too, was descended from Alfred, on his mother's side. To be sure, Matilda was the legitimate heir of Edmund Ironsides, the last of her line; so that Henry united whatever hereditary claims she had upon the throne; but these were practically none at all, for it was not as an Englishman, but, primarily, as a descendant of William the Conqueror, that he succeeded. A few slight errors may be noticed. We find more than once Sir Edmund Berry (for Edmundbury) Godfrey. The Emperor Henry III. (the Black) is called (page 70) Henry the Pious, a title that belongs to Henry II. The Emperor of Austria is spoken of in 1791 (p. 547), thirteen years before there was any such potentate. Wolsey's "Ego et Rex meus" (p. 313) was not "absurd arrogance," but good Latin. Clement the Eighth (p. 315) should be "the Seventh." The historical maps (three in number) are pretty good, but not at all what we have a right to expect after the example set by Mr. Freeman's "Old English History for Children"; and, of all writers, we should have supposed that Mr. Lossing would take pains to have illustrative pictures, which, in a book like this, would be very serviceable.

The Conservative Reformation and its Theology. By Chas. P. Krauth, D.D. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.)—In a ponderous octavo of 840 pages, Dr. Krauth vindicates the spirit, the aims, and the theology of Luther's Reformation, as distinguished from the positions of Calvin, Zwingli, and other reformers, and contrasted with the progressive spirit of later church movements. He regards the conservative features of Luther's doctrine—as, for instance, touching the sacrament of the Supper—as providing the true nucleus for the union of the scattered elements of Protestantism against Popery. How little the spirit of his own book is likely to foster such a union may be inferred from his manner of speaking of theological opponents. "The insect-minded sectarian allows the Reformation very little merit except as it prepared the way for the putting forth in due time of the particular twig of Protestantism on which he crawls, and which he imagines bears all the fruit, and gives all the value to the tree. As the little green tenants of the rose-bush might be supposed to argue that the rose was made for the purpose of furnishing them a home and food, so these small speculators find the root of the Reformation in the particular part of Providence which they consent to adopt and patronize. The Reformation, as they take it, originated in the divine plan for furnishing a nursery for sectarian Aphides." Whereas, according to Dr. Krauth, the Reformation had two great fruits—the Lutheran Church and the Augsburg Confession! The properties of these "Aphides," however, he develops with much learning and ability.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Atwood (D. T.), Country and Suburban Houses.....(Orange Judd & Co.) $1 50
Augustine (St.), Works: The City of God, 2 vols.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 6 00
Beekman (J. W.), Centenary Address, N. Y. Hospital, swd.....(New York)
Carlyle (T.), Life of John Sterling.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 90
Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches.... " " 90
Curtis (G. T.), The American Conveyancer, 2d ed.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Lord (J.), Prophetic Imperialism.....(Hurd & Houghton)

HURD & HOUGHTON,

13 ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK.

THE RIVERSIDE PRESS, CAMBRIDGE,

HAVE JUST READY:

I.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS,

And her Latest English Historian. A narrative of the principal events in the life of Mary Stuart. With some remarks on Mr. Froude's History of England.

BY JAMES F. MELINE.

In 1 vol. crown 8vo, price $1 75.

II.

POEMS BY WILLIAM H. BURLEIGH.

With a Sketch of his life by Celia Burleigh, and a Portrait.

In 1 vol. crown 8vo, price $2 25.

Mr. Burleigh had a wide circle of friends strongly attached to him, and appreciative of the fine qualities of his mind and character. The volume will be a fitting memorial in honor of a gifted man.

III.

THE CHARACTER OF CHRIST:

Does it Supply an Adequate Basis for Religion?

BY T. W. FOWLE.

Reprinted from the Contemporary Review, London.

Paper, price 15 cents.

The writer argues that the character of Christ is wholly incomprehensible, except on the assumption of its divinity. The Christian Union calls this essay "striking," "masterly," "noble," and urges it upon the notice of the public.

[FOR THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.]

IV.

THE NEW YEAR:

A National Family Almanac, 1872. 32 pp. 4to, price 20 cents.

This Almanac, profusely illustrated, will contain besides its calendar pages a great variety of valuable information and suggestions for the household. It is intended to give it a national character and a national reputation.

Any of the above sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of prices annexed.

LADIES DESIROUS OF LEARNING TO sing in the pure Italian School, will address SIGNOR GIANNETTI, care of Wm. Hall & Son, 751 Broadway.

No. 34, NOVEMBER, 1871.

THE AMERICAN BIBLIOPOLIST.

A LITERARY REGISTER

AND

MONTHLY CATALOGUE

OF

OLD AND NEW BOOKS,

AND

REPOSITORY OF NOTES AND QUERIES.

Among other articles the new Number contains the following: Petrarch's Library. Charles Dickens Not a Christian! George Ticknor's Spanish Collection. Bismarck's Library. Literary Gossip. Whim Whams by Four of Us. Sir Walter Scott and Sir Walter Raleigh. A Dublin Tradition. Hymns, Ancient and Modern. Was Dr. Johnson a Snuff-Taker? Thomson's Poems. Coleridge as a Soldier. Prayer of an Irish Emigrant. Self Importance. Noble Calculation on the Value of Art. Lord Brougham and Queen Caroline's Funeral. State Nicknames. The Heirs of Sir Francis Drake. The Penny Cyclopædia. The English National Portrait Gallery. Book Notices. Mr. James Duffy's Literary Larceny. Evenings at Home. Chicago. Did Shakespeare Ever Read Don Quixote? Singular Hieroglyphic Correspondence. Anecdotes of Jerome Bonaparte. Etc., etc.

Subscription $1 per year.

☞ Send stamp for Specimen Number. ☜

J. SABIN & SONS,

84 Nassau Street, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED.

OUR COUNTRY HOME:

A STORY FOR THE YOUNG.

By the author of "Harry Lawton's Adventures," "What Makes Me Grow," etc. With Twelve Etchings

BY RUDOLF GEISSLER.

4to, cloth extra, $2.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.,

Cooper Union, New York.

THE CHICAGO FIRE

DESTROYED

THE LITTLE CORPORAL

Publishing House with all its contents, including the November Number, which was ready for the press, and partly printed. I am happy to announce, however, that the LITTLE CORPORAL and the December Number will appear early in November, brighter and more charming than ever.

STILL LIVES,

SUBSCRIBE NOW

before you forget it, and secure for your children the best and cheapest Juvenile published.

TERMS $1 50 A YEAR.

Send for Premium List and raise a club.

Address

JOHN E. MILLER, Publisher,

CHICAGO, ILL.

TAINE'S ART IN GREECE.

16mo, Cloth (uniform with "Taine's Art in the Netherlands," "Ideal in Art," etc.), $1 25.

"One feels at moments as if, before this writer, there had been no critics, no travellers, observers, or æsthetic inquisitors."—Nation.

GOETHE'S POEMS AND BALLADS.

16mo, cloth (uniform with "King Rene's Daughter," "Nathan the Wise," "Frithiofs Saga," etc., and making No. VII. of the series), $1 50.

AROUND A SPRING. By Gustave Droz. Translated by M. S. 8vo, paper, cloth-lined, 75 cents.

"A masterpiece of fiction."—Nation.

KEY TO THE PENTATEUCH.

Part I.—GENESIS. By Dr. Solomon Deutsch. 12mo, cloth, $1 50. Parts II. and III., completing the work, will soon be issued.

"This work is very elaborate and very carefully done, and its Hebrew portions are remarkable for distinctness and correctness."—Nation.

NEARLY READY.

TAINE'S ENGLISH LITERATURE. 2 vols. royal 8vo.
TAINE ON INTELLIGENCE. Royal 8vo.

HOLT & WILLIAMS, Publishers,

25 Bond Street, New York.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL.

The difference in cost to an ordinary family between a cheap and dangerous burning fluid and Pratt's Astral Oil will not exceed one cent per day. None should hesitate on account of such sligh expense in using the latter, while th difference in safety and burning quali ties is not to be compared.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1871.

The Week.

In one respect only has the result of the late election been disappointing. A belief had gained ground very generally that the defeat of the Ring would cause a revival of business. But the Chicago disaster, with its insidious influences, is too recent to permit of any great amount of healthy animation, and all that the elections could accomplish was to render apparently permanent the reaction from the first extreme depression. Strange as it may seem, the great fire is now recognized as beneficial in many of its influences, notably in its check upon the reckless career of inflation which the banks were running. The great calamity permitted and justified a degree of caution and contraction among financial institutions which, under ordinary circumstances, would have created a panic, but which, in the prevailing spirit of mutual consideration and leniency on the part of creditors, has been borne without complaint. The unexpectedly favorable result of a large portion of the mercantile settlements from the unfortunate city has contributed greatly to render this result possible, while the marvellous and inadequately recognized spirit and organizing genius of the various relief committees on the spot, and of the people at large, promise a revival of Chicago almost as startling as its original growth. One remarkable fact has been developed by the fire, tending to show how utterly all preconceived opinions of prudence and policy fail in the presence of great disasters: those firms who had all their capital in their business, and sold only for cash, are the heaviest and most hopeless losers, while those who had outside investments, and sold largely on credit, are quietly collecting their debts, and realizing their assets elsewhere.

There have been enormous election frauds in Brooklyn in the nature of repeating and stuffing the ballot-boxes, the "Ring" of that city being very audacious. To meet this state of things, a Citizens' Reform Association has been formed, with a Committee of Seventy-five; and, as proofs seem plenty enough, we shall doubtless have the election contested, and an attempt made not only to punish the authors of the frauds, but to free the government of the city from the Ring, whose existence can be no longer doubted. Meantime, other great cities in other States are engaged in the same warfare against thieves. In Philadelphia, they have a defaulting city treasurer, $478,048 out of pocket, due to his having loaned the city and State funds in his keeping to private parties, thus postponing public claims, depreciating them, and enabling his confederates to buy them up at a discount and cash them at par—a speculation which raised the emoluments of his office from $2,500 to $20,000 a year. This appears to have been the custom of his predecessors also, and each retiring treasurer became a member of the Ring, which went surety for the new incumbent in return for a share in these transactions. Speculations in "Reading," and the Chicago fire brought on the crash, which has cost the city its half-million. The City Council, in a feeble way, and the already existing Citizens' Reform Association, have taken the matter up, and it is before the courts, though the treasurer's resignation has not yet been accepted. In Cincinnati, a probate judge, elected on a reform ticket, has been charged with conspiring with the Law Librarian to swindle the county, the latter, according to the Commercial, alleging and having exercised his "right, whenever a lunatic is sent to the Longview Asylum, to draw the value of two suits of clothes, whether he furnishes a rag or not, and to make up vouchers, using R. T. Thorburn's name as steward, three months after Thorburn was discharged." In Chicago, as is well known, the fire burnt up a promising Ring, one member of which, the late opposition candidate for mayor, is accused of retaining $15,000 from the Charity Fund. And, to complete this dismal survey of municipal rottenness, we may point, as we have done once before, to the New Haven lobbying on the Connecticut capital question, one item of which Dr. Bacon has so forcibly exposed in the last New-Englander.

The Woman's Suffrage Convention which sat recently at Xenia, Ohio, passed a series of resolutions of which the first declares that women have a legal right to vote under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments; the second asks Congress to propose a sixteenth amendment, giving women the same right to vote; and the third demands the right aforesaid of men. It is nearly as difficult to make out from all this where women's right to vote really is, who has got it, or is keeping them out of it, as under what thimble "the little joker" is to be found at the fair. The Cincinnati Commercial sets down the number of women in Ohio who greatly want to vote as one dozen, or thereabouts; but this must be inaccurate. The question whether the Fourteenth Amendment gives women the right to vote in the District of Columbia has been argued and decided within the last week by the Supreme Court of the District (not of the United States) in the negative. The plaintiffs were two women who sued the Board of Registration and the Superintendents of Election at Washington for refusing to allow them to register or vote. The Act of February 21, 1871, organizing the government of the District, restricts the suffrage to male citizens; the plaintiffs asked the Court to set aside the restriction, partly under the Fourteenth Amendment and partly under the Law of Nature, which, they said, gives them an "inherent and inalienable" right to vote—we presume everywhere, and at all times that they happen to come across a polling-place, for Nature knows nothing of electoral districts, or counties, or towns, or other arbitrary divisions or qualifications. The Court decided that it was incompetent to administer the law of nature, being itself an artificial contrivance, and hinted that the natural right to vote, being, of course, the natural right to govern, was in reality identical with the Divine Right of kings and queens, and, therefore, hardly sustainable in American tribunals. It also remarked, obiter, that, in its opinion, any attempt to act on the doctrine that such a right existed would prove "destructive of civilization." As to women's right to vote under the Fourteenth Amendment, it decided simply that it did not exist. The Fourteenth Amendment, it is true, recognizes the citizenship of women, which it could hardly avoid doing, seeing that their citizenship has always been recognized; but citizenship does not necessarily carry with it the suffrage, as we see in the case of minors, and even babies, who are also citizens. Of course Congress can, in the District of Columbia, give the suffrage to any class of citizens it pleases; when it does so, the courts will be happy to carry its will into effect. As it has not, as yet, given it to women, the Court sustained the demurrer, and sent the women away sorrowful. So this little trick has failed, as it deserved.

The excitement about the South Carolina bonds continues, having, as we expected, been increased rather than diminished by the statement to which we referred last week, put forth by the Governor and Treasurer and Chairman of the Committee on Accounts. The main facts of the case against these officers, which is too voluminous to be completely summed up in a paragraph, are, that the total debt of the State, as far as can be made out from accounts accessible to the public, is $12,000,000, or thereabouts. Last September, however, Governor Scott publicly stated that it was only $9,500,000. It now appears, however, from the vague official confession, that at least $20,400,000 printed bonds are in the hands of the authorities—or, as their enemies call them, "the Ring"—awaiting issue at their discretion. It is permissible to infer, from their statement, that, besides this, they hold $8,000,000 sterling bonds and registered stock, also awaiting issue. The public now asks, For what purpose have these securities been printed? The answer is: "To pay the indebtedness of the State, and convert its securities." But this is met by the obvious rejoinder: "You cannot want $28,000,000 in securities to pay or convert a debt which, according to your own account, was only $9,500,000 in September last, and, according to all accessible data, is only $12,000,000." So there is a loud demand for further explanation, which had better be forthcoming speedily; but it is not unfair to infer, from the lame attempt of last week, that it will not be satisfactory.

The truth is, that the management of the finances has, for some time back, been at least bad on its surface. The most intelligent citizens of South Carolina believe it has been fraudulent, and this belief is supported, in view of the enormous "Ring" frauds which are being revealed all over the country, by the history of the State officers. The State Treasurer, for instance, Mr. Niles G. Parker, kept a bar in Haverhill, Mass., before the war. He entered the army; served, as worse men did, with credit; then settled as a carpet-bagger in Charleston; opened another grocery; "went into politics"; was made an alderman; cultivated the negro vote; failed in business, and paid thirty cents on the dollar; rose rapidly in politics, became State Treasurer, and is now reputed to be worth a million, and has plenty of diamonds. Put behind such men the most corrupt and ignorant legislature that perhaps ever caricatured free government in a civilized State, and we see why the financial condition of the State is suspected. New York is certainly the last place for such a "Treasurer" to come to just at this moment asking credit. We are too familiar with this kind of financier.

The Civil Service Commission is said to have succeeded in draughting a system of rules and regulations which will probably be carried into effect, and the Washington correspondents report that the subject underwent a long discussion at a Cabinet meeting last week, when Mr. G. W. Curtis spoke on it at some length in behalf of the Commission. We ought to mention that the cause of Civil Service Reform has received in this city, and, of all places in the world, in the City Hall, and from the hands of Mr. Andrew H. Green, the Deputy Comptroller, the most valuable piece of assistance it has yet got from any official quarter. Mr. Green, on taking office, issued an order warning the clerks that their sole duty was office duty; that they were not to concern themselves, as officers, about politics; that their salaries were not to be assessed or levied upon in any manner for any purpose; and that neglect or incompetency would be the only cause of removal. Considering that Tom Murphy, the Collector of this port, selected by the President, and removable by him, has fifteen hundred employees under his orders, whom he appoints and dismisses on precisely the same principle, and for the same reason, as Connolly did the clerks in the City Hall, and that all the time that this Commission has been sitting at Washington—and more particularly while Mr. Curtis was addressing the Cabinet, and while Mr. Green was introducing Civil Service Reform into the City Hall—Tom was actually violating all the rules and regulations which it is fair to presume Mr. Curtis and his colleagues have embodied in their new scheme, and more particularly that rule and regulation which, it is to be hoped, forbids the docking of clerks' salaries for electioneering purposes—it is not unfair to say that Tom's continued presence in the Custom-house, and his continued activity in the work of corrupting and debauching the public service, are a great scandal. The New York Tribune recently asked whether, the question being put to the people of the city, Who was the man among its inhabitants who would, if put in charge of the Custom-house, collect the largest amount of revenue at least cost to the Government and least annoyance to the merchants? anybody would ever have thought of answering, Tom Murphy. Of course not. Murphy's appointment was simply unaccountable on any creditable theory of the principles on which the President administers the government.

In Wall Street everything remains dull and stationary, but prices are well maintained at or near the highest level reached since the panic week. The banks have materially strengthened their position, and, in the absence of great business activity everywhere, money is cheap and easily obtainable on good security. Merchant paper, which, for a time, was almost unsalable, again passes current, though the rates continue high. There is a sense of insecurity lurking around Wall Street, which prevents even the most sanguine speculators from entering into new engagements. The condition of the Southern State debts, which are tainted with frauds almost exceeding those of Tammany, the uncertainty concerning the influence of the Government funding operations, now approaching maturity, combine with the mercantile and insurance losses to maintain a healthy caution. Gold has declined about one per cent. during the week, without any very well-defined cause. Government bonds, under the influence of a steady debt reduction, and a growing preference among investors, remain firm. Bonds of new or future railroads find but little sale.

Cotton comes forward better than was anticipated. The receipts early in the fall are not always trustworthy indications of the probable magnitude of the crop, but the fine weather at the South promises to compensate materially for the limited acreage planted and the drawbacks earlier in the season. Crop estimates are beginning to be enlarged, and the extreme views of speculators who calculated on less than three millions of bales are already disproved. The India crop is very large, and the manufacturing trade dull. Hence the stocks of raw cotton are accumulating both here and in Europe. But the price, nevertheless, remains firm, and is higher here than in Liverpool, mainly owing to the pernicious system introduced in recent years of cotton-planters becoming heavy speculators in their own products. Reckless greed and reckless bank-management are developing, at the South, a spirit such as has prevailed among our Western farmers for several years past, and has covered a large portion of our best agricultural lands with mortgages to pay for losses in speculation. The planters are holding back their cotton in expectation of higher prices. Grains are firm, owing to the heavy export; meats dull, and fluctuating at low prices. Almost every article of food, with the exception of bread, is cheaper now than it has been for many years, and those who are fully employed are better off; but there is great complaint of want of work, especially among the classes directly depending upon trade, such as clerks, porters, book-keepers, and the like. Real estate is very dull, and with marked downward tendency. Coal is cheaper, but groceries, especially coffee and tea, are high and firm.

The German official paper, the Reichsanzeiger, has published a crushing reply to M. Benedetti's book, leaving that gentleman in a very embarrassing position. It may be remembered that M. Benedetti stoutly maintained, at the outbreak of the late war, that Bismarck tried to tempt the French Emperor into an alliance, offensive and defensive, under which France was to have Belgium, Prussia was to be allowed to work her will with Austria, and England and all other objectors were to be set at defiance. Bismarck then published the draught of a "secret treaty," which, he said, the French Minister had proposed to him in his own handwriting, but which he (Bismarck) had cautiously kept clear of. To this Benedetti replied that the draught was really written by him under Bismarck's dictation, and that the project to which it related was entirely of Bismarck's devising. The question being thus reduced to a conflict of veracity, we believe the French sympathizers everywhere concluded that Bismarck had been "fibbing." The matter would probably have been allowed to rest here if M. Benedetti had not returned to it in his book, which he did, in ignorance of the fact that a considerable quantity of papers of the French Foreign Office had fallen into German hands during the war, on the capture of M. Rouher's country-house at Cercay, near Paris.

These the Prussian Chancellor now uses against the French negotiator with remorseless cruelty. He shows that after the demand for Mayence, and a certain portion of German territory on the left bank of the Rhine, after the battle of Sadowa, of which everybody heard at the time, had been made by the French and refused by the Prussians, M. Benedetti proposed the secret treaty with regard to Belgium under direct instructions from Paris. The Mayence proposal was dropped on the 13th of August. On the 16th he took up the Belgium project, under instructions from Paris, which Bismarck publishes in full, directing him to press for a "secret convention" annexing Belgium to France, and forming an alliance, offensive and defensive, with Prussia, permitting France to make the annexation when she pleased, with armed support from Prussia; and if Bismarck asked what he was to gain by it, he was to be told, "A powerful ally and security in the acquisitions he had already made, without other sacrifice than letting France take what did not belong to him." He also publishes Benedetti's reply to these instructions, enclosing a draught of the proposed treaty, made by Benedetti in his own handwriting, with the marginal emendations made afterwards in Paris, and which were incorporated in the copy which he subsequently gave Bismarck, and which Bismarck published last year. Nothing can be more conclusive or more damaging; and it is difficult to say whether it leaves Benedetti, or the old adventurer whom he served, in the worse position. The Reichsanzeiger announces that it has more of the same in reserve, if more is called for, which it is not at all likely to be. Benedetti is said to be furious with Rouher for not warning him in time, but consoles himself with the reflection that the exposure will damage the Emperor more than it will him. But think of the "morals" of the whole party!

The accounts of the famine in Persia, which continue to arrive in greater detail, bid fair to treat the world to the spectacle of a calamity the like of which has not been witnessed in historic times at least—the sudden extinction of a nation by want of food. This has really been the fate of the great states which once filled the valley of the Euphrates, and it is a fate which has for centuries been threatening some modern states—Spain, for instance. Man has stripped the soil of trees; the absence of trees has brought droughts; droughts have slowly diminished the productive powers of the ground, and finally destroyed them, the population, in the meantime, dwindling in numbers and vitality. Spain had forty millions of people in the time of the Romans, and flowed with milk and honey; it is now an arid region, only half of it under cultivation, with only sixteen millions of inhabitants, and, if modern science had not come to its aid, would probably go the way of Babylon. Persia was one of the most powerful states of antiquity, and even in the fourteenth century was able to support the army of Tamerlane, who marched without commissariat or baggage, during a bloody contest. It is now almost a wilderness, with a population of two millions—about half of them nomads, which is rapidly perishing from famine brought on by three years' drought. The worst of it is, that, owing to the absence of either common roads or railroads, it seems to be impossible for the charity of the rest of the world to reach the sufferers, so that there is really a strong prospect of the total depopulation of the country. The moral of this horrible story is—look after your trees. It is to be hoped that we shall witness, before long, some organized attempt in this country to deal with this momentous question of forest preservation, which is daily becoming more pressing. Zoroaster, the great Persian legislator, was wiser than he knew when he put planting a tree among the most meritorious of acts.

Spain is passing through a period of party excitement such as it has not had for a long time, which is saying a great deal. Since the fall of the Zorilla Ministry, which was for a time supported by a majority of the Radicals of every shade, there is no end to agitation, wranglings, divisions, and futile attempts at fusion or reunion, such as are generally followed by a recrudescence of animosities. The main trouble in the camps of the Progressists, Democrats, and Republicans seems to be that Sagasta, the predecessor of Zorilla, and his followers, cannot be persuaded to unite with that lately fallen Minister-President in an attempt to overthrow the Cabinet of his successor, Malcampo. Sagasta, like Serrano, who preceded him, continues to give his support to Malcampo, and his partisans are loud in denouncing the subversive schemes of the more pronounced Radicals, while Zorilla—a comparatively young politician of equal ability and ambition—looking for allies on the opposite side, makes common cause with the Republicans under the lead of Orense, and vehemently assails the restrictive policy of the Government in regard to the Internationals. The latter are, at this moment, perhaps more active, and certainly more threatening, in Spain than in any other country of Europe. Agitations in the army, which are said to have ripened into a conspiracy in Barcelona, add to the complications of the situation. Yet the popularity of King Amadeus seems to have taken deep root in the country, and his Government, though without names of great eminence in its history, makes gallant efforts to weather the storm. In the sitting of the Cortes, on Friday last, it won a significant victory over the opposition, but Zorilla is reported ready to return to the charge.

M. Thiers's professions of fidelity to the Republic are, perhaps, reiterated too often to obtain implicit confidence; yet the number of those who are inclined to question their sincerity is daily becoming smaller. To the members of the General-Council of the department of the Seine-et-Oise, the capital of which is now the provisional capital of France, he is reported to have said, "I am not the author of the Republic, but I have received it as a trust; I am a man of honor, and that trust shall not perish in my hands, nor through any deed of mine." As much as this he has uttered many a time in Bordeaux as well as in Versailles, and no action of his can as yet be pointed at as conflicting with that emphatic assertion. What is new—and certainly open to doubt, though unreservedly communicated by the Cable—is that "President Thiers has authoritatively [sic] stated that when the Legislative [sic] Assembly meets, in the beginning of December, the Government will propose to end the provisional régime, and establish a definitive Republic." Among the indications of M. Thiers's freedom from Orleanistic bias, we find cited his opposition to the election of the Duc d'Aumale to the Academy, for which Guizot, Saint-Marc Girardin, and Jules Janin are said to be working. But whatever his sentiments towards the house of Louis Philippe may now be, his hostility to the intriguers in favor of a Bonapartist restoration is, beyond question, becoming more and more intense and pronounced. The Government is also irritated by the insulting behavior of several officers of the army, most of them Imperialists, whose ire has been roused by decisions of the Commission on Grades.

The Cable has failed to furnish us any explanation of the sudden resignation of Chancellor Beust, which so closely followed the triumph of his views on the Bohemian question and the retreat of the initiator of the opposite policy, Count Hohenwart. All we have learned since the first announcement of the fact is that Count Andrássy, the President of the Hungarian Cabinet, who was in accord with the Chancellor on that question, has been appointed to succeed him as Minister of Foreign Affairs; and that there is likely to be no change either in the foreign policy or in the programme lately adopted for Cisleithan-Austria. Count Andrássy, who, though cherishing a lively sympathy for France, never committed himself to a hostile attitude towards Bismarck and the union of Germany, and lately accompanied Francis Joseph to the interview at Salzburg, will undoubtedly continue the cordial relations with the court of Berlin there inaugurated by his predecessor in the foreign office; and the sudden closing, just announced, of the Diet of Bohemia, on its unanimously passing a resolution against the election of delegates to the Reichsrath, shows that the new Cisleithan ministry is going to act in domestic affairs in conformity with its first professions. How Baron Kellersperg has ultimately formed that Cabinet, or who succeeds Count Andrássy in that of Hungary—a Cabinet of wonderful firmness, though entirely transformed by successive changes in its personnel—we have yet to learn. Hungary, through Andrássy and Lónyay, the Minister of Finance, holds now two out of the three ministries of the common Austro-Hungarian Cabinet, and—such have been the vicissitudes of the monarchy of the Hapsburgs in later years—the Germans are glad of it.

RICH MEN IN CITY POLITICS.

THE condition of New York is not of local interest simply. Even if the city were not the largest in the Union, and the commercial capital of the country, and were not every day coming nearer and nearer to being its social capital also, we should still be unable to blind ourselves to the fact that the peculiar relation between money and politics, which is attracting so much attention in New York, has a strong tendency to grow up in all other cities and States under the influence of our enormous material prosperity. All the leading conditions of our problem are to be found, though in a lower stage of development, in Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, and even in towns of the second order, like Hartford, and New Haven, and Providence, and Buffalo. The chief of these conditions are, first, the existence of great wealth in the hands of persons who are too busy, and accumulating too rapidly, to be troubled seriously by the weight of taxation; secondly, the liability of this wealth to taxation by universal suffrage; and, thirdly, the presence of a large body of voters too deficient in intelligence or power of imagination to perceive that, even when they do not pay taxes directly, taxation, nevertheless, reaches them through rents and the price of commodities. Wherever we have these forces working in a political fabric which is built on the hypothesis that all citizens are concerned about taxation, and interested in politics, in an equal degree, and compose a homogeneous society, we may look for the appearance of Tweeds, Halls, and Connollys with almost scientific certainty. There is no more use in denouncing people who call your attention to it, or in maintaining that it cannot be, than in maintaining that two straight lines can enclose a space. It would be pleasant if two straight lines could enclose a space; humanity would be the better of it; the cost of houses would be greatly diminished, and life in other ways would be much simplified; nevertheless, our conduct is and has to be regulated by the theory that they cannot, and so far from sitting down in despair, and living in round towers or in the woods, our duty is to build our houses under the law by putting cross-walls in them. Therefore, what is passing in this city and State cannot be watched with too much attention by the people of other cities and States. If they go on getting rich through either commerce or manufactures without profiting by our experience, they will suffer what we are suffering just as surely as the sun rises. If they profit by our experience, they may have the riches and the population which constitute both our glory and our shame, without any of the shame, and without Tweeds and Halls; but not otherwise.

Now, one of the lessons which is most clearly enforced by our New York crisis is, that in a commercial and manufacturing community, it is not possible to prevent the union of wealth and political power. In such communities one of two things is sure to happen—either the power follows the wealth, or the wealth follows the power. In the Constitution of 1846, an attempt, and we admit an honest one, was made to prevent this union by the thorough democratization of the government, as democracy was understood in those days. The result was that the class of well-to-do merchants who had until then managed city affairs were rapidly excluded from all open participation in the government, until in ten or fifteen years the pretensions of a leading citizen to the possession of any political weight or influence became ridiculous; and the concern of the bankers, traders, and manufacturers in the conduct of the affairs of their city became to all outward seeming as remote as their concern in those of Paris or London. Poor men came into power, as the framers of the Constitution intended they should, and as, on the Democratic theory, they ought; but they did not remain poor very long. We believe it is literally true, that every man who has figured prominently in New York politics during the last twenty years,—and by figuring prominently, we mean, showed that he possessed a strong personal following among the voters, and got his share of municipal spoils,—Wood, Tweed, Connolly, Hall, Sweeny,—entered "politics" very poor, and in one or two cases insolvent, and every one of them accumulated fortunes rapidly—that is, in ten years, or thereabouts. Wood came up to the surface about 1852, few people knew whence, but he came up penniless; before he retired from city politics in 1861, we believe, he was a millionaire. Tweed entered politics insolvent in 1860, and is now supposed to be worth at least ten millions. Connolly was four or five years ago a bank clerk, dependent on his salary, and is now "transferring" property by the million. Of Hall, it is difficult to speak with so much certainty, as he has had a profession, or at least has belonged to a law firm; but the business of the law firm has been largely city business. Sweeny started as a poor office-boy in the service of Mr. James T. Brady, but almost immediately on setting up for himself went into the collection of "claims" against the city, since which time he has been rolling up wealth rapidly, and for ten years at least has been universally acknowledged to be further "inside politics" than any other man in the city. Now, these men all took the place of "the rich men" in the control of municipal affairs, but they speedily became richer than any of their predecessors. They were put into power as the representatives of "the people," as distinguished from the great tax-payers, but they soon became themselves the greatest tax-payers of all, and further removed from "the masses" in habits and tastes than the men they dispossessed. Tweed's and Connolly's style of living, for instance, is vastly more luxurious and sensual than that of the most luxurious and sensual business-man we have or have ever had. One other result followed their accession, and it is the most curious and instructive of all. Not only did they become rich, but they entered into an alliance with the other rich, against whom they might be expected to feel some hostility. We are unable to support our assertion with figures, but we only repeat the belief of the best-informed men when we say that, under the reign of the Ring, the great property-holders, though outwardly despised and rejected, really fared better than any other class of the community. They were able to make, and did make, terms with the robbers; it was the men of moderate means, who only owned their own houses and stores, who were made to suffer most, and through them, of course, the laboring classes, to whom they rented dwelling-places and sold goods. So that, stripped of all paraphernalia, the rule of the Ring, though it is talked of as the rule of the mob, really did consist in the rule of the rich; but not the rich enriched by commerce, but by plunder.

In fact, the supposition that in places in which enormous fortunes are made and great wealth concentrated, and in which making money is every man's chief concern, and in which every rich man numbers his dependents by the thousand, property can be deprived of weight in politics, is a chimera. Property will weigh heavily in politics in spite of all we can do; what we have to decide is whether it shall weigh openly, legitimately, and by fair and moral means, or secretly, illicitly, and through bribery and corruption; and whether the property which weighs heavily in politics, shall be property honestly earned in commerce and manufactures and lawful speculation, or property accumulated in cheating, stealing, and corruption; whether, in short, it shall be the property of men whom our churches, and schools, and literature are encouraging our boys to imitate, or the property of men for whose restraint and correction we build our jails. To take a familiar illustration of what we are saying, the Broadway Railroad: For many years, rascally speculators tried regularly every year to procure a charter authorizing them to build a horse-railroad along that great thoroughfare, but they were regularly every year defeated by the property-holders along the route, who are nearly all rich men, though they never held a meeting, or in any way appealed to public opinion. Had they done so, they would probably have been laughed at. What they did was to raise a fund privately, give it to a knavish lobby agent, and send him up to Albany, never asking what he did with the money. All they knew, or cared to know, was that no Broadway Railroad Company was ever chartered.

All this would, perhaps, have less importance if it were not the fashion, and had not been for some time the fashion, to ascribe all the evils of the body politic in our great cities to the laziness and indifference of the wealthy and cultivated. If the rich men "would only go to the primary meetings," we are told, all would go well. This has now been said so often that we believe nearly everybody but the gentlemen who write it in the newspapers and preach it from the pulpits laugh when they hear it. Any system of government would work well if everybody who lived under it did his duty. What has to be considered in framing it is the probability that a considerable number of persons who live under it will not do their duty. In fact, this probability is what makes any government necessary. If all citizens of New York would do right, we should need neither constitution, nor laws nor courts. If voters would behave properly, we should need no registry law. Any government which is set up in this city has to be a government adapted to the peculiar conditions of city society, composed, as it is, in part of a large number of poor and ignorant voters, and in part of a large number of busy and indifferent rich voters. It is the business of a moralist to urge them "to do their duty at the polls"; but it is the business of politicians to make their duty at the polls simple and easy to perform. If we want the rich honest men of the city to exercise a legitimate influence in politics, we must so arrange our politics that their attention to it shall interfere as little as possible with the main business of their lives, viz., the proper management of the financial affairs of this nation. It is no exaggeration to say that the regular working of the vast and complicated machine of American commerce and industry, and, with it, the happiness, comfort, and prosperity of tens of millions of our population, are dependent on the order, punctuality, application, and judgment and integrity with which New York business men attend year by year to their daily concerns. Those who ask them to neglect them for the purpose of contending with the Tweeds, and Connollys, and Halls, in the mazes of ward politics, with all respect be it spoken, do not consider what they are saying. Government, it cannot be too often repeated, is not an end, but a means. Men's great object in life is not to carry on government, but to follow their callings; and the use of government is to enable them to follow their callings in peace and security, and there has been no case on record, and never will be a case, where men will continuously and permanently neglect their callings to look after the government. Security and peace they will have, and, if they cannot get them under a republic, they will seek them under a dictator, or emperor, or "boss."

The Constitution of 1846, and all the city charters that have been framed under it, have, in multiplying the number of elective offices and dividing responsibility, made it impossible for men actively engaged in professional or business pursuits in a large city to pay any fruitful attention to politics without neglecting their private affairs. This inconvenience was felt twenty years ago; under the increase of railroad and telegraphic communication, it has become tenfold more pressing; and our best citizens have succumbed to it, and left the field to the knaves. If we ask any of the Committee of Seventy, or of the Young Men's Reform Association, or of the Reform Democrats, who have done such splendid service during the last three months, whether they could continue to render the State the same aid permanently, they will answer unanimously, No; that it would ruin them if they did. The poor men among them have, in fact, been sacrificing their families, and the rich men have been neglecting the superintendence of large interests, on the safety and success of which hundreds of thousands of families are dependent. In short, no such effort as gave the victory of last week can be protracted; it is not in human nature to protract it; and it must not be forgotten that, gallant and successful as it was, and stupendous and notorious as was the villainy against which it was directed, it left Tammany in possession of over 50,000 votes.

We hope all these things will be considered by those who undertake to reorganize the municipal government this winter. No system will succeed which shuts out rich men, in a commercial community, from all open and legal influence on affairs by overwhelming them with mere numbers or by making politics an intricate game. They will make themselves felt somehow. If you will not give property open representation in the city councils or some supervision of the outlay of the taxes which it pays, property will protect itself by hiring janissaries to work after its interests, and the janissaries will finally rule the city. You must also make the number of elective city offices so small that no party will venture to nominate obscure candidates for them; and that it will be possible for a decent citizen to find out all about them, without abandoning his family and neglecting his business and his friends, and passing all his leisure hours shut up in close rooms with the refuse of metropolitan society. You must, too, give us a pure judiciary. The bench of New York must this winter be cleared of scoundrels and blackguards. Upon this point there must be no wavering or hesitation. There are three men on it at this moment who, if they got their due, would be at hard labor in the penitentiary. One of them uses daily in open court to suitors and counsel language such as is seldom heard outside a brothel. The Attorney-General will, we know, do his best to bring these beastly rascals to justice, but the bar and all good citizens must aid him. Finally, let us say, and we say it for the warning of such weak-minded males as are looking forward to the regeneration of mankind from the experiment of female suffrage, that the governmental arrangement which has brought all this shame and iniquity upon us was vigorously opposed in 1846 by men who predicted all that has come to pass, who have ever since striven to make the best of it, and who now find themselves denounced for its failure by the very philosophers who then maintained that it would bring in the reign of pure justice and truth.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The exposures which have recently been made of the Ludlow Street jail—that disgrace not only to the city and county of New York, but to the judicial system of the State—and the late irregular, but we think commendable, action of Mr. Justice Barnard in releasing a large number of persons confined within that prison-house, will have the effect, we hope, to direct the attention of the public, of reformers, and of the legislature to the subject of imprisonment for debt, or, to speak more accurately, the arrest and imprisonment of defendants charged in purely civil actions. We presume that almost any individual, not an expert, would, when asked, declare at once and without hesitation that imprisonment for debt had long been abolished. We are certain that few citizens, who have not made a special examination of the subject, are aware in what a large number of instances a person sued in a civil proceeding may be exposed to this degrading penalty. It is our purpose to spread this whole matter before our readers; to describe in plain words the exact condition of the law in New York; and to suggest reasons why arrest and imprisonment as civil remedies should be abolished immediately and utterly.

We shall enter upon no antiquarian investigation. It is enough to say that for a very long period of time in England the first ordinary step in a legal action was or might be the arrest of the defendant and his confinement until he could furnish competent bail. This was technically known as arrest upon mesne process, as contradistinguished from arrest and imprisonment upon final process or execution issued after judgment, which was not bailable. The same system prevailed for a while in this country within the memory of living men. Its supposed abolition was hailed as a triumph of right and justice over force. But has it been abolished in New York? The Code of Procedure shall furnish an answer. We there find that the defendant may be arrested in any action brought to recover damages which does not arise out of a contract, provided he is a non-resident of the State or is about to remove therefrom. He may be arrested in all actions for injury to person or character, whether that injury be intentional, with violence, or through negligence and without force. This includes the wide range of assaults, batteries, false imprisonments, wrongs done by neglect in the performance of any duty affecting the person, seduction, criminal conversation, slander, and libel. He may be arrested for injuring, or for wrongfully taking, detaining, or converting property. Here also the injury may be intentional or negligent, with or without direct force, and the property may be real or personal. A large number of familiar actions are embraced within this division. He may be arrested in an action upon a promise to marry. He may be arrested in an action brought for money received or property fraudulently applied by him while acting as a public officer, as an attorney, as an officer or agent of a corporation, as a factor, agent, or broker, or, finally, while acting in any fiduciary capacity. The transaction which gives rise to a remedial right in either of these cases is a contract, express or implied, and the peculiar element which distinguishes it from an ordinary contract is the breach of a fiduciary duty, the violation of a personal trust. He may be arrested in an action brought to recover damages for any misconduct or neglect in an official or professional employment. He may, under some circumstances, be arrested in an action brought to recover possession of specific personal property. He may be arrested in an action upon a contract or to collect a debt, if he has been guilty of fraud in incurring the obligation. The familiar instance of this class is the case where a purchaser of goods obtains credit by means of false representations as to his pecuniary responsibility. He may be arrested in all actions brought to recover damages for fraud or deceit. Finally, in any and every action, whether upon a contract, for a debt, or for a naked tort, he may be arrested if he has removed or disposed of his property, or is about to do so, with intent to defraud his creditors.

This is certainly a formidable list, and it is commended to the careful and thoughtful attention of our readers. We may well enquire in what cases, under what circumstances, is arrest not lawful? They are the following: where the action is to recover a specific tract of land, originally known as ejectment; and when it is brought upon a contract entered into in the ordinary way, involving no breach of a fiduciary duty and no element of fraud in its inception, and the defendant has not removed or disposed of his property, nor is about to do so, with a fraudulent intent. We shall not greatly err by saying that in all other cases of legal civil actions, and under all other circumstances except the two last mentioned, the plaintiff may procure the defendant to be arrested. Whenever the defendant may thus be arrested as a preliminary step, he may also be taken and imprisoned upon final process or execution issued upon the judgment, and this imprisonment is not bailable. How it may be terminated we need not now stop to describe. It is remarkable that our procedure in New York is much more tender of property than of person. An attachment against property, which is so freely used in many States, is only allowed in actions upon contracts or for the conversion of personal property, and even not then unless the defendant is a non-resident, or has absconded, or concealed himself, or is about to remove property from the State, or has transferred or secreted it, or is about to do so, with a fraudulent design.

Such is the law of New York which is daily enforced in every county, and which produces a vast amount of suffering, injustice, personal degradation, and demoralization. We believe that the whole system should be abolished. What is the theory of remedial rights, of remedies, and of the civil actions by which they are enforced or obtained? Private persons hold as against other individuals certain rights, while duties devolve upon the latter corresponding to these rights. These primary rights and duties may be broken by a thousand different acts and omissions, by withholding the possession of specific real or personal property; by injuries forcible or indirect, intentional or negligent, to property; by like injuries to the person; by slanders and libels; by refusing to pay a debt; by breaches of contracts; by frauds and deceits. Upon the commission of a delict, a remedial right in favor of the party wronged, and a remedial duty vesting upon the wrong-doer, at once spring into existence. The peace of society would be continually disturbed were these remedial rights and duties privately pursued and enforced. For this reason alone the State steps in, and by its courts and sheriffs provides an orderly method of relief through the instrumentality of civil actions and other judicial machinery. The only ultimate civil remedies possible in the nature of things are restoration to the possession and full enjoyment of the rights of property in a specific thing; the prevention of a threatened or of a continuous wrong; the actual performance of a duty growing out of a contract or out of other acts; and pecuniary compensation. All these the law furnishes by means of judgments, to be executed in most instances upon the property of the wrong-doer. This is the theory, and the system of arrest and imprisonment is utterly useless as an ancillary remedy; it furnishes no help in perfecting the final remedial right which is the object of all civil actions; it does not facilitate the recovery of the judgment which contains the relief, nor the execution of that judgment when obtained.

For a long time arrest and imprisonment in civil actions were not only useful but necessary in England. There was no direct method for enforcing an ordinary claim upon the debtor's or wrong-doer's land: the sheriff could only execute the ordinary judgment of a common law court against the tangible chattels of the defendant; all equitable rights and property, all debts, demands, and claims due, all things in action of every description, were beyond the reach of the creditor armed with the final process issued upon a judgment. The debtor or wrong-doer might, therefore, although possessed of great wealth, be able to hold the creditor at bay, unless some means of moral coercion were provided to compel him to do voluntarily what the direct agencies of the law could not do against his will. Arrest and imprisonment were these means of moral coercion. Imprisonment upon final process held up the alternative of payment out of funds under the defendant's control, but beyond the operation of the law, or of rotting in jail; arrest and bail were simply a preliminary step to ensure the presence of the debtor's body ready to be taken and confined. We need not describe the change which has taken place in England; it is enough to say that nothing of this system now exists in New York. All of a debtor's or wrong-doer's lands, all of his estates therein legal or equitable, all of his personal property, his chattels, debts, demands, and claims, everything which can be called property, every right which may result in property, with some unimportant exceptions made from considerations of public policy, are liable to be taken in some manner and appropriated to the satisfaction of the judgment which shall be rendered against him. The instruments which the modern procedure has contrived are searching and irresistible. The whole machinery of judges' orders, of examinations upon oath, of receivers, and of actions may be set in motion, and if there is anything to be found it cannot escape. The only ground, therefore, upon which arrest and imprisonment could ever be sustained has been entirely taken away. No moral coercion is needed, because there is nothing which the defendant can be coerced to do which cannot as easily and as effectually be done in a direct manner by other processes, whether he consents or not. Experience corroborates this result of theory, and shows that arrest and imprisonment produce no actual benefit, afford no real aid in the attainment of any form of civil remedy. We cannot dwell upon these matters of detail; but the solemn farce which was enacted a few days ago in the private office of Tweed is a pertinent and timely illustration. If it should be thought that a large class of civil delicts, wrongs to person, property, or character, frauds, and deceits have such an element of quasi-criminality, evince such a semi-criminal spirit and intention in the wrong-doer, that something more is necessary than a mere summons to appear and defend, some measure which shall prevent an alienation or removal of property during the pending of the suit, then the ancillary remedy of attachment already exists, and can be easily extended to all the cases which now admit of arrest and imprisonment. Attachment seizes hold of the debtor's or wrong-doer's property of every description, and holds it in the iron grasp of the law until the litigation is ended, and is in every respect more beneficial to the creditor than arrest. If in the case just mentioned an attachment had been levied upon Tweed's lands, bank account, and other assets, Tweed would have trembled far more than he did at the approach of the sheriff with his warrant.

Arrest and imprisonment are not only useless, but they confound

the essential distinctions which exist between private remedies and public punishments. To the state alone belongs the high function of inflicting penalties for crimes. In every rational system of law the entire penal administration is in the hands of the state's officers as the representatives of society, because crime is an injury to society. The confusion of which we speak is produced in two ways. First, the law declares that many acts which give rise to a civil remedial right shall also constitute a crime. Assaults and batteries, malicious injuries of person or property, libels, obtaining goods by false pretences, many frauds and breaches of personal trust, create this double liability. The penalty for the crime is imprisonment; and if arrest and imprisonment are permitted in a civil action brought to obtain satisfaction for the same delict, the wrong-doer is twice subjected to punishment for the single offence. Secondly: as the State interferes in civil actions only to promote social order and quiet, and as the object of every such proceeding is to restore the injured person to the condition he was in before the wrong, or, if that be impossible, to compensate him by a pecuniary satisfaction, arrest and imprisonment, which do not tend to effect this ultimate object, are merely punitive. A private suitor is thus enabled to inflict penalties, to invade the functions of the state, to redress public wrongs. The practical result is that the angry creditor uses the machinery of the courts to gratify his feelings of animosity; and thus the old barbarian system of private punishments is retained in this enlightened age, although the theory which all civilized nations have adopted refers the correctional process to the calm, unimpassioned control of the state, which can have no malice, hatred, or revenge.

Finally, this system of arrest and imprisonment is antagonistic to the principles of Christianity, which recognize and respect the inviolability of the person. One of the elements which the Christian religion introduced into jurisprudence was the notion that every human being exists independent of and above and not through the state, and that his person is sacred. As this notion has been developed by philosophy, and has been expressed in legislation, torture and slavery have disappeared; the severity of all penalties has been mitigated; reformation instead of vindication has come to be regarded as the object of punishment; and it is time that wrong-doers who have incurred only civil liabilities should be freed from the indignity and degradation of confinement in jails.

For these reasons, which might be greatly amplified and made more convincing, we urge that arrest and imprisonment in civil actions should be utterly abolished, and that, if necessary, attachment of property should be substituted in those cases where the delict is malicious or possesses any other element of quasi-criminality.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, October 27, 1871.

IN my last letter to you, I wrote of the new social movement which had been just announced. I expressed at the time some slight misgiving as to the authenticity of a piece of intelligence which was so startling that its interest was almost independent of its truth. I must confess that I was imposed upon—so far as there was any imposition in the case—by the apparently official character of the announcement, and the gravity with which it was discussed in newspapers generally possessed of good information. I am honest enough to confess that I believed a little too much, but I am still unable to discover how much I ought to have believed. A lively debate has been raging upon the matter for the last fortnight. The aristocrats and the artisans have each given their own account of the matter. Lord Salisbury and his supposed colleagues in the treaty have entirely repudiated the doctrines embodied in the resolutions which they had been supposed to approve. In short, the bargain between peers and workmen was never ratified. It is, however, plain that some sort of negotiation has been going on. Certain Liberal papers imagined that Mr. Disraeli must in some way or other have been at the bottom of so mysterious a plot; and, indeed, the evident belief of his opponents in the boundless resources of his tactics must flatter that gentleman not a little. They supposed that, though too clever to allow his hand to be seen, the Ex-Premier had tacitly encouraged the manœuvres by way of providing a counterblast for Mr. Gladstone. Without going into the details of the controversy, I may say that the general result seems to be something to this effect: Mr. Scott Russell seems to have been the medium through which the negotiations—such as they were—were carried on. He is, perhaps, a little of a busybody, and rather anxious to increase his personal importance. Accordingly, he somewhat overstated to each side the degree in which the other had come forward. When the peers had expressed a general desire that the working-classes might improve their position, he took this benevolent but vague aspiration as equivalent to a consent to a policy of downright socialism. The result was the strange mystification which has been amusing us. The bubble has burst a little sooner than it might have done, owing to the indiscretion of some of the persons concerned; and the only result has been to reveal a certain slight tendency to flirtation between Conservatives and workingmen. The Tory papers have endeavored to persuade themselves that it indicates the approaching advent of that being in whom they have believed so long and so fondly, without ever being able to produce him—the Conservative artisan, who is to recognize in the ancient nobility his true leaders and his natural allies against selfish capitalists. The Liberal papers have, of course, ridiculed the notion of so monstrous an alliance. Gladstone, they say, is the friend, not Disraeli; and they scorn the Machiavellian policy by which their natural supporters were to be seduced from their side. They have the best of the joke, as matters have gone; and yet there is, perhaps, something to be said for the statement that the workingmen would ally themselves with one party almost as willingly as with the other, if they saw in such an alliance the way to carry out certain social changes, a higher rate of wages, and shorter hours of labor. However, it is not likely that Lord Salisbury will just now lie down with Mr. Odger, or that Mr. Disraeli, prodigal as he is of ingenious manœuvres, will realize the dream of his earlier days, and witness an alliance between feudalism and the revolution.

I have said, however, enough of a nine days' wonder, of which we shall probably hear little more, except as an occasional subject of banter in the approaching session. The symptoms of an approaching storm in the political world are becoming daily more serious. Mr. Gladstone will have a hard task to rally once more the party which, two years ago, followed him with such implicit faith. The most serious of the difficulties which has lately assumed prominence is the result of the Education Act. As that act comes into working order, it becomes daily more obvious that it will tend on the whole to the strengthening of the denominational schools. The school-boards are, in fact, allowed the alternative of paying the fees of the poorer children who may prefer to attend such school, instead of the unsectarian schools to be provided. They are inclined to avail themselves of this permission; and the result is that the Church of England everywhere, and the Roman Catholics in the largest towns, being the religious bodies already in possession of the field, will probably receive the main advantage from the act. In the country districts, again, no school-boards have been formed, owing to the jealousy of the clergy, who fear that their power over education would thus be diminished. Now, the dissenters are generally in favor of a purely secular system of public education, and regard this tendency of the measure with extreme suspicion. In fact, at the meeting of the Education League at Birmingham, the other day, open war was proclaimed by them against the Government. I do not enter into the rights of the question; but this is a very serious matter. Perhaps your readers fail quite to realize the influence which is exerted by the dissenters upon English politics. There is scarcely any town in England where they do not possess sufficient power to turn the scale; they act with great unanimity; and, what is more, they take a really keen interest in political warfare. As everybody calls himself a member of the Church of England who is nothing else, the church necessarily includes a great majority of lukewarm adherents, who are probably divided pretty equally amongst themselves. But the dissenters, acting in a steady phalanx, and headed by their ministers, can throw a heavy weight into the scale whenever they please. They therefore form the real backbone of the Liberal party. If Mr. Gladstone has been unlucky enough really to alienate them, the Liberal party will break up, and I confess that, in my opinion, that result will follow before long unless the Cabinet show far more discretion than has lately been the case. This education question is important, amongst other reasons, because we are evidently going to have a serious fight over similar questions in Ireland. The priests are there demanding a Catholic university and the command of the national system. Mr. Gladstone has spoken with his usual verbosity and equivocation—I can really use no gentler terms on the subject. If, as many people anticipate, he yields to the Irish Catholic demands, he will hear something from the English dissenters that will be far from agreeable. In fact, his ministry would not be worth a month's purchase. I am, however, venturing too far towards prophecy. I will confine myself, therefore, to repeating the simple fact that the dissenters are everywhere showing symptoms of an irritation which may perhaps be allayed by judicious measures, speedily applied, but which, if not allayed, is ominous of a considerable political catastrophe. What would be its precise form baffles all powers of calculation.

I will just notice here one fact which has brought some discredit upon the Government. We have received a full report of the loss of the Megæra. It is evident that the suspicions expressed at the time were only too well founded. There can be no doubt that the Admiralty, in their newborn zeal for economy, sent a regiment to make a voyage to Australia in a ship which was tumbling to pieces from old age, which they had been warned by competent persons would tumble to pieces, and which tumbled to pieces accordingly, fulfilling the predictions of everybody who had anything to do with her. There is, of course, the usual controversy as to who was to blame; and it is likely enough that we shall find that nobody, as usual, was the guilty person. In such a case, I need not say that nobody is equivalent to everybody; or, in other words, that a system which leads to such results, without making any single person responsible, is self-condemned. The Admiralty, indeed, have, by all accounts, a good deal of which they may fairly boast; they have provided us with a fleet which, as we, at any rate, believe, is by far the most powerful in existence; but the catastrophe, though not very serious in itself, is just one of those picturesque incidents which catches public attention. It shakes confidence generally, and renders some searching enquiry imperative. Poor Mr. Goschen, who has been made First Lord of the Admiralty because he was so well up in the management of pauperism, has an unpleasant task before him; though I believe that he exchanged workhouses for dockyards at too late a period to be personally responsible.

I turn from these political speculations to notice briefly the death of three distinguished men, though two of them scarcely attained a reputation equal to their merits. Mr. Babbage, one of the ablest of English mathematicians, has gone. The calculating machine on which he spent so much labor, and on which the Government of the day refused to spend enough money, remains half-finished in King's College, a monument of vast ingenuity, much of which—from no fault of his own—was thrown away. The general public recently connected his name chiefly with some peculiarities of temper, which are manifest in his memoirs, and with the uncompromising warfare which he carried on against organ-grinders; but I believe that the followers of his own special science valued his services highly. Sir Roderick Murchison, whose death has been almost simultaneous, was another scientific celebrity of a very different stamp. He better understood the difficult art of making a scientific reputation the means of social success; the Geographical Society has become one of the popular lions of the day under his presidency; and some of his rivals regarded him with a certain jealousy, as having usurped an unfair share of public attention. How that may be, I need not enquire; but I imagine that no one doubts the reality of the services which he has rendered to geology. The last of the trio was Burgoyne, the most venerable representative of the English army, and associated with many military triumphs and disasters. He was all through the Peninsular campaigns, and, if his influence had been more powerful at Sebastopol, it is said that the Crimean War would have left less melancholy recollections behind it. In another way, he curiously connects the past and the present. His father was the General Burgoyne of whom you know something in America, and he was born within five years (if I remember right'y) of a certain transaction at Saratoga. His son—a very distinguished naval officer—was in command of the Captain when that ill-fated ship capsized, the other day, in the Bay of Biscay. This melancholy event, it is said, broke the old soldier's heart; and he was followed to his grave, in the melancholy little chapel of the Tower of London, by a great crowd of the oldest and most eminent officers in the service. So drops out one of the links which connected our modern times with days that already seem to lie far back in history.

A GENERAL-COUNCIL IN SESSION.

PARIS, October 27, 1871.

THE sittings of the General-Councils in France have been made public by the new law voted by the National Assembly. I have, therefore, taken an opportunity to visit one of the provincial towns in the neighborhood of Paris to see, with my own eyes, how our departmental assemblies conduct their work. If ever a permanent republic, a real republic, is established in France, these provincial bodies are the nucleus of the future houses which will play in it the part which the State legislatures fulfil in the United States. The town which I chose was once an ecclesiastical town; the magnificence of its old churches shows this plainly enough, as well as a sort of cloistered quietude hanging over the whole place. The Councillors met on the 23d October, in the rooms of the Prefecture. A Prefect, as you know, is the representative of the Central Government. He was, under the Imperial system, nothing short of a despot; all the life of the department was practically concentrated in his cabinet; he directed the local press, sent his warnings to the editors, gave to the paper which he chose as his favorite the monopoly (a very lucrative one in some places) of all the legal advertisements. (The law in France compels the advertisement of all tenders for public expenses, all sales of property, all creations or dissolutions of partnerships, and a number of other things.) He held all the functionaries under his sway—magistrates, government engineers, receivers of taxes, professors, schoolmasters, officers of police. Not a window can be, even now, opened in the wall of a communal school; not a road can be widened by a yard; not a tree can be cut on a government road; not a commune can increase its local taxation, without the permission of the omniscient, all-powerful Prefect.

You may well imagine that such an important personage must be lodged in a palace. The Prefecture of X. is no exception to the rule; it is an immense building, surrounded by a large English park; and it contains, besides the reception-rooms and private rooms of the Prefect, all the offices and archives of the Prefecture. On my way to the Prefecture, I saw no signs of agitation in the streets; nobody seemed aware that the first meeting of a new General-Council was going to take place. People went quietly about their business. I found the avenues of the prefectoral park covered only with new gravel, and at the foot of the great staircase some forty gentlemen were talking in groups. These were the Councillors; they soon entered the room where the sittings were to take place. This room is just large enough for the immense table round which sit the thirty-five Councillors and the Prefect, for two stenographers, and for a few benches placed against the wall, and which are at the disposition of the public. Since the new law only, the meetings of the Councils are public; but I doubt if, in the room where I have been spending the greater part of the last few days, the public could outnumber twenty or thirty people. To be sure, there appeared no eagerness on the part of the population to attend the meetings; the only people whom I have seen near myself on the benches have been some lawyers and engineers, interested in the transactions of the Council. A gendarme, in his splendid costume, who, of course, is an Alsatian, as all good gendarmes are, charged with the preservation of good order among the audience, seems to be aware of the inanity of his consigne.

The composition of the Council will, perhaps, speak more for the political state of the country than many dissertations. I counted in its ranks as many as three dukes, all three wearing illustrious names, but each of them belonging to a different party, which shows pretty well the disintegration of the French aristocracy and of society in France. There were, besides, two counts, three barons, a viscount, three gentlemen with the particle de, which makes a total of twelve—not a small sprinkling of feudalism in a Council summoned by a Republican Government. Every Councillor is elected in his own canton (the canton is a subdivision of the arrondissement; it contains, on an average, thirty villages); and the rural population is, of course, always inclined to vote for the richest and most benevolent proprietor of the canton. All these gentlemen addressed each other during the debates by their own names and titles—M. le Duc, M. le Comte, and so on.

The political opinions of the Council are of importance merely as an indication of the state of the department, as they cannot find an open expression in the debates. The Prefect, who is always present, though he has no vote, can stay a discussion which is wandering from administrative subjects to political subjects. The Council cannot even pass a resolution on a purely political subject. M. Thiers and the Republican Left of the Chamber have succeeded in effacing from the original project of the new law the article which allowed all General-Councils to pass resolutions on political subjects. They are only allowed to resolve, or, to use the French words, to express wishes on questions of administration and political economy. I will not stop here to show the absurdity of such a restriction. To an American or an Englishman, it must seem almost childish to forbid any body of men to pass any resolution they please on any subject they choose; but the French mind has an almost intuitive horror of the word politics. Politics is the forbidden fruit which our Councillors are not allowed to touch, even in thought. Politics is the golden apple which M. Thiers keeps in Versailles. Who will be in power? That is the résumé of what people understand here by the word politique. Public administration and finance are quite another thing. It will, nevertheless, be interesting to know what are the political feelings of these Councillors of X., all the more because, outside of the Council, they speak of nothing else. In this committee of thirty-five men, chosen by universal suffrage, there are five decided Bonapartists, men under personal obligations to the Emperor Napoleon, and who make it no secret that they desire his return. There are three radical Republicans, men who have been chosen in the most industrial districts, and who would prefer Gambetta to M. Thiers. The rest may be best classed under the name of Conservatives, as having no very marked political doctrine. These twenty-seven members, who will form the majority, are partisans of M. Thiers's policy; eight of them would prefer the maintenance of the Republic, nineteen would favor the establishment of the constitutional monarchy, but most of them think that the time has not yet come to choose between these two forms of government, and are all ready to give their support to whatever form may be adopted by the Constituent Chamber. Among the nineteen who are monarchists, there is only one professed Legitimist, one of the three dukes I mentioned.

The Prefect is a lawyer whom the revolutions of the 4th of September found in the opposition, and who has only been in office since that time; a clever, shrewd, intelligent man, who seems very well fitted for his post, and who does not attempt to overrule the Council in the fashion of his predecessors. For instance, in old times, the Council never chose the President without a secret understanding with the Prefect; this year, the Council did not consult the wishes of the Prefect, and put in the chair the most influential and independent of its members. As there are no printed rules for the proceedings of the Council, the choice of the President is very important; he conducts the debates, and the Prefect, who sits opposite to him, has nothing to do with the discussions; he only puts the official reports and accounts before the Committee, and waits for their decision.

The new law allows the newspapers to publish the debates; but they are bound to publish an official account, supervised by the President and his secretaries. This obligation has thrown the local press into a great consternation; there are only two newspapers printed in this capital of the department, and they only appear every two days. If they published the official procès-verbal in extenso, there would be room for nothing else in their papers. Yesterday the Council decided that they should be allowed to publish a résumé, but this résumé will have to be submitted to the supervision of the secretaries. I do not see why the law has not allowed more freedom in this matter, especially as the debates are purely on financial and administrative matters; but the jealousy of the press has survived the Empire. I can perceive how much all the Councillors, most of them highly reputable people, are in dread even of the local press, feeble and empty as it seems to me. It is almost painful to go through these local newspapers; there is absolutely nothing in them. The editor is always the printer himself; he gives a ridiculously small salary to some obscure man, who has neither talent, nor ambition, nor political interests. Under the Empire, the Prefect was the real editor of the principal paper; now the Prefect has been deprived of his right of choosing the paper to which the legal advertisements must be sent; and, consequently, the two printer-editors, who can both publish these advertisements, have been looking for new patrons. One is called the Conservative, the other the Republican paper; to me they seem identical, as I never find anything in them but the same telegrams, sent by the Havas telegraphic agency. They only assert their party character on the eve of an election; then they publish different lists, and begin a sort of warfare which is incomprehensible to those who do not know the candidates individually. I fell into conversation yesterday with one of these editors, who was sitting with me on the benches of the Council, and, to my great surprise, he told me that he was adverse to the liberty of the press. I had it on my lips to tell him that example is stronger than precept, and that he had better shut up his own office.

Every evening, after the meeting, the Councillors dine among themselves, in groups of ten, sometimes of twenty. So far there has been no public dinner of any sort; the municipality has offered them no banquet. To-night the Councillors will be the guests of the Prefect; but the inhabitants seem to regard all these proceedings with perfect indifference. There are no demonstrations of sympathy, no public marks of deference shown to the Council. In short, life in the provinces has become quite individual; that strong feeling of association, of solidarity, which one observes in free countries, does not exist here. After so many revolutions, even what might be called the class-feeling is gone. Every man lives in his own house, with a few friends and relations, as in an oasis, which the noise of the outside world cannot penetrate. The only feeling still alive is that of patriotism: the Council resolved yesterday that it would attend a public service in the cathedral, in memory of the soldiers of the department who fell during the late war.

I have tried to give you in this letter the physiognomy of a General-Council. In the next, if the subject interests you, I shall attempt to explain to you what is the business of these Councils. Their functions are of the greatest importance, as you will see, and it is only just to say that they seem to me to be fulfilled with great conscience and ability. This year especially, after the disasters of the war, this department, which has been occupied for several months, had to deal with very important and difficult questions.

Correspondence.

JOHN AND ROBERT KENNICOTT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Exactly what Mr. Olmsted meant by the following passage in his interesting letter from Chicago, in your last issue, is not quite clear: "As examples of these [citizens who had bonded themselves to have no share in the material prosperity of Chicago, in their devotion to higher pursuits], the Kinnicutt brothers, as both are dead, may perhaps be named." Certainly, few citizens of Chicago, or the Northwest, throughout which his name is widely known and honored, will recognize in this an intended tribute to Robert Kennicott, the founder, while still a lad, of the Chicago Academy of Sciences. When the news came, the Nation fittingly chronicled the loss to science by his death at Nulato, at the age of thirty, and while in command of the scientific corps of the Russo-American Telegraph Expedition in 1866. And not even his name, "misspelled in the despatches," will dim his fame among naturalists and explorers.

The other of the "both" to whom your correspondent refers, was John A. Kennicott, Robert's father, and whose synonym, "the Old Doctor," as he was lovingly called, is still a household word throughout that region. A pioneer in agricultural and horticultural education, the honored friend and peer of such men as A. J. Downing, Marshall P. Wilder, and Dr. Kirtland, this confusion of name and identity must have been a lapsus pennæ that Mr. Olmsted, himself of that ilk, will feel grateful to have corrected.

If it were not for the implication that the seal of death is necessary to secure personal recognition in your columns, the writer would like to speak of him on whom devolved the younger Kennicott's work. The loss of mere material wealth, when the life spent in its acquisition is drawing to a close, is sad. But there seems absolutely no recompense for such a loss as befalls him who, steadily putting aside every temptation—where temptation, as in Chicago, was most rife—to commercial gain and profit, and, devoting himself solely to the service of science, sees in an hour the fruits of years of study, ripe for, but yet ungiven to, the world, vanish like the baseless fabric of a dream. Kennicott's lonely death on the sandy beach of an Alaskan bay was pathetic, and, in its untimeliness, seemed a cruel and wanton sacrifice. But his works and words remained, and under the loyal care of his friend, Dr. William Stimpson, had fruited in an institution which ranked among the first scientific establishments of the country. For Dr. Stimpson's loss there seems no such compensation. Manuscripts, collections, and illustrations, embracing the life-work of a recognized authority, a patient investigator, a profound, and often brilliant, generalizer, are utterly swept away. This, too, when his health, broken by prolonged and assiduous study, was so critical that the trustees of the Academy had given him leave of absence for a protracted vacation, during which he was to have had charge of the deep-sea dredgings in the North Atlantic. Even the proverbially warm sympathy for each other of the larger men of science, of which Stimpson himself is an example, in his chivalrous devotion to the memory and reputation of his predecessor, Kennicott, is weak and inadequate for such a case as this.

Frank W. Reilly, M.D.

New York, November 9, 1871.

Notes.

Mr. E. H. Munday, editor of the Philadelphia Proof-Sheet, purposes publishing in a volume, whose typography will be as noticeably good as the Proof-Sheet's, his interesting historical sketches of the "Newspaper Press of Philadelphia, from 1719 to 1872," which have already appeared in his journal. These have been accompanied in each instance by reduced fac-similes of the newspaper heading, and the proposed book will contain also thirty or forty full-page portraits of editors and publishers. The work will be sold by subscription, at $10 a copy, by Collins & McLeester.——Two other subscription works seem worthy of encouragement, at least by the denomination particularly interested in them. These are the series, to be comprised in eight or ten volumes quarto, called "The Historical Collections of the American Colonial Church," of which the first volume, on Virginia, has already been issued, and the second, on Philadelphia, is in press; and "The Early Journals of the General Conventions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, 1784–1838," with notes and appendices, in three volumes octavo. Rev. Dr. William S. Perry, of Geneva, N. Y., is the editor of both collections, and should be addressed by those who desire them. The cost will be $9 75 and $3 50 per volume respectively.——The Michigan Avenue Free Library and Reading Room in Chicago was the only one which escaped the flames, but it was also the newest, and its store of reading-matter is but small. The Association which opens it to the public is now soliciting contributions of books, periodicals, and money, to enable it to meet the demand on it for more extensive reading than it can now afford; and they may be sent either direct to the Library by the American Merchants' Union Express, or to the agent in this city, Rev. J. B. Thomas, 677 Broadway.——Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. will publish, in the course of this month, a work which we cannot err greatly in warmly recommending before we have seen it:

"Household Book of Songs, for Four Voices," collected and arranged by Francis C. Bowman and Charles A. Dana.——We are glad to report that the Jarves Collection was purchased last week by Yale College for $22,000.

—Any one interested in Landor's writings will, we think, take pleasure in looking over a complete set of his literary works lately received by Scribner. Several of the volumes are enriched by notes, emendations, and additions, in the handwriting of the author. There is a copy of the first edition of "Gebir," and one of the second showing many variations from the first, and from later editions as well. A little book in the lot, consisting of Latin verse and prose, formerly belonged to Leigh Hunt, who has made numerous notes in the margins in pencil, which he has afterward thought it worth his while to go over with a pen. As we ourselves have never before met with this production of Landor's, and as, from its rarity, it may be new to others of his admirers, we give the full title, of which Allibone gives only the first two words. "Idyllia Heroica Decem Librum Phaleuciorum unum partim jam primo partim iterum atq tertio edit Savagius Landor. Accedit quæstunacula cur poetæ Latini recentiores minus legantur.

> Ἀλλ' ἐφομαρτειτον και σπευδετον ὁττι ταχιστα
> Ταυταδ' ἐγων αὐτος τεχνησομαι ἠδε νοησω,
> Στεινωπη ἐν ὁδῳ παραδενμεναι, οὐδε με λησει.

Pisis. apud S. Nistrium. MDCCCXX." In the poems we come upon a word which has recently attracted some attention, and which Landor uses in a sense differing from the Connecticut:

> "True indeed, some time ago
> Clutterbuck and I
> Joined for better and for worse
> Our young hearts and little purse,
> Bundling—weal or woe."

And, while we are upon this word, we may as well give another example of its use, which we have met with in that charming book, "The Letters of Mrs. Adams" (Boston, 1840), too long out of print. It occurs in a letter written at sea to her sister, Mrs. Cranch. She was going to England to join her husband, who had been appointed American Minister to the Court of St. James. The letter is very entertaining, and shows those of us who are inclined to grumble that, even in the good old times, they could be as miserable at sea as we can be to-day. "Our accommodations on board are not what I could wish, or hoped for. We cannot be alone, only when the gentlemen are thoughtful enough to retire upon deck, which they do for about an hour in the course of the day. . . . The door opens into the cabin, where the gentlemen all sleep, and where we sit, dine, etc. We can only live with our door shut whilst we dress and undress. Necessity has no law; but what should I have thought on shore to have laid myself down to sleep in common with half a dozen gentlemen? We have curtains, it is true, and we only in part undress, about as much as the Yankee bundlers; but we have the satisfaction of falling in with a set of well-behaved, decent gentlemen, whose whole deportment is agreeable to the strictest delicacy, both in word and action."

—Mr. Alfred Perry, Inspector of the Royal Insurance Company, communicates to the Montreal Daily Witness some observations on the phenomena of the Chicago fire, which, after all that has been written on the subject, may be read with interest. What most struck his professional eye was that "all the buildings left standing present on their upper stories sound materials, whilst each succeeding downward story shows a proportionately increasing destruction." On the wall of the court-house, some sixty feet above the level of the street, he saw erect a wooden flag-staff not even scorched. Passing on to the water-works, he noticed that the glass lantern of the tower, eighty feet high, had not a pane of glass cracked by the heat, "while below, at the base of the tower, blocks of sandstone, ten feet long by five feet wide and two feet thick, are so calcined and splintered into fragments as to be quite useless." It should be remarked, however, that these buildings had been fired by flying brands and consumed before buildings between them and the main conflagration had even been touched. "The fact of the fire not ascending," to use Mr. Perry's words, was also exemplified in the remains of the Church of the Holy Name. This church "had its tower running up about 100 feet, and the spire had not been erected. It had been intended to finish it this year, and the contractor had placed his scaffolding on the top of the tower, and two of the four main corner timbers had been placed. These two corner-pieces and a portion of the scaffold remain, apparently unscorched, whilst the body of the church, its tower, and the surrounding district are ruined, the very cast-iron lamp-post at the edge of the sidewalk being melted." Another more questionable phenomenon which he reports is that, "in those streets where telegraph wires ran, the intensity of the heat destroyed stone and iron work much more completely than in those streets where there were no wires." Finally, the intensity and completeness of the combustion were shown in the total absence of smoke—a fact which did not occur to the imaginative draughtsmen of our illustrated papers.

—Nature tells us that, "with the extension of the telegraph into the more northern latitude of the Shetland Islands, between 59° 51′ and 60° 51′ 30″ N., we enjoy a much better opportunity of observing the frequency and variation of magnetic and auroral storms. Some of the earliest recorded observations upon the strength and direction of these storms date from the time when the extension of the telegraphic wires over England rendered the phenomenon visible, by the disturbance of the magnetic needle placed in circuit with the wire. In some cases, these magnetic storms were so severe as to impede the working of the railway signals. On the 18th of October, 1841, a very intense magnetic disturbance was recorded, and among other curious facts mentioned is that of the detention of the 10:5 P.M. express train at Exeter sixteen minutes, as the magnetic disturbance affected the needles so powerfully that it was impossible to ascertain if the line was clear at Starcross. The superintendent at Exeter reported the next morning that "some one was playing tricks with the instruments, and would not let them work." The article in Nature from which we quote gives us also some interesting observations on the colors of the aurora. "'Dark' streamers will appear to start up high in the zenith, . . . these dark auroral rays being at the same time transparent as regards the power of transmitting the light of the stars, which shine through with undiminished splendor. At the same time with these dark rays, brilliant green, violet, crimson, and white rays stream upward, but always with a less persistance of duration. These colored scintillations change with greater rapidity than the black rays." The red rays would seem to be less transparent than those of other colors. The colors that have been observed are, black, pale yellow, strong yellow, white, violet, pale blue, bright green, crimson fading with reddish pink, pale orange, and sea-green. Thus far nothing approaching to the indigo hue has been noticed. We are assured, too, that, in the Island of Eday, where some very brilliant auroral displays have been seen lately, and where the atmosphere is perfectly still, repeated observation has determined the existence of very appreciable sounds to the ear as an accompanying phenomenon to the rapid rush of the auroral stream to the zenith. The intensity of the sound emitted varies considerably. At times it greatly resembles the rushing noise caused by the firing of a rocket into the air, heard at a distance. At other times, it resembles strongly the sound produced by the crackling of burning embers, but wanting in any very distinctive sharpness. Nature for Oct. 26 contains a paragraph headed "Are Auroras Periodical?" in which a list is given of notable auroral displays occurring during the last hundred years, which seems to make out a very striking case for the period between Feb. 15 and Feb. 23. Thus, beginning with 1773, we have:

1773, Feb. 17.	1848, Feb. 20.
1784, " 23.	1851, " 18.
1794, " 15.	1859, " 18.
1838, " 21.	1866, " 20.

Besides the February epoch, any extended list of auroras will indicate two or three others, the most remarkable of which is that of Nov. 13–18. Fifty-three brilliant auroras have been observed since 1770. Of these eight have occurred in the period just named. The latest remarkable aurora took place, as many of our readers will remember, on the evening of Thursday, the 9th of this present November. It was a magnificent display, and its date not more than a fortnight later than the great display of last year, which occurred on the evening of Oct. 23.

—We have lighted upon a passage in Shakespeare which proves, we think, as clearly as anything we are likely ever to come across, that he was once in Venice. Can any one doubt who has threaded the narrow, tortuous lanes (calle), alleys, and streets of that most bewitching city without a guide—trying, let us say, to make a short cut or to find a certain church in an obscure quarter—that the writer of the Merchant of Venice was putting his personal experience into the mouth of Launcelot Gobbo (the name of Gobbo, by the bye, still hangs out on signs here and there in Venice) when he makes him say, in answer to his father's question, "Master, young gentleman, I pray you, which is the way to Master Jew's?"—"Turn upon your right hand at the next turning, but at the next turning of all on your left: marry, at the very next turning, turn of no hand, but turn down indirectly to the Jew's house"? All the bewilderment of Venice is in that "turn down indirectly." None but an actual peripatetic in that floating labyrinth could have so touched off for us "how vainly men themselves amaze," to use Marvel's words, in finding some house that is "only just round the corner." To such a man in such a plight, old Gobbo's exclamation comes pat: "By God's sonties, 'twill be a hard way to hit." It has nothing to do with our subject, but we wondered when we came upon it, and wonder still, whether the "Calle della donna detta Becher," evidently painted lately on a wall, is meant, Italian fashion, to point out the street honored by the residence of the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" during her stay in Venice.

—The Sonnets of Shakespeare have been newly translated into German by Otto Gildemeister (Leipsic: Brockhaus), already well known for his masterly translations of Byron. If the following is a fair sample of the rest, the least praise we can give it is to say that those in whose language Shakespeare wrote may take almost equal pleasure in reading him (if they can) in this new version. We subjoin the original (No. 29) for the sake of comparison:

"When, in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,
I all alone beweep my outcast state,
And trouble deaf Heaven with my bootless cries,
And look upon myself, and curse my fate,
Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featur'd like him, like him with friends possessed,
Desiring this man's art, and that man's scope,
With what I most enjoy contented least;
Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
Haply I think on thee—and then my state
(Like to the lark at break of day arising From sullen earth) sings hymns at heaven's gate;
For thy sweet love remember'd, such wealth brings,
That then I scorn to change my state with kings."

"Wenn ich, verachtet von Geschick und Welt,
Einsam mein ausgestossenes Los beklage,
Und schrei' umsonst zum tauben Himmelszelt,
Und schau' mich an und fluche meinem Tage,
Und wünsche, dass ich wie ein and'rer wäre,
So hoffnungsreich, so schön, befreundet so,
Und dieses Kunst und jenes Macht begehre,
Des eignen Köstlichsten am mind'sten froh:
Wenn so ich selbst mir fast verächtlich werde,
Da denk' ich dein, und dann steig' ich empor
Der Morgenlerche gleich von dumpfer Erde,
Und singe Hymnen an des Himmels Thor;
Denn deiner Lieb' Andenken macht so reich,
Dass ich mein Los nicht tausch' um Kron' und Reich."

—"Shut up in Paris," a little book which makes Vol. 1175 of the Tauchnitz Collection of British Authors, is a lively, well-written, and evidently truthful account of one side of life during the siege of Paris by the Prussians, and contains, probably, quite as much of the dismal story as most people will care to read. The author is Mr. Nathan Sheppard, whose letters from Paris written during the siege to the Cincinnati Gazette we remember to have found full of entertainment and information. Several useful appendices are added to the present volume. The first gives us an analysis of the death returns during the nineteen weeks from September 17 to January 28:

Small Pox,	6,604	Killed in Battle,	3,000
Typhoid Fever,	2,897	Died in Hospital,	10,000
Bronchitis,	3,627	Killed in Mobs,	15
Pneumonia,	3 027	Murders and Assassinations,	6
Diarrhœa,	564	Suicides,	10
Scarlatina,	37	Deaths by Accident,	40
Measles,	154	Deaths from Excitement,	13
Dysentery,	42	Spies and Deserters Shot,	20
Croup,	27
Other causes,	30,402	Total,	60,485

Another table in the appendix is called "Gastronomic," and gives, first, a list of the animals not generally eaten, but which found their way to Parisian tables during the nineteen weeks of siege, with the numbers of each kind that were killed:

Horses eaten,	65,000	Ostriches,	3
Donkeys,	1,000	Porcupines,	2
Mules,	2,000	Bears,	2
Dogs,	1,200	Kangaroos,	3
Cats,	5,000	Wild Boars,	1
Rats,	300	Stags,	2
Mice,	200	Deer,	5
Elephants (3 sold for 27,000 francs),	3	Antelopes,	6
Dromedaries,	1	Tropical Birds,	25
Camels,	1

This is followed by a statement in detail of the provision-market for each week, with the prices, and with various interesting and valuable items relating to the appearance of extraordinary viands in market, to the failure of certain provisions, and to the unexpected appearance of certain others.

—The new Strassburg Library has been enriched by the purchase, for 24,000 francs, of the Heitz library, remarkable for being the fullest collection of works published in or relating to Alsace. This was not accomplished without great opposition on the part of the irreconcilables, though ten years ago, when the city was offered the library, it refused to buy it. Another valuable addition, also by purchase, is the Böcking library, said to be one of the richest in respect of the literature of the Reformation, and unique in its collection of the works of and concerning Hutten and the Obscurants of the "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum." Donations from all parts of the world, and of every degree of value, are flowing in with a gratifying rapidity.

—Two items of interest regarding Russian interests in Eastern Asia have recently come to our knowledge. Some months since, a mercantile firm at Nertchinsk fitted out, at their own expense, an expedition for the purpose of discovering some road to Peking and Tientsing shorter than that hitherto in use. The existing route, via Kiakhta, entails considerable discomfort in crossing the desert of Gobi, and to shorten this was the object of the exploring party. They lately returned, having found a practicable route leading south to Dolon-Nor, and thence to Peking. It is 700 versts (more than 400 miles) shorter than the old road, has a firm soil fit for vehicles, while fodder and water abound along its whole length. The result of this discovery will be the transport of Russian goods into China at a much cheaper rate than heretofore. The second item is that the Mongolians, having menaced Urga, the Russians had, in August, sent down 600 men and two field-pieces to protect the consulate in case of attack, although Urga is in Chinese territory. But the Chinese will probably be glad that the Russians have undertaken to keep their troublesome subjects in order. Russia's policy in these matters is admirable in its simplicity. "If you cannot protect our people, we shall do it for you," she says to China; "but you must bear the expense." An extension of the Russian frontier has hitherto been the price paid. Whether it will be so in this case remains to be seen.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS, AND MR. FROUDE.*

In exhibiting his restored portrait of Henry the Eighth, Mr. Froude threw the Sentimentalists into ecstasy, and grieved and disgusted the judicious. The work was worse than sensational hero-worship—it was audacious hero-making. The lives of Elizabeth and Mary Stuart offered even a more fortunate subject in the play of contrast among the subtleties of female character for the exercise of his great and peculiar talents. What pictures of angel and demon he might have made of them, if not warned by the censure of all serious readers upon his earlier volumes, may be conjectured from the unequal distribution of light and shade in the lower-toned but most elaborate compositions he has put forth in place of their real history. As an achievement of well-deserved literary flaying alive, this critique of his performance by Mr. Meline is thorough and satisfactory.

The faults of Mr. Froude as a historian are radical, lying both in his system and in the mental qualities that govern his treatment of subjects. He aims to combine the ancient idea of controlling fate with the modern analysis of individual motives. He is tragedian and novelist in one. His personages are the puppets of Providence, but it is a Providence which he assumes to direct, and tells when and how to strike. Human passion is allowed its play, but only under permission of his omniscience. Not satisfied with the arrogance of interpreting the ways of God towards men, he affects to penetrate and reveal the most secret ways and thoughts and feelings of men and women towards each other. We may allow him the praise of entertaining noble hopes and generous wishes for the human race, and of great ingenuity in accommodating these to his views of divine interference in human affairs. We may admit, too, his nicety in analyzing the springs of action, and his vigor and brilliancy in setting forth the trains and consequences of the actions themselves. But we deny his right to speak with a double intuition, and refuse to be deceived by the art with which he puts himself forward as the deus ex machinâ, and the machine, and the actor in the scene, all at once. He asks us to look at a passage of history as only the higher intelligences of some other world can look at it—to comprehend it as part of a universal plan, involving a transparent view of the characters and motives in every detail of those who shared in it—and to compass this divine vision he offers us no help but his own glorifying and distorting spectacles. For his manner of treatment is as faulty as his plan. He is the enthusiastic advocate, not the calm arbiter. He transports us to a past age by vivid pictures of its manners, its outward life, and the very motion and talk and business of that older world. But we are introduced to friendly relationship with only one small set of its inhabitants. It is not Europe at all that we are made familiar with; we are not even allowed to like or care for all England, but are forced into sympathy and partisanship with a particular faith and policy. The point of view is chosen in and from that faith and policy alone. It is even not enough to show that affairs bore a certain aspect to Elizabeth and her councillors; but we are bid to believe that the aspect in which they pretended to take them was the true one. And the worst of it is that, in such excess of bias, Mr. Froude sees no bias at all. The generality of his plan breaks down at once under the prejudiced casuistry of his treatment.

It is upon this plan that the framework of his Elizabethan story is constructed. Two spiritual powers are contending throughout Europe in opposition of light and darkness—the Ormuzd of the Reformation, and the Ahriman of Romanism. Elizabeth and Mary are contrasted as the mortal agents of these "fell incensed opposites"—the Scotch Queen, the centre of a web of intrigues, plots, and crimes; the English Queen, the wise and resolute defender of truth and freedom. The contrast is carried out with nice pictorial truth and fine suggestion, in points of character, state, and fortune, except that Mary's tragical death is brutally displayed, and Elizabeth's horrible last hours discreetly veiled. A trivial fault or two, as of frugality or indirectness, is allowed to blemish the brightness of one, and it is kindly conceded that a certain charm and grace and spirit did relieve the sensual deviltry of the other. But white and black they respectively were in theory, and only the white and black must be picked out from the facts as put into the innuendoes assigned to each. Mr. Meline relentlessly exposes the mixture of boldness and adroitness used to produce the desired effect. Now it is an intimation thrown in while discussing some other subject, and reverted to some chapters afterwards as a fact; again a seed of suggestion lightly dropped into the reader's mind, and nursed by slight touches into full-blown persuasion without argument; again, a bold misquotation, a faulty translation, an essential statement omitted or inserted. In brief, every species of trick and unfairness is here detected and stigmatized, which, if employed in a matter of business, would be frankly called fraud and forgery.

* "Mary, Queen of Scots, and her latest Historian. By James F. Meline." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 8vo. 1872.

Every reader of Mr. Froude's history accustomed to weigh evidence was at once offended by his vehement advocacy, setting up an unusually lofty claim for historic impartiality. Even those who read only to be amused were haunted amid all his dramatic movement and subtle insight by a suspicion that the author was selecting and disposing his materials with either too much art or too much prejudice. Mr. Meline deserves great praise for the dispassionate examination, founded on authentic documents, which he has brought to bear in this book upon the duty of determining exactly how much of this ingeniously misconstructed historical novel is supplied by prejudice, and how much by art. Ordinary mortals, who cannot rise to the Brahma-like faculty of being indifferently the director, the doer, and the sufferer, are fortunately not left without the means of forming a judgment upon historical problems for themselves. Records remain, not only those public ones of rulers who seek to set themselves right before the world, and of watchful observers who correct official accounts by notes of incidents and circumstances, but also the more frank and uncolored ones of private letters and diaries. No one who does not examine these sources of information with profound research, and compare and report their statements without bias, has any title to the essential quality of a historian—veracity. Every year adds to these important materials for ascertaining the truth. Mr. Meline makes effective use of several which Mr. Froude neglected. The appearance of one such document may have the effect of altering all a historian's combinations, and depriving a narrative founded on partial inferences of all value. If produced in time, it may altogether change his intended plan, as was probably the case, Mr. Meline points out, with Mr. Froude's history of Elizabeth after the publication of documents brought to light from the Spanish archives by Mr. Motley. But what if such dead witnesses to the truth, accessible at the time of composition, instead of being overlooked by the historian, are misquoted or falsified? Yet this is what his critic shows the practice of Mr. Froude to have been in repeated instances. The originals are given of the letters from Mary to Elizabeth, from Killigrew to Cecil, from Throckmorton to Elizabeth, from Sussex to Cecil, with the version of them by Froude, presented in parallel columns. In each case, the historian's statement of their contents contains either a suppression of the truth or a suggestion of falsehood, and in more than one instance an interpolated invention of which there is no trace in the original. And these letters all relate to important passages in Mary's life, where the artful version supplies the very fabric and color of the tissue destroyed by the original.

We cannot follow the critic through all the detail of uncovering his author's sinuous track. He is ready with a score of proofs of the assertion that insidious suggestion and rhetorical exaggeration are his favorite devices. He convicts him by State Paper evidence of committing grotesque blunders and suppressing inconvenient facts. He cites with unsparing sarcasm his passages of reckless romancing and picturesque fancy-sketching. August suns are detected shining in autumn, and reaping-hooks flourished by Scotch peasants harvesting in May. And, cruellest of all, he quotes the distinguished historian's own forcible precepts for given cases, in flat contradiction to his practice in precisely similar ones. A few instances of this keen chase must suffice.

The "peine forte et dure" is familiar to any one looking at the commonest English law books, such as a historian must consult, as the savage punishment legally inflicted on obstinately silent witnesses. Mr. Froude in his first edition speaks of this in a case of its actual occurrence as an "imaginary horror" invented to satisfy the Spanish ambassador's demand for justice. In later editions the corrected passage conforms to the truth. Very early in the history an innuendo as to Mary's utter falsity glides in, under a careless suggestion of her training at the corrupt court of Catherine de Médicis. Catherine de Médicis had no court while Mary was in France, nor any influence, and she never at any time either loved or guided her daughter-in-law. Mr. Froude gives as a citation from a certain designated letter a cruel purpose imputed to Mary: Mr. Meline learns, on application to the Public Record Office, that no such letter exists. The historian puts into Mary's mouth a menace to Rizzio's murderers, addressed to Darnley: the critic shows the perverse art with which two phrases, addressed to different persons, and found in different authorities, are put together to make up the threat. The writer dwells on the long and minute scrutiny to which certain suspicious letters were subjected: the reviewer opposes to this Cecil's own statement that they were examined hurriedly and "rather by hap, as they did lie on the table." Instances of this nature might be multiplied, but we prefer to refer the reader to the volume itself, as an admirable specimen of critical ingenuity closely applied to the detection of a counterfeit.

The stock charges against Mary Stuart's fame, her complicity in Darnley's murder, her guilty passion for Rizzio and for Bothwell, her conspiring against Elizabeth's life, are discussed fully with the aid of contemporary evidence for the hundredth time. So far as her innocence of these crimes is concerned, Mr. Meline thoroughly dissipates any unfavorable impression that may have been made by Mr. Froude's violent partisanship. He even leaves the case looking better for her than it did before that historian took it up with his inconsistent malignity. Nor does he follow the bad example set him by passionately attacking her rival, contenting himself with saying that the less said of Elizabeth the better, if we are friendly to her memory. The chapter devoted to the famous casket-letters, which have furnished Mary's enemies with their strongest arguments against her, will repay perusal for the sake of its acute research and careful sifting of evidence. That evidence leads so irresistibly to a conviction of her innocence in this particular, as to leave hardly any necessity for the citation of Dr. Johnson's deliberate opinion that the letters were forgeries.

The author, although writing as a Roman Catholic bent on correcting historical misstatements in the form of attacks upon that faith and upon one of its most celebrated and unfortunate supporters, employs in his severest censure a tone of fairness and moderation. Only one expression, in allusion to the system of torture in use in Elizabeth's reign, "which dwarfed the Spanish inquisition into a mere apprentice in cruelty," deserves to be noted as an exaggeration. For the rest, this refined enquiry, conducted closely and sharply, does not transgress the bounds of fair and well-grounded censure. Readers who are thrilled and charmed by Mr. Froude's art are not likely to enjoy his vivisection. But the truth of history can only be the gainer by the stern process. In taking leave of his author, with the accusation of worshipping art more than truth, he fairly cites against him his own words: "Those who pursue high purposes through crooked ways deserve better of mankind, on the whole, than those who pick their way in blameless inanity, and, if innocent of ill, are equally innocent of good." The Man of Sedan might so justify himself. But the world has agreed to accept Pascal's teaching as more moral.

MRS. STOWE'S LAST NOVEL.*

In her introductory chapter, Mrs. Stowe says, with a great deal of truth, "It is now understood that whoever wishes to gain the public ear, and to propound a new theory, must do it in a serial story. . . . We have prison discipline, free-trade, labor and capital, woman's rights, the temperance question, in serial stories," and for this reason she has chosen to take this form of presenting her views on love and marriage, so far as they concern the rising generation. Indeed, Mrs. Stowe's success with "Uncle Tom's Cabin" may well convince us of the power of the novel over the minds of the masses. But with the "novel with a purpose" there is always this danger, that the writer, instead of drawing the lesson from human nature, will warp and twist human nature for the sake of the moral; will observe with a prejudiced eye, and record only with the enthusiasm of a partisan; in short, will write a tract instead of a novel. Clearly, a work that is marked by this fault is a failure, in spite of whatever success it may have while the readers' minds are mainly intent upon that question which the book discusses; but, when the excitement is allayed, the book remains to be judged only by those canons which always exist, notwithstanding any uproar about the treatment of convicts or the justice of the tariff. The subject Mrs. Stowe has chosen for this novel is, of course, of far greater interest. Love and marriage will hold their own importance whether free-trade or protection conquer. If they are not the most important subject of human concern, they nevertheless seem to belong of right to the novel. Let us, then, examine Mrs. Stowe's treatment of them.

"My Wife and I" is the very appropriate title of the book. Harry Henderson, the hero, who tells his own story with the aid of a few letters, of which he became the master in due course of time, is a man born to be married. It is his only aim in life. In marriage he takes a really feminine interest. To be sure, we find occasional reference to his "life-work," etc., but that is only an empty phrase: his real life-work is simply supporting his wife. And there is no reason why he should not be married. Besides his own feelings on the subject, he earns enough money, and is a model of the domestic virtues. In fact, he may be called the ideal marrying hero, who is, of course, to be distinguished from the romantic hero who is glorious for his freedom from the domestic virtues, who would make a delightful lover but a worthless husband. Harry does not smoke nor drink. He does his work, which consists in noticing books for a religious paper, and general literary toil for the magazines, with commendable punctuality and ease, and all of the romantic hero about him is that he does not go into society, a fault, however, from which he is soon freed. At one time, too, of his early life he is somewhat shaken in his religious beliefs, but he soon goes to church with unfailing regularity. He has already had his calf-love, and, it is unnecessary to say, survived his disappointment, and recovered from the profound gloom it usually brings after it, however it may result. With this preparation for romance, he meets, in a horse-car, a "Fifth Avenue princess," of whose wealth we can judge by the fact that she was carrying nothing smaller than a ten-dollar bill in her "toy purse of gold and pearl." He pays her fare in the car; again in a stage; and protects her from the rain as far as her own door. The girl is Eva Van Arsdel, the heroine. She, too, is ripe for romance; she is pretty, rich, and persecuted by a detested suitor, a young money-maker. In spite of the worldly-wise advice of her mother and aunt, she treats him coldly, for she has her ideal. She writes thus to her old teacher:

* "My Wife and I; or, Harry Henderson's History. By Harriet Beecher Stowe." New York: J. B. Ford & Company. 1871.

"About this marriage. Mr. Sydney [the despised son of Mammon] is not at all a religious man; he is all for this world, and I don't think I shall grow much better by it.

"I wish there were somebody that could strengthen me, and help me to my better self. I have dreams of a sort of man like King Arthur, and the Knights of the Holy Grail—a man noble, holy, and religious. Such an one I would follow, if I broke away from every one else; but, alas! no such are in our society, at least I have never met any. Yet, I have it in me to love, even to death, if I found a real hero."

This poor little creature, with her shivering wonders, a discontent at parties—she has been in society three years—and a fondness for ritualism, naturally smiles on Harry. He is torn by regrets for his poverty, a little by jealousy; but gets fairly in love. Perhaps the following extract will show, as well as any description, the tone in which the whole subject is treated. It is quoted from a letter from Eva to her intimate friend. She and Harry meet rather unexpectedly, except to the reader, after a misunderstanding which is here explained:

"He rose up when he saw me, and looked pale; but an expression of perfectly rapturous delight passed over his face as I checked myself astonished.

"'Miss Van Arsdel!' he said, 'to what happy fate do I owe this good fortune!'

"I recovered myself, and said that 'I was not aware of any particular good fortune in the case.'

"'Not to you, perhaps,' he said, 'but to me. I have seen nothing of you for so long,' he added, rather piteously.

"'There has been nothing that I am aware of to prevent your seeing me,' I said. 'If Mr. Henderson chooses to make himself strange to his friends, it is his own affair.' He looked confused, and murmured something about 'many engagements, and business.'

"'Mr. Henderson, you will excuse me,' said I, resolved not to have this sort of thing go on any longer. 'You have always been treated at our house as an intimate and valued friend; of late, you seem to prefer to act like a ceremonious stranger.'

"'Indeed, you mistake me entirely, Miss Van Arsdel,' he said eagerly. 'You must know my feelings; you must appreciate my reasons; you see why I cannot, and ought not.'

"'I am quite in the dark as to both,' I said. 'I cannot see any reason why we should not be on the old footing, I am sure. You have acted of late as if you were afraid to meet me; it is all perfectly unaccountable to me. Why should you do so? What reason can there be?'

"'Because,' he said, with a sort of desperation,—'because I love you, Miss Van Arsdel. Because I always shall love you too well to associate with you as the wife or betrothed bride of another man.'

"'There is no occasion you should, Mr. Henderson. I am not, so far as I understand, either wife or betrothed to any man,' I said.

"He looked perfectly thunderstruck.

"'Yet I heard it from the best authority.'

"'From what authority?' said I; 'for I deny it.'

"'Your mother.'

"My mother! I was thunderstruck in my turn; here it was, to be sure. Poor mamma! I saw through the whole mystery.

"'Your mother told me,' he went on, 'that there was a tacit engagement, which was to be declared on Mr. Sydney's return; and cautioned me against an undue intimacy.'

"'My mother,' I said, 'has done her utmost to persuade me to this engagement. I refused Mr. Sydney out-and-out in the beginning. She persuaded me to allow him to continue his attentions, in hope of changing my mind; but it never has changed.'

"He grew agitated, and spoke very quickly.

"'Oh! tell me, Miss Van Arsdel, if I may hope for success in making the same effort?'

"'I shouldn't be surprised if you might,' said I.

"There followed a sort of electric flash and a confusion of wild words after this—really, my dear, I cannot remember half what he said."

It is chiefly for what we must call the sordidness of its view of life that we decline to praise the story. It is a feeble representation of what, if anything, makes human beings gracious. It is not the story of the loves of these two young people, but of the steps they take in order to keep house together. In other words, the book is not really a novel, but a sort of guide to young men with slender incomes who are wearied of boarding-house life. All the last part of the book is full of advice to them. The story, such as it is, is told, but the author lingers over the account of the early troubles of the household, and promises to continue the tale under another title, giving us an account of the way they lived in a back street. After all, it may be said that the author does all she claims to do. That may be granted; but, in the name of those who are not keeping house, we protest against the vulgarizing of human beings in order that the inexperienced may learn how to make the cold mutton suffice for three days. A happy life requires this knowledge, but novels should not be the means of inculcating it. We condemn here not so much this novel, as the class of novels to which it avowedly belongs. They generally undertake to teach, and as often forget that no teaching will be so effective as that which both elevates and delights. This story will doubtless be successful; it has already been highly praised, and is certainly more carefully written than "Pink and White Tyranny"; but those who read it should bear in mind that our interest in ignoble cares is not the proper subject for works of fiction. The story of Harry Henderson's boyish love is told not badly, and the account of his affection when a child for a little girl, is really pretty, and, though at times it seems a little exaggerated, it is the most nearly poetical thing in the book.

A careful proof-reader would have corrected numerous mistakes; and, if he had known French, it would not have been amiss. The illustrations are below blame.

The Life of John Pendleton Kennedy. By Henry T. Tuckerman. (New York: G. P. Putnam & Sons. 1871.)—The writing of this book was undoubtedly a labor of love on the part of Mr. Tuckerman, and to this fact are due the merits, as well as the faults, of the volume. In Mr. Kennedy's life there was nothing of striking interest to most of us, for Secretaries of the Navy often descend into their graves unwept, with their lives unwritten, and their names immortalized only in the lists of past United States officials; but there was something in this man's character which endeared him to all who knew him, and a gentle dignity and courtliness in his whole life, which make the book of value as a picture of a time now past, when both the literature and the politics of the country were in a more "genial" state than they are now. Not that Mr. Kennedy was lacking in a serious comprehension of political affairs—of the war, for example, and its consequences—far from it; no Marylander of his position, who stood by the Union, can be said to have taken the "genial" side; but in the active political life from which the Rebellion found him quite retired, he figured, and figures over again in this memoir, as the "gentleman of the olden time," taking a public position as a reward of general intelligence and respectable life, rather than of "services" to his party, or of unwearied trumpeting of his own claims to office. Mr. Kennedy's literary life was of more or less importance in its day, but we doubt if many readers are familiar with "Horse-Shoe Robinson" or "Swallow-Barn," yet the North American Review, then in its palmy days (we quote from Mr. Tuckerman), said about the last-named: "We do not know that we can better express our friendly feelings for him [the author] than by expressing the wish that the success which this production has met with may induce him to withdraw his attention from other objects, and devote himself entirely to the elegant pursuits of polite literature, for which his taste and talent are so well adapted; and in which the demand for labor—to borrow an expression from a science to which he is no stranger—is still more pressing than in law, political economy, and politics." Mr. Tuckerman compares it with the Spectator and with Irving's "Bracebridge Hall." William Wirt called it "a right merrie and conceited work"; but it has gone, and is now interesting chiefly as a memorial of the good old Knickerbocker days, when every one was expecting to wake up some morning and find an American literature waiting to be read and admired through countless ages. Hence the ready encouragement bestowed on all literary aspirants, and the praise which Mr. Kennedy's earliest productions earned for him. Thus, with some of his young associates at the bar, he brought out "The Red Book," which his biographer tells us "shows the old Queen Anne essay style and scope, now allegorical and now a parody, here an imitation of classical English, and there a reproduction of a classical type." And it was of these papers, of which specimen titles are, "The History of Mr. Bronze," "An Old Prophecie," "Sidrophel to the Ladies," etc., that the late Mr. Everett wrote privately: "There is so much talent displayed in 'The Red Book' that I should gladly see you strike boldly at greater abuses; and, though it might still be done in a pleasant way, aim at elevating the turn of public feeling on many important points of opinion and morals. Your town is large enough to admit it—ours is not; for it is scarcely possible, with a limited population like that of Boston, to say anything which will not bring you into personal collision with your acquaintances." Professor Andrews Norton, too, wrote begging them, for the honor of Greek and Baltimore, not to print σ instead of ς final, and not to use double η as a diphthong.

After his marriage, and his more legitimate appearance as an author, Mr. Kennedy was elected member of Congress, where he occupied a respectable position. For his much-needed and successful support of Mr. Morse, in his attempts to get money to make experiments with the telegraph, he deserved the thanks of the country, and indeed of mankind. Later, under Millard Fillmore, he was made Secretary of the Navy, and to his assistance was largely due the success of Kane's voyage to the Arctic seas, and Commodore Perry's expedition to Japan. Perhaps the most admirable feature of his public career was the modesty with which he always spoke of what he had done. Of the last twenty years of his life—he died at Newport, in August, 1870—we have a full record in this volume. He gave much of his time and attention to his friends, old and young; he visited Europe; enjoying, in a word, an honorable old age. That his great attractiveness was more due to the kindness of his heart and the charm of his manner than to any preponderance of those qualities that live outside of the memories of one's personal friends can be seen in the quotations from his diary, written upon his birthdays. For instance: "October 25, 1848.—Fifty-three! Fiddle-de-dee! Here is my birthday. The top of the morning to you, my good fellow! You wear well. Somewhat thin—somewhat scattered in the matter of thatch upon the poll; but not so bare as the back of my hand. It will come to that one day. Let it come, I am ready, etc." Many of his letters to his friends, and particularly those to his godson, are less languidly humorous. A proof of the goodness of his heart is his kindness to Edgar A. Poe, whom he helped in many ways. This is an interesting record from his journal under the date of June 22, 1853: "We [Irving and himself] saw also Washington's ledger, a very large folio, full of accounts. Among other accounts (they are all in the General's handwriting), there is one headed 'Accounts of Cards and other Games.' This has the entries of three years (1772–3–4), with a debtor and creditor side. His winnings entered on one side—thirteen pounds, the highest entry there—and his losings on the other, with a balance struck at the end of three years, showing a loss of six pounds and some shillings."

On the whole, then, the chief merit of this book is the attractive picture it gives us of the best sort of Southern gentleman, well educated, of literary tastes, an honest politician, and a good lawyer. For, whatever merit our grandchildren may find in the present generation, it certainly will not be the elegant leisure of our public men; nor are we of to-day divided between our admiration of their literary work and our respect for their official excellence. Mr. Tuckerman's performance is wanting in order; dates are confused without regard to the reader's convenience; and the whole volume would have been better for more careful proof-reading.

War and the Weather; or, The Artificial Production of Rain. By E. Powers, C.E. (Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co. 1871).—The author affirms it to be the duty of Government to cause some experiments to be made to determine whether rain cannot be produced by the discharge of artillery. To prove this opinion, two hundred battles and salutes followed by rain are referred to, scattered over the four quarters of the globe, along with some score of campaigns and sieges during which it was unusually rainy. These battles occupy the bulk of the book. At the close is a discussion of the best arrangement of the cannon by which Government is to furnish rain for the victims of drought and fire. The only strong point in the argument is the sequence of rain after certain Mexican battles during the dry season in that country. But the author fails to perceive the importance of showing precisely how infrequent rain is during the dry season. A brief table of the statistics of the monthly rain-fall near Monterey and Buena Vista during the twenty years since the war, would furnish the material for an easy calculation of the chances against the rain having been accidental after those battles. Such a table would be worth more than the fifty pages of "documents" in the appendix, which are letters from army officers attesting that rain followed battles in our late civil war. But it is not even stated when the rainy season ends and begins in Mexico. The rest of the argument is fitted to impress readers who are taken by appearances. Here is a sample from page 28, "Artillery Firing in Front of Hooker" (these lines are in capitals, and leaded apart from the lines above and below, as are the names of all battles referred to, which gives the book a peculiar appearance inside): ". . . June 21, 1862: 'Suddenly a brisk fire of musketry ran along Hooker's front, followed by artillery' and [next day] 'we have had a few drops of rain since dark.' On the day after, also, there were 'showers of rain with a little thunder.'" We are not told but that "a brisk fire of musketry" ran along somebody's front every day during the year 1862: nor how many such discharges were followed by clear days. Mr. Powers should have confined himself to a narrow space and time, and given the weather record both at the scene and some distance eastward, for every hour during the period selected. Or, a terser method would have been to confine himself to cases when thunderstorms followed firing, for these phenomena are limited, in most States, to a few months in the year, so that their occurring in other months would have some significance. Butler's "Philosophy of the Weather" would furnish details concerning the usual paths of storms in different months.

The order in which battles are introduced is so reckless as to be amusing. Thus: after a battle in Prussia, in this century, is mentioned a salute fired in Madras in 1776; then the siege of Valenciennes, in the French Revolution; then the bombardment of a fort in Sweden in 1806; then a naval battle in the Indian Ocean in 1793; then Sedan! Irrelevant matters are admitted, such as names of generals, military manœuvres, numbers of men killed, compliments to troops (to the Russian infantry at Eylau!) Instead of all this, why does it never occur to the author to tell the calibre of the heaviest guns used in a given case, or whether the sky looked like rain before the first discharge? Why is it that only five of Bonaparte's battles are alluded to? Were all the others followed by fair weather?

The most notable blunder in the book occurs under the caption Waterloo. "Waterloo, as all know, was fought in a pouring rain, brought on, without doubt, by the battles of Ligny and Gemappes, which preceded it." Now, the fact is that Waterloo fell on a clear day (though in deep mud from the rain of the preceding day, which, being twenty-four hours nearer Ligny, would have been better for the argument); but the writer actually forgets to look up the weather after Waterloo, though so conspicuously parading its name! Had he known, he would surely have informed us, that thirty-six hours after the battle a long rain set in. The respectability of all Mr. Powers's other testimony is compromised by this carelessness. The weather records in the appendix are worthless, because disconnected. The conclusion, then, is that though a casual connection between firing and rain may exist, our author has not been accurate enough to justify Government in appropriating money to experiment about it. Moreover, it might be doubted whether an agricultural college would not be more appropriately appealed to than Congress, considering how Mr. Smithson's astronomical donation was treated.

Dr. K. v. Spruner's Hand-Atlas für die Geschichte des Mittelalters und der neueren Zeit. Dritte Auflage. Neu bearbeitet von Dr. Theodor Menke. (Spruner's Historico-Biographical Hand-Atlas, Mediæval and Modern. Third edition; re-elaboration of Dr. T. Menke.) (Gotha: Justus Perthes. New York: B. Westermann & Co. 1871.)—The names of the author, reviser, and publisher of this grand work are a sufficient guaranty of its excellence in every respect; and, as regards its external appearance, a glance at the maps constituting the first number—which is now before us—is enough to convince us that the new edition is to be a rival of the finest productions of the cartographic art in its latest development. The whole publication is to consist of ninety large maps, including also about three hundred and forty sectional maps, all newly designed and engraved. The latter will thus be almost three times as numerous as in the two former editions. The work is to be published in twenty-three numbers. The first contains "The East Roman Empire in the Time of Justinian," with plans of Constantinople, Rome, and Carthage among the sectional maps; "The East Roman Empire and Western Asia, from Justinian's Time to the Fall of the Sassanide Empire"; "Syria during the Crusades," with the Holy Land, plans of Jerusalem and Acco, etc.; and "The Ottoman Empire and the States under its Protection in the Seventeenth Century." Introductory remarks are added, on separate pages, explanatory of the single maps. A remark on "The Ottoman Empire" informs us that the names of the localities are given after Hammer's history of that empire, Mailáth's "History of Hungary," and the "Wiener Jahrbücher." These authorities are certainly of a high order, but they have not prevented a somewhat indiscriminate use of names. Thus we find, in close succession, in the Turkish portion of "Hungary," "Buda," "Waitzen," and "Nowigrad," names of towns in Hungarian, German, and Slavic respectively; "Setscheny" and "Muncacs," also names of Hungarian towns, are correct in none of those languages. We need, however, hardly add that such slight blemishes are almost unavoidable in a work of such comprehensiveness.

Zanita: A Tale of the Yo-Semite. By Thérèse Yelverton, Viscountess Avonmore. (New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1872.)—What a lively imagination can do with unreal people, gorgeous scenery, and improbable incident is very well shown in this novel. The persons of the story are either eccentric or insane, except a few who are conspicuous for almost unprecedented refinement. This is an extract from the conversation of the author with two of the early settlers of California:

"We walked down to the falls in the moonlight; they fell like an avalanche of silver spray, glittering like globules of quicksilver, the whole arched by a delicate lunar rainbow.

"'A real pluie de perles,' I exclaimed. 'Or Naiad's tears,' responded Rudd; 'weeping that Venus has usurped the loves of the golden-backed dolphins.'

"'Then it is not true of the dolphins, "Qu'on retourne toujours à ses premières amours"?'

"'No,' rejoined Rudd; 'amour only returns when the amourette is a——'

"'Mrs. Brown,' I put in mischievously.

"'Ah! that's too bad,' laughed Mr. Naunton, 'to spoil the phrase and the compliment; it should have run, "when the amourette is a Sylvia"; for that is your name, I believe.'

"We turned to retrace our steps," etc.

Zanita, the heroine, is the ill-trained daughter of the last speaker, and the story is more especially about her growth in refinement through the gentle influence of love. The extract we have given may serve as an example of the style in which the novel is written. The title-page bears the date 1872. It would be well to be accurate even with the most ephemeral books.

A Journey Round My Room. By Xavier de Maistre. Translated from the French, with a notice of the author's life, by H. A. (New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1871.)—This is a neatly printed and carefully translated version of the story so familiar to beginners of French. They will remember its gushing sentimentality and close imitation of Sterne. It is difficult to find any other qualities in the book, which, however, may be safely bought by any one anxious to make a present to those who only use their books as ornaments of parlor tables. It is well enough printed for that, and the miniature illustrations add to its attractiveness.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Adams (Rev. W.), Regeneration in Baptism	(M. H. Mallory & Co.) $2 50
Alcott (Miss L. M.), Morning Glories, and Other Stories	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Antidote to "The Gates Ajar," swd	" " 25
Beard (Dr. G. M.), Eating and Drinking, swd	(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 50
College Library: Julian Home; Eric; St. Winifred's, 3 vols	(M. Doolady) 5 00
De Vere (Prof. M. S.), Americanisms	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Dewey (Mary E.), Life and Letters of Catharine M. Sedgwick	(Harper & Bros.)
Diaz (Mrs. A. M.), William Henry and His Friends	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Erckmann-Chatrian (MM.), The Invasion of France in 1814	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Fowle (T. W.), The Character of Christ, swd	(Hurd & Houghton) 15
Half-Hours with Modern Scientists	(C. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Headley (J. T.), Mountain Adventures	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Holt (Emily S.), Isoult Barry of Wynscote	(T. Whittaker & Co.)
Hood (T.), Puss and Robin; and their Friends Kitty & Bob	(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50
Houses not Made with Hands	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Illustrirte Kriegs-Chronik, Part 28 and last, swd	(B. Westermann & Co.)
Jepson (B.), Elementary Music Reader	(C. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Kingsley (H.), The Lost Child	(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50
Knatchbull-Hugessen (E. H.), Moonshine; Fairy Stories	" " 1 50
Magill (Mary T.), Women, or Chronicles of the Late War	(Turnbull Bros.) 1 75
Marryat (Florence), The Prey of the Gods: a Tale	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 25
" " " swd	(Harper & Bros.) 30
Modern Scepticism	(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 2 25
Morton House: a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.) 1 00
McPherson (E.), Political History of the U. S., 1865–1870	(Philp & Solomons)
Meline (J. F.), Mary, Queen of Scots	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 75
Mother Goose set to Music	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)

DIED.

AT EAST FISHKILL, N. Y., on Wednesday, October 18, Catharine E., widow of George Armstrong, of New York, in the 67th year of her age.

"And I heard a voice from heaven, saying: 'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord.'"

JUST PUBLISHED.

WAS SHE ENGAGED?

A NOVEL. BY "JONQUIL."

12mo, extra cloth, $1 50.

An attractive love story, full of charming complications and entertaining dialogue. Its plot is well constructed, and its style natural and lively.

TREATMENT AND PREVENTION OF

DECAY OF THE TEETH.

A PRACTICAL AND POPULAR TREATISE.

BY ROBERT ARTHUR, M.D., D.D.S.

Formerly Professor of the Principles of Dental Surgery in the Philadelphia and Pennsylvania Dental Colleges, etc.

With Thirty-eight Illustrations.

16mo, extra cloth, $1 50.

A manual thorough and practical in its matter and style, and suited to the wants of both the profession and the public.

PENDENNIS;

HIS FORTUNES AND MISFORTUNES: HIS FRIENDS AND HIS GREATEST ENEMY.

BY WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.

Profusely Illustrated with Designs from Thackeray's own Drawings.

Being Vol. II. of the New Crown 8vo Edition of Thackeray.

Toned paper, handsomely bound in fine cloth, $3 25.

The New Crown 8vo Edition of Thackeray contains all the most attractive features of the famous Standard Edition, including its profuse and beautiful series of characteristic illustrations.

MUSKINGUM LEGENDS.

WITH OTHER SKETCHES AND PAPERS DESCRIPTIVE OF THE YOUNG MEN OF GERMANY AND THE OLD BOYS OF AMERICA.

BY STEPHEN POWERS.

12mo, extra cloth, $1 75.

This series of travelling sketches is distinguished alike for the novelty and interest of the subjects chosen, and for the sprightly and attractive manner in which these subjects are treated.

For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of the price, by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia, and 25 Bond Street, New York.

LADIES DESIROUS OF LEARNING TO sing in the pure Italian School, will address SIGNOR GIANNETTI, care of Wm. Hall & Son, 751 Broadway.

JUST READY.

I. TAINE'S ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Vol. I. Royal 8vo, cloth (to be completed in 2 vols. Vol. II. nearly ready), per vol., $5.

THE PUBLISHERS HAVE BEEN LED TO the considerable undertaking of reproducing this great work by the solicitation of several scholars eminent in the department, who have pronounced it unquestionably the best book on English literature extant. From this opinion they have never heard a dissenting voice. The American reviewers have not yet given their opinion of the work; but the capacity of the author for such an undertaking may be to some extent surmised from the testimony quoted below, from John Stuart Mill, regarding his power as a student of the human intellect, and the following testimony from the Nation regarding his general power as a writer:

"One of the most powerful writers of the day—to our own taste, indeed, the most powerful—the writer of all others who throws over the reader's faculties, for the time, the most irresistible spell, and against whose influence, consequently, the mental reaction is most violent and salutary. . . . . His style, literally translated, makes very natural English. It has an energy, an impetus, a splendor to which no words of ours can do justice. . . . Finally, we cannot help laying down our conviction that M. Taine's two volumes (on Italy) form a truly great production. . . . One feels at moments as if, before this writer, there had been no critics, no travellers, observers, or æsthetic inquisitors.

II. TAINE ON INTELLIGENCE.

Royal 8vo, cloth, $5.

"We feel certain that it will be welcomed, as soon as known, by the most advanced school of English mental science. . . . The book deserves to be, and we hope will be, universally read by real students of psychology."—J. S. Mill, in Fortnightly Review.

III. SPIELHAGEN'S NOVELS.

Household Edition, $1 50 per vol.

PROBLEMATIC CHARACTERS and THROUGH NIGHT TO LIGHT—NOW READY.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

TAINE'S ART IN GREECE, $1 25.

GOETHE'S POEMS AND BALLADS, $1 50.

GUSTAVE DROZ, "Around a Spring," 75c.

HOLT & WILLIAMS, Publishers,

25 Bond Street, New York.

TO BE PUBLISHED NOV. 25.

BEHIND THE LOOKING-GLASS,

AND WHAT ALICE SAW THERE.

By the Author of

ALICE'S ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND.

Elegantly Illustrated.

Booksellers should forward their orders at once.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

JUST PUBLISHED.

AMERICANISMS.

BY PROF. SCHELE DE VERE, of the University of Virginia. Author of "Studies in English," etc. 1 vol. crown 8vo, printed on laid and tinted paper, 600 pages.

PRICE IN CLOTH, $3.

Prof. De Vere, whose studies in English have secured him a high repution among philologists, in this volume pushes his investigations into a field which has never before been explored so thoroughly or so attractively. He traces a large number of "Americanisms" never before identified, and by grouping them all in chapters according to their respective derivations, gains the opportunity to develop the subject in a systematic and most entertaining manner.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

I. The Indian.
II. Immigrants from Abroad.
III. The Great West.
IV. The Church.
V. Politics.
VI. Trade of All Kinds.
VII. Afloat.
VIII. On the Rail.
IX. Natural History.
X. Old Friends with New Faces.
XI. Cant and Slang.
XII. New Words and Nicknames.

A FULL INDEX.

ANOTHER VOLUME OF

THE POPULAR ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN NOVELS.

THE INVASION OF FRANCE IN 1814.

BY ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN.

With a Memoir of the Authors and four full-page Illustrations.

1 vol. 12mo, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 90 cents.

BY THE SAME AUTHORS.

Uniform with the above, each 1 vol., 12mo, illustrated.

THE CONSCRIPT.
WATERLOO.
A Sequel to the Conscript.
MADAME THERESE.
THE BLOCKADE.

Any or all of the above books sent to any address, postpaid, upon the receipt of the price by the publishers.

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,

No. 654 Broadway, New York.

FOR SALE—LOW.

A few Large Paper Copies of

DE TOCQUEVILLE'S DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA.

CHARLES W. SEVER,

UNIVERSITY BOOKSTORE, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

THE COUNTRY SAFE!

Good Books are now "in order."

G. P. PUTNAM & SONS

Have now Ready,

I.

THE ARTISTS' EDITION OF HOOD.

THE POEMS OF THOMAS HOOD.

Elegantly printed on toned paper, with red lines, in 4to form. With 25 illustrations by Birket Foster, Darley, Doré, and others.

Small 4to. Uniform with "The Artists' Sketch Book." Elegantly bound, cloth gilt extra, $8; morocco extra antique, $12.

II.

A New and Splendid Volume of American Art.

THE GALLERY OF LANDSCAPE PAINTERS.

AMERICAN SCENERY ILLUSTRATED BY AMERICAN ARTISTS.

Comprising 24 highly finished engravings on steel, from Paintings by Casilear, Kensett, Whittredge, Gignoux, etc.

With Letter-press Descriptions. In 1 vol. large 4to, elegantly bound in cloth extra, bevelled, gilt edges, $18; morocco extra, $30.

This beautiful volume is much the finest of its kind yet produced in the United States. As a gift-book of high character and solid elegance, it is not surpassed by any European work of its price.

III.

A New Impression of that Attractive Volume,

THE SUNNYSIDE BOOK.

BY POPULAR AUTHORS AND EMINENT ARTISTS.

With 40 beautiful illustrations.

Small folio, gilt extra, $1 50; morocco antique, $3; morocco extra, $9.

This "every way charming volume."—Boston Transcript.

IV.

THE CRAYON READER.

Choice Papers and Passages from the Writings of

WASHINGTON IRVING.

New edition. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

V.

ART—PICTORIAL AND INDUSTRIAL.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS.

A volume of Original Papers on various topics connected with Ancient and Modern Art. With 53 Autotype Illustrations. Folio, cloth gilt extra, $16; half-morocco, gilt edges, $18.

VI.

SMITH'S WEALTH OF NATIONS. New (English) Edition, complete in 1 vol., 781 pages 12mo, $2 50.

VII.

WALPOLE'S ANECDOTES OF PAINTING IN England. New Edition complete. 1 vol. 12mo, $2.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED:

1. THE ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF D'Aubigné's History of the Great Reformation. 212 fine Engravings. Complete in 1 superb 4to, $10; morocco antique $16.
2. THE HANDY-BOOK SERIES: Eating and and Drinking, 50 cts.; cloth, 75 cts. Stimulants and Narcotics, 50 cts.; cloth, 75 cts. What to Eat, 40 cts.; cloth, 60 cts. Till the Doctor Comes, 30 cts.; cloth, 60 cts.

NEARLY READY:

1. PUTNAM'S HISTORICAL LIBRARY. 15 vols. $37 50.
2. PUTNAM'S "KNICKERBOCKER" EDITION of Poets. 4 vols. $2 each.
3. GEMS OF DUTCH ART. 4to.
4. THE BEST READING. A Guide for Book-buyers, Book-readers, Booksellers, and Librarians. 12mo.

G. P. PUTNAM & SONS,

Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,

BY

LEE & SHEPARD.

REYNARD THE FOX. A Burlesque Poem. From the Low German Original of the Fifteenth Century. 4to, tinted paper, Red Line, 16 full-page illustrations, cloth, gilt edge, $2 50.

An elegant edition of a very popular satirical work, full of wit and humor.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF Robert Burns. With a steel Portrait and 32 full-page illustrations by eminent artists. 4to, tinted paper, Red Line, cloth gilt, $3 50.

BY PROF. W. ELIOT FETTE.

DIALOGUES FROM DICKENS. Second Series. 16mo, cloth, $1 50.

DIALOGUES FROM DICKENS. First Series. New Edition. 16mo, cloth, illustrated, $1 50.

BY MISS A. M. DOUGLAS.

KATHIE'S SOLDIERS. 16mo. Illustrated. $1.

KATHIE'S HARVEST DAYS. 16mo. Illustrated. $1.

KATHIE'S STORIES. Complete, 6 vols. illustrated. Per vol., $1.

1. Kathie's Three Wishes.
2. Kathie's Aunt Ruth.
3. Kathie's Summer at Cedarwood.
4. Kathie's Soldiers.
5. In the Ranks.
6. Kathie's Harvest Days.

OUR BOYS' AND GIRLS' FAVORITE. Containing Tales of Adventure, Records of Travels, Sea Stories, Dialogues, Head Work, etc. Splendidly illustrated. $1 50.

Sold by all Booksellers and Newsdealers.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

LEE, SHEPARD & DILLINGHAM, N. Y.

THE CHICAGO FIRE

DESTROYED

THE LITTLE CORPORAL

Publishing House with all its contents, including the November Number, which was ready for the press, and partly printed. I am happy to announce, however, that the LITTLE CORPORAL and the December Number will appear early in November, brighter and more charming than ever.

STILL LIVES,

SUBSCRIBE NOW

before you forget it, and secure for your children the best and cheapest Juvenile published.

TERMS $1 50 A YEAR.

Send for Premium List and raise a club.

Address

JOHN E. MILLER, Publisher,

CHICAGO, ILL.

THE BEST ENGLISH PERIODICALS.

THE LONDON QUARTERLY, EDINBURGH, WESTMINSTER, and BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEWS, and BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

Regularly and faithfully reprinted, at about one third the price of the originals.

TERMS.—Blackwood or any one Review, $4 a year; Blackwood and any one Review, $7; Blackwood and two Reviews, $10; Blackwood and three Reviews, $13; any three Reviews, $10; the four Reviews, $12; Blackwood and the four Reviews, $15.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE WESTMINSTER FOR OCTOBER.

THE LEONARD SCOTT PUBLISHING CO.,
140 Fulton Street, New York.

NEW BOOKS.

CHILD LIFE.

A COLLECTION OF POETRY FOR THE Young, selected and edited by JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER, with an Introductory Essay. Profusely illustrated with handsome engravings. 1 vol. small quarto, bevelled and gilt, $3.

This volume includes a large number of the choicest poems in the literature of child-life. Hundreds of the most popular writers are represented—American, English, German, Italian, Norwegian, and Dutch. Mr. Whittier remarks in the preface:

"While the compiler has endeavored to accommodate his book to the especial tastes of the young, he has not been without the hope that maturer readers may find something of interest in it—something to bring back the freshness of the past—hints and echoes from the lost world of childhood. He is happy in believing that, in this way, some noontide wayfarer may be able to discover shadowy places of memory where the dew of the morning of life is not wholly dried up, and where may still be heard the music of the birds of sunrise."

The large and choice variety of contents, the beautiful printing, tasteful binding, and abundant illustrations of this volume, make it a gift-book of unusual attractiveness.

THE WANDERER: A COLLOQUIAL POEM.

By WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING. 1 vol. 16mo, $1 25; paper, 75 cents.

☞ This volume is of a character to justify what Mr. Emerson said of an earlier work by the same author: "Here is poetry which asks no aid of magnitude or number, of blood or crime, but finds theatre enough in the first field or brook-side, breadth and depth enough in the flow of its own thought. Here is self-respect which leads a man to date from his heart more proudly than from Rome. Here is love which sees through surface and adores the gentle nature and not the costume."

Mr. Geo. W. Curtis says: "Channing seems to be so intent upon his thought that, like a mountain climber resolved to pluck the edelweiss, he will mind no shocks or bruises. . . . It is refreshing, in these echoing days, to hear a strain which is entirely without echo. . . . Amidst the verse which is popular at the moment, this is a strain like that of Wordsworth to the devotees of Byron."

 For sale by all Booksellers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers.

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO., Boston.

JUST PUBLISHED.

OUR COUNTRY HOME:

A STORY FOR THE YOUNG.

By the author of "Harry Lawton's Adventures," "What Makes Me Grow," etc. With Twelve Etchings

BY RUDOLF GEISSLER.

4to, cloth extra, $2.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.,

Cooper Union, New York.

BOOK-BUYERS.

Send for Catalogue of INTERESTING, USEFUL, and SCARCE BOOKS added to the Stock in hand of

FRANCIS EMMINS,

20 Nassau Street, New York.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. Oil explosions most frequently occur from the lamp being upset and broken. By using Pratt's Astral Oil, you avoid this as well as every other danger incident to unsafe oils, it being in every respect a perfectly pure, reliable, and safe article.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1871.

The Week.

THE Ring is slowly fading away. Tweed will, it is said, resign in a few days, and is now only waiting to see whether he cannot bargain for the selection of his successor. Connolly has at last resigned the Comptrollership, and Mr. Andrew H. Green, to everybody's satisfaction and relief, been appointed in his stead. Hitherto, as simply Deputy-Comptroller, his tenure was dependent on the duration of Connolly's penitence, and, had Tammany carried the election, he would probably have been dismissed. Connolly, it is said, offered to resign some months ago, on condition that Green were put in his place, which the Mayor agreed to do, but, after the seeming success of Tammany at Rochester, he picked up his courage again, and refused. The election has at last frightened him into compliance. Judge Hilton's place on the Central Park Commission has been worthily filled by Mr. Henry G. Stebbins, who long presided on the old board, and has since figured prominently on the Committee of Seventy. Sweeny having resigned, too, Hall may be said to be left "blooming alone." Why he does not follow his "lovely companions," it is hard to say, but we understand he wishes to support his denial of all complicity in the frauds by sticking to his place. It would almost require a change in the constitution of the human mind to make it possible to persuade people that a gentleman who passed twenty years inside New York politics, and even filled the office of district-attorney for more than half that period, and had lived in intimacy with the leading members of the Ring, can have committed his powers as a member of the Board of Audit to Tweed, and afterwards endorsed warrants for "claims" to the amount of over six millions of dollars, without suspecting anything was wrong. But no change in man's mental constitution, of which it is possible for finite beings at present to conceive, would enable people to believe that a gentleman of this description is innocent of complicity, who, when he hears of the frauds, and finds presumptive evidence of them on the books, first denies that they exist; then acknowledges that they do exist, but that an "old board" was responsible for them; then says he signed the warrants, but only "ministerially"; and then says he did not sign them at all, that his name was forged to them, but never exhibits a particle of surprise or indignation, and never proposes, during six long months of agitation, to aid in any investigation, or put anybody on his trial, or bring anybody to justice. It is almost an insult to the public to pretend that we have no right to charge Hall with fraud because nobody has been able to trace any of the money into his pockets or into his bank account. If such proof were necessary to moral conviction, nine-tenths of the thieves could boast unblemished reputations. There may not be proof enough to send him to jail, but there is proof enough to drive him out of office, and out of every honest man's house and company.

These changes in the city government have been very appropriately followed or accompanied by the resignation of Collector Murphy, which he has at last had the decency to send in, and which the President has accepted with profuse expressions of esteem and confidence, which, perhaps, he owes Murphy, but which it would have been well for his own reputation if he had refrained from offering. There can be no doubt that Murphy was appointed in order that he might do a certain kind of work in the Custom-house, and there is no doubt that he did it; but that work was not the prompt, careful, and honest collection of the revenue. We know of one case, at least, in which, just after taking office, he confessed to a merchant of this city—who went to him to intercede for an upright and efficient officer of long standing whom he was dismissing—that he (Murphy) was put there to "run" the Custom-house for the best interests of the party, and that he meant to do it, and that, although he acknowledged the truth of all that was said in favor of the gentleman in question, he would have to go, as his place was needed for a more "useful" man. It was because it was this kind of service that the Collector was expected to render that a man of Murphy's class was selected for the place, and that class includes, in this city, Tweed, Connolly, Hugh Smith, Sweeny, and the like. Some of its members are Republicans, others Democrats; all have some nominal calling, and all "speculate" in city real estate, and know a good deal about it, as Murphy says he does; but they all manage to help their speculations by a little "politics."

The amount of Murphy's collections at the Custom-house, and the cost per cent., have been sent on from Washington as a sort of parting touch of whitewash, but we warn the reader that these figures prove nothing and reveal nothing. What we need to know first is how much might be collected, and at what cost, by an efficient business man; having got this, we should be in a position to judge of Murphy's efficiency, or that of any politician who takes his place. We believe the general opinion of the mercantile community here is that the Custom-house was never worse managed than under his sway. To his successor, Mr. Arthur, we know of only two objections—that he is a lawyer and not a merchant, and that he is and has been a warm friend and supporter of Murphy, and an active politician of the same wing of the Republican party. Personally, he is a gentleman and a man of education, but the fact that he is a prominent member of "the Custom-house faction" forbids the hope that he will take the Custom-house out of politics or institute any real reform. It is for the people of the United States to say how long this plan of "reforming the Civil Service" on paper, around a table at Washington, and keeping up its worst abuses in the ordinary working of the administrative machinery, is to be persisted in.

We are glad to say that the propriety of the step which we suggested two weeks ago to Judge Hilton, was perceived by himself nearly as soon as by others. He has resigned his position as Vice-President of the Central Park Commission. We cannot allow him to go back to private life without an attempt to "improve the occasion." He deliberately took office in company with a band of politicians resting under suspicion of dishonesty, which even then almost amounted to certainty—one of his colleagues in the Park Commission, "Tom Fields," who is now under arrest for swindling, and ought to be in the penitentiary, being one of the most notorious political scoundrels in the city—and, in company with these men, he ousted and took the place of the respectable citizens who had managed the Park from the beginning with an honesty and ability unparalleled in the history of the city. Not only this, but he, as executive officer, proceeded to dismiss, and with actual contumely, the architects who had constructed the Park, and who were still engaged in the completion of their designs; and he removed from all share in its management Mr. Andrew H. Green, who for ten years had honorably and efficiently superintended it. He then put it into the hands of common Ring gardeners and laborers, and began to carry out on it his own curious ideas of landscape gardening, a subject on which we need hardly say he is as ignorant as man can well be. This was bad enough; but finding that the public excitement against the Ring was increasing, and that Connolly's failure to publish his accounts was creating great outcry, and was likely to lead to enquiry, far from throwing his influence on the side of reform, or seeking to make Connolly obey the law, he went to work to quiet and confuse the public mind by giving public testimony as to the honesty of the members of the Ring, and as to the mode in which they had made their enormous fortunes, subjects on which, as events have shown, he either knew nothing whatever or knew a great deal. In either case, his coming out as a witness about them was little, if any, short of connivance at fraud. We ought to add that Mr. Hilton is not wholly to blame in this matter.

He is in all respects a very ordinary person, whose sole claim to any position of prominence in the public confidence is based on his connection with Mr. A. T. Stewart, and we cannot help saying, after all that has happened, that Mr. Stewart would do well to look a little more carefully after his dependents.

That many of the crimes of Tammany differ only in degree from the practices of other men deemed highly respectable is anew brought to the public notice by the failure during the week of some of the savings-banks started under Tammany auspices. It is notorious that the original idea of the philanthropists, who organized savings-banks for the purpose of serving and benefiting the poor and ignorant, barely survives, if at all, in some of the older institutions,which are still managed by honorable men without reward direct or indirect, and from motives of pure benevolence. But with these rare exceptions, the savings-bank has long since become an institution devoted to the interests of its founders or managers instead of its depositors, using the pretence of philanthropy for the sole purpose of obtaining the control of the enormous sums of money which constitute the savings of the poor. Few persons are aware, or are apt to remember, that the deposits of the savings-banks of New England and New York State alone nearly reach the enormous sum of five hundred million dollars, and that the control of even a very small portion of this sum would be a source of power and profit to the most scrupulous and most honorable management. But, under a law easily evaded and most laxly administered, less scrupulous and less honorable managers long since discovered that, next to the national bank monopoly, the savings-bank system was the most powerful financial institution of the country, and most easily perverted to purposes of private advantage. It is not to be wondered that the Tammany Ring sought to obtain a share of this power and profit, and that it established savings-bank after savings-bank for the sole purpose of employing the savings of the working-classes in the purchase of those fraudulent and secret issues of city and county bonds, which could not have been offered in the open market without long since exposing the magnitude of their iniquity.

We presume the true version of the differences between M. Catacazy, the Russian minister, and this Government will hardly ever be known; but it seems safe to affirm that he has been guilty of divers indiscretions, and notably of "inspiring" newspapers with attacks on the Administration, and that for this and other reasons the President has asked for his recall, and the Administration press, as in duty bound, has furiously attacked him. The Russian Government was evidently, owing to the approaching visit of the Grand Duke, placed by the affair in an awkward position, and sought, Russian or Continental fashion, to pooh-pooh and gloss over the matter through the semi-official press; but the combined onslaught of our newspapers on M. Catacazy at last drove the Russian Foreign Office into a more explicit statement of its understanding of the case in the Journal de St. Pétersbourg. It appears that M. de Westmann, the minister, was aware of the Catacazy difficulty for some time before calling the Emperor's attention to it, believing it to be a personal matter which would blow over, and, when he did so at last, it was too near the Grand Duke's visit, and the causes of the trouble were too obscure, to take any immediate action on it. His stay till the Grand Duke's visit was over was therefore arranged, but without any mention of "toleration," and then, the mere fact that he is personally disagreeable to the President will be sufficient, according to diplomatic usage, to ensure his recall, without going into disagreeable details.

In the meantime the Grand Duke has arrived, after a tedious and stormy voyage, and at this writing is being received by the committee of citizens, which, in curious illustration of the condition of our City Government, now always takes the place of the city authorities in welcoming distinguished strangers. The last occasion on which the city politicians were allowed to "extend hospitalities" and "tender" things to unfortunate foreigners was the visit of the Japanese, who, being heathen, were given up to them without remorse; but it was a barbarous and inhuman proceeding, unworthy of a Christian community. The Grand Duke is apparently a modest, sensible young gentleman, who is laboriously engaged in learning and discharging the duties of an honorable profession, and is entitled, as the son of the reigning house of a country which has been uniformly friendly to the United States, to a very cordial greeting, which he will certainly get. We will not add anything to the warnings which some of our daily contemporaries have addressed to his hosts on the subject of good taste, and the general restraining of enthusiasm and other noble emotions; but we may, perhaps, be allowed to fortify what the New York Tribune has said in the nature of a hint to the ladies—that Europeans are somewhat puzzled by great eagerness on the part of young women to see and talk to young men of whatever rank, and that it is the custom of the regions from which the Grand Duke comes, and of the circles in which he has lived, for the gentlemen to call upon or approach even such ladies as desire to make their acquaintance, and not vice versâ, as a Congressman might say. In short, the spectacle of a young man, surrounded by a bevy of girls or women gazing blandly at him and eager for his notice, is to the denizens of the effete despotisms of the Old World at least novel.

We have received from a very respectable source in San Francisco a strange story about the dealings of a company, known as the "Alaska Commercial Company," with the inhabitants of the Island of St. George, in the Arctic Sea, which came to us as an appendage of Alaska. The Alaska Commercial Company is a Californian concern, which purchased the stock and fixtures of a Russian Company, broken up by the cession to the United States, and has obtained a lease of the islands of St. George and St. Paul, for the exercise of the exclusive privilege of killing the seals which frequent them, and dealing in the fur and oil. The terms of the contract bound it to furnish the native inhabitants of the islands whom it found there with clothing and medicine, and the means of educational and religious improvement. The inhabitants, however, now say that the company has violated all the stipulations made for their benefit; that the lease of the island on which they live has virtually sentenced them to a kind of imprisonment; and that the company has reduced them to a kind of slavery or peonage, by getting them heavily into debt for supplies furnished to them, of which it retains a monopoly, and by refusing to pay them more than forty cents a skin for their fur, which gives them only about fifty cents a day for their labor—and, of course, they have no other market for their wares—thus leaving them dependents and paupers. They add that the employees of the company also "often beat and violently assault them"; and, as the company has a monopoly of the fur trade, they select and pay for only the best skins, throwing the rest into the sea—the loss falling on the laborers. These statements were, the islanders say, embodied in a petition in 1869, which they tried to send to Washington, but it never reached its destination. They tried again, by giving another copy to a United States official in 1871, but they never could find out what he did with it. They then tried to get it published in the San Francisco papers, but only succeeded with regard to one, which, two days after, apologized for printing it, having in the interval been seen by the officers of the company, whom it handsomely eulogized. We offer no opinion as to the truth of the charges, but they certainly furnish ground for prompt and searching enquiry when Congress meets. Some member, we trust, will take the matter up, even if the California members do not. This enquiry is all the more necessary, because the impropriety of committing to a commercial company by lease the material and moral welfare of a population, such as that Russia handed over to us in Alaska, is plain on its face.

The South Carolina bonds have sunk to 26, and Governor Scott now announces calmly that he believes our old friend, Niles G. Parker, the State Treasurer, has been guilty of fraudulent issues; while Niles and his friends say that the Governor and his friends have been telling lies about the State debt, and making it appear smaller than it really was, for political purposes. In the meantime the treasury is completely empty; the taxpayers of the State are calling loudly for repudiation, and nobody doubts that the Ring has committed, either in New York or Charleston, or both, enormous frauds. We predicted repudiation more than a year ago as the likely result of the operations of the disreputable band who constituted the State government, but we sincerely trust that the decent people of South Carolina will now find some other way out of their difficulty, for repudiation is a process which, once begun, rarely stops short at debts fraudulently contracted. In the meantime, we once more call attention to the fact that the majority in Congress and the Administration have no remedy to offer for this deplorable state of things, except the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and cavalry and artillery, and the Administration organs still ask us to believe that, if we only "proclaim" counties enough, and send down troops enough, and let Scott and Parker go on stealing quietly and securely, all will eventually be well.

Stocks are generally higher, Government bonds very firm, foreign exchange higher, and gold unaccountably weak, money easy, business dull, and all prudent men cautious. In trade, the week has been moderately satisfactory, and a more encouraging tone prevails. Breadstuffs are higher under continued heavy exports, meats somewhat better, but still very low and depressed. Cotton is coming forward pretty well, though still considerably behind last year. In spite of the diminished receipts, stocks on this side are larger, owing to the slowness of the export movement, the English and Continental spinners holding large stocks, and the India crop being decidedly greater than of late years. Still, prices are firm, and have advanced a little, but much of the firmness seems to be speculative. Country trade is quiet and fair, and merchants are recovering from their fears. There is again trouble brewing in the coal regions. The men of one of the largest companies in the Lehigh and Wyoming valleys have struck, owing to alleged irregularity in the receipt of their pay. Some smaller collieries have suspended work, and the mine-owners are not prospering just now, although the consumer receives but little benefit from the decline in the wholesale price. Real estate is dull and weak.

Affairs in Spain have culminated in a new ministerial crisis. In the sitting of the Cortes on Friday last, the Zorilla wing of the Radicals brought forward their proposition of want of confidence in the Malcampo Cabinet, based mainly on asserted infringements of the rights of association in dealing with the Internationals. This was met by a counter-motion, submitted by Señor Ochoa, for the suppression of all restrictions on religious societies, and notably of those imposed by the late Provisional Government, of which Señor Zorilla himself was a member. Pending the discussion, which was violent and protracted beyond measure, a proposition was offered to declare the sitting permanent, and adopted by a considerable majority, in spite of the Cabinet staking its existence on its rejection. Admiral Malcampo, the Minister President, thereupon immediately prorogued the Cortes by royal decree, and tendered his resignation to the king, who, however, seems to hesitate in accepting it. The crisis is accompanied by immense excitement throughout the country, and the Internationals are busy fanning the flames; but the Republican members of the Cortes have issued a circular urging the maintenance of order. The Cable fails to inform us by whose defection the defeat of the Malcampo Cabinet has been brought about. To judge by previous despatches, it is more likely to have resulted from a factious coalition between Republicans and Zorilla men on one side, and Carlists and Alfonsinos on the other, than from a sudden desertion from the Government side of a large number of Sagasta's partisans.

The Spanish ministry which has just gone out of office disgraced itself towards the close of its term by a proposal, on the part of M. Augulo, the Minister of Finance, to strike the dividends of foreign creditors of the Government with a tax of eighteen per cent. An attempt was made to soften the scheme by attaching to it the ridiculous condition that ten per cent. only of the tax should pass to the treasury, the other eight per cent. to form a "sinking fund" for the benefit of the creditor; but the term "Sinking Fund" appears to have impressed the creditors very much as the term "Board of Apportionment," applied to the Ring, affected the inhabitants of this city. The "Sinking Fund" would, of course, be treated with no more respect than the original debt. What aggravated the case was, that the prospectus under which the last loan was contracted expressly declared that the bonds should be free from Spanish taxes. The Spanish bondholders in London held an indignation meeting as soon as they heard of the proposal, and protested strongly against the tax as "a flagrant breach of faith," "destructive of the credit of Spain," and "injurious to the true interests of her people," and they provided for the appointment of a committee to consider the expediency, in the event of the tax being imposed, of issuing certificates to holders of Spanish bonds protesting against and claiming indemnification for deductions made from the full amount of the coupons, and of taking measures to prevent the admission of any new Spanish securities to the London Stock Exchange, and all other public exchanges. The Cortes has not, thus far, acted on the proposal, and, owing to the fall of the ministry, probably will not; but the mere fact that Spanish financiers think of such plans in moments of perplexity must seriously injure Spanish credit, because it revives in full force the old distrust which for so many years kept Spain out of all European money markets. It will, however, serve one good purpose, in increasing the unwillingness of small investors to lend money to foreign governments. Nothing can well be more unsafe, as the experience of every day shows. Austria has done within the last five years what Spain has been proposing to do. Italy came near doing it; and, if the Democrats and Butlerites had had their way, we should have done it ourselves, and it is the readiness with which, for the last fifty years, governments have procured loans from foreigners that deprives such schemes of the terror which they should really possess.

The Kellersperg Cabinet proceeds, apparently without hesitation, on the path chosen for its action when it assumed the reins of government in Cisleithan Austria. The Diet of Bohemia having most emphatically reiterated its determination not to elect delegates to the Reichsrath of Vienna, a decree has been issued ordering direct elections by the people instead of the regular ones by the provincial assembly. This cannot fail to produce increased agitation in that province—if, in fact, the political excitement there can run higher than it has been running for some time without degenerating into armed conflicts, for plunging into which the Czechs can, however, find but little encouragement in the present juncture of European affairs. The demonstrations made in Prague on the return of Dr. Rieger, the popular advocate of the Czechs' claims, from Vienna, on the breaking off of the negotiations with the Government and the fall of the Hohenwart Ministry, were tumultuous enough, but the intervention of the police alone was sufficient to check them. The rage of the Czechs was then chiefly directed against Count Andrássy, to whose advice, and the Hungarians in general, they attributed the Emperor's final resolution; and an internal crusade against the latter, by means of Slavic agitation in the Transleithan division of the empire, was preached in the Pokrok and other journals of Prague—the assailants of the Magyars forgetting that a violent agitation of the same character which was charged to themselves had preceded, and probably determined, Andrássy's meddling in Cisleithan affairs, and that his course was far from being generally approved by his countrymen. The elections ordered in Bohemia will probably result in a comparatively small number of German successes in various portions of the country, and in the return by the Czech districts of Nationalists who will refuse to take their seats in the Reichsrath, which will thus hardly escape the reproach of being but a rump parliament.

THE POLITICAL PROSPECT.

THE precise meaning of the Republican triumphs all over the country at the late elections, and especially in this State, is, naturally, a subject which is interesting the political world a good deal, and giving rise to a good deal of discussion and speculation. Ordinarily, a victory of the party in power, the year preceding the Presidential nomination, is taken to be an endorsement of the administration, and it is not surprising that the present Administration should put this construction on the late Republican successes. The President, who has for a good while made no secret of his desire and expectation of renomination, and the whole army of office-holders, who desire and expect it at least as much as he, are, therefore, just now, in very high spirits, and look forward to the Republican Convention not only without misgiving, but with joyous anticipation, and it must be admitted they have, during the last year, played their part with considerable skill. The unfortunate effect which appointments like Murphy's and Forney's were producing on the public mind has been very properly and judiciously met by the organization of a commission for the reform of the civil service, so that anybody who complains of the way in which the New York or Philadelphia Custom-house is managed can be promptly disarmed with the reply that rules are now being framed at Washington which, when carried into effect, will render such appointments impossible or innocuous. The debt has been undergoing steady reduction by means of the surplus which the prodigious growth of the country in wealth and population places every year at the disposal of the Government, and the conversion of a portion of it at par at a lower rate of interest has been apparently made by the device of giving interest-bearing bonds to an association of bankers three months before they are called on to pay for them. The civil service, in some departments, has really been improved, and the appointments made in execution of the Treaty of Washington have been admirable, and, although the defalcations in various branches have been numerous and large, they have been readily put out of sight by the tremendous frauds of Tammany, which, of course, are set down to the Democratic party.

The state of things at the South, which cannot well be worse, and which almost seems to threaten a dissolution of society, owing to the deep and unblushing corruption and rascality of the class which has there got into power, and the responsibility of which, under ordinary circumstances, would naturally fall on the Republican party, is, by an extraordinary piece of luck, covered up by the Ku-klux outrages, which there is no denying, and which—such is human nature everywhere—many people are just as ready to rely on the bayonet to cure here in America as they would be in France or Russia. In short, although the evils which are at work in our politics and society are deep-seated and widespread, and though there is a strong and natural expectation on the part of the country that the Republican party should deal with them radically, circumstances are such that the party is enabled to refrain from any active treatment of them while keeping up a show of activity, and that the diseases may prey on the body politic a year or two longer without producing any startling crisis. Behind all these favorable influences, too, there is a body of officials such as no party in a constitutional country has ever been served by, and such as no government, except that of Imperial France, has ever brought into play to influence an election. Probably nothing more skilful in the way of managing such a body was ever seen than the removal of Murphy. His character and antecedents were all unfavorable, so he had to be got rid of, but not until he had got the Custom-house force into good working order, and he has been replaced by a gentleman whose character and antecedents are perfectly good, but who may be trusted to lead the force thus prepared along the same path.

These are all favorable indications; but it was clear as soon as the elections were over that their value would greatly depend on the way in which the Democrats took their defeat, and we are bound to say, from present appearances, that their way of taking it seems likely to render it, if not very useful to them, certainly very damaging to the President's prospects. It is quite plain that they are rapidly making up their minds to choose between the "passive policy" of the St. Louis Republican, and the policy—which finds most favor with their New York leaders—of nominating somebody who will, beyond all doubt or question, be strong enough either to draw the votes of a large force of Republican malcontents, or considerably diminish the enthusiasm for Grant. The "passive policy," which a few weeks ago seemed very visionary, begins to wear a highly practical look, and it has one important advantage over the plan of nominating a Republican or a moderate Democrat likely to prove acceptable to Republicans, in that it throws on Republicans the responsibility of selecting the person who is to oppose Grant. For there is no doubt that, in the present state of the public mind, anybody, even Charles Sumner, whom the Democrats nominated, and who consented to accept their nomination, would be looked on with distrust. No platform could be drawn up for him that would not seem shaky. On the other hand, there is not, under ordinary circumstances, time now to organize within the Republican ranks alone any serious or effective opposition to the Administration. There is plenty of discontent, but it can hardly be crystallized into a party and a nomination in six or eight months, in the absence of any well-recognized and admired leader to whom people naturally turn. There are half-a-dozen men among whom dissatisfied Republicans might find a very respectable candidate, but there are difficulties and drawbacks about all of them, and an absence of positive preference for any of them, which would make more time than is to be disposed of necessary for the work of selection. In this state of affairs, help from without seems almost necessary to create an opposition movement of any moment, and it is hard to see in what form it can come, except that of Democratic abstention. But if Democratic abstention is to affect the crisis in any way, it must be formally resolved upon and announced at once. If the Democratic leaders go on balancing pros and cons and calculating probabilities till the spring, they may count on four years more of Grant's Administration as a certainty. All the facts which have the most importance are now fully before them. There is not the slightest chance of any reaction in their favor. They have been looking for something of the kind for the last ten years, but, in spite of Republican faults and follies, it is apparently further off than ever. Even the late modifications introduced into the party creed by Mr. Vallandigham, the World, and other wise men have not produced any apparent effect on the public mind. Indeed, if we may judge from the elections, the more they modify, the less favor do they find with the people. Under these circumstances, it seems as if the grand council, or pow-wow, or whatever it is, in which the last sad step is to be taken, might as well be held in December as in May, as far as the effect on Democratic fortunes is concerned, and far better, as far as the effect on Republican fortunes is concerned—that is, Republican fortunes considered from the Democratic standpoint. The Tammany troubles have given the last fatal blow to the old fabric, and those who are most devoted to it acknowledge that it is no longer tenantable; the question of leaving it, therefore, becomes one of detail, and might as well be settled at once.

The most hopeful feature in the condition of the Democratic party, and that which promises most aid to any effort that is made in the Republican ranks to get rid of the office-holding incubus, is the increasing number of Democrats who not only despair of the great object for which the party has for some time existed—the getting back to the status quo ante bellum—but are sincerely desirous of reform in the whole machinery of administration, which is in reality the most crying want of our time. This is more especially manifest among the German Democrats, whose leading organs are all clamoring for a new organization, no matter of what materials made up, which shall offer us a chance of escape from the dull routine of jobbery in which we have been living for the last ten years, and in which no alterations in management made by existing parties seem to work any interruption. It seems as if this element must very speedily find means of coalescing with the corresponding one in the Republican ranks.

MUNICIPAL RESPONSIBILITY.

THE New York Tribune contained, the other day, a suggestion which, though the Tribune only made it lightly, and without appearing to attach any importance to it, has still enough hold on the popular mind to make it worth discussing—viz., that the Mayor, in the proposed new charter, should have to submit his appointments of the subordinate offices of the government to the confirmation of the Common Council, or whatever the legislative body may be called. Now, this would be, it is true, copying the practice of the Federal Government, which Mr. Nordhoff, in his late article in the North American Review, suggested as a desirable model for cities engaged in the reconstruction of their administrative machinery; and it is true that the Federal machine has, on the whole, worked better than most of our State and municipal machines. But we believe a good many thoughtful observers begin to doubt very seriously the value of the practice of dividing the responsibility of appointments between the President and Senate; and he would not be a very rash man who should assert that, if the Constitution were to be framed over again, with the benefit of the experience of the last few years, the burden of selecting his subordinates would be imposed on the President exclusively. One of the remoter, but not least important, results of the triumph of the doctrine that the public offices are the property or "spoils" of the successful party, has been the spread of the notion that an appointment is a gift or favor bestowed on the person who gets it, and does not necessarily bear any relation to his capacity or the public requirements. Out of this there has naturally grown another notion, that he ought to share any good things he gets out of it with the person or persons who procured it for him or bestowed it on him. This obligation, in its earlier and milder form, simply involved a contribution from his salary to the election expenses of the party in power. But of late, and in a coarser and more advanced form, it has required contributions not simply from salaries, but from possible or probable stealings—still, of course, for the benefit of the party. In the hands of Tweed and politicians of the baser sort, however, it reached its final development, in the shape of an obligation to pay a round sum to the particular man who got you the place, and for his own private use and behoof—all pretence of dividing with "the party" being laid aside.

It is easy to see how the system of "Rings" has been built up on these two or three ideas. A "Ring" is, in its common form, a small number of persons who get possession of an administrative machine, and distribute the offices or other good things connected with it among a band of fellows, of greater or less dimensions, who agree to divide with them whatever they make. The art of a great Ring politician like Tweed, therefore, consists mainly in the possession of the same kind of judgment and dexterity which make a good carver. He has to have an accurate and minute knowledge of the tastes, needs, capacities, and peculiarities of the various persons whom it is judicious or necessary to invite to the feast, and then he has to be able so to cut up and disjoint the prey, and distribute the white and dark meat, that nobody shall be disappointed or sent away hungry. Tom Murphy's claims to his late position in the Custom-house were exactly of this sort, and it was his success in applying to the administration of the Custom-house the great rules by which Tweed secured the success of Tammany that gave him his strong hold on Republican politicians in this city; in other words, he could make the Custom-house appointments go further, and satisfy more useful hacks and adventurers, than any other man. If, therefore, anybody went to work to ascertain why it was that any particular person obtained any office of importance in the City Hall, for instance, under the old system, he would have found that more influence than he could well count or understand had contributed to it. Probably the filling of that one office had been made to satisfy the claims of a dozen politicians, or was part, and an important part, of an arrangement—or "slate"—by which hundreds had been appeased. In fact, an attempt to unravel the matter, on the part of a mere outsider, would have been very like an attempt to analyze a highly organized body by a person ignorant of chemistry.

Now, this art, or mystery, of the destructive effects of which on political morality everybody is aware, cannot be rooted out as long as a good many persons have to concur in the bestowal of offices. Everybody who has anything to say about the filling of a place has got into the habit of looking on his consent in the light of what lawyers call an "incorporeal hereditament," like what is known in England as an "advowson," or the right to present a minister to a church living. If he has to be consulted about it, and concur in a particular choice, he expects to be paid for it in some way. Every man in politics has "friends" whom he has "to take care of," and if he allows an office to pass through his hands without either trying to get it for one of them, or trying to make a compromise over it which shall result in one of them getting something else, he becomes guilty of the offence known as "not standing by his friends," than which none is graver. This feeling about offices and contracts has made its way outside political circles, and surrounded even religious, scientific, and philanthropic undertakings with an atmosphere of jobbery. We have known of a case in which the concurrence of all the members of a small committee being necessary to the adoption of an architect's plan for a building for charitable purposes, and one plan presented being unquestionably the best, it was impossible to secure the required concurrence without an agreement that a certain other architect should be employed to "superintend the construction," which he did by simply drawing his salary. In the Federal Government, the selection of office-holders—for the leading places, at least—is nominally and constitutionally in the hands of the President. In practice, it may be said to have passed completely out of his hands, except in the case of members of the Cabinet. The Federal offices in each State are now really in the gift of the senators from that State, and in this usurpation the whole Senate makes common cause—each senator being now bound by a sort of corrupt etiquette to stand by his colleagues in securing the patronage of their respective States. Therefore, nearly every one of the President's appointments is a kind of compromise with somebody in the Senate, and, if a bad one, the public find it impossible to fix the responsibility on anybody in particular. The President can always say, and does often say, that he did the best he could—or, in other words, as well as the Senate would let him—that he would willingly have appointed the upright Jo or the eminent Ben, but "the pressure" on him was so great, and the opposition of Senator Jones so fierce, that he had to give way, and send in the name of the disreputable Bob; it was bad, no doubt, but it is the system which is to blame. Go down to the Senate, and ask the other senators how they came to let Jones have his way, and you are told that the usage is, "in the absence of definite charges," to leave the appointments of a particular State in the hands of its senator, and that in this matter Jones was not to be gainsaid; or, if you approach Jones himself on the subject, you will find that nothing but the selection of Bob, "which was, after all, the President's own work," had saved the party from destruction at the last election. But one thing you will never discover, and that is, the exact man who got Bob the place, and the exact reason for getting it for him.

The application of all this to municipal government is obvious. If the Mayor has the exclusive right of making appointments, it is, perhaps, if he is a politician, useless to expect that in making them he will not be more or less influenced by personal or party considerations. But, at the worst, we shall know by whom the appointment has been made, and whom to hold responsible and punish in case it turns out badly. If the legislative body is admitted to a share in the selection, however, two things are pretty sure to happen. One is the growth of a system of log-rolling and traffic between it and the Mayor—even the best mayor; because no mayor will go on striving for ever after an ideal which he finds is not attainable, and from trying to put the best man in each place he will soon sink into contentment with the least bad, and we shall remain pretty much where we are now. There was doubtless a time when necessity for the concurrence of several persons in an appointment constituted a check, as there was a time when the representation of both parties on a board, like our old Board of Supervisors here, prevented jobbery; but that time has long passed away. If you put anybody up to check anybody else now in the matter of office-holding or voting money, the first thing he thinks of is the arrangement of the basis of a trade of some kind with the man he is set to watch, evidently considering his own position a franchise. The most striking illustration of this, in recent times, was the arrangement by which the Republicans consented to the passage of the Tweed charter. The debates and discussions on that instrument, while it was before the Legislature, were not about its merits, but about the concessions in the shape of offices Tweed could be induced to make in order to get it through. He, of course, paid plenty of money for votes—$600,000 in all, it is said—but this was privately. In public, the opposition fought simply for a proper share of the "spoils," and, having secured them, turned to the country with the complacent smile of men who had done their duty, and expected applause. It will take some years, as we recently said, to get rid of this way of looking at the public service, but, in the meantime, let us have no countenance given to it in the new charter. What the inhabitants of this city need, of all things, is to know the exact man to go to, and the exact place in which he may be found, who is responsible, without ifs or buts, for anything that is wrong in the municipal administration—bad pavement, bad police, bad lighting, bad draining. He ought not to be responsible for the amount of the taxes, or for the purposes to which they are to be applied; that should be the business—and the chief, if not the sole business—of the Common Council. But for the way in which every executive officer, from the comptroller down to the scavenger, does his work, he, and he only, should have to answer, and the law should be so clear that the commonest laborer should be able to take the charter in hand, and confound him if he tried to evade his accountability.

WHO KILLED THE RING?

THERE is a controversy going on between the Tribune and the Times which it is impossible to avoid calling discreditable to both parties, over the question who is entitled to most of the credit of bringing about the late victory at the polls, and the dissolution of the Ring. We do not know, and we have not yet met anybody who does know, what good interest is served by the prolongation of such a discussion, particularly as it has, of late, as is usual in such cases, run into common abuse, and the mutual imputation of the lowest motives to both papers for doing what they have done in the work of reform. We know of no person, too, who can possibly derive any advantage from the Tribune's suggestion that the Times charged the Mayor with being "a thief" out of sheer malice and love of mischief, except one, whom we will not designate more particularly than by saying that his name is Abraham, and that he is not a person whose mind any good citizen should just now wish to see eased. The public has hitherto, and with a near approach to unanimity, awarded to the Times the principal share in the work of bringing the Ring to destruction, and we take leave to say that this is one of the subjects on which the public is not likely to be mistaken. It is public indignation which, after all, has killed the Ring, and the public is made up of individuals, and each individual knows pretty well, at any great crisis, what agency has had the largest part in rousing him into activity.

It is quite true that, without the revelations of Mr. James O'Brien, the Times would probably have achieved little of its present glory, and it is true, also, that Mr. James O'Brien is not a whit better than Tweed and Connolly, was an old confederate of theirs, and was really actuated in making his revelations by a desire to avenge himself on the Ring for not giving him the full amount of a fraudulent claim on the city. But we really do not see how this can diminish the Times' moral claim to popular gratitude. The fact is, that the Times began nearly a year before there was any prospect of its receiving such revelations to indulge in denunciations of the Ring, and make accusations against its members, which attracted public attention strongly, and prepared the public mind to be greatly stirred up by the revelations when made, and which, let us add, led O'Brien to go to the Times with his proofs. It did this, too, in the teeth of considerable opposition, and in the teeth of a strong and widespread disposition on the part of persons of wealth and influence in this city to pooh-pooh its accusations, and to confide in Tweed and Connolly as persons who, with all their faults, and in spite, perhaps, of past stealings, were then disposed to administer the municipality honestly and fairly. This was a most alarming condition of the public mind, and it can hardly be denied that the Times was the paper which fought against it most strenuously, and which did most to arrest the tendency to a false security; and it did arrest it, and did arouse suspicion, before O'Brien peached, by its persistence in rebuking Connolly's refusal to publish his accounts, and by challenging him to show his books, and by exposing the nefarious character of the attempt to whitewash him, made by the committee of merchants and bankers whom he asked—the sly dog—to inspect his management of his "sinking fund."

We confess we did not always admire the way the Times did this work. It was not our ideal; but we should no more think of seriously condemning it for its mode, than of correcting an artilleryman for the use of bad language when working his gun under a rain of shells. In desperate crises—and we now know this crisis was desperate—manners become a matter of small moment. What the motives of the Times were we neither know nor care, and we advise the public not to care either. Possibly it wanted to increase its circulation, but we hope this has not yet become a good reason for refusing to praise a paper which does hard work in an honest cause. The Tribune has risen to wealth and fame and influence on its opposition to slavery; but whether the desire for wealth and fame and influence was its principal or only motive in assailing slavery, would be a foolish and useless enquiry. Nobody who knows anything of human nature or has ever examined his own springs of action, will bother himself with such questions. We know little, and never can know much, about people's motives. It is their conduct which concerns us, and it is about their conduct, and not the possible or probable thoughts of their hearts, that we should busy ourselves. That the Times was pure, in the only way in which we need to know that a paper is pure, is, we believe, well established by the fact that long before O'Brien's revelations considerable pecuniary inducements were offered both to editor and proprietors to desist from their assaults on Tammany. That such offers would have been rejected with equal scorn in the Tribune office under similar circumstances we do not doubt; but, in the name of all that is rational, what would the world come to if we were prevented from praising a man for a noble act by the consideration that somebody else in like case would have acted in the same way?

As to the value of the accident of O'Brien's treachery in building up the Times' reputation, it is hardly worth consideration in weighing the paper's merits, because, to recur to our former illustration, it might be said that it was the accident of the Southern declaration of war which fairly established the Tribune's reputation on a firm basis, and gave it the full credit of effecting the change in public sentiment at the North which led to the abolition of slavery. Nobody doubts, of course, that had O'Brien carried his figures to the Tribune office, he would have been well paid for them, and they would have been gladly published; and the Times sensibly weakens its claims, if not on the popular gratitude, certainly on the popular respect, by meeting those who seek to belittle it by charges of "whitewashing" and complicity with Tammany. Is it not in the highest degree absurd, on any sane view of the facts, to suppose that the conductors of the Tribune have really been trying to save Connolly or Hall or Sweeny or anybody else, or would not have pursued the whole gang with as much determination as the Times, had they been furnished with the same weapons the Times possessed? There has been, as it seems to us, some queer writing in the Tribune about Sweeny's "lofty aims," and some very simple-minded doubting about Hall's guilt, and there has been a great deal of not very creditable carping at the Times; but, then, if every time any of us behaved foolishly his neighbors set him down for an arrant knave, what would become of our reputations, or where should we all be? We do not believe that anything that either paper has said of the other has had or will have the smallest effect in diminishing its reputation for honesty, but we are quite sure that their course toward each other has seriously diminished popular respect for the press, and confidence in it as an agent of reform, and certainly has not raised the profession of journalism either in influence or dignity.

As regards the proper distribution of the credit of overthrowing Tammany, we think the Tribune divided it pretty fairly—the Times' claim apart—the other day, when it gave to Mr. Ottendorfer of the Staats-Zeitung, to Harper's Weekly and Mr. Nast, a large share of it. Mr. Ottendorfer's declaration of war on Tammany was, as we observed at the time, the most important incident in it, after the publication of the accounts, and indeed may be called the turning-point in the struggle. We have never doubted the enormous importance of German co-operation in the work of reform in this city; and the firm determination of the native Republican saints, in their horror of lager-bier, not to seek it, would always have been comical if the results of their obstinacy had not been so serious. There are worse sins than lager-bier drinking, both for the citizen and state, as Boss Tweed will tell us, and we advise the body of godly, sober-minded, chaste, and devout men who manage the Republican politics of this State to get over their repugnance to it if they can. To Mr. Nast it is hardly possible to award too much praise. He has carried political illustrations during the last six months to a pitch of excellence never before attained in this country, and has secured for them an influence on opinion such as they never came near having in any country. It is right to say that he brought the rascalities of the Ring home to hundreds of thousands who never would have looked at the figures and printed denunciations, and he did it all without ever being for one moment weak, or paltry, or vulgar, which is saying much for a man from whose pencil caricatures were teeming every week for so long. There has been, in short, only one thing in this struggle to which any citizen of New York can look back with shame or regret, and that is, that through it all the two leading journals of the State should have been fighting on opposite sides, under the private banners of two such sorry leaders as the two State Senators, and should have nearly every day to suspend the warfare on Tammany to give Fenton "a dig" or expose Conkling.

Correspondence.

THE MORMONS vs. THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The writer was in Salt Lake City during the time of the so-called "persecution of the Mormons by the United States Federal officers," and was in a situation to know the sentiments of the best men on both sides, as well as to hear the on dit of the Gentile public. You will, therefore, permit him to say that there is no truth in the assertion of certain newspaper correspondents that the attempt to enforce the laws by the Federal courts is a persecution, except in the same sense that the New York Ring have been "persecuted" by Judge Barnard. Every evil-doer feels himself "persecuted" when he finds the grip of the law upon his person, and that there are many such evil-doers in Utah who have too long gone unwhipped of justice is too notorious to need illustration. It is therefore with great regret that the writer read your notice of the Federal Court and its decisions in the Nation of last week. If you had been behind the scenes and knew how completely perverted are the views of the "correspondents" above alluded to, the tone of your article would have been quite different.

Mr. Townsend's allegation that Judge McKean "has also been unfortunate enough to compromise his reputation by mining speculations which have come before his court, and received influential consideration there," has no foundation in fact which at all justifies so slanderous an assertion. The truth, and all the truth, which has given any color of plausibility to this statement is simply this: Some miner located "a claim" in East Cañon on the Onquirrh range last summer, and as the local mining law limits the amount of each individual to two hundred feet and the whole amount may go even to three thousand feet, it is essential to insert in the original "notice" and its record the names of as many persons as may be requisite to divide the whole number of feet by two hundred. It was in this way that the name of James B. McKean got upon the record of the Mining Recorder's Office in Ophir District without any privity of the Judge, nor was it known to him for several months that such use had been made of his name. If you or any fair-minded man can see in this circumstance anything to "compromise his reputation by mining speculations," then Judge McKean is so compromised. This trivial circumstance was brought to the notice of President Grant last summer at a time when an effort was made to remove Judge McKean because he stood in the way of certain speculators who desired to wrest a valuable mining property (not that in which Judge McKean was an unconscious owner) from its rightful owners, and those who thus sought to compromise Judge McKean in the mind of the President met the rebuke and discomfiture which their unworthy conduct merited. Being solicited at that time to sell his interest in the mining claim first named by one who knew its value, he very properly said, "No! not while my innocent possession of this right is sought to be used to my injury, lest it be said I have acted under the constraint of intimidation." So much for the unworthy imputation against Judge McKean of having damaged his reputation by mining speculations.

That his behavior on the bench "has been despotic and extra-judicial to the last degree," is an assertion which no candid man can make who will take the pains to read the Opinions of the Chief-Justice in those cases out of which the defenders of Mormonism and their apologists have sought to sustain this broad and damaging charge.

These opinions are: 1st. Demurrer to Challenge to the Array of Grand Jurors.—The decision in this case, setting aside the challenge and sustaining the demurrer, gave great offence to the Mormons, who thought to foist upon the court a Territorial law, by virtue of which an officer known as the Territorial Marshal is required to summon a jury, while by Act of Congress establishing the Territory it is made the duty of the U. S. Marshal to summon the grand jury. In this conflict of laws the Judge was compelled to sustain the Federal Government, as in duty bound, and rightly ruled that "there is but one sovereignty in Utah, and that is the sovereignty of the United States." That this ruling should be especially distasteful to the followers of Brigham Young is very natural, as they are by their endowment oaths sworn to know no authority but his. Is it hard to raise the cry of persecution on such grounds as this, or to stigmatize the Federal courts as "members of the Anti-Mormon Ring"? Certainly not; but it is hard to understand how loyal men can lend themselves to the disgusting work of sustaining a polygamic theocracy in their efforts to defy the laws of the United States.

2d. Quo-Warranto against Territorial Attorney-General.—In this case also there was a direct conflict between the U. S. Attorney for the Territory of Utah, Mr. Chas. H. Hempstead, and Mr. Zerubbabel Snow, the defendant, who claimed to exercise the functions of Attorney-General in virtue of his appointment to that office by joint vote of both branches of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory in 1869. To this claim of Snow, the plaintiff Hempstead demurred, and the court was requested to consider the question of its jurisdiction, both plaintiff and defendant appearing in person each for himself. After a full citation of authorities bearing upon the case, and a discussion of the principles involved therein, all going to show the essential incompatibility and absurdity of the coexistence of two incumbents of the same office, his Honor rules that "the conclusion is irresistible that, in electing an 'attorney-general' to prosecute causes in this court, the Assembly did an act inconsistent with the provisions of the Act to organize this Territory. The attorney provided for by the Organic Act has been appointed by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate, has been commissioned, has qualified, is now present in court, and, in the name of the United States, demands to be permitted to exercise all the functions of his office." Of course the demurrer was sustained, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff, whereupon the Star and its sympathizing Gentile friends proclaim "the despotic and extra-judicial conduct" of the court as "a crusade against Mormonism." And the Nation even is betrayed into considering Judge McKean as one of the "instruments" of the Lord "that an honest man could not touch with a forty-foot pole."

3d. But far more intimately do the opinions of Judge McKean concern the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints" in the matter of the application of certain Mormons for naturalization before the Third District Court of Utah Territory, McKean, C.J., which applications were rejected by the court on the ground that, in the case of Sandberg, a Swede, and Horseley, an Englishman, the first "satisfied" the court that he is not, and the second failed to "satisfy" the court that he is, "a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well-disposed to the good order and happiness of the same." In answer to the direct demand of the court, "to whose satisfaction" it must appear that the applicants for naturalization "are men of good moral character, attached to the Constitution of the United States, etc., etc.," Sandberg answered in substance that he regarded it as in accordance with the laws of God for a man to have more than one wife at the same time; and that if the laws of the country forbade it, he regarded it as his duty to obey the laws of God rather than the laws of man. Horseley refused to answer, and, by his manner as well as by his words, said, in substance, that it was his own business, and not the business of the court. Judge McKean rightly judged that no man, or set of men, entertaining such views could honestly swear to support the Constitution and laws of the United States, one of which specially provides that any person having two or more wives at the same time "shall be adjudged guilty of bigamy, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years." The Judge adds: "This court needs not to be informed that many other courts have been very negligent, criminally negligent, in this matter of naturalization. The practice of such courts can form no precedent for this. There are some things of which courts are bound to take judicial notice; and this court takes notice of the fact that it is in session at Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah; and that here there are many men who defiantly trample upon the Act of Congress against polygamy, and call their conduct—liberty; who preach and practise the heinous crime of bigamy, and call it—religion. Surrounded by such influences, guided by such leaders, aliens come into this court, and ask for the high privilege of citizenship. Well, what are their views of American civilization? What do they believe to be the rights and duties of an American citizen? Before they take the oath of citizenship, let the court 'be satisfied' that they understand its full meaning, and recognize its solemn obligations. Let the court 'be satisfied' whether they believe the supreme law of the land to be the Constitution, the laws of Congress, and the treaties of the United States; or whether they believe it to be the revelations of some polygamic prophet. Let the court 'be satisfied' what pretended laws of God they mean to obey, and what positive laws of man they mean to defy. In this country, a man may adopt any religion that he pleases, or reject all religions if he pleases. But no man may violate our laws and plead religion as an excuse; and no alien should be made a citizen who will not promise to obey the laws. Let natives and aliens distinctly understand that in this country license is not liberty, and crime is not religion. . . . . The duty of the court is plain: these applications for naturalization must be rejected."

Mormon sympathizers may call this rhetoric, and it is certainly very unlike the language of certain courts nearer home in matters of naturalization. But honest men will call it good morality, and it certainly is not bad law, however unpalatable it may be to the saints in Utah.

4. In the matter of Douglass and others for naturalization, the applicants admitted that they had plural wives, but claimed that they were in this condition prior to the law of Congress of 1862 against polygamy, and were therefore exempt from its pains and penalties. The Judge's opinion in this case covers several pages, with copious reference to authorities, and shows that, where no special law exists regarding such matters, the laws of the states and countries from whence the emigrants come will prevail, or those of the territory into which they came—said territory, before the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, being part of Mexico, and, as such, under the Roman civil law. He shows that the law of Congress of 1862 denouncing penalties against the crime of bigamy, was in strict harmony with the principles of both the civil and the common law; and he adds, with emphasis, "It is quite time that certain men in this community, who mislead the people, who prate about their loyalty to the Constitution while they denounce every law that opposes their lusts; it is quite time that such men had learned that 'the jurisdiction of a nation within its own territory is exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself.' Let them make up their minds that this nation will enforce in Utah the same laws that are enforced everywhere else in the civilized world. Let those men who have been ignorantly or willingly misled into bigamy make provision for the support of their illegitimate children, and the mothers of those children, and let them cease to cohabit with their concubines. After they shall have done and persisted in such 'works meet for repentance,' there will be time enough for them to apply for American citizenship on the ground that they are men 'of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same.' Whatever the present applicants for naturalization may have supposed in regard to the law prior to 1862, they now know that the law condemns their conduct," etc. Of course the applications were rejected, and all good men will rejoice that a judge has been found with the requisite nerve to tell these law-breakers the wholesome truth that they are a stench in the nostrils of civilized humanity, and are unfit to become American freemen until they are purged of their crimes against decency and law.

5th. Grand Jurors and Polygamy.—This case is one which excited great feeling, and gave the enemies of law occasion to raise the cry of persecution against the Mormons, because three prominent Mormons were challenged off the grand jury which was to decide if certain cases involving the whole matter of polygamy should be referred for trial. Twenty-two men, summoned as grand jurors, answered to the call of the clerk, and were sworn on their voire dire. George Q. Cannon, one of the jurors, in reply to questions addressed to him by Mr. Baskin, United States Attorney, testified that polygamy is one of the fundamental doctrines of the church of which he is a member; that he believes polygamy is a revelation from God to that church; and that he does not believe a man living in polygamy is guilty of adultery. Hiram B. Clawson and James Townsend testified that they agreed with Cannon in all that he had said. Mr. Baskin here stated that he intended to present to the grand jury, under the Utah statute, the case of the People vs. Hawkins, on a charge of adultery growing out of polygamy, and also several cases of bigamy growing out of polygamy. He therefore challenged Cannon, Clawson, and Townsend, as being by their own confessions incompetent to sit on the jury.

It is as well to state, for the better information of those who do not know these persons, that Cannon is the editor of the Deseret News, the official organ of the Mormon Church, and one of the Twelve Apostles. Clawson is the Adjutant-General of the Mormon Militia and Nauvoo Legion. Townsend is the proprietor of the Townsend House. Each has several wives. Two of Clawson's wives are daughters of Brigham Young.

Judge McKean delivered in this case an opinion just such as any honest man, jurist, or layman must have made in a case so clear, but, of course, very distasteful to the Latter-Day Saints. We quote only the closing sentences:

"When the burglar is a fit juror to enquire into the crime of burglary, when the robber is a fit juror to enquire into the crime of larceny, when the assassin is a fit juror to enquire into the crime of murder, then the bigamist, who swears in substance that crimes are his religion, may be a fit juror to enquire into the crimes of bigamy and adultery. But, thanks to centuries of Christian civilization, that time is not now, and, judging from the steady progress of the human race, that time will never come."

Are you prepared to say that this decision is "despotic or extra-judicial"? Even the Mormons themselves acknowledged that the ruling was just.

6th. But the opinion of Judge McKean which has excited the loudest complaints, and has been most violently attacked by the Mormon leaders both in their organs and in the Tabernacle, was reviewed under the head of "One Indictment for Many Crimes," being in the case of the People vs. Brigham Young, senior, for lewd and lascivious association and cohabitation with sixteen women, not being married to them. The indictment is under the statute of Utah of 1852 ("Laws of Utah," p. 53, § 32). Waiving for the present any discussion of your position that it was a legal anachronism to try this case upon the Utah statute, on which, perhaps, the writer is prepared at a proper time to break a lance with you, he would only add at present that the chief cause of offence against the Judge in this case rested on the language which follows: "The Supreme Court of California has well said: 'Courts are bound to take notice of the country where they judicially rule.' It is, therefore, proper to say, that while the case at the bar is called 'The People vs. Brigham Young,' its other and real title is 'Federal Authority vs. Polygamic Theocracy.' The Government of the United States, founded upon a written Constitution, finds within its jurisdiction another government, claiming to come from God —imperium in imperio—whose policy and practice are, in grave particulars, at variance with its own. The one government arrests the other in the person of its chief, and arraigns it at this bar. A system is on trial in the person of Brigham Young. Let all concerned keep this fact steadily in view, and let that government rule without a rival which shall prove to be in the right. If the learned counsel for the defendant will adduce authorities or principles from the whole range of jurisprudence, or from mental, moral, or social science, proving that the polygamic practices charged in the indictment are not crimes, this court will at once quash this indictment and charge the Grand Jury to find no more of the kind."

Subsequently, as is well known, B. Young secretly and in the night left Salt Lake City, as it is believed to avoid arrest and incarceration at Camp Douglass under several indictments for murder; while Mayor Wells and others were held for trial on similar charges. And the opinion is common in Salt Lake that Young will never return. Certainly, his sudden exodus under such circumstances has an ugly look for his innocence. But we will not now enter upon this prolific subject. The almost absolute and despotic power of the great Mormon leader is broken, and his system has received, at the hands of Judge McKean, such a shock in the simple course of legal proceedings that it will surely disintegrate. But it is only fair to remember that the charge of persecution of the Mormons is one which has no foundation in fact, as against the military or Federal authorities in Utah. If fearless and rigorous prosecutions of crimes against Federal and common law are persecutions, then all felons are persecuted where the laws are administered with energy.

The writer has it in his power to enlarge and illustrate his positions if needful; but at present he purposely abstains from any mention of other matters, however interesting or startling they may be, having already taxed the patience of your readers perhaps too far. OBSERVER.

NOVEMBER 11, 1871.

[We publish the above simply as an act of fairness, and not because we believe it to be a judicious defence of Judge McKean. If it be proper and politic to put down Mormon polygamy by penal legislation, the judges of the Federal courts are not proper persons to preach from the bench against Mormon practices and probity. No judge can do this, or ever has done anything like it, with any other result than bringing justice into contempt. His business is to administer the law as he finds it, under ordinary rules of interpretation, and not to wrest it or enlarge it, or color his expositions of it, for the general promotion of morality and virtue. We have had too much of this already. Judge Underwood, of Virginia, is a flagrant example of the mischief of it. Most of the passages quoted above from Judge McKean's charge we look on as a low order of stump speaking. We have no space this week to say more about them.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

MR. KENNAN'S "Tent-Life in Siberia" has had the deserved compliment paid it of being translated into Russian.——Mr. Robert Dale Owen's promised work, "The Debatable Land between this World and the Next, with Illustrative Narrations," is to be published shortly in this country by G. W. Carleton & Co.——Every Saturday, it is announced, will cease, on and after January 1, 1872, to be an illustrated newspaper, but "its publication will be continued in the original character in which, during a period of four years (1866–69), it gained the highest favor from many thousands of intelligent and thoughtful readers throughout the country." Whether it will also resume its handy form is not stated. George Eliot's novel, "Middlemarch," passes over by arrangement to Messrs. Harper & Bros. and their Weekly.—— A novel by Jean Ingelow, "Off the Skillings," has been secured for serial publication by Hearth and Home.

—The Rev. Dr. J. P. Thompson, who has been for the last twenty-five years minister of the principal Congregational Church in this city, sails for Europe this week, to be gone an indefinite period, having been compelled to resign his charge through ill-health, brought on by over-exertion during the war. He has been from the first a valued contributor to the Nation, and his learning in certain fields, and particularly Egyptology, is so marked, that we should regret his departure as deeply as his congregation and his private friends, if it were not his intention to devote himself more closely than ever to his private studies while abroad, and if we did not hope still to benefit by his labors. But his loss to this city will be serious and long felt, for he had, in a peculiar degree for a clergyman, a strongly developed political sense, took a keen interest in public affairs, and brought to the service of every good cause a manly and vigorous eloquence. Among all the eulogies, and epitaphs, and lamentations within our knowledge called forth, either in speech or writing, by President Lincoln's death, we remember nothing so effective and so stirring as the few words of impassioned tribute paid to his memory by Dr. Thompson, at the Union League Club, on the evening of the day on which the news arrived. His retirement has been sudden and unexpected, and his congregation marked their sense of their own bereavement in the only way left them, by promptly presenting him with over $50,000.

—The much vexed question of Methodist Church Property in the South is taken up in an exhaustive article in the Methodist Quarterly Review (October), "written," says the editor, "at our request, and, we believe, with candor and intentional truth. If this be questioned, we are ready to publish any able and candid counter-statement which is furnished by any one leading writer of the Church South early enough for our January or April number, in view of the next session of our General Conference." The article is certainly written with great good temper and seeming fairness. But, as it stands, it is a very pretty quarrel, and it will require a great deal of patience, mental forbearance, and throwing away of prejudice, to bring about a settlement. The writer in the Quarterly divides all the church property cases in the South into four classes, and considers each of them separately. These are, the Military Cases, the Colored Cases, the Holston Conference Cases, and the Virginia Cases. The Military Cases are those in which the churches were seized as a military measure by the United States Government, because they were being turned, by fanatical Southern preachers, into recruiting camps for the Confederate army. They were not shut up, but were turned over to loyal ministers, presumably from the North, and were held by them until an order came from the Government to restore them. The Methodist Church South now blames the Northern Methodists for having occupied these churches, but, as they have been restored to its control, we do not see why the Southern Methodists should nurse their anger. The Colored Cases are those in which the negroes claim the ownership of the churches which they built with their own means and labor for their own use, but which—since, before the war, colored congregations composed of slaves could not hold property in their own right—were deeded to white trustees, who were to hold the legal title to the property for the benefit of those worshipping in them. After the war was over, efforts were made by the negroes, or by those friendly to them, to have the control of their own property put into their own hands. In Louisiana, an order was issued (November 18, 1865) from Military Headquarters in New Orleans which turned over to white rebels the churches which the military authorities had seized and taken from them, and reserved to all colored congregations the church property then in their possession. And in Special Order No. 32, issued February 6, 1866, the complete control of the church property in their possession was given to the members of the colored congregations in the department of Louisiana. According to the writer in the Quarterly, this order, so far as it relates to the three colored congregations worshipping in Winans Chapel, Wesley Chapel, and Soule (Soulé ?) Chapel, New Orleans, has never been obeyed. "When our church," he says, "was ordered to surrender and restore property, we did so promptly. . . . Why did not they obey ? Was it because those colored societies had connected themselves with the Methodist Episcopal Church ? . . . We are informed that several similar cases exist in Kentucky, and that the colored people are distinctly told that if they will unite with the Southern Methodists, or even with the African Methodist Episcopal Church, their property shall be transferred to them ; but that if they connect themselves with the Methodist Episcopal Church, it shall not be transferred."

—The Holston Conference Cases and the Virginia Cases are those which give the most serious trouble, and which will be found most difficult of adjustment. The Holston Conference Cases are those which result from ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at the request of the congregations deserted by their own ministers, coming down and occupying the pulpits, and uniting with the majority of the congregation to hold the church property as against any claims made upon them by the former ministers backed by the unsatisfied minority. These cases occurred chiefly in the Holston Conference, which would appear to be situated in Tennessee. The writer directly charges this newly aroused determination to get the churches back into Southern hands to the reviving spirit of the scotched, but not killed, rebellion. But, would it not be a wise and practicable solution of the affair to abandon the disputed churches, and for the rich Methodist Church at the North to build new ones for its own use if it insists on considering the South as a missionary field ? The ill-feeling engendered by disputes of this kind is very hard to get rid of, and the only sure way is to abandon the disputed property to those who claim, with much show of reason, to be its original owners. The Virginia Cases had their origin in the division of sentiment in the States of Virginia and Maryland as to the rightfulness or wrongfulness of secession. "In 1861, some of the ministers of the Virginia Conference withdrew and finally joined the Methodist Church South, and during the war some of the churches and parsonages belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church were seized both in Maryland and Virginia by the Methodist Episcopal Church South. There is said to be more of this church property seized by them, and retained to this day in the possession of the Church South, than they claim that our people hold of their property in East Tennessee. Some of these houses of worship which they do not use, it is said, they nail up, and refuse to let the lawful owners, members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, occupy them for religious worship." Candid as the writer of this article seems sincerely bent on being, it is yet evident that there is much to be said on the other side, and we trust for the sake of truth that the Southern Methodists will put forward their best man to answer it.

—The etchings of M. Jules Jacquemart are pretty well known by reputation here, as well as in Europe, though none of the works in which they are contained are in common circulation in America. This artist is the son of M. Albert Jacquemart, well known as a writer on subjects connected with art and antiquity. One of the first works of the son was to illustrate with the etching-needle the father's "Histoire de Porcelaine," a good book enough, but exquisitely illustrated. Jules Jacquemart has the rarest faculty of portraiture; he can copy a "large lise" painted on a Chinese vase, or a distorted monster lacquered on a Hindoo bottle, and give to each exactly the amount and the kind of incorrectness or of conventional imperfection which marks the original, without exaggerating it or rectifying it. This is prodigiously difficult; or rather, we should say, it is wholly impossible to most artists. M. Jacquemart's etchings from paintings are equally valuable, and equally remarkable in their fidelity to the originals. The character and expression and even the technical peculiarities of each painter are preserved. And this it is that makes it so fortunate that the authorities of our new Museum of Art have been able to engage his services to etch a dozen of their newly purchased paintings. We are glad, also, to have this additional testimony to the value of the pictures owned by the Museum. M. Jacquemart made his own selection, as we happen to know, and he does not choose indifferent works of art as subjects for his handiwork.

—These etchings of M. Jacquemart can be used in several ways, but perhaps the best thing that can be done with them will be to exchange them for engravings, or other reproductions of original works of art in other museums. Several museums in Europe have proposed already such interchange. It is not to be supposed that equal money value is required for equal money value in such bargains as these. Each museum may be supposed to be only too glad to send to its compeer worthy copies of its own worthy works of art, so that any museum with which our New York institution is in correspondence will send photographs, casts, etc., as they are made, and as New York expresses a readiness to receive them. None such will send better things to New York, better in themselves, that is, and as independent works of art, than those that New York can return in these etchings. It remains to be seen whether it will not be rather difficult to keep up the standard.

—About the pictures themselves we shall speak hereafter more in detail, and more critically than is possible here. But it is a proper subject for a "note" that they are of admitted excellence and of high relative value. A long article in the current number of the Revue des Deux Mondes treats of the New York Museum, and describes and criticizes at length the collection in question, which was housed at Brussels when the author of that article saw it. This author is M. Ernest Chesneau—a well-known Parisian writer upon art, whose treatises and critical essays are in the library of every reader and collector of books upon art—private secretary, until late untoward events, of M. le Comte de Nieuwerkerke, Surintendant des Beaux Arts et des Musées Impériales. Whatever may be thought of M. Chesneau as a critic—and in previous numbers of the Nation we have ventured to challenge his claims to a very high position—it is evident that, in the article under consideration, he wrote not so much out of his own matured judgment upon the pictures, as under the influence of the general consent of the best judges. A translation of a part of this article appeared in the Times of last Sunday, and is worth reading.

—Recent and forthcoming English publications embrace a large number of titles and a few good works, of which we judge the following worthy of mention. In biography: Woltmann's "Holbein and his Time," translated by Frances E. Bunnètt; the Duc d'Aumale's "Lives of the Princes of the House of Condé," translated by Rev. R. B. Borthwick; Lamartine's "Twenty-five Years of My Life," translated by Lady Herbert; a second series of the "Letters of Mary Russell Mitford," letters from whom will also be found in the "Memoir and Letters of Charles Boner," edited by R. M. Kettle; "Swift, Flood, Grattan, O'Connell," by W. E. H. Lecky; "Literary Life of Rev. W. Harness," a very readable book, edited by A. G. L'Estrange; and "Voltaire," by John Morley. Tales of travel include W. H. D. Adams's "The Land of the Nile; or, Egypt, Past and Present"; "The Desert of the Exodus—Journeys on Foot in the Wilderness of the Forty Years' Wanderings," by E. H. Palmer, who is also joint author, with Walter Besant, of "Jerusalem, City of Herod and Saladin"; "The Himalayan Districts," by Capt. A. F. P. Harcourt; "The Highlands of Central India—Notes on their Forests, Wild Tribes, Natural History, and Sports," by the late Captain J. Forsyth; "Sketches in Western Australia"; Julius Brenchley's "Jottings during the Cruise of H. M. S. Curaçoa among the South Sea Islands in 1865"; "Queen Charlotte Islands," by Francis Poole; "The Fortunate Isles; or, The Archipelago of the Canaries," from the French of M. Pegot-Ogier; "To San Francisco and Back," by a London Parson; and "Prairie Farms and Prairie Folk," by Parker Gillmore.

—In theology, we have Bishop Colenso's "Pentateuch and Book of Joshua Critically Examined"; Rev. J. J. Goadby's "Bye-Paths of Baptist History"; "Life and Times of Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln"; and Dr. Newman's collection, with original notes, of his "Critical and Historical Essays (1829-1846)," a work undertaken lest it should fall to some one who would not couple the antidote with the bane. In connection with the foregoing may be mentioned "The Bristol Orphan-Houses"; "Educational Places of Amusement in London"; and H. G. Reid's "Past and Present; or, Social and Religious Life in the North." In science: "The Laws of the Winds Prevailing in Western Europe," by W. Clement Lay; a smaller "Star Atlas," by Richard A. Proctor; and "Popular Lectures on Scientific Subjects," by H. Helmholtz. In philology: "A Comparative Grammar of the Modern Aryan Languages of India," by John Beames; "A Grammar of the Language of the Vedas," by Dr. Theodore Benfey; and a second edition of Stratmann's "Dictionary of the Old English Language, compiled from writings of the XIIth, XIIIth, XIVth, and XVth Centuries." The list of illustrated works embraces: "Alpine Plants," described by D. Wooster; "Hogarth's Works," with Charles Lamb's essay; "Choice Pictures by Velasquez," described by G. W. Reid; and "London: a Pilgrimage," by Gustave Doré and Blanchard Jerrold.

—A few miscellaneous works remain to be noted: Sir Edward Creasy's "Imperial and Colonial Constitution of the Britannic Empire"; "Three Centuries of Modern History," by Professor C. D. Yonge; "The Miscellaneous Writings of the late Professor John Conington," including a complete prose translation of Virgil's works; "Uncollected Writings, Essays, and Lectures of Ralph Waldo Emerson"; "The Mansions of Herefordshire and their Memories," with copious tabular pedigrees, etc., by Chas. John Robinson; "Mythical Zoölogy; or, The Legends of Animals," by Prof. A. de Gubernatis; "Metrical Epitaphs, Ancient and Modern," by Rev. John Booth; "Training of Railroads for War in Time of Peace," from the German of Von Weber and Hoffrath; Lady Barker's "Travelling About"; a new poem, "Love is Enough," by William Morris; and "More Nonsense," by Edward Lear.

—We find in the Pall Mall Gazette an explanation by the Comte de Palikao of the famous "diamond necklace" story which so long united his name with that of the Empress in a common scandal. Supposing the Count's explanation to be the true one, we think his world has a right to be surprised that he should have waited so long before publishing it, considering how plain a tale would have put down a swarm of petty liars, and quashed at least one item of the public indictment against a woman whose real faults were serious enough, without the need of inventing new ones. As for the ex-Empress herself, the story leaves her little better off than she was before. That the court of the Second Empire was riotously extravagant, and that Eugénie led the court, was proved already in the time of it, and has gone near to be thought so since it came to grief. The proofs of this extravagance were ostentatiously paraded before the French people, and made the Empire dear to the shop-keeping gentry of Paris, who, though they put it by, were loth to lay their fingers off it. There hardly needs a better proof of the extravagant scale on which life at the court was pitched than the fact that the belief of the Comte de Palikao having made so large a fortune as to be able to give the Empress her tithe in the shape of a necklace of diamonds worth two millions of francs, should have made no deeper impression on the public mind than it really did. It was merely one item more in an interminable list of excesses. This one item, then, withdrawn, will only make her memory a little less brilliant in the eyes of the aforesaid shopkeepers of Paris, and of those noble Americans, the descendants of "old" families, who, for posterity, will divide with them the glory of having supported for twenty dreary years the greatest sham of the century. But what will Frenchmen, even Catholic Frenchmen, say when they read this new proof of the intellectual and spiritual littleness of "the Spanish woman"? Certainly, if the enlightened people of Paris had known that the piety of her Majesty would lead her to regard an old mandarin collar sewed over with trumpery pearls with the eyes of a fervent Christian merely because it had been "blessed" by Monsignor Mouly, they would not have allowed themselves to be worked up into fits of scorn and indignation when it was spread about—and truly, too—that the same High Personage went early every morning to the Church of Notre Dame des Victoires to pray for the success of the army which was being whipped every day by the Prussians. We give the Count's story as we find it in the Pall Mall Gazette:

"When the Summer Palace was occupied, a commission composed of three English and three French superior officers was appointed to divide the spoils. Among the objects captured were a number of mandarins' collars of small value which were given out to the army. The commission was good enough to give me three; one for my wife and two for my daughters. I had them made into a chaplet and blessed by Monsignor Mouly for presentation to the Empress. I was sure that in consequence of the well-known piety of her Majesty she would regard these objects, of no intrinsic value, with the eyes of a fervent Christian. It was this simple gift which was represented as being worth a million owing to the fine pearls of which it was formed. The value of the chaplet afterward rose to 1,500,000 francs, as it was discovered that the pearls were black, and it finally reached the price of 2,000,000 francs when they were found to be vivantes. I must here confess my ignorance as to the nature of perles vivantes. However, these absurd reports were believed in the capital of a people which prides itself on being the cleverest in the world."

—Whoever has attempted to follow the bewildering politics of the Austrian Empire must have become in some degree familiar with the struggle in Cisleithan Austria between the German and the Czechic parties which lean respectively towards alliance with Germany and towards Panslavism. It is, perhaps, the hardest nut Austria has to crack—this division of Bohemia into two hostile and nearly equal races. The Czechs naturally enough look upon the Germans as interlopers; the Germans remember that Bohemia has for nearly a thousand years been an integral part of their empire, and seeing that their own residence in the country dates from the thirteenth century, naturally claim that they have as good a right there as their rivals. Each race has its national historian. Palacky's great work represents the Czechs, and exalts the national movement of the fifteenth century, of which Huss and Podiebrad were the leaders. To represent the Verein für Geschichte der Deutschen in Böhmen, a history has been prepared by Dr. Ludwig Schlesinger, which he must read who wishes to understand both sides of this controversy. Dr. Schlesinger remarks, with some complacency, on the degree of attention that he has given to Culturgeschichte, which, as belonging much more to the Germans than to the Czechs, has been somewhat neglected by the latter. It must be confessed that his tone is more controversial than one would like, and it is impossible not to feel that he appears in behalf of a race, while Palacky speaks as a national historian. Schlesinger contends that the Hussite movement was quite as much political as religious, directed against the Germans rather than against the corruptions of the church. The Germans were the middle-classes, the inhabitants of cities, while the nobles made use of the lower orders, Czechs, to establish their own power. The battle of the White Mountain (1620) did not, he says, overthrow the freedom of Bohemia, as is so often urged, but the tyranny of its aristocracy—substituting for it, to be sure, a centralized despotism which may have been as bad. He points to Poland as an illustration of what this feudal aristocracy, with its elective monarchy, would probably have led to. Perhaps it would be as fair to point to Hungary, where an equally aristocratic system, not crushed, has resulted at last in a really free government, while Poland and Bohemia alike are destitute of genuine political life. Dr. Schlesinger admits, by the way, that it was largely the middle-classes—the merchants, manufacturers, and men of science—that were driven into exile in 1627, and these, one would gather from his own expressions, were chiefly Germans.

—Mr. W. R. S. Ralston, in the Academy of November 1, pays a tribute to the late Alexander Afanasieff, one of the most eminent and industrious of Russian writers. He was a constant contributor to the magazines, newspapers, and reviews of his native country, chiefly upon subjects relating to the history, archæology, or literature of the Slavic nations; but the two great works which will keep his memory green were "Russian Popular Tales" and "Poetical Views of the Old Slavonians about Nature." The first was completed in 1863, in eight parts, making four volumes, and is a monument of industry, the stories having been taken down from the mouths of the peasantry, and both the names of the narrators and of the locality being given when possible. These Afanasieff edited with critical notes, embodying the results of his extensive reading. The second work is in three volumes, completed about two years since. "It is," says Mr. Ralston, "a mine of wealth for all who wish to study the subject, to know the many legends which, in the various Slavonic lands, are told about the Heavens and the Earth, the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, the Hills and the Streams, the Thunder and the Wind—to form some idea of the light in which life and death were viewed by the eyes of the old Slavonians—to enter into the feelings of the Slavonic peasantry of the present day with respect to the physical world they see around them, and the spiritual world of which they believe themselves to be conscious." Afanasieff was born in 1826, and his death must, therefore, be considered untimely.

—The latest publication from the China press is a little brochure entitled "A Sketch of Our Relations with China during Three and a Half Centuries—1517 to 1869," by Baron de Méritens, Knight of the Legion of Honor, formerly acting Chinese Secretary to the French Legation at Peking, and, later, Commissioner of Customs at Foochow. The author has, in this pamphlet, condensed in handy form an account of foreign intercourse with the Chinese since the beginning of the sixteenth century, devoting its latter pages to a consideration of how far the policy recently instituted has been successful. His verdict, like that of most men thoroughly conversant with the subject, is emphatically adverse, and his deductions seem but too well supported by facts. The pamphlet has attracted much attention in China, and the China Mail and other leading papers review it at considerable length. To enter into a consideration of the many points raised in its pages would occupy too much space, but we may commend it as a useful vade mecum to those desirous of obtaining information upon the subject of which it treats. As a fair exposition of the views held by nearly every foreign resident, English, American, or French, in China, it possesses a value apart from the intrinsic truth or error of its arguments.

RECENT WORKS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW.*

During the late civil war, Dr. Lieber, at the request of Mr. Secretary Stanton, drew up a body of rules entitled "Instructions for the Armies of the United States of America while in the Field," which was sanctioned by the President, and adopted by the War Department. This system of instructions did not claim to have any international force or effect; it was, so far as it had any sanction at all and was more than a theory, a part of the municipal law of the land. As its author, however, chose to put many of his rules into the form of abstract and general propositions applicable to all countries and to all wars, the whole took on somewhat the appearance of an attempt to codify that portion of international law which relates to the actual conduct of war between belligerents. M. Bluntschli declares that this work "constitutes one of the most important movements in advance of modern international law." M. Laboulaye is more enthusiastic, and says: "These instructions are in fact a little chef-d'œuvre. It is not a small thing thus to have installed right in the empire of force, by bringing under the yoke of law the usages and even the excesses of war." Inspired by this act of Dr. Lieber, M. Bluntschli has undertaken to reduce the whole of the rules and regulations by which civilized nations are accustomed to govern themselves in their intercourse with each other, and which we are in the habit of callling international law, into the form of a code. The volume before us is the result of his labors. In an introductory chapter, he briefly discusses the nature of international law, and gives a short history of its development and description of its present tendencies. There follow nine books or chapters, treating in order: 1, of fundamental principles; 2, of persons in international law, embracing a definition of states and of their sovereignty and independence; 3, of the organs of international relations, including sovereigns, diplomatic agents, and consuls; 4, of territorial rights; 5, of persons in their relations with the state, under which title the rights and duties of states towards foreigners, and the subject of extradition, are considered; 6, of treaties; 7, of violations of international law and the means of repressing them; 8, of war; and 9, of neutrality. It would be interesting, and perhaps instructive, to examine this work of a university professor in detail, and to enquire how far he had played the rôle of a simple compiler; how far he had been content with expressing in the form of a positive and abstract enactment the rules which now exist, and how far, on the other hand, he had assumed to legislate and to give what in his opinion the law should be, and not what the law is. We should find that in many instances his zeal as a legislator had outstripped his caution as a codifier. But we cannot expatiate over this wide field. We can only gather material from one or two portions of it, and may thus, perhaps, be able to judge of the whole.

At the very foundation of his work must lie the author's conception of the nature of international law. He is met at the outset by the objection, as he states it, that "there does not exist any international law (droit) expressed under the form of positive legislation (loi), and sanctioned by legislation (loi); that international law wants the efficacious protection of tribunals; and, finally, that in conflicts between nations, the decision depends more upon the event of a battle than upon any judicial authority." The same difficulty occurs to M. Laboulaye, who contributes a preface, but he disposes of it in a light and airy manner, as though a phrase could answer a fact. "It is said," he remarks, "that this law (droit) is chimerical, for it has no legislature to promulgate the statute (loi), and no tribunal to apply it. This objection, I reply, is superficial and without validity. Wherever there are relations between free beings, there is law (droit). Ubi societas, ibi jus. The true legislator of international law is the whole human race." M. Bluntschli, who is certainly a closer and more accurate thinker than M. Laboulaye, sees something more in the objection, and proceeds to answer it at length. It should be noticed here that French writers have an advantage over the English, as they can use the two words droit and loi, answering to the Roman jus and lex, to express different facts and notions which we are obliged to indicate but cannot describe under the single term "law." The Roman lex was applied to that portion of the entire national jurisprudence which was enacted by a proper legislature, and substantially answered to our "statute." In its original and strict signification, jus was applied to that other portion of the same municipal system which was not enacted, but which was, by a process of gradual development and steady increment, promulgated by the prætors and other magistrates—the law of judicial decision. But in the course of time, when philosophical writers conceived the notion of a law of nature, they extended the meaning of jus, and described by it those parts of this moral system which relate to subjects essentially juridical. Jus came, therefore, in more modern times, to include certain principles and rules of that divine legislation uttered through the consciousness of mankind which we call the natural or moral law. It is in this extended and somewhat vague sense that droit is constantly employed by the French writers. By the use of these two words M. Bluntschli states the objection he is to meet in an unfair manner; he makes the objector say that there is no international droit, because there is no international loi—no jus, because no lex. This is unfair, because no one denies the existence of a droit or jus in relation with international affairs. The question is as to the existence of a human law, and not as to the existence of a divine and moral law binding upon independent and sovereign states. Law, be it jus in its widest sense, or be it lex, requires a lawgiver and a sanction. In the first case, that lawgiver is God, and the sanctions are moral; in the other case, the lawgiver must be a human legislator, and the sanctions physical.

The school of jurists to which M. Bluntschli belongs maintains the naked fallacy that a certain human law must of necessity exist because the divine commands have created like moral obligations resting upon individuals or states, which can be enforced by moral sanctions. Austin, in his exhaustive discussion of this subject, has left nothing to be said, and has demonstrated that what we call international law is, in fact, international morality. So far as it has a human origin, it wants every feature of a law. It has no superior lawgiver who can utter commands whence result obligations and rights, and no subject inferiors who must obey, because the very postulate of the system is that states are juridically independent, equal, and sovereign. It has no proper sanction, for war is the very abandonment by the belligerent parties of all obedience, voluntary or otherwise, and a resort to force, in which the stronger succeeds without reference to right. To call this process a sanction is simply an abuse of terms. There is an international jus, or droit, and the progress of peoples in civilization consists largely in the development of its doctrines, and in a willing conformity with its precepts; but there can be no international law without destroying the attributes of independence and sovereignty which are essential to our conceptions of the state. M. Bluntschli, as his discussion proceeds, gradually yields to the force of the objection he is combating, and virtually yields his ground by conceding that some form of international court, proceeding according to an established method, and adjudicating upon fixed and universal rules, is necessary to perfect the system. The time may perhaps come when such a tribunal will be erected; but the nations which shall submit to its judgments will then so far forth form one municipium, and the law which it administers will be municipal and not international. Some of the illustrations which M. Bluntschli uses to enforce his doctrines are extremely unfortunate. Thus he infers that war is a proper sanction of a true law because, in early and barbarous times, disputes concerning rights of property and the like between individuals were determined by the issue of a judicial combat. The inference is exactly the opposite of the one which he draws. The judicial combat was used simply because there was no municipal law, just as war is resorted to because there is no proper law between nations. Pursuing this subject, we might plainly demonstrate the impossibility of codifying the doctrines, precepts, and rules of international morality, which can have no human sanction except a varying public opinion, and to which the obedience of independent and sovereign states must from the nature of the case be voluntary.

* "Le Droit International Codifié, par M. Bluntschli, traduit de l'Allemand par M. C. Lardy, et précédé d'une préface par M. Edouard Laboulaye." Paris: 1870. Guillaumin et Cie.
"Commentaire sur les Éléments du Droit International et sur l'Histoire des Progrès du Droit des Gens de Henry Wheaton, par William Beach Lawrence." Vols. I. and II. Leipzig: 1868 and 1869. F. A. Brockhaus.

We pass now to the examination of some particular portions of this code, and we shall restrict ourselves to the general subjects of war and of neutrality. It is remarkable that, in view of recent discussions, M. Bluntschli nowhere states the right and duty of neutrals to recognize the parties to a civil war as belligerents, nor defines the occasion on which such right and duty arise, nor the limits to be placed upon their exercise. In Section 512 he concedes the possible quality of belligerency to armed persons not fighting in the service of an established state, but in a note applies this section, in the case of a civil war, simply to the penal liabilities of such persons when captured—they should be treated as prisoners of war. In Section 514 it is said that "in confederations of states, war between the central power and divers states of the confederation, whenever it has for its object the maintenance of the public federal law, takes on the character of a federal execution; it is not a war between two equal states, and consequently does not enter within the domain of international law. Nevertheless, even in this case, in the interests of humanity, the quality of belligerency is accorded to both the parties." In a note, the late rebellion in the United States is mentioned as falling within the operation of this rule. M. Bluntschli is clearly wrong in his principle and in its application. The United States is not such a confederation as his rule describes, and a federal execution, in the sense in which the term is used in European public law, is with us simply impossible. In the second place, his statement that such a war is not between two equal states, "and consequently does not enter within the domain of international law," is opposed to the doctrines of all jurists and to the universal practice of all civilized nations. A civil war within a state absolutely homogeneous confessedly enters within the domain of international law, and much more is this the case when a civil war rages between the central authority and portions of a state which themselves have an organized government, the power of administration, and an independence and sovereignty sub modo.

Passing to the conduct of a war, the following rules, among others, are laid down as established doctrines of international law. "The conqueror is bound to respect private property, and can only seize or destroy it when military operations demand such a course" (§ 652). "The laws of war in particular do not authorize requisitions purely pecuniary" (§ 654). "Persons who form a part of an army have not the right to seize objects belonging to private individuals, or to injure such objects voluntarily. But in case of absolute necessity, provisions or clothing may be appropriated: the public treasury (le fisc) will nevertheless be bound to reimburse the value of the articles taken, unless the inhabitants were under an obligation to furnish them gratuitously" (§ 656). "The international law absolutely interdicts the acquisition of booty in time of war" (§ 657). M. Bluntschli, in this connection, cites the thirty-seventh and thirty-eighth articles of Dr. Lieber's "Instructions," as follows: "The United States recognizes and protects in enemies' territory private property." "Private property, unless confiscated for the crimes or delicts of the owner, can only be seized for the needs or use of the army or of the United States. If the owner is not in fault, the commanding officer will deliver to him a receipt which will enable him to obtain an indemnity." All this may be in the interests of humanity, but it is not international law, nor according to the practice of the most civilized nations. With these delightful "Instructions" of Dr. Lieber in his hands, General Sherman swept through Georgia and South Carolina, leaving a broad track behind him desolated as though by the Egyptian plagues of fire, hail, and locusts. We have not heard of receipts which he gave to the resident proprietors, and we are inclined to think that members of Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury would smile if any such were presented for payment. This may be justified as a stern military necessity, and we do justify and applaud it as such. But Congress went further, and authorized the seizure of private property after all resistance had ceased; and the Supreme Court of the United States has in the most solemn manner held that the international law still permits the appropriation of private property on land as well as on the sea. The pecuniary requisitions made by the invading Prussians are within the memory of all our readers.

In § 665, the rule that enemies' ships and cargoes are exposed to capture is stated in a very mild way. It is said that "many maritime powers recognize even to-day this right." The author is strongly of the opinion that belligerent commerce, except in contraband, should be made free. The rights and duties of neutrals are treated in a manner very satisfactory, and in accordance with the latest authorities and the modern practice. In §§ 763, 764, the duties of neutral governments in respect to the construction and fitting out of armed vessels for one belligerent are expressed in a précise form, and in full agreement with the doctrines maintained by the United States. The power of neutral citizens to trade in contraband with a belligerent, subject to the risk of capture, is fully admitted (§§ 765–768). We are gratified to see that M. Bluntschli is not a supporter of the very recent heresy which would make neutral governments themselves responsible for such contraband transactions. In §§ 803–807, articles contraband of war are described and confined within very narrow limits, substantially in accordance with the views of Hautefeuille. M. Bluntschli has thus given to the world a very admirable treatise upon international law, thrown into the form of short and somewhat abstract propositions or paragraphs, with brief illustrative notes, rather than into the form of elaborate discussions. He has, in many important instances, stated what, in his opinion, the law ought to be, and not what it is. The whole work is animated by a spirit of justice, of equity, and of devotion to the interests of humanity.

The Commentary of Mr. William Beach Lawrence is, in many respects, a contrast to the treatise of M. Bluntschli. It lays down no theories, and discusses at length no principles; it simply brings together and arranges under their appropriate heads a vast number of historical facts of the utmost importance to the statesman and to the practical diplomatist. To the notes which he had before made upon the text of Wheaton's "Elements," Mr. Lawrence has added much other matter, and has brought the whole down to the time immediately preceding publication. We have, therefore, all the important international and diplomatic transactions in Europe, in America, and with the Asiatic powers, with the substance of the despatches and public acts, to and including the withdrawal of the French from Mexico, the downfall of Maximilian, the Prusso-Austrian war, and the establishment of the North German Confederation. The reader is equally amazed at the enormous labor and the vast learning which are involved in the production of these commentaries. Their extent and exhaustive character may be seen from the fact that the two volumes already published—or which, at least, have been received in this country—embracing 800 pages, cover only 160 pages of Lawrence's second edition of Wheaton's "Elements." The first volume gives, among other matters, a full statement of the relations of Christian nations with the pagan powers of Asia; instances of the recognition, partial or complete, of revolted provinces; the effect upon national rights and obligations of a change in the form of government, and especially of the acts of an usurping government; a description of the semi-sovereign and tributary states of Europe; an account of federal and confederate unions, and particularly of the German Confederation. The second volume completes the subject of confederations, and embraces that of the United States and of Switzerland. This volume is principally devoted to a description of various acts of intervention by one nation in the affairs of another. It treats of the Thirty Years' War and its results; the various interventions growing out of the French Revolution; the Holy Alliance; the wars between Spain and its American colonies, with a full discussion of the Monroe Doctrine; the interferences of England in the affairs of Portugal, and of the Great Powers in those of Greece and of the Ottoman Empire; the proceedings of Napoleon III. in Mexico, with the correspondence and conventions between Great Britain, France, and Spain, and between these countries and the United States, and, finally, of the negotiations between France and the United States which led to an abandonment of the enterprise by Napoleon. We have thus simply indicated some of the important matters which are elaborated in an exhaustive manner.

It might be asked why Mr. Lawrence, an American publicist and diplomatist, should publish in Europe, and in the French language. We assume that there are two reasons. In the first place, his reputation is European, perhaps, more than American, and as his work would, from its complete and practical character, become necessary to foreign statesmen and diplomatists, a French edition was indispensable. In the second place, it is plain that Mr. Lawrence is yet sore on account of his treatment by the State Department in reference to his second edition of Wheaton's "Elements," and that he has not become reconciled to the fact that the United States was successful in the civil war. This leads us to point out with plainness a fault which mars these commentaries, and for which there can be no possible justification in a work of this kind. After having stated the self-evident proposition that international law has nothing to do with the internal jurisprudence, public or private, of a state, he proceeds to comment at great length, not upon the manner of conducting our late war, but upon the civil acts of Congress and of the executive; the proclamation abolishing slavery; the so-called overturning the authority of the Supreme Court by disregarding the Dred Scott decision; the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus; the military arrest and trial of citizens; the case of Vallandigham; the test-oath statutes; the reconstruction measures, and many other proceedings. In many instances, he not only suppresses important facts, but he actually misstates events and transactions. Thus, in volume ii., page 99, after stating the expulsion by the Senate of senators from the seceding States, he adds: "The same measure was even extended to a senator from a State not seceding, who was believed to be opposed to the acts directed against the Confederates." This plainly refers to the case of Mr. Bright, and is simply a falsification of the record. Mr. Bright was very properly expelled, not on account of his opinions, but because he had been proved to have given direct aid and comfort to the enemy. It is enough for us to say, in reference to all these matters, which are given by Mr. Lawrence at great length, that, even if his strictures were true, they have nothing whatever to do with a work upon international law. They are impertinences where they are found, and we fear they were inserted by an American citizen to gratify his personal ill-will, and to prejudice his country with foreign nations and statesmen.

FALL BOOKS OF POETRY.*

In "The Book of the East," as in Mr. Stoddard's other books, the pieces that seem to us to be the best, as being most distinctively the poet's own, are some which express, with a reserve or vagueness of suggestion which is taking, some evanescent mood of mind, or, perhaps we might better say, some moodiness of feeling. Such a piece is this, for example:

"I am dreary and gray,
And my thoughts fly away
Like a long flight of cranes
On a dark autumn day.

"They may go till they find
The warm sunshine and wind;
But the autumn remains,
And my darkness of mind."

Another, not so good, whether in itself or as an example, is this, entitled "Leaves":

"What is life? and what are we?
Only leaves upon a tree;
Green to-day, to-morrow sere,
Then we are no longer here.

"Others, fair and brave as we,
Grew of old upon the tree;
Now they crumble in the mould,
With their histories untold.

"So shall we: it is our lot
Thus to die and be forgot;
By-and-by the tree will fall,
One oblivion waits for all."

The expenditure of thought is not great in such little poems, nor are they very satisfying. But they are lightly touched, expressive, and musical, and merit the praise of being successful in their way. They are not for all times, perhaps, any more than for all time; but now and again, when the reader's mood helps the author, they serve and will be welcome.

When he escapes, wholly or partially, from the pensiveness or the sadness that underlies such poems as these, Mr. Stoddard occasionally makes a lyric which is gay with a sort of gaiety that we should guess to be not immediately his own, but his secondarily rather, and reflexively. Earlier English lyrists certainly have not written for him such poems as his "Beggar Song," for instance, for it has none of the marks of imitativeness which would show it to be some one's else, and not his own property. But unless we are mistaken in the prevailing tone of his poetry, it is Mr. Stoddard's enjoyment of the light-heartedness of the old lyrics rather than a light-heartedness native to his genius, which gives him his success in the "Beggar Song," and in such poems as many of the Arab, and Persian, and Tartar songs from which his volume takes its title. As to these latter, by the way, we do not know precisely how much in them is of Mr. Stoddard's invention, and how much of his discovery. They are very like the Oriental thing, so far as that has been made known to the West by the less learned dealers in Orientalism, and, on the other hand, they are much like Mr. Stoddard; and we should as soon think that he wrote them as that he wrote his "Clown's Song" or this "Beggar Song."

Besides the poems of mood, sad or gay, and these others just spoken of, which are mainly love poems of some warmth, "The Book of the East" contains a good many other pieces, all short, which range themselves under various heads, and some of which will, no doubt, be well liked, though in our opinion there is none of them that the reader of poetry will find so much to his mind as the classes we have mentioned. We think that in several of the varieties of poetry exemplified in this collection, it will be held by most good readers that other poets have worked so much more naturally than Mr. Stoddard, to say nothing of their having done better work, that it is a matter of some surprise that he should have attempted to work after them. It is, indeed, always a thing to move wonder that a writer who has a genuine vein of poetry belonging to himself; whom, therefore, we must presume to have at some time known either that satisfaction which comes from the consciousness of having successfully sought the perfect, or that dissatisfaction which arises from a perceived incapacity to attain it—to match the thing with the word—it is always surprising when such a person consents to take and use the word of another, and half fit his own thought and feeling with another's expressions. Why, now, Emerson having written his "Threnody," and Tennyson his "In Memoriam," should Mr. Stoddard write, and write in the form in which he has written it, his "In Memoriam"? We do not find that the poem itself furnishes a justification: rather the reverse. Indeed, it was the poem which suggested our question, and the answer implied in it. At all events, we would say that in our opinion there should have appeared to our author more reasons for refraining from writing his poem, than reasons for writing it. So believing, we excuse ourselves from examining "In Memoriam," though it is the longest poem of the volume, and from praising its merits or commenting on its faults—faults which would soon have been its death, even had it originally had a fair degree of vitality. Other instances of this same mistaken use of his powers which Mr. Stoddard, if our judgment is sound, has repeatedly made in this volume, are the poems called "A Woman's Poem" and "Without and Within." Browning's "Men and Women" spoils one for taking the pleasure in these poems which one would like to get, in view of their cleverness, if for nothing else, and which one may readily get from such poetry, for instance, as three or four little poems like "Love My Neighbor," "What's My Love Like?" "Head or Heart," and "The Messenger of Night," which we find together in three or four of the pages before us. They may not be very great things, but there is more good poetry extant than great poetry; and what is good of a man's own is better than his inferior specimens of such fruits as his neighbor's orchard is able to produce in greater excellence than is within the capacity of his own garden.

As we have said, however, many of the verses among those which we think are less to be liked than the author's poems of mood, are worthy of respect, and will be read with pleasure. Such are "Adsum," written on occasion of the death of Thackeray, "At Gadshill," in memory of Dickens, and "Vates Patriæ," in celebration of Mr. Bryant's birthday. Of these, "Adsum" is best, and of the other two the last is, perhaps, to be preferred, because, while equally good in feeling, it is more certainly within the bounds of justice in its praises, and thus more certain of permanent acceptance. Indeed, the "Adsum" is too laudatory. But all are occasional verse. Not so good in this portion of the book is the poem entitled "On the Town," the subject of which has before now been found intractable by a number of our poets. We should not, however, speak of it particularly, if it were only that the views which it presents are commonplace and unprofitable, and the subject disagreeable, unless otherwise handled than here; nor if it were only that its views in regard to the social question it raises strike us as being but doubtfully true to the facts of the evil which it discusses. Whatever may be the correctness or the falsity of the frequent assertion that whenever a ruined woman is seen we see a victim to some man's fraud or force, it is, at all events, an assertion that is better made and discussed elsewhere than in poems or criticisms of poems. But in the case of two or three poets who have chosen to treat of this topic, it would seem as if the innocence and good intentions and cruel betrayal of the woman who stands condemned by the world were taken for granted, less because of exact truthfulness or probable reasonableness in the assumption, than because it seems to them well to look somewhere for a lash to lay over the shoulders of "a

* "The Book of the East, and Other Poems. By Richard Henry Stoddard." Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co. 1871.
"My Witness: A Book of Verse. By William Winter." Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co. 1871.
"East and West Poems. By Bret Harte." Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co. 1871.

harsh world." Here is a poor creature—the argument goes—whose only fault was that she was too good, trusting, and loving, and see how, in spite of her goodness and her injuries, the harsh world condemns her and visits on her the bitterest punishment, and the conclusion which in this and similar cases we are asked to draw is that the world is not to be trusted as a judge of morality, and that, indeed, the world's judgment in general is not to be trusted or regarded. But if this conclusion is sometimes to be accepted, there is, on the other hand, little doubt that to preach it too often is an act of immorality and inutility, and we suppose it may well be doubted if the ordinary plea for the ruined woman has done as much good in persuading people to charity of judgment as it has done harm in assisting people to persuade themselves that it is fate or the world's cruelty that has caused their calamities, and not their own wickedness or wilfulness or want of sense, or other weakness. We take it to be some such considerations as these—leaving apart the artistic value of the topic, or its want of value, and the scientific value or worthlessness of the alleged facts on which the advocates of the average harlot base their poems—some considerations of the dangerous tendency of the "On the Town" poetry which are at the bottom of the dissatisfaction it inspires in its readers, or some of them. But we should hardly speak of it at this length except that it seems to express forcibly enough a feeling which manifests itself in Mr. Stoddard's poems less agreeably than often.

As we have commended the verses entitled "Vates Patriæ," we take the occasion to remark that a reviewer has done Mr. Stoddard the injustice to charge him with plagiarism from Mr. Bryant in writing this stanza, which, as has been discovered, puts into rhyme three or four lines of Mr. Bryant's blank verse:

> "By the rock-ribbed hills and pensive vales
> That stretch in shade between;
> And by the soft complaining brooks
> That make the meadows green."

The younger poet, however, is, in "Vates Patriæ," expressly engaged in telling how the elder was taught by Nature to see and reveal her secrets, and it was not only right but graceful in Mr. Stoddard to use the words in which Bryant himself has told us where and how it was that he used to feel the intimate presence of Nature and used to con his task. Other of Bryant's words besides those paraphrased in the stanza we have quoted, the lover of that poet will find in Mr. Stoddard's well-managed tribute.

The readers of Mr. Winter's modestly-named volume will consult the interest of their own pleasure and his interest in their good opinion if they put off the perusal of the first two or three poems he offers them until they have taken a look at the later ones. In some of these later pieces they will find some verses which are not only neatly and prettily finished, like most of their companions, but which here and there have a gleam of poetry, and, oftener still, are agreeable in virtue of a sort of simple though not too happy or forcible expression of feelings, which, whatever part they play in the poetry of certain schools of writers, make up the honest happiness of the lives of most of us. Quite different from such verses are the first verses in the book, which are entitled "Orgia," and which, for their dreadful, naughty blasphemy and ferocity and church-robbing tendencies and haughty misery, can hardly have been equalled since ten years ago, when various scarred souls used to drain the beaker at "Pfaff's," in this city, in Broadway, near Bond Street. Mr. Winter shows in his more natural poems a degree of good and sensible feeling which makes one wish that he had himself relegated to forgetfulness matter like this:

> "In every city my cups I quaff,
> And over my liquor I riot and laugh.
>
> "I laugh like the cruel and turbulent wave;
> I laugh at the church and I laugh at the grave.
>
> "I terribly laugh, with an oath and a sneer,
> When I think that the hour of death is near," etc.

Compare with these verses those called "The Heart's Anchor," or those called "Love's Question," or the lines in honor of Mr. John Brougham, or those in memory of the late Mr. George Arnold. The difference is the difference between writing which, whether or not it is precious writing, is at any rate unaffected, and embodies natural sentiment, and, on the other hand, writing which seems affected and not honest, and which, be it honest or not, embodies sentiments that would be laughable if it were not that they rather provoke a sort of contemptuous pity which it is not good to feel or to call forth.

Mr. Bret Harte's "East and West Poems" consists of two parts, the first containing many pieces which have been printed since Mr. Harte's name became generally known, and which, probably, have been seen by most of the reading people, and the second part being in the main composed of pieces which, we believe, first saw the light in the San Francisco papers. Many of the pieces in the one part and the other have a cleverness, witty or otherwise, which should have made their appearance welcome to the columns of the California press, and should have secured for them wide copying among the other newspapers of the country. But only a few are of such merit as to justify their reappearance, and the volume looks so much like a piece of book-making as to look not prepossessing, and we doubt if it would be unjust to say that what it looks it is. We may, however, commend "The Stage-Driver's Story," "In the Mission Garden," and—more doubtfully—"Truthful James's Reply to 'Her Letter.'" The new version of "Little Red Riding-Hood," too, is clever above what is common in the sort of writing to which it belongs. We must add, that besides the crudeness of taste—not to call it the vulgarity—of much of "East and West Poems," there are two or three slips into coarseness, which are to be regretted, and for which the necessity of doing book-making is a better explanation than excuse.

Synonyms Discriminated. By C. J. Smith, M.A., Christ Church, Oxford, Vicar of Erith, and late Archdeacon of Jamaica. (New York: Scribner, Welford & Co. 1871.)—This book is, of its kind, one of the most ambitious that has yet appeared in our tongue. It claims to be a complete catalogue of synonymous words in the English language, with descriptions of their various shades of meaning, and illustrations of their usages, taken from standard writers. It is a work upon which clearly much labor has been spent; it contains, though generally in a crude and cumbrous form, a good deal of valuable information, especially upon matters not strictly included in its subject; but, regarded as a whole, no work has yet appeared in this department of investigation more utterly useless to those for whose service such books as these are specially designed. The objections to it are both of a general and of a special character; but in each they are manifold. Of course, the difficulty of doing well the task which the author proposed to himself cannot easily be exaggerated. Even distinctions which are felt by all it is frequently hard to set forth in a satisfactory manner to any. But the trouble with this work is that the distinctions laid down are such as do not exist, or they are so shadowy in their character that they could not by any possibility be of any practical service. There is sometimes a confusion in thought, as, for instance, when selfish and egotistical are put down as synonymous words, and an attempt made to discriminate between two ideas which no one in his senses would ever think of confounding. Many of the statements, if not totally wrong, are wrong to this extent, that they make some special use of a given word its exclusive one. Thus, under enemy, a foe is spoken of, without any restriction whatever, as "a personal enemy, one who bears a more energetic and specific hatred than enemy." Now, foe is a word belonging almost exclusively to poetry or the higher style of prose, and is far from being limited to the meaning here ascribed to it, though unquestionably sometimes so used. In reality, it is much more generally applied to an enemy in war; for in ordinary life men are not apt to speak of those personally hostile to them as foes. Again, hopeless is spoken of as an epithet applied to things. True enough; but who would hesitate to say that he felt "hopeless of success"? Definitions such as these either mean nothing, or, if taken as unqualifiedly as they are expressed, are wrong; and of such definitions in this work there are many.

This is not all. There is too much of the author, and too little of quotation. The value of a book of synonyms depends full as much upon the extracts as upon the definitions, if not actually more; for in most cases no one will recollect the latter without a very thorough study of the former. Now, in this respect, this book is very much of the character of the account found in Falstaff's pocket—there is a most intolerable deal of sack to a halfpenny-worth of bread; and the matter is made still worse by the bread not being always of the best quality. It is, in fact, in most cases exceedingly heavy. The author is a clergyman, and his readings have lain necessarily, to a great extent, among the writers of his own profession, and from them and the metaphysicians his extracts are mainly taken. Atterbury, South, Blair, Burnet, Priestley, Locke, Horsley, Hurd, Waterland, and others of the same class are the names that bristle on almost every page. The best writers in literature proper are, comparatively speaking, little represented. This would not make so much difference with the usefulness of the work, though it would with its interest, were the quotations given really apposite, were they such as to make clear those delicate shades of meaning which the mind feels but finds difficult to express. But this they rarely are. So little do the extracts make evident the distinctions sought to be conveyed in the definitions, that in fully half the instances a synonymous word could be substituted without making any perceptible alteration in the sense. But for practical purposes the chief objection to the work lies in the vague and clumsy language in which the shades of meaning are expressed—a fault which runs through the whole of it, and which is sufficient of itself to prevent it from ever being put to much use. Even when the author seems to see the distinction clearly, he lacks the ability to set it forth sharply

There is nothing precise or pointed in any of his definitions which will cause them to remain fixed in the mind; many of them are such that it will require from most students more thought to comprehend what the definitions themselves mean than to ascertain unaided the distinctions they are designed to explain. Thus, under sake, sake is said to "denote an ulterior purpose which is contemplated; account, an anterior cause or motion which induces." This is very probably true; but it will not materially assist men in using the words correctly, especially that class of young writers who are most likely to consult books of this kind. As a further illustration of how words can be used to bewilder knowledge, take the assertion made in reference to clog, that "it denotes the presence of something heterogeneous, obstructive, or against freedom of action." Such examples might be multiplied by scores, for clumsiness of expression characterizes every page of this book, which in this respect presents a striking contrast to the little treatise on synonyms edited by Archbishop Whately. If to all this we add that the author, like many other worthy men who write about language, is in his definitions terribly under the dominion of the derivation—that he clearly fails to see how little control mere etymology has over good usage, we shall have said enough to show how far this book has fallen below what we have a right to expect in the matter of accuracy. Whether, indeed, works of this kind are ever of much benefit is an open question, for delicacy of taste and discrimination in the use of language cannot be learned out of a text-book. Certainly for practical purposes such treatises are far inferior to simple collections of synonymous words; and he who feels the need of helps of this nature, as most men do more or less, cannot do better than to turn to the admirable dictionary of English synonyms prepared by Richard Soule, and published by Messrs. Little, Brown & Co.

The Philosophy of Art: Art in Greece. By H. Taine. Translated by John Durand. (New York: Holt & Williams. 1871.)—There is every sign except the usual one about this little volume to indicate that it is the first part only of the work whose title it bears. Neither title-page nor publishers' announcement says "Vol. I.," "Part I.," or "First Series"; and yet the subject is only introduced, the argument only opened. An introductory chapter treats of the inadequacy to our enquiries of the remains of Greek art, even of sculpture, which particular art is announced as the subject of this work; and the reader is told that the milieu is especially worth studying where there is so little else to study. The milieu of Greek sculpture, then—that is, the character of the country, climate, and race amid which Greek sculpture was developed—becomes the subject of examination throughout the volume. There is scarcely more reference to sculpture than to architecture or painting, and scarcely more allusion to the formative arts than to music or oratory. The reasons why Greece became the nurse of splendid sculpture are set forth in a fluent and consecutive essay, easy to read and carrying a sort of conviction with it. As each division of the book—first, "Race"; second, "The Period"; third, "Institutions"—draws to a close, we seem to be coming nearer and nearer to the question itself what Greek sculpture was; but each one ends; the last page is reached; and this is the conclusion, just enough, though not in strictly accurate terms: "Through a long circuit, and in gradually approaching circles, we have traced the original sources of the statue, and we have now reached the vacant space, still recognizable, where its pedestal formerly stood, and from which its august form has disappeared." In other words: We have come to our principal subject at last—let us discuss it. But at this point the volume before us terminates, and we are left to go elsewhere for instruction in the "Philosophy of Greek Art."

This "elsewhere" will be, if we are wise, in the capital little book by Emile Boutmy, entitled "Philosophie de l'Architecture en Grèce." There is a good deal of M. Taine's verve and pleasant way of making the reader understand just what his author means in M. Boutmy's style, and he has a respect for the milieu almost as great as that held by M. Taine himself. But M. Boutmy is a professor in Emile Trélat's "Ecole spéciale de l'Architecture," and therefore presumably an architect himself, and a French architect, which is as much as to say that he is not a graduated carpenter, but a man of some kind of training. Moreover, he seems to be artistically minded to a degree far beyond M. Taine; which latter critic always impresses us as more desirous to theorize profoundly about the possible than to criticise seriously what is actual and in existence. So that, to say that we prefer M. Boutmy's book to any book upon art that we have read by M. Taine, is not to say too much.

But to return to the book in hand: There is to be found in it a very interesting, well-arranged, clear, and generally authentic and authoritative account of those marked peculiarities in Greek civilization that especially separate it from other kindred civilizations. Without being especially directed to the artistical results of that civilization, the reader is still enabled to see how those results were possible. The classic authors from whose works the information is drawn are not always nor often cited; the reasons for thinking this and inferring that are seldom given; the book contains the résumé of a great deal of reading, and, perhaps, thinking as well. It is such an essay as a practised writer, who had been for a year past "cramming" in Grecian history, would write, without taking pen from paper, as an introduction to an analytical history of Grecian literature or even of Grecian art; and this is just what we take the book to be.

My Winter in Cuba. By W. M. L. Jay, author of "Shiloh." (New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.)—"The reader may find elsewhere," says the author in her preface, "more graphic descriptions of Cuba's scenery, combined with accurate tables of her statistics, and profound views of her politics; but he will find no work that opens to him so frankly the doors of Cuban homes, and allows him to watch the inner currents of Cuban life." Those who are aware of the facilities which the windows of Cuban homes, especially in the cities, afford even to the wayfarer for "watching the inner currents of Cuban life," will not build extravagant expectations on this introduction. In fact, eleven of the twenty-nine chapters are devoted to Havana, in which the author had no advantages as an observer over any tourist capable of speaking Spanish, with considerably less descriptive power and literary skill than many who have made us familiar with that interesting city; twelve relate to Matanzas and vicinity, including journeys to and from it by rail; five have something to tell of plantation life; and there is one general chapter, "Cosas de Cuba." In fact, less than a quarter part of the work fairly answers the claim put forth for the whole of it. That said, the book may be recommended if only for its telling old stories in a fresh way, and as it is brief as well as lively (being all contained in three hundred pages), it may be pleasurably read through at a couple of sittings. It is scarcely more, in substance or in quality, than a bright woman's letters written home to her friends, to which we have to add that the woman is an Episcopal clergyman's wife and an invalid, given to "harvesting the abundant crop of analogies growing out of all" she sees; one to whom "it was impossible not to notice, for example, how the cane became the agent of its own destruction—how the bruised mass from the rollers was made the instrument of drawing in a continual succession of fresh, sweet cane, to be likewise crushed, mangled, and cast out, fit only for burning—a thing which has its mournful counterparts in the social world."

Of politics and revolution there is said not a word in this narrative; of slavery, viewed abstractly, only this: "How justly these fifteen have acquired the right to dominate over the three hundred and seventy-five, is a question for moralists; but while they exercise it, it behooves them to take measures for their personal safety." There are a few glimpses of the slaves themselves, blacks and Chinese, and they are mostly gloomy enough, the latter especially being painted as if from a personal dread on the part of the writer. Perhaps her best observations are those which contrast her womanly freedom at home with the conventional restrictions placed upon her sex in Cuba, the compensations for which, in the open-air life of the people, are not wholly to the taste of an Anglo-Saxon American. We have room but for a single extract from her social sketches, on a point of etiquette which was new to us:

"The feast being ended, there is an almost unanimous withdrawal to the broad, airy piazza. The two elder gentlemen only remain behind with their cigars; the younger ones composedly light theirs outside. The practice of smoking is so universal in Cuba, it is considered so much a matter of course, that ladies are seldom asked if it is disagreeable to them—never, except as the merest formality, the reply being taken for granted. I am not a little surprised, therefore, when Don Diego joins our party, to see his son, Casimiro, remove his cigar from his mouth, and, holding it to the side remote from the elder gentleman, quietly slip away to the farther end of the piazza to finish it. I am so struck by the oddity of the circumstance that I venture to ask Engracia, in an aside, what it means. She replies that it is an act of disrespect for a son to smoke in the presence of his parents.

"'Why?' I ask, with pardonable obtuseness, seeing that the parents all smoke, to a man (and sometimes to a woman), and cannot well help knowing that their sons unhesitatingly follow their example.

"'Es un vicio, V. sabe!' (It is a vice, you know), she answers, with a little grimace, and a most expressive shrug of the shoulders."

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Channing (W. E.), The Wanderer; a Poem	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) $1 25
Chatterbox for 1871	(Pott, Young & Co.) 1 50
Gilmore (P. S.), History of the National Peace Jubilee	(Lee & Shepard) 5 00
Grün (A.), The Last Knight	(Hurd & Houghton)
Haswell (C. H.), Book-keeping by Double Entry	(D Appleton & Co.) 60
Holtzendorff (F. von), Jahrbuch für Gesetzgebung, Verwaltung und Rechtspflege des Deutschen Reichs, Part I., swd	(Leipzig)
Lever (C.), Kate O'Donohue; a Tale, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 75
Melville (G. J. W.), The Gladiators; a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.) 60
Mulock (D. M.), Hannah, swd	(Harper & Bros.) 50
Newby (Mrs. C. J.), Kate Kennedy; a Tale, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Co.) 50
Our Country Home: a Child's Story	(Pott, Young, & Co.)
Prentiss (E.), Aunt Jane's Hero	(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 1 50
Prentiss (Rev. G. L.) Discourse in Memory of Thos. Harvey Skinner, D.D., swd	(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 50
Pressensé (Rev. E. de), The Early Years of Christianity	(Chas. Scribner & Co) 1 75

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE.

An Illustrated Monthly of

POPULAR LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

THE DECEMBER NUMBER

CONTAINS: I. Scrambles Among the Alps during the Years 1860–69. A Series of Graphic and Brilliant Sketches. By Edward Whymper. Profusely and exquisitely Illustrated after the unrivalled Drawings of the Author. Chapters 6 and 7. II. The Cold Hand. A Tale. By Clara F. Guernsey. III. Monte Testaccio. A Poem. By T. Buchanan Read. IV. Phantom Limbs. By S. Weir Mitchell, M.D. V. Trips to the River Plate. By Robert M. Walsh. VI. My Long-Lost Brother. A Story. By Charles Warren Stoddard. VII. Balzac as Artist and Moralist. By Kate Hillard (Lucy Fountain). VIII. A Stroll in Virginia. By Richard B. Elder. IX. A Branch of Lilac. A Story. By "Ouida." In Two Parts. Part II. X. Sonnet. By Paul H. Hayne. XI. The Sharpless Crayons. By J. W. Palmer. XII. Our Monthly Gossip, containing papers on Cooper, Scott, and Lockhart; Jerusalem; Steps to a Colossal Fortune, etc. XIII. Foreign Literature. XIV. Literature of the Day.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

With the number for January, Lippincott's Magazine will enter upon a new volume. The number of pages will be increased, enabling the conductors to furnish an additional amount of popular reading in the best and most emphatic sense. In addition to the shorter articles by well-known writers, the following attractive Serial Works will be published during the Year:

A POWERFUL AND ABSORBING NEW STORY.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD, LL.D.,

Author of "Alec Forbes," "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," etc.

ALSO, A CHARMING NEW NOVEL,

AYTOUN,

BY A TALENTED AMERICAN AUTHOR,

MR. EDWARD WHYMPER'S EXQUISITELY ILLUSTRATED WORK,

SCRAMBLES AMONG THE ALPS,

will be continued from month to month until completed.

A large amount of space will be devoted to Our Monthly Gossip, which will be enriched with short and lively articles on persons of note, incidents of the day, and other novel or amusing topics.

Illustrations designed by distinguished artists and engraved in the highest style will accompany each number.

TERMS—Yearly Subscription, $4. Single Number, 35 cents. Specimen Number mailed, postage paid, to any address on receipt of 25 cents.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

FOR SALE—LOW.

A few Large Paper Copies of

DE TOCQUEVILLE'S DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA.

CHARLES W. SEVER,
UNIVERSITY BOOKSTORE, CAMBRIDGE MASS.

THE BEST ENGLISH PERIODICALS.

THE LONDON QUARTERLY, EDINBURGH, WESTMINSTER, and BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEWS, and BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

Regularly and faithfully reprinted, at about one third the price of the originals.

TERMS.—Blackwood or any one Review, $4 a year; Blackwood and any one Review, $7; Blackwood and two Reviews, $10; Blackwood and three Reviews, $13; any three Reviews, $10; the four Reviews, $12; Blackwood and the four Reviews, $15.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE WESTMINSTER FOR OCTOBER.

THE LEONARD SCOTT PUBLISHING CO.,
140 Fulton Street, New York.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. Oil explosions most frequently occur from the lamp being upset and broken. By using Pratt's Astral Oil, you avoid this as well as every other danger incident to unsafe oils, it being in every respect a perfectly pure, reliable, and safe article.

CHOICE ENGLISH BOOKS

D. APPLETON & CO.,

549 AND 551 BROADWAY,

Have now Ready

A CATALOGUE

OF A MAGNIFICENT COLLECTION

OF

STANDARD AND ILLUSTRATED ENGLISH BOOKS,

SELECTED IN EUROPE DURING THE PAST SUMMER EXPRESSLY FOR THEIR RETAIL TRADE.

The greater part of the Books are in choice Bindings, by Hayday, Riviere, Bedford, Andy Griere, and other artists of eminence, and the Illustrated Works were specially selected with regard to the condition of the plates.

Sent free, by mail, on application.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, BAZAR,

$4 PER YEAR EACH.

$10 a Year for the Three.

$7 for any Two.

An Extra Copy of either gratis for every five Subscribers at $4 each in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE sent by mail on receipt of six cents in postage stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

JUST PUBLISHED.

OUR COUNTRY HOME:

A STORY FOR THE YOUNG.

By the author of "Harry Lawton's Adventures," "What Makes Me Grow," etc. With Twelve Etchings

BY RUDOLF GEISSLER.

4to, cloth extra, $2.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.,
Cooper Union, New York.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

133 NASSAU STREET,

Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

TO LET—LOW.

The Office lately occupied by THE NATION, consisting of two front rooms, on the 3d floor of No. 3 Park Place. Address

"THE NATION,"
P. O. Box 6,732.

5 Beekman St., N. Y.

NOW READY AND FOR SALE AT ALL BOOKSTORES.

In 1 vol. crown 8vo, pp. x.–326, $1 75.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS,

AND

HER LATEST ENGLISH HISTORIAN.

A Narrative of the Principal Events in the Life of Mary Stuart, with some Remarks on Mr. Froude's History of England.

BY JAMES F. MELINE.

The trenchant criticism to which Mr. Froude's work has been subjected by Col. Meline has excited much attention in literary circles, and this volume will be found a fresh and readable contribution to the settlement of one of the most interesting questions in English History. The work contains not only criticisms of Mr. Froude's History, but also a complete narrative of the life of Mary Stuart.

The mottoes placed at the heads of the various chapters are often very happy hits, sometimes drawn from Mr. Froude's own writings, thus:

Chap. V. "It often seems to me as if History was like a child's box of letters, with which we can spell any word we please."—Froude.

Chap. viii. "Mr. Froude does not seem to have fully grasped the nature of inverted commas."—London Saturday Review.

The New York Nation says:

"As an achievement of well-deserved literary flaying-alive, this critique of his performance by Mr. Meline is thorough and satisfactory."

HURD & HOUGHTON, New York,
THE RIVERSIDE PRESS, Cambridge.

THE "NATION" ABROAD.

Subscriptions and Advertisements for the Nation are received in Europe by the following

AGENTS:

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE COLONIES: George Street, 30 Cornhill, E.C., London.

FRANCE: Bowles Brothers & Co., 12 Rue de la Paix, Paris.

SWITZERLAND: Vérésoff & Garrigues, Place Bel-Air, Geneva; rue du Spectacle, Berne; 110 rue Richelieu, Paris, France.

ITALY: Furse Brothers & Co., 9 Piazza di Spagna, Rome.

"AMER. SCHOOL INST."

FOUNDED 1855.

Is a reliable and practical Educational Bureau—
To aid those who want well-qualified Teachers,
To represent Teachers who seek positions;
To give parents information of good Schools;
To sell, rent, and exchange School properties.

Sixteen years have proved it efficient in securing "the right Teacher for the right place."

J. W. SCHERMERHORN, A.M., Actuary,
14 Bond Street, New York.

CHEGARAY INSTITUTE.

English and French for Young Ladies and Misses, Boarding and Day Pupils, 1527 and 1529 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Reopened on Wednesday, Sept. 20. French is the language of the family, and is constantly spoken in the Institute.

MADAME D'HERVILLY, Principal.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1871.

The Week.

THE piece of news which has excited most talk during the week has been that of Mr. Robert C. Schenck's appearance on the London market as director of a new silver-mining company. This step on his part is a contravention of a positive rule of the State Department, which prohibits "foreign ministers of the Government from engaging in any commercial speculation whatever." It is also a contravention of the general sound and old-established usage which forbids a man who, as an ambassador, is exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts of a country, to engage in enterprises in which other men similarly situated may render themselves liable to civil or criminal prosecution on the part of its citizens. The offence is aggravated in Mr. Schenck's case by the fact that the stock which he is lending his official position to push is what is called a "fancy stock," in which no trustee, executor, or prudent man would invest in this country, and about which we venture to say he does not know anything; and there can be no doubt, for reasons we have given elsewhere, that the general belief will be that he has been paid for the use of his name, and this belief will bring discredit on the Government he represents. Supposing, too, as is not impossible, the scheme should prove, like hundreds of others of the same kind that have gone before it, one of those failures closely bordering on a swindle, or prove wholly a swindle, and the strong arm of the English law should lay hold of his brother-directors, what a nice position the American eagle would be in flapping its wings over Mr. Schenck's head to save him from the legal consequences of conduct on the moral guilt of which the world would be unanimous!

A portion of the press has attempted to shield him, or whitewash him, and a sorrier performance we have not seen for a long time. Some papers have tried to persuade people that helping to bring out fancy stocks on the London market is no worse than occupying a place in a trading firm, which is very like saying that John Morrissey is in the same profession as Mr. Duncan or Mr. James Brown, as both are "bankers," the sole difference being that Morrissey's is a faro-bank. Others, again, have tried to make out that the English objection to Mr. Schenck's course was but part of the general "monarchical" objection to public servants earning an honest livelihood while performing diplomatic functions. This reminds us of the American Consul at Rome at the time of the battle of Mentana, who, being called to account by the State Department for going into the field with the French and Papal troops with a rifle, and firing on the Garibaldians, did not deny that he took part in the fray, but alleged, in his defence, that it was an Englishman that saw him doing it and reported. Mr. Seward, however, held this to be insufficient.

There is little or no purely political news of the week. One of the most important bits of it from Washington consists in renewed assurances of the President's enthusiasm in the cause of civil-service reform—which may be well founded, but we are bound to say that his way of displaying his zeal is very peculiar. The Commission is said to have prepared a body of rules, but we judge that it depends entirely on the President to carry them out. Should he do so, we shall applaud heartily, but, after all that has happened, it is justifiable to keep one's judgment in suspense. The other bit of interesting intelligence is that many members of Congress are going back determined to call Mr. Boutwell to account for violating the law in issuing his new loan one and a half per cent. lower than the rate fixed by the act. He has never given a reason for doing so, or offered any defence of it, beyond his own allegation that the United States will be found to have made money by the transaction. This will hardly stand examination, and ought not to do so. His ideas on the whole matter of finance and taxation, beyond the simple housewife's faith in the propriety of saving up money and paying one's debts, have, however, always been so crude and odd that elaborate criticism of them has been useless. When he told Congress he could place his five per cent. loan at par, he plainly did not clearly understand what he was talking about.

Senator Schurz has been lecturing during the past two or three weeks on civil-service reform, and last Thursday discoursed on the subject in this city. He gave his discourse the benefit of the practical experience he has himself had of the way in which the present system works at Washington, and announced certain conclusions which the audience heartily applauded, and about which we imagine not many thinking men throughout the country will differ with him. The first was, of course, that the spoils system debauches the President, the Congressmen, and the community; the second, that the average President likes being debauched by it, especially in his first term, when he wants re-election; that the average Congressman likes being debauched by it too, and that his denunciations of it are very like the wry faces the old toper makes over his hot grog; third, that it is but part of, and in no small degree contributes to, the corruption which has begun to penetrate to all parts of our society; and he gave his hearers plainly to understand that he saw no hope for reform except from the pressure of a strong and indignant public opinion. It was remarkable to see how little importance he attached to the labors of the Commission now sitting in Washington, not because he undervalued them, but because he had no confidence in the President. He made several allusions, and none of them complimentary, to our late Collector, Mr. Tom Murphy, evidently taking a totally different view of this gentleman's character from that held by General Grant. The New York Custom-house, too, he frequently mentioned, but not as an establishment in which young men were acquiring habits of industry and integrity in "the prompt and economical collection" of the revenue, which, from Mr. Murphy's account of it, it would appear to be. We ought not to omit mentioning that he laughed in a heartless and cynical manner, as we confess we did ourselves, over the late commendation bestowed on the President by the Republican Convention of this State, for having, by "considerate investigations, made worthy efforts for the reform and elevation of the civil service."

The correspondent of the New York Tribune at Charleston throws, in a recent letter, some new and interesting light on the condition of the State finances, to which he has for some time given a good deal of attention, and his story is one which, if we had not been prepared for it by the doings of the Ring in this city, would sound very extraordinary. We have given some account already of the antecedents of Niles G. Parker, the State Treasurer. He and Governor Scott, and one Kempton, who has filled the office of "State agent" in New York, and whose sole business appears to have been the raising of funds for the Charleston Ring, have had the funds and credit of the State wholly in their hands for the last three years, and Kempton, the correspondent alleges, before he was put into this position, was a "street broker," or what is called in the slang of the Exchange a "gutter shark"—that is, a broker who has no office, and transacts his business on the sidewalk, and on top of adjacent carts and barrels. The custom of the Ring seems to have been to send on State bonds to this worthy to raise money for them on them, and he, instead of selling them, pledged them for loans, and so went on pledging and borrowing like clock-work—the securities all the while falling in value, and being occasionally sold by alarmed lenders. Into his doings no enquiry seems ever to have been made, all the Charleston fraternity cared for being the honoring of their drafts. Now, however, their credit is wholly exhausted; no more money can be raised on bonds; the treasury is empty; the salaries of the State officers have been long unpaid; and there is no provision for the January interest. Under these circumstances, the Governor and Treasurer and Comptroller have at last to face an angry and swindled community, and try to answer some questions as to their doings with the money entrusted to their keeping, and we once more commend their story to the consideration of those persons who think order and prosperity can be restored to South Carolina or any other State by a liberal use of horse, foot, and dragoons. In judging the Ring, too, it must be remembered that behind them stood a grossly ignorant and corrupt Legislature, knowing nothing of finance and taxation, or the nature or value of public credit, and intent only on filling their own pockets. This body actually gave the Ring unlimited power to issue bonds, restricting them only as to the sum of money to be raised—a contrivance for facilitating stealing which has had no parallel in legislation except Tweed's "Board of Audit." A committee of this Legislature came on to this city last summer, ostensibly to look after Kempton, but nothing is known or has been heard of them or their doings since, except that they lived sumptuously for three months at a fashionable hotel, and went back to Charleston in fine condition. A knowledge of these facts seems to be necessary to a proper comprehension of the Ring "accounts."

These accounts are very curious. In October, 1870, Parker, the Treasurer, gave "an official statement" of the debt of the State, which he sets down at $7,665,903 98. Six weeks later, the Comptroller-General made a report, in which he put it at the same amount as Parker, but, oddly enough, gave a very different account of its composition. It now appears that both these statements were false. The taxpayers had in the meantime been getting alarmed, and held a convention in May, 1871, of which we gave some account in the Nation, and they sent a deputation to see the Comptroller, who repeated his falsehood of the previous December. Four months later, in September, 1871, Governor Scott tried his hand at giving the amount of the State debt before the Congressional Ku-klux Committee, and he made it out in all $9,528,564 10, which it now appears was the greatest falsehood of all, for he must have known, and knew, that, besides this, Kempton had then received and pledged bonds to the amount of over $5,000,000. Next, Parker and Kempton spent a day over the books, and on the 25th inst. handed to the Tribune correspondent, as the result of their labors, a statement showing the debt to be $15,806,908 98. Finally, on Tuesday, the Legislature having convened, Governor Scott informed them in his message that the whole public debt is $11,994,908, "which statement he knows, from a severe personal scrutiny, to be correct, nothing being suppressed."

Business in all branches is dull and unsatisfactory. A lethargic feeling pervades the mercantile community which can be only in a very small measure ascribed to the Chicago fire and its influences. A much larger share of it is no doubt due to the general recognition of the importance and magnitude of the frauds committed by the local governments in various parts of the country, and to the growing conviction that business cannot be healthy until this evil is remedied. The produce and provision markets continue active at fluctuating prices, and with a liberal export of breadstuffs. Cotton comes forward in fair quantities, but the shipments to Europe are light, and the stocks here accumulate, while prices, nevertheless, are maintained at artificially high figures. Coal continues weak, but with a somewhat improved tone, and without further decline, the great companies carrying their own stocks this season, and thus temporarily preventing the usual ruinous competition. Real estate of every description is practically unsalable.

Wall Street shares the prevailing dulness as far as genuine business is concerned. The great cliques who have been again manipulating the markets since the Chicago panic are now beginning to be cramped by a natural and legitimate increase in the demand for money, and there are unmistakable symptoms of approaching fluctuations and changes. As a rule, the financial community has not been prosperous of late, and recent events have not tended to improve confidence. Government bonds continue firm, gold steady, stocks fluctuating and lower, foreign exchange lower, and money on call fairly active, at seven per cent., with rather an improvement in the rates for commercial paper.

The Commercial Treaty concluded in 1870 between France and England, for ten years, is now open to abrogation by either party on giving one year's notice. It is essentially a free-trade treaty—that is, a step towards putting France and England in economical relations with each other similar to those which exist between the various States of this Union. The origin of the treaty was unfortunate, as it was a mere emanation of the Emperor's will, on which the nation was not consulted; but it has proved satisfactory to nearly all Frenchmen not engaged in the cotton or iron trades. It was, however, always an object of fierce hostility on the part of M. Thiers, who is a protectionist of the last century; and when he took office and made M. Pouyer-Quertier, a Rouen manufacturer, and as ardent a protectionist as himself, his Minister of Finance, everybody felt the treaty was doomed. Nevertheless, it now appears that the new government recoils from abrogating it, and has contented itself with trying to negotiate some modifications of it, but thus far unsuccessfully. In the meantime, the Cobden Club, in England, as a sort of tribute to the memory of their patron, who was the author of the treaty, has issued a pamphlet, giving the result of ten years of its working, taken from the "Annals of Foreign Trade," published by the French Ministry of Commerce, and they are tolerably instructive. The "general commerce" of France had increased in value, from 1860 to 1868, by $540,000,000, including in this all importations and exportations of all kinds, and for all purposes—that is, importations, whether for consumption or for re-exportation, and exportations, whether of French or foreign products. In the "special commerce," or importations for consumption only, and exportations of French products only, there was in the same period an increase in value of $332,600,000 in the exports, and of $131,800,000 in the imports.

It ought to be remembered, too, in examining these figures, that French trade with England forms a fourth of the whole foreign trade of France, while the English trade with France forms only a tenth of the whole foreign trade of England. The wine and silk trades, which form the most important branches of French industry, and whose interests are most powerfully affected by the treaty, have, however, actually not gained in the same proportion in the above period as other branches in which France is exposed to competition, having been unfavorably affected by the outbreak of our war and the resulting tariff. But the most curious and instructive of the facts extracted from the returns by the Cobden Club is this: the coasting trade of France is reserved by a rigid navigation law to French bottoms—her foreign carrying trade, of course, is open to all nations. Well, during the period in which the treaty has been in operation, the returns show that French tonnage employed in the foreign and colonial trade has steadily increased, while the tonnage employed in the coasting trade has declined. The French steam tonnage engaged in the trade with England has increased tenfold. It is safe to say that, in the presence of these facts, the treaty is not in as much danger as seemed at first, and the more time there is given to the French people to recover from the confusion of mind wrought by the war, the less likelihood is there even of its being modified.

The news from France has for some time been very meagre, which is a good sign, though it is in part owing to the political apathy which has seized upon the people. The stillness which prevails there in the political arena will probably be broken on the reassembling next week of the National Assembly, whether M. Thiers propose to it the changing of the provisional condition of affairs into a permanent one, or not. The question of the change is in all minds, and cannot but soon become a source of serious debates and conflicts. Gambetta, in his new organ, La République Française, is one of the most eager assailants of the status-quo on the Republican side, while it is chiefly the Bonapartists who assail it from the other. The latter have also tried, for the first time under the Presidency of M. Thiers, the experiment of a street demonstration, but apparently with very slight success. To judge by the late exhibitions of severity, on the part of the authorities, towards the culprits of the category of the Commune, and such ultra-Radical journals as the lately revived Rappel, the organ of the Hugos, the spectre rouge has not yet entirely ceased to be formidable, and it is, perhaps, more so than the lingering shadow of imperialism. The appeals for mercy of the Commune leaders, sentenced to death, having been rejected by the Commission of Pardons, Rossel, Ferré, and one less known insurrectionist have suffered the penalty of death, the first-named evincing to the last that undismayed energy of character which distinguished him during the struggle and the trial. The trial of the murderers of Generals Lecomte and Clément Thomas has, on the other hand, uncovered some of the most atrocious features of the Paris tragedy which opened with their assassination.

On Monday the Italian Parliament completed the transfer of the national capital by meeting in Rome. The abstract which we get of the King's address contains nothing noticeable beyond the expression of a belief that Rome is large enough for two sovereigns, and that although the peace of the country is not threatened, the reorganization of the army and navy cannot safely be neglected. Accounts of the effect on Florence of its ceasing to be the political centre of the kingdom are rather sad. The marks of depopulation are evident to the casual observer, and the theatres alone are said to have lost nothing of their attendance and gayety. Now that Rome has received its political deserts, there is an earnest feeling that something ought to be done to compensate Florence, and that the nation should acknowledge, in some substantial way, the leadership which that pleasant city still retains in Italian culture. It has been accordingly proposed to revive the University of Florence, for which there are unrivalled opportunities. In their own behalf, the Florentines seem modest enough, and neither grumble nor clamor for restitution; and if one compares their conduct with that of the Romans, and with the generally tranquil condition of the peninsula—in spite of the large show which the crime of homicide still makes in the reports—it is impossible not to admire the good sense and political capacity of the Italians, who pursue their even course between the temptations of the Internationals on the one hand, and the raving denunciations of the Clericals on the other.

Mazzini and Garibaldi, after working together in a common cause for over thirty years, Garibaldi being, during most of that time, Mazzini's disciple, have split, owing to differences of opinion upon the Paris Commune and its doctrines. Mazzini is to-day opposed to the political and social theories of the French Radicals, and comes as near laughing as his temperament will allow over their talk of "natural rights," and says that no fruitful society can be founded on any such theories; that we live and grow by discharging our duties, and not by claiming our rights; and that the social fabric which the Communists are aiming at would be one in which men would be condemned to the condition of the beaver, and in which nearly everything that gives life its charm—the individual enterprise, activity, hopefulness—would be wanting; and he is doing his best, and with considerable success, to prevent the entrance of these doctrines into Italy. The fact is, however, that the Italians have never shown any leaning to them, having apparently preserved, in spite of their faults and misfortunes and comminglings, a large share of that old practical perception of the limits of the possible in the artificial arrangement of human relations, and of the deep resulting gulf which separates, and must always separate, sentiment and law, for which the old Romans were famous, and through which their political ideas and jurisprudence have exerted such a powerful influence on modern European society. There can hardly be a more striking illustration of this than Mazzini himself. He has been all his life a sentimentalist and dreamer, and has been familiar with little else than sentimental processes, and yet, when the time comes to reorganize society, or, in other words, do the practical work of life, he becomes as cool and clear-headed as a common-law judge. Garibaldi, on the other hand, has a strong and chivalric affection for France, and has all a military adventurer's love of the picturesque and faith in the power of enthusiasm.

Baron Kellersperg's Cabinet has proved abortive, and has made room for a new Ministry under Prince Adolph Auersperg, the fourth which Cisleithan Austria has had within the last ten months—the earlier two being Count Potocki's and Count Hohenwart's. And as Hohenwart's Cabinet was an improvement on Potocki's, from a Slavic or Federalistic point of view, so Auersperg's is an improvement on Kellersperg's in the opposite, German or Centralistic, direction. The new Prime Minister is a brother of Prince Carlos Auersperg, the head of the "Citizens' Ministry" of 1868, which completed the reorganization of the monarchy on the dualistic and liberal basis adopted in the preceding year; and his associates, among whom are Lasser, Banhaus, Stremayr, and Plener, are men of the same school. To it belongs also Brestel, the newly-appointed Minister of Finance in the Cabinet for the whole empire, whose predecessor, Lónyay, succeeds Count Andrássy as Prime Minister of Hungary. Thus the "Ausgleich" with the Czechs is definitively—though, perhaps, not finally—given up, and the German Liberals of Cisleithan Austria would be exulting over their victory over Slavic, clerical, and feudal opponents in the late excited contests, had not the unexpected dismissal of Count Beust fallen like a bitter drop into the cup of their joy, reminding them that the wheel of political changes in the monarchy, which lately played so strange and so galling a trick on the Czechs, ha not ceased turning in its capricious way with the fall of the Hohen wart Cabinet.

Whether Chancellor Beust has fallen a victim to the enmity of the Ultramontanes—the natural foes of the Protestant foreigner—and their feudal backers in the intimate circles of the Hofburg; to the necessity of sacrificing somebody to the resentment of the now so harshly and certainly not very fairly treated Czechs; to the dissatisfaction and fickleness of Francis Joseph himself, who, while constantly yielding to the Count's advice, felt oppressed by an influence which both ruled and overshadowed the throne; to a court intrigue which availed itself of various imputations—of a more or less private character—long since sedulously circulated against the statesman; to the ambition of Andrássy, his successor in the Foreign Office, for which the domestic sphere of the Transleithan Cabinet was too narrow; or to more adroit machinations by Lónyay, who thus managed to occupy Andrássy's place at the head of the Hungarian Cabinet—all this, and much more of this sort, forms a lively topic of discussion in the European files before us. What is certain is that the late Chancellor of the Empire leaves his office regretted, and extolled as a statesman, by the great majority of the thinking people in both divisions of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy; that his policy—dualism and liberalism within, and firm opposition to Russia without—receives a fresh sanction in the appointment of Andrássy to succeed him; and that the Germans have more reason to regret his fall than the Czechs and their allies to rejoice over it. Hungary, too, loses by the change, as Lónyay is far from possessing the popularity and ability which made Andrássy so successful.

DIPLOMACY AND STOCKS.

THE scandal which Mr. Schenck has caused by appearing in London as a director of a concern known as the "Emma Silver Mining Company," whatever be the result as regards himself personally, will certainly help to fix the public mind more strongly than ever on the corrupting influence, both on politics and society, of our system of incorporations for industrial and other purposes; and we doubt very much whether it will not help to give currency to the views of those who believe that the time has come when we may safely give up altogether the practice of allowing persons to form joint-stock companies, with small shares, for the construction and working of mines, railroads, and other similar enterprises. The utility and even necessity of these associations in earlier times, when capital was scarce, and when it was impossible for a small number of individuals to furnish it in the quantity necessary for the proper conduct of great undertakings, were obvious enough; but in our day, when fortunes ranging from one million to thirty are so numerous, and when in nearly every State in the Union half a dozen men can be found able to shoulder almost any responsibility out of their private resources, their necessity is at least not so obvious. There is nothing which promises to pay nowadays for which capital cannot be obtained in almost any required amount, from persons who are excellent judges of what will pay; and, in point of fact, nearly all the great and successful joint-stock enterprises in the country are passing into the hands of a few individuals, who manage them as partnership concerns, and with about the same secrecy, and with far less accountability—for the joint-stock law gives them powers and immunities which, as members of a firm, they could not have. Commodore Vanderbilt, for instance, and Mr. Tom Scott, own and manage vast lines of communication to all intents and purposes as their private property, but without the burdens attaching to the ownership of private property, because they enjoy the privileges of shareholders—or, in other words, enjoy, as proprietors, a kind of exemption from responsibility which was originally devised for the protection of persons of small means, contributing from scanty savings to the prosecution of enterprises which could only be prosecuted through co-operation.

It is not this particular vice of the corporation system, however, which Mr. Schenck's case illustrates, so much as the way in which it is made, in our day, the instrument of monstrous frauds on persons of small means. The extent of these frauds and the wideness of the area over which their corrupting influence extends are almost incalculable. If, when a party of speculators wished to raise capital for the opening of a mine or the construction of a railroad, they were obliged, by the state of the law of liability, to seek it from great capitalists who are mostly men of ripe judgment and long experience in affairs, and who would either know whether a scheme was worth taking up, or would be able to take care of themselves, or bear the loss if it turned out badly, we may be sure that the number of such schemes would be greatly reduced, and the value to the public of those actually carried out would be greatly increased.

But as matters stand, a very large proportion of the capital put into speculative enterprises comes, through the sale of stock and corporation bonds, from persons of comparatively meagre fortunes; and the very first thing that speculators do when bringing such schemes into the market, is not so much to draw in the great capitalists—for they know this is not easy—as to make effective arrangements for getting at the small ones scattered all over the country, who are relying on their investments for the income which furnishes them with daily bread. Here it is the imposition begins, and, to make it successful, as large a number of persons of influence as possible have to be made participators in it. The bonds—if bonds they be—are handed over to a banker—not for himself, of course, but for sale—and to push their sale he uses, directly or indirectly, all the instrumentalities within his reach. The most potent of these instruments is the press, which is seduced by advertisements, given on the rigid condition that they shall be backed up by "editorial notices," although in nine cases out of ten nearly every assertion they make is either a direct falsehood or a misrepresentation. This use of the press is, indeed, carried so far that it is already alleged by well-informed men that the newspapers which are not edited, in a greater or less degree, in the interest of advertising operators, or are not used to push their schemes, may be almost counted on one's fingers. In some cases, indeed, the editor or publisher actually becomes an agent for the sale of the bonds or stock which he is engaged in puffing, and makes a double profit off the unfortunate country investors whom he assists in deceiving.

Next in importance to the command of the press is the command of good substantial names on the board of directors, and this is in England, perhaps, a more valuable aid than any other. The usages of the London papers of influence make it difficult or impossible to get any direct editorial help in disposing of speculative stocks, and little is known of "the great and good men" in the editorial chairs, and therefore less importance is or would be attached to anything he said in recommendation of the bonds of an "Air Line" road or the shares of a Bear's Grease Company. Moreover, small investors in England are not quite so speculative as they are here, as the struggle of life is harder, and the chances of getting up after a fall much smaller, so they cling with some tenacity to consols or well-established securities. The darling weakness of the English mind is, however, as everybody knows, an admiration of rank or official position. There are few Englishmen who have the heart to doubt a lord or even a baronet, or refuse anything he asks, and they cover all men of high office with much the same reverence. On this weakness the speculators in London play with the same adroitness with which speculators here play on the American faith in the press, and especially the religious press, and with fully as much success. Instead of making terms with "enterprising publishers," they try to get imposing names on the board of directors—if those of a lord or two, or of a baronet, so much the better; a general or colonel is, however, not bad, and a knight is better than a mere "esquire." There have been, as is well known to everybody who has had any knowledge of the processes by which speculative securities are forced on the London market, cases in which broken-down peers and baronets who could not get a pair of boots on credit, have lived for years out of sums paid them for the use of their names on the board of direction of gold, and silver, and copper, and iron, and coal, and oil, and vinegar, and pepper companies, and it ought to be added that they have found even kinder and more considerate employers among Americans than among Englishmen, for the American speculators who appear in London generally take up the old British devices for getting at other people's money, and make ingenious improvements in them which greatly increase their efficiency.

We believe there is no case on record, however, of their having got hold of a foreign minister until now, although, of course, his name would have been worth any money to them; and it must be said that, considering the sorrowful experience the public has had in this country of gold and silver mines during the last ten years, there has been a mixture of audacity and dexterity, in securing the name of the American Minister for the direction of a western silver mine, which has never been surpassed in this particular field. Viewed in the light of recent mining history, it may safely be said that any new silver-mine or gold-mine enterprise of which the scene is laid in Utah, or Colorado, or Montana, or Arizona, is presumptively a swindle—that is, it may be honest, but the burden of proof lies on the promoters. Now, the burden of such proof in the case of this "Emma Mine" is, from all we hear, heavy, and that its promoters should have perceived that they would need an ambassador to help them through with it, and should have got him, shows them to be men of the highest order of ability in their particular line, and yet not men of judgment—for, though an ambassador can do a good deal towards selling a fancy stock in a flunkeyish community, he is, owing to the responsibility of his position, a somewhat unreliable ally, and cannot compare to a nobleman, for an ambassador may to-morrow lose his office, while a nobleman cannot lose his title. The selection in this case is doubly unfortunate because, whatever Minister Schenck's name may do for a silver company, plain Robert C. Schenck can hardly help it much in England, and would not help it at all here.

The public indignation has been already deeply roused by the news of the indiscretion he has committed, and we do not well see how it can avoid ending in his recall. He cannot be allowed to choose between the company and his place, because his consenting to the company's use of his name reveals at least a weakness of judgment which almost amounts to proof of unfitness. We are afraid, too, that it will do Mr. Schenck a still greater injury than this, in confirming and spreading an impression about him which prevailed widely before he went to England—the impression, derived from observation of his career in Washington, that he is what is called in the slang of the City Hall politicians "on the make"—that is, looking about for chances to make money, and not as particular as he ought to have been about their nature. We have never alluded to this before, and have never spoken of him personally except in terms of respect, and warmly approved of his appointment to England, and we have now no good reason for believing that this suspicion has a particle of foundation. That the suspicion should have arisen is the natural consequence of the relations in which Congress—and especially the Committee of Ways and Means—is placed, under the protective system, to a large body of manufacturers and speculators, who find every year that fortunes may be made or lost by changes in the tariff. Mr. Schenck was long Chairman of that Committee, and very influential in the House on all tariff questions, and was thus exposed to temptations of which, in the present state of political morals, it is difficult to overestimate the power. It therefore behooved him to walk with extraordinary circumspection; that he did not walk with circumspection enough the rumors to which we have referred showed—but they were vague rumors, to which any man is exposed, and which a man conscious of his own purity could readily disregard. But it will be very difficult for Mr. Schenck to disregard them after he has taken the unprecedented step of lending to mining speculators in London the weight given to his name by the bestowal on him by the nation of an office of great dignity, and which has for eighty years been filled by men not only of the highest ability but of the highest personal character.

There is one other circumstance which helps seriously to aggravate Mr. Schenck's misfortune, and that is the temper of the public mind with regard to the whole matter of the influence of money on political life. People are greatly roused on this subject; they are becoming more roused every day; and, unless we are greatly mistaken in the signs of the times, they are likely to continue roused until a reform is effected. There is a deep and widespread determination growing up that men shall not go into the politics of this community for the purpose of making fortunes, and that politicians shall not use their offices, or influence or authority acquired from their offices, to fill their pockets; and, more than this, that persons in the public service shall not only be pure, but that they shall behave in such fashion, and avoid all such associations, and the incurrence of all such obligations in the way of presents, gifts, donations, and testimonials, as shall put their purity in doubt, or shall weaken their authority over their subordinates.

It does not make the slightest difference whether Mr. Schenck's conduct has been pure or not; the rule in all such cases is the sound and old one, which was applied to Bacon's case, when he said that the bribes received from suitors did not affect his decisions—viz., that a person in an official position must not assume relations towards others which are calculated either to weaken the public confidence in his integrity, or to furnish a precedent which would enable bad men to cover up their corruption: that is, a Kent must not receive presents from litigants, lest he should give a Barnard an excuse for taking them; a Grant must not put himself under obligations to office-holders, lest a Tweed should some day make the whole civil service a vast machine for enriching himself. So, also, we would say to the Government, "Do not allow Mr. Schenck to bring mining ventures on the London market, for as sure as you do, we shall see the London Mission sought by rings of speculators for the express purpose of bringing out swindling enterprises"; just as we would have said, two or three months ago, "Do not give the foreign banking business of the Government to a rich New York politician, because he promises you or has given you a good deal of money for electioneering purposes—for, as sure as you do, this business will become one of the prizes at every Presidential election, and will help to sink our politics still lower into that pit of corruption into which all good men now look down with so much alarm." The country at large has but one duty in the matter, and that is to insist—cost what it may and damage whom it may—that this mingling of politics and money, this conversion of every public office into an "opportunity" for enrichment, shall cease.

THE "REVENUE REFORM" MYSTERY.

THE one question which must come before the next Congress, and before every Congress till it is finally settled—whatever else be neglected or postponed—is the manner of raising the revenue. Nobody is satisfied with the present method, and no method will ever be a finality, which the country will accept, which creates, as the present method does, a privileged class. As we have often said before, whatever the merits of the protective system may be, its permanence in a democratic country is not to be looked for. The popular feeling is, in the long run, sure to rise against any system of which the benefits to a few are visible and enormous, the benefits to the many—supposing them to exist—invisible, indirect, and remote. There is little use in the manufacturer, whose fortunes the duties are building up rapidly, telling the consumer that part of the advantage works round to him in the long run, through the increased prosperity of the country. The great mass of men have always associated and will always associate prosperity with cheapness of food, clothing, and furniture. High wages, in money, dazzle men who have been working at a lower rate, but the feeling of satisfaction never lasts long if the purchasing power of the wages is small. Few will eat poor fare, and wear poor clothes, and live in a poor house many years, in the hope that by so doing they may contribute, at some indefinite period, to the establishment of a particular kind of industry, or prepare the country for a war, which may never break out, with some nation with which it is now in profound peace. This may evince a lamentable want of self-sacrifice and sagacity, but the mass of men are not in a high degree self-sacrificing or sagacious. Men, as M. Thiers, himself a great protectionist, wisely and wittily said, "will die for their country readily enough, but they will not make pig-iron for their country." He might have added that they will not go on indefinitely either buying dear pig-iron when they can get it cheaply. The blindness on these points which prevails among the advocates of protection might be illustrated in a hundred ways; but one illustration, which lies before us at this moment, is as good as a hundred, though to call it an illustration of blindness simply is a mild way of putting it. The New York Tribune of November 28 contains the following, the like of which has not often appeared in print:

> "When J. B. Say, the French economist, published his translation of Adam Smith's 'Wealth of Nations,' Napoleon (the great, not the little) examined the book, and seeing that the visionary but mischievous translator had elevated the specious selfishness of British Free Trade into a positive science, he interdicted its further publication and sale for a period of twelve years. In that interval the great Emperor furnished the world with a complete refutation of the Free Trade sophistries."

No theory advocated in that spirit can long stand in a free country. We have freely condemned the arbitrary course of "the great Emperor's" nephew in forcing free trade on Frenchmen without consulting them, but free trade is at most nothing more than the absence of government interference with the operations of trade and industry. But what are we to say or think of a school of economists which can see something admirable in the suppression, by a blood-stained military despot, of works arguing against government interference? And yet this admiration of the despot and his processes is, when we come to think of it, the most natural thing in the world. Despots are the only persons who can really establish and carry out a policy of protection. Protection was everywhere begun and maintained by arbitrary governments. The relaxation of restrictions on trade and industry has everywhere gone on pari passu with the growth of political freedom. No popular government can ever long look a community in the face and tell the men who elect it, and whom it serves, that it knows better than they into what industries they should put their capital, and in what markets they should buy and sell; and we need hardly say no popular government can ever be depended on to suppress a book, whether original or translated, "for a period of twelve years," or any other period, while it is trying industrial experiments. The protectionist experiment here has neither cavalry, infantry, nor artillery, nor a censorship of the press, to depend on for security against criticism or interference. It has to be carried on in the light of day, under the popular eye, and must be able to bear the worst its enemies can say of it.

One of the assaults on it which "the great Emperor" would not only have suppressed for a period of twelve years, but would probably have punished by sending the author out of France, but which American legislators, having no gendarmes at their disposal, would do well to read and consider, is Mr. Edward Atkinson's article in the October number of the Atlantic Monthly, which has just been reprinted in pamphlet form, and we select it for commendation not more for the value of its arguments than for the value of its testimony, because it comes from a New England manufacturer, and therefore does not lie under the suspicion of corruption which attaches in many minds to all advocacy of free trade or "revenue reform" emanating from persons engaged in foreign trade or having cousins or uncles engaged in it.

Mr. Atkinson appears once more as the expounder of the doctrine known as "revenue reform," and which, for many ingenuous minds, beginning with that of the President, has some of the difficulty, not to say inscrutability, of the problems of the higher mathematics. When a gentleman of General Grant's ability asks whether revenue reform means the repudiation of the national debt, and announces that if it does he is opposed to it, nobody who undertakes to explain it needs any excuse for coming before the country, and no Congressman who proposes to vote this winter on any question connected with the tariff can excuse himself for not studying it.

Mr. Atkinson's positions are in substance these: that the entire force of the protectionist argument lies in treating the production of steel and iron in their crude or primary forms, and the production of textile fabrics from wool and cotton and flax, as the only manufactures to whose promotion everything else should be subordinated, whereas they are only a very small proportion of the manufactures of the country, and only a very small—absurdly small—proportion of the products of the national industry used by the agricultural population in whose interest, it is said, they should be fostered. The entire force of workmen engaged in all the steel-works of the United States would only be sufficient to run one large machine-shop, and the entire capital invested in them would be barely sufficient to build and equip one hundred and fifty miles of railroad; and yet, for the protection of this industry, the price of the million and a quarter tons of steel rails needed every year by American railroads is raised, by protective duties, by a sum equal to the total capital invested in the steel business, and which, if invested at six per cent., would pension all the men now employed in steel-works at two dollars a day for their lives. All this, be it remembered, to the incalculable detriment of the people who use steel in manufactures—locomotive and car builders, boiler-makers and tool-makers, and so on.

It is on the subject of cotton manufactures, however, that Mr. Atkinson's testimony is most suggestive and weighty. He alleges that, even if it be true that wages are twenty-five per cent. higher here now than in England, her advantage in labor is only five per cent. on goods worth twelve cents a yard, and with this she has to meet the cost of transportation and other charges; so that in coarse fabrics the American manufacturer now actually beats her even in the English colonies. Her real advantage in the finer kinds of goods lies, says Mr. Atkinson, in the cheapness of her machinery, and in the absence of taxes on the fuel and clothing of her operatives, and these are so great as to give her not only the home market, but the markets of the world, while we cannot hold our own in the home market alone. But, as Mr. Atkinson truly remarks, if we were to open our ports to-morrow, Great Britain could not supply all our wants and compete with our domestic industry, because she has neither the machinery, mills, labor, nor capital ready for the work, and if she attempted it would so raise wages and the price of all commodities used by the laborer as at once to destroy the advantages she now possesses over us. To supply us with the cotton goods alone which we need, she would have to put $100,000,000 fresh capital into the business, and employ 120,000 new operatives. The effect of this on profits need not be stated. In fact, Mr. Atkinson performs a neat reductio ad absurdum on our present revenue system when he says—what is literally true—that, with the highest tariff ever enacted, there is the largest importation of specially protected articles, viz., cotton and woollen goods, iron and steel, ever known. In other words, the tariff has made our market the best in the world for foreigners to sell in, and the worst in the world to buy in. Surely there must, on the protective theory, be something wrong here. When a rational man reads that, an enormous duty having been imposed on foreign wool for the protection of native wool-growers, woollen mills have, under its influence, greatly multiplied in Canada, their products being freely smuggled across the frontier; that our imports of foreign woollen goods reach the enormous sum of $50,000,000 annually; and that the number of sheep has fallen in Ohio, one of the greatest wool-growing States, from 7,688,845 in 1868, to 4,302,904 in 1871, he cannot avoid feeling that what our protectionist friends really need, to keep such a system going, is "a great Emperor," with a large army and a vigorous police. Nothing but brute force can make a civilized and sane community support it indefinitely; and the work to which the high-tariff men should set themselves next winter is the passage of an act submitting all works on political economy to a Board of Censorship, composed of Mr. Greeley, Mr. Henry C. Carey, and Judge Kelley, and making illicit publication punishable summarily on conviction by Commissioners of Internal Revenue and Collectors of Ports.

Mr. Atkinson, obiter, convicts our esteemed friend Mr. Shellabarger, of Ohio, of what Mr. Greeley calls having "lied knowingly, wilfully, and with naked intent to deceive," in saying, in a speech in the late canvass in Ohio, "that Great Britain retained such protective duties as were deemed by her adequate for the purposes of her industries, they being ten per cent. on all wrought manufactures, on all metals, articles of cotton, wool, etc." In saying this, Mr. Shellabarger showed that he either knew nothing about the British tariff, or invented this account of it as he went along. Great Britain collects no revenue on the articles he mentions. Her whole customs revenue is derived from tea, coffee, sugar, wines, liquor, tobacco, and fruits. A similar rate of duty on the same articles would, as Mr. Atkinson says, give us all the customs revenue we require, and he thereupon produces a "Revenue Reform Budget" which no protectionist "great Emperor" would allow to see the light, as long as he had a bayonet at command or a revenue reformer to stick it into; but of this we have no time to speak this week.

NEWSPAPER FIGHTS.

We made some remarks, some weeks ago—about the peculiarly professional character of the encounters which are almost constantly going on between the newspapers of the various towns, cities, and villages of our common country—which seemed to meet with so much favor and acceptance that we are tempted to explain ourselves more fully. We said then that these encounters interested nobody, and were watched by nobody but other newspaper men—an assertion which, at first sight, seems sweeping and rash, but which a very slight examination of the facts will show to be almost literally true. Although the American people are great newspaper readers, those who read two daily newspapers, either of the same party or of opposite parties, may be said to be confined almost exclusively to politicians or editors. The politicians take a great many papers, and read them, partly to inform themselves as to the events of the day, and partly to discover in what direction the tide of public opinion is flowing, and editors have to make it a daily duty to look over their "exchanges" from all parts of the country. But nobody or next to nobody else thinks of such a thing. In the cities, there are not many persons who read even two articles in one daily paper through from beginning to end; the great majority, especially of business men, look at the heading, and skim over the earlier part of the article. In the country men read more carefully, but there is hardly a farmer, a country merchant, or lawyer in the United States who reads the articles of more than one newspaper. Around New York and two or three other large cities, persons in easy circumstances are apt to take one city paper besides their own local paper, and perhaps read them both, but the practice is confined to a small circle. In this city and the neighborhood, we suspect the number of those who read both the Times and Tribune, or either of these papers or the World or Herald, with anything like system or interest, might not amount to over a few dozen, always excepting the politicians and persons connected, in one way or another, with the press.

Now, to get real enjoyment out of a fight, one has to see and hear both combatants, especially when the conflict is one of words. A theatrical set-to, in which one party is away behind the scenes, or outside a window, and in which all we know of his "practice" is what we learn from his opponent's replies and counter-hits, is one of the tamest and dullest spectacles imaginable, and if offered as an entertainment by itself would not be tolerated. Indeed, people only submit to it when it some way contributes to the progress of a drama, or, in other words, is one of the incidents of a "situation." Now, a newspaper fight is, to the general public, exactly like a theatrical fight of this description, without the surrounding drama. When, for instance, the Times and Tribune have an encounter, hardly anybody but editors get the full benefit of the show. The newspaper men form a dense throng round the scene of conflict, and they—and they only—see the two men shy their castors into the ring, get home on each other's conks, draw each other's claret, flatten each other's smellers, knock each other down, and otherwise smash, bruise, and maltreat each other. It is altogether from the newspapers that the applause and encouragement on both sides comes; it is only newspaper men who can tell the exact effect of the Tribune's hits or the Times's counter-hits; which looks groggy, which comes up smiling, which is forcing the fighting, and which seems unwilling to leave his corner. The odds on the first knockdown, the first blood, and the final event are all offered and taken by newspaper men. You could not get a layman to "put up" five cents on any fight that has taken place in or about Park Row within fifteen years. The reason is obvious. The outside public sees the play of Greeley's terrible right, but of the effect on Jones's knowledge-box or bread-basket (these gentlemen must, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, excuse this familiar use of them as illustrations) it can see nothing; or it sees Jones deliver his vicious left-hander, but what portion of Greeley's carcase it attained, and how he took it, and whether he parried it, it cannot tell.

Take the case of the "lies" told by the Times about John V. Gridley. From the Tribune the public learnt that the Times had told about twelve lies in a single issue about this one man. Now, the Tribune's public would have liked to hear from the Times itself what gave Gridley this malefic influence on its morals, but, knowing that this was impossible, it took no interest in the matter. Take, again, the case of Mr. Greeley's connection with the Bowling Green Savings-Bank. The Times's public is given to understand that Greeley went into a scheme for getting up a savings-bank for the simple purpose of defrauding poor emigrants of their money in sums of ten cents and upwards; but one's interest in such a charge is largely dependent on the manner in which Greeley meets it, and it being impossible to know how Greeley meets it without taking the Tribune as well as the Times, people let it pass carelessly, as in some sense a question of "lunar politics." The same observations may be made, mutatis mutandis, on nearly all the great newspaper controversies, even on public questions. Take, for instance, the perennial dispute between the World and Tribune on the tariff. To newspaper men it is interesting enough, and, perhaps, does something towards changing or modifying their convictions, but to the general public, who never see more than one side, it is almost unintelligible. The Tribune, which displays a keener perception of this difficulty than any of the other papers, occasionally makes extracts from an opponent before proceeding to annihilate him, but, as is well known to controversialists, the power of making "extracts" from an enemy before assailing him may be so used as to be the equivalent of the process—to recur to our former illustration—known to pugilists as getting a man's head "in chancery." In this process one combatant puts his arm, with an appearance of affection, round the other's neck, gets hold, if he can, of one of his hands, and, having thus fixed his head and face in an exposed and convenient position, goes on to punch them in a leisurely but effective manner. To choose one's self the passage which contains one's opponent's case is a somewhat analogous mode of dealing with him, and when done dexterously, the "punishment" inflicted on him may sometimes be awful, though we do not affirm that it may not be in many cases richly deserved. Nevertheless, it is not a process which the humane care to witness, and can never furnish really good entertainment to any but professional eyes.

The amount of space which is given up in nearly all papers to the refutation of other papers—we are not now talking of the personal quarrels of the editors—is a striking illustration in fact of the extent to which the press, and especially the metropolitan press, is addressed to editors, and how largely any one paper is indebted for its influence on the country to the impression it makes on the editors. It is only the latter, who are familiar with the result of the various great "mills" which have come off at different times in the newspaper world, who know anything of the training and condition of the more prominent bruisers now in the field, and can, therefore, estimate the probable result of any of the coming "engagements," and they give their readers the benefit of their knowledge in a sort of mixed narrative and commentary, like the account which Rebecca gave Ivanhoe of the progress of the assault on Bois-Guilbert's castle. All over Massachusetts, for instance, people are largely dependent on the Springfield Republican for all they know and care to know of the various press encounters in New York, how they began, and how they ended or are likely to end. People in the Northwest have the same burning tale day by day from the Cincinnati Commercial or Chicago Tribune, and so on all through the country, and we venture to assert that far more minute and accurate knowledge of these encounters is to be met with among the readers of country papers at a distance from the scene of conflict, than among the public of this city or the environs.

There is no doubt, however, that the general readers of papers of a combative turn, or of papers actually engaged in a fight, hold themselves deeply wronged by it, and complain of it bitterly. We have made frequent extensive enquiries on this point, and have never yet met anybody, man or woman, not connected with the press, who cared one straw about any fight in which his or her paper was engaged, and who did not consider it a mixture of nuisance and fraud, or who did not wonder at the superlative folly of continuing it. The combativeness of editors may therefore be considered, on the whole, injurious to them from a commercial point of view, and one can only account for it by ascribing it to their sensitiveness to the opinion of their professional brethren—a weakness they share with lawyers, who will often "spat" in court for a whole day, through mere professional spite and jealousy, and to the manifest disgust of the jury and injury of their clients. The editor, in like manner, who knows the other editors are watching him, and who has his reputation to maintain with them, cannot bear to have the man over the way seem to get the better of him or have the last word; and it is the misfortune of the profession, that these quarrels, instead of being fought out in courts or clubs or professional societies, have to be conducted under the eyes of the world.

In most quarrels of the secular press there is, however, an element of jocoseness which greatly mitigates the horrors of the actual conflict. Of cool malignity, hitting below the belt, and seizing the enemy by the hair, and jumping on him when he is down, we fear most of the examples must be sought among our brethren of the religious press. They are not easily roused, but when they are, they care nothing about the rules of the ring. If they were not all weeklies, we fear they would spread desolation all around them; but there is, it must be admitted, something ludicrous in the mutual hostility of a pair of weeklies. The daily editor, when he is in a fight, nearly always writes in a passion. He gets up late, and does not receive his antagonist's blow till about noon, often later. He does not get to his office till, say, three in the afternoon. In the meantime, the more he has thought over the matter, the more deep-dyed has the other fellow's rascality seemed to him, the more patent and barefaced his lying. When he gets to his office, the smiles or excitement of his subordinates, and the ill-concealed derision of his acquaintances, combine, during the whole evening, to deepen his indignation, and night-work has probably done a good deal to make him nervous and excitable. So his return "castigation," composed at a later hour, is apt to be a regular burst of fury. Not so his weekly brother. The worst newspaper assault on another newspaper, especially of a personal character, is apt to lose most of its sting in thirty-six hours. The most carefully prepared one is apt to be a little ludicrous in forty-eight hours, and in three days, the man who sits down to answer it in kind must be either a real vessel of wrath or else a wholly humorless blockhead. Then the fight is carried on at long range, and with feeble artillery. There is something preposterous, in the very nature of things, in Smith's calling Brown a fool on Friday because he, on the previous Thursday week, had called Smith a knave. But then, anybody who carries his indignation for a week, and nurses it carefully all that time, is apt to be a very ugly customer, and, if his indignation has a religious tinge, is as dangerous an antagonist as anybody can encounter. Some of the most shocking press fights that have occurred have been between religious papers over their comparative circulation. There is no subject on which the genuine newspaper mind is so sensitive as about circulation. A thorough newspaper man will stop at hardly anything to keep up his reputation for large circulation, and will go through any shifts or humiliations to avoid being suspected of a small one. It acts on him as hardly any other charge will. You may accuse him of lying or stealing with a fair chance of seeing your reproaches received with a smiling front; but insinuate that his circulation is low, and, above all, declining, and you rouse the tiger in him, and may know that apologies are useless, and accommodation is impossible. A charge of this kind comes on religious papers with peculiar bitterness, because they do not profess to be mere commercial ventures, as most secular papers hardly deny being. They are to a large extent preachers also, and the charge has, therefore, a double sting—that of commercial failure and rejected and despised counsel on the most sacred themes.

ENGLAND.—MR. GLADSTONE AT GREENWICH.

LONDON, November 10, 1871.

WHEN last I wrote to you, all England was anxiously expecting Mr. Gladstone's great speech to his Greenwich constituents. We were told that it was to be sent by telegraph to America—a circumstance upon which the penny-a-liners dilated after their fashion, but which proves at any rate that you will have had time to form your own opinions on the matter long before my letter reaches you. I may, however, give you what, so far as I can judge, is the general impression as to the merits of the performance. Putting aside the ecstacies of Mr. Gladstone's thick-and-thin supporters, and the snarls of his cynical despisers, it may be safely said that the speech was a decided success. His dramatic position was favorable. He could fairly assume the attitude of an overworked servant of the nation, forced to leave his arduous duties for a time in order to encounter to their faces the deserters who had endeavored to attack him in the rear. An attempt made to roar him down at the opening of his speech served only to increase his great triumph. The speech, however, was itself able and eloquent, and has probably gone a long way to secure his seat in the borough for some time to come. The weak point in it was the complete absence of any indication of his future policy. The etiquette which regulates such matters would have prevented him from promising any distinct measures; but it would have been certainly desirable that he should have pledged himself to some distinct principles as to the important matters which are coming before the country. I have seen the fading popularity of Mr. Gladstone ascribed to the dislike of his enthusiasm felt by London society. I would by no means deny that this is to some extent the case; as, for example, the abolition of the purchase system provoked a curious amount of hostility from many who profess to be described as Liberals. But the dislike of over-refined persons to Mr. Gladstone's enthusiastic adoption of popular cries is a matter of small moment. The real danger to which he is exposed is the distrust of the more thoroughgoing members of his own party. They do not doubt his honesty; but they have no belief in his steadiness, clear-headedness, or straightforwardness. If you wish to see the grounds of this dislike explained with considerable force, I recommend to you an article by Mr. Fawcett in the current number of the Fortnightly. It should be read with the recollection that, if we may judge from their behavior in the House of Commons, it would not be easy to find two more uncompromising antagonists than the Prime Minister and the most Puritanical of Radicals. They hate each other, to all appearance, as we may fancy that Robespierre, in his most austere days, must have hated the eloquent, shifty, and untrustworthy Girondins. However, Mr. Fawcett, strong as his feelings may be, is only expressing what is felt by a good many of his party.

I turn, however, to a manifesto by another rising politician of the same school which has provoked a good deal of amusement and probably a good deal of indignation. Sir Charles Dilke is a very young man for his position—being still on the right side of thirty. He is endowed with great energy and a boundless thirst for useful information. He went round the world, and, as you are aware, published the results of his observations in a book called "Greater Britain," of which I need only say that it proved his zeal in acquiring knowledge to be equalled by his courage in generalizing from his facts. His manner as an orator has the fault of that slight tinge of pomposity which is the natural result of premature wisdom; but, whatever his foibles, he is really a man of much vigor and likely to make his way. Just now he seems disposed to be bidding for popular support by advancing extreme opinions. He has found out that our last Reform Act has still left a wide field for agitation in the inequality of electoral districts; but in his last speech he has struck a bolder note, and caused a momentary shiver in well-regulated circles. Sir Charles Dilke has declared for a republic. Moreover, his declaration was greeted by the unanimous applause of a large audience at Newcastle. The Royal family have received notice to quit; they are pronounced to be a useless encumbrance, and are told that the people of England are growing not so much indignant as tired of keeping up an empty show. Royalty has become a mere tumble-down excrescence which has not even the merit of being picturesque; and the sooner we get rid of it, the better. That such conclusions should be applauded in a large English audience is a curious sign of the times; but, to understand its meaning, we must look a little further. Sir Charles's argument was a remarkably simple one, and is that which seems to be at present the favorite argument with the working-class. He regards the whole question from a purely pecuniary point of view; it is simply a matter of debit and credit. Asking what the Queen does, and how much she is paid for it, he finds that the same duties would be done on more reasonable terms by the president of a republic; and therefore he proposes to get rid of the Queen for the president, just as a lady might resolve to give up a footman and take a parlor-maid in his place. The illustrations by which this argument was enforced were well enough calculated for the tastes of a popular audience. The Queen's privy purse, the sums paid the several members of the Royal family, and various expenses of that kind, come to about £700,000. Then the Horse Guards, being an ornamental but utterly useless body of troops, cost £100,000 more than a similar number of cavalry of the line. Next we have the Royal yachts, which cost at least as much more; and Sir Charles declared that he had found an able-bodied seaman employed all the year round in decorating them with portraits of the lion and unicorn. Besides all this, we have all the strange apparatus of a semi-feudal household, a hereditary Grand Falconer, a Master of the Buckhounds, Exons in waiting (whatever they may be), Gentlemen-Ushers, and a medical staff, beginning with three physicians in ordinary, and ending with one chemist in ordinary, which is thus composed of thirty-two doctors for one family. Sir Charles had, of course, little difficulty in making fun of these arrangements to workmen who have been lately fighting a hard battle for a few more shillings a week; but they appear to have heartily enjoyed his speech and agreed with his summing up of the case. Royalty costs us, in the various ways indicated, at least a million a year. For this sum the Queen has really nothing to do, except to sign a great number of documents. The remuneration is evidently excessive; and—here, perhaps, there is a slight gap in the argument—a republican form of government would necessarily be cheap, honest, and efficient. Sir Charles hurried rather hastily over this difficult ground; and ended—not by proposing an immediate revolution, but by significantly intimating his belief that it was time for the monarchy to set its house in order.

I am inclined to think myself that if we could get rid of the monarchy without a hard fight we should be the better for the change; though, as I see no probability of such a revolution being carried out without creating a violent contest, I should prefer that we should not try to pluck the fruit before it is ripe. I have, therefore, no particular prejudice against Sir Charles's conclusions; but I confess that I regret the tone of his arguments. It is simply absurd to argue a constitutional question on commercial grounds. The million a year which we spend upon the Royal family is a mere trifle compared with the pecuniary waste that would be caused by a corrupt republican form of government, and even that waste is of small importance as compared with the moral injury that would be inflicted. I do not say that a republican form of government in England would be corrupt; but I mean to point out that the question cannot be decided for reasonable men by a mere comparison of salaries, but involves far wider and more important issues. I repeat, therefore, that I regret to see a young man of much ability appealing to the very lowest motives which can be brought into play upon such a topic; yet this incessant recurrence to the immediate cost of the monarchy in money is characteristic of all our incipient republicanism, though the argument has seldom found so complete an expression. A nation which should take so hopelessly narrow a view of constitutional questions as to fancy that this was a worthy mode of treatment would show a low order of political intelligence; and I do not think that so long as republicanism is merely a matter of the breeches pocket, it will become a very formidable power. A party must have some ideas that cannot be expressed in terms of pounds, shillings, and pence, if it would be long-lived; and I do not think so little of my countrymen as to believe that oratory of the kind described sinks very deeply into their bosoms.

One inference, however, may be safely drawn from this and other orations of the kind. Money is grudged for the support of the monarchy, simply because the Royal family has lost its personal popularity. The fact is steadily becoming more evident. Newspapers say that it is because the Queen does not show herself sufficiently, and beg her to secure the monarchy by encouraging London tradesmen and taking part in public shows. I have no doubt that by such a course she might win the hearts of a good many tailors, upholsterers, and footmen. Whether she would regain her place in the national affections seems to me to be a more doubtful proposition. The Queen is a most exemplary person; but, somehow, personal loyalty even towards her has become so cold that I doubt whether it can be reawakened by any mere pageantry; and the Queen's probable successor shows no symptoms of possessing any of those qualities that tend to popular magnetism. His manners are good; and I believe him to be well-meaning, if not remarkably wise. But, whatever the cause, the fact I am sure remains. Twenty years ago, enthusiastic loyalty to the persons of the Royal family was a great political fact. It has been succeeded by a profound indifference, with a considerable tinge of contempt. Speeches like Sir Charles Dilke's would once have made a popular audience angry; they would have been revolted by this petty, tradesmanlike mode of appraising the services of their Queen. Now a large audience is pleased, and the outside world is simply amused. Swords have long given up leaping from their scabbards when Queens are insulted—now they scarcely give even the faintest rattle.

TAXATION IN FRANCE.

PARIS, November 9.

I TOLD you in my last letter that I would attempt to give you some idea of the labors of a General Council in France. Its most important business is the supervision of the departmental budget. This budget is prepared by the Prefect and presented by him to the Council. It must not be thought that the Council can change it at its pleasure. The general lines, if I might so say, of the departmental budget are drawn by an Imperial law, by which I mean the general law of the budget as voted by the Chamber. If you examine the general budget voted at Versailles, you will find in it an item—"Departmental and Communal Budgets." In our system of financial administration, which, like everything else, bears the mark of centralization, there are no departmental collectors, communal collectors; the state collectors receive all the taxes, only their receipts are divided under three heads, and attributed to the state, to the department, to the commune. This must never be lost sight of by those who study the finances of France. In every French budget, you see at a glance all the expenses of the country in the shape of taxes, while in the English budget, for instance, you find nothing but the Imperial taxes, and you can form no idea of the local taxation. Not only all the collectors of the state employed in France to levy the taxes for departments and the commune, but the taxes themselves, are not specialized. The peasant or proprietor, at the time he pays his taxes to the collector, does not know, unless he has had time to read the discussions of the Imperial budget, how much he actually gives to the state, how much to his own department and to his own village. There are four direct taxes, and they are the fountain whence state, department, and commune are all supplied. These four direct taxes are, (1) the land tax, which is the heaviest and most productive; (2) the personal and furniture tax, which is a tax of capitation as well as on the furniture possessed by every householder; (3) the tax on doors and windows, which is at bottom a house tax; (4) a license tax, which is paid by all those who are engaged in a manual or liberal occupation, by the lawyer as well as by the manufacturer, by the doctors as well as by the shoemakers.

Let us study the working of this system in its details. The law of the 4th September, 1871, enacted at Versailles, fixed the general amount of the four direct taxes for the whole of France and for every department; the department of Oise, for instance, is required to pay, under this head, about three million francs of land tax, half a million of personal and furniture tax, half a million of door and window tax, etc. Now, here begins the business of the General Council. There are in the department four subdivisions called arrondissements. It is for the Council to apportion the direct taxes between these four districts, taking as a basis on the one hand population, and on the other the quality of the land, which is divided, according to its fertility, into three classes. This apportionment is practically made in the bureaux of the Prefecture, and is about the same every year, so that the Council has nothing to do but to approve what is proposed by the Prefect. However, if any commune thinks itself too heavily taxed, it can send a petition to the Council, which examines it. The classification of the land, which was completed under the reign of Louis Philippe, is called the cadastre. There is in every village a map of all the lands of the commune with their limits marked, and at every subdivision of the land a new limit is marked. These maps cannot be compared, for simplicity, with those I have seen in the Far West, where astronomy and geodesy furnished the first landmarks; and, as the quality of the land has often been changed by the progress of agriculture, the actual classification is not as correct as it ought to be; but the principle of equity which consists in levying the smallest tax on the poorest land, ought not to be abandoned. The best plan would be to have a tax in proportion to the rent; but as there are so many peasant-proprietors in France, the determination of the rent would often become very difficult.

Suppose, now, that the taxes are levied. A large part goes to the state. What becomes of the remainder? It goes into the receipts of the department and of the commune; but it does not form the whole of these receipts. Let us leave the communes aside, and speak only of the department. The department is an invention of the French Revolution; it is, historically speaking, a new thing; therefore, we cannot expect it to possess much land, while some communes, being the heirs of ancient incorporated boroughs, own forests, pasture land, buildings, etc. The law allows each department to vote additional taxes, in proportion to the amount of the state taxes assigned to it by the Imperial budget. These local taxes are called additional centimes, each centime being the hundredth part of the franc. When a department votes a centime, it votes the hundredth part of the direct state land tax. It is as if an American State voted a cent more than the dollar for every dollar of a certain specified tax. These additional centimes form a very important item in the budget of the department; the law on the General Councils allows them to vote those additional centimes, only it fixes a limit which they cannot surpass. The maximum which they can vote is 26 centimes for the general expenses of the department (which enter into the budget under the head of ordinary expenses); for roads, 7 centimes; for schools, 3 centimes; for extraordinary expenses, such as loans, 12 centimes. You will remark at once that the maximum is lowest for the schools. Putting all these centimes together, we make a sum of 48 centimes, which represent as it were, arithmetically, the freedom of the department, as the department may vote as much of these 48 centimes as it likes.

Let us take, for instance, the department of Oise. The receipts will be, in 1872:

26 additional centimes for ordinary expenses	922,357 francs.
7 centimes for roads	320,967 "
3 centimes for schools	137,557 "

The principal items to be added to these receipts are a voluntary contribution of various communes for the construction of roads to the amount of 600,000 francs, and 12 additional centimes for extraordinary expenses caused by the war, which will give 550,230 francs. In all, the receipts will amount to 2,601,989 francs. The state will devour much more of the people's substance, as you will readily understand when I tell you what the Imperial taxes were in 1870:

The direct taxes produced	9,191,327 francs.
The indirect taxes	7,107,616 "

These indirect taxes are those on the registration of sales and mutation of property, succession duties, post, wine and alcohol, etc. The state thus consumed, in 1870, more than sixteen millions, and the war had greatly diminished its receipts, which in 1869 had amounted to twenty-two millions; while the department, as a department, only spends about two millions and a half. We may say, on an average, that the department only pays to itself about ten per cent. of what it pays to the central government.

This proportion will seem to you very small; but then you must bear in mind that the department has very small expenses; all its roads are under the supervision of the state engineers; all the tax collectors are paid by the state, great or small. The departmental expenses in Oise all come under these heads: Rent, furniture, and keeping up of the prefecture, the sub-prefectures, the gendarmeries, the criminal courts and civil tribunals, the prisons, the printing of the electoral lists, the construction and repairs of departmental roads, the subvention to the lunatic asylums, expenses of vaccination, subventions to charitable institutions, agricultural school, subvention to agricultural exhibitions, service of the departmental debt, primary schools. The expenses of the primary schools amount in a year to 820,000 francs; the department contributes only 122,997 francs towards this object; the Imperial government gives 117,575; the remainder goes towards the expenses of the communes themselves.

The budget of the schools is painfully low, though the department of Oise is one of the richest and most prosperous in the country. It does not amount to the sum of a million. The communes contribute directly to the maintenance of their schools the sum of half a million; but, strangely enough, the schoolmasters are all under the government of the Minister of Public Instruction. The schoolmaster's salary amounts generally to 1,200 francs; but in this you must comprehend his pay as secretary of the mairie (it is very seldom that he does not have the two places). Many of them have only 700 francs; the female teachers (for the boys and girls are kept separate) receive on an average 800 francs.

The Council, before it separates, nominates an executive commission which will now sit permanently between the sessions, and have a sort of general control of the Prefect. But, if the new law is not altered in a liberal direction, I don't see how these permanent commissions will do much good.

As it is, the Prefect is everything in the department, as before; he is the connecting link between the central government and all the officials of the department. The only officials who are independent of him are the judges of the courts, who correspond directly with the Minister of Justice. But the engineers, the tax collectors, the agents of public instruction, the mayors of the villages, all look upon the Prefect as the fountain of justice and honor. He can do everything and undo everything. The General Councils even, under the new system now just tried, are but a consultative assembly; they cannot legislate for the department; they have really no initiative, except in the question of the roads; they have no local patronage, and, therefore, no real power.

Correspondence.

JUDGE McKEAN'S COURT vs. THE MORMONS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Accepting the disadvantage of meeting a partisan who conceals his name, I have to say in reply to "Observer" that he has not truthfully stated the issue in Utah. Brigham Young did not "secretly and in the night leave Salt Lake City"; he left it between ten and eleven o'clock A.M., and by the advice of Hon. Thomas Fitch, his counsel, who told him that McKean had all the machinery of conviction prepared for him, and that he should await the decision of the test case (Engelbrecht vs. Clinton and others) before the U. S. Supreme Court. This case might be called by a rhetorician like McKean: Sentimentalism vs. Trial by Jury. The only additional issue of fact not smothered in controversy, quotation, or innuendo in that letter of four columns, is about Judge McKean's mining speculations. "Observer" says that "some miner located a claim, and the name of Jas. B. McKean got upon the record of the Mining Recorder's office without any privity of the Judge as one of the locators," etc. They must take familiarities with "high-toned" U. S. Judges in Utah to put their names into papers entered at the office of a land-register who is a volunteer counsel in McKean's court against the polygamists. Here is the same case, as U.S. Senator Stewart, Ex-U. S. Attorney Hempstead, and others stated it to me:

"Judge Strickland, associate and crony of McKean, jumped a mine in Ophir Cañon. Strickland sold his interest to McKean, who organized a company called the 'Silver Shield,' of which he was made President. McKean retained Baskins, the prosecutor of Brigham Young, as his attorney, and by visiting all the lawyers practising at McKean's bar, it was extorted from them that they would not take the case against him. McKean then commenced suit in his own court against the original locators of the Velocipede mine, and called Judge Strickland to sit in his place. The defendants declined to try the case in the District Court before Strickland, on the ground that he had sold McKean his interest. They appealed to McKean, as Supreme Justice, to allow Hawley, the alternate Justice, who was disinterested, to try the issue. This McKean refused to do; the case stuck fast in the courts, and McKean & Company, the 'Silver Shield,' continue to draw ore from the Velocipede mine."

You see that an "Observer" may not be able to see things as clearly as a "Correspondent"—a profession of folks apparently not in high regard with this gentleman, who, at the time named, "was in Salt Lake City, and in a situation to know the sentiments." The "situation" and the "sentiments" give me a clue to the person. One part of the Territorial Ring tactics has been to alarm and "startle" public opinion in the East by keeping up a fire of correspondence to sustain the extra-judicial attitudes of the rhetorical Chief-Justice there, and while several of the Territorial officials are professional correspondents, like Mr. Hollister, the general telegraphy is entrusted to an Arab named Sawyer, imported from the East and subsidized. I have some sympathy for the under-dog in an unequal fight, and, while I abhor polygamy and have small pity for superstition, I want to see the labor and the seventy millions of acquisitions in Utah saved to our country and to the simple citizens who have accumulated it. The Territorial Ring hate the Mormons more than polygamy. The Chief-Justice there is a melodramatic actor, more serious than Dogberry, but not more lovable. Two of the small body of Territorial officers have committed homicides in other States, and the prosecuting attorney, who married a lady for whom he procured a divorce, is now menaced with prosecution by his original wife. Amongst the flagrant outrages which I found there was the persistent refusal of the malignant land-register to issue a title to Salt Lake City under the general municipal law, although it has been settled twenty-two years, and every other town in the Territory was confirmed in its titles. Hard upon my letters, which received prompt consideration from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, came the Associated Press telegram from Utah, that Salt Lake had been entered in the office of this register.

Every republican interest demands that the Mormon people be encouraged to form a State government with polygamy for all the future made penal in it, and past marriages to be tolerated, except where either contracting party seek divorce and alimony. We demand nothing more of the Indians, and many of the Mormons are little above the grade of Cherokees. It is not consistent to govern 120,000 people by the Federal emissaries of a distant public opinion, who can put all the enginery of extra-judicial courts and martial law into effect, and enlist the prejudices and the press of the great East in the unequal contest. There is much admirable in Mormon Utah. Statesmanship, and not blatherskites nor filibusters, should cut the tumor and preserve the Territory. Our government is behaving towards these poor idolaters just as if the British Government, discovering the lost mutineers of the Bounty in the South Sea, had proceeded to try them for old piracies and more recent polygamy. The British Government turned a forgotten crime into an episode of clemency and generosity, and our Sunday-school urchins read the pretty story with as much sympathy as we may make them one day read the wonderful history of the Mormon exodus and the peaceable assimilation of its empire into ours.

George Alfred Townsend.

November 25.

THE GREAT FIRE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your issue of the 16th inst. I observe an extract from Mr. Alfred Perry's communication to the Montreal Witness, which contains a statement of one of those "facts which are not facts." Speaking of the peculiarity of the non-ascension of the fire, Mr. Perry says it was exemplified in the remains of the Church of the Holy Name. This church "had its tower running up about 100 feet, and the spire had not been erected. It had been intended to finish it this year, and the contractor had placed his scaffolding on the top of the tower, and two of the four main corner timbers had been placed. These two corner-pieces remain apparently unscorched," etc.

Now, the fact is that the spire had been just erected. I have watched its progress all summer from my residence on the block diagonally across Huron Street. The spire, being of wood, was the first part of the building to take fire, which it did from flying brands. It was burning when my own family fled from their burning home, and passed State Street in front of it. A moment after, it fell before the fierce gale, and plunged blazing through the roof of the church, setting the whole interior on fire. Two of its broken timbers still remain sticking upon the tower.

The error is a trifling one, perhaps, but as the Chicago fire was entirely unexampled, it is necessary to be very careful about the facts which are to furnish the data for any consistent theory. This mistake of Mr. Perry is only one of a class of mistakes which I have noticed in various quarters. It has been said, for instance, that the wooden pavements contributed to spread the fire. Now, the fact is that while the solid blocks of stone of the sidewalks and curb-stones are shattered or calcined, the wooden pavement is not injured, save where burning walls or masses of brands fell upon it, and then it simply charred downwards, and the fire did not spread superficially.

I have even seen the foolish statement that there was petroleum in the stone of which the massive central blocks were built! And the other day, the New York Times, in commenting on the fire, spoke of Chicago as a tinder-box of wood, and compared it with San Francisco, which, having suffered from fires, is now built of solid stone and brick, in a wisdom bought from dear experience. The truth is, as any one acquainted with the two cities knows, that there was more solid brick and stone swept into ruin in the Chicago fire than would suffice to build four times over the brick and stone structures of San Francisco. San Francisco, more afraid of earthquakes than of fire, has constructed miles on miles of wooden buildings, and two years ago, when in the city, I suggested to a relative the danger from fire to which the city was exposed on that account. Even the failure of the water-supply during the Chicago fire is exaggerated as to its effect. The fire was along the river and its branches, raged there first, and first got beyond control there; and there was abundance of water in the river. But no amount of water, after the first hour, would have been of avail. In a heat so fierce, driven by a gale of seventy-five miles an hour, the water, as chemists know, was worse than useless. The fire was driven onwards as from the end of a blowpipe. It calcined granite and melted iron.

There are, unquestionably, adequate causes to explain the great conflagration. Having discovered those causes, Chicago and other cities may guard against them. It is in the interests of civic safety that we should be careful about our facts. As far as I can see, given the same conditions—a tempest of seventy-five miles an hour, a fire well started in a mass of inflammable material in the lower part of the town—I know no reason, from the different construction of the two cities, why New York might not burn from the Battery to Central Park. HUGH MILLER THOMPSON.

[We have received another communication, from a different source, confirmatory of the above, and otherwise demonstrating the untrustworthiness of Mr. Perry's observations.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

—MESSRS. HURD & HOUGHTON announce "Landmarks, and Other Poems," by John J. Piatt.——Messrs. J. R. Osgood & Co. publish this week "The Last Tournament," by Tennyson, an addition to "Idyls of the King."——We have to announce the opening in this city of a branch of a well-known English music-publishing house, Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co., at No. 751 Broadway.

—"Latin Pronunciation" (Cambridge: Charles W. Sever) is an outline in a few pages of the system of Latin pronunciation introduced into Harvard College, some years ago, by Professor Lane, and now generally adopted by the Massachusetts schools. The absurdities of the English and American pronunciation have always been apparent enough. It has been kept up or submitted to, however, quite as much from indifference as from despair of certainty on a necessarily doubtful matter. An approximation to the Augustan standard of orthoepy is made feasible by the help of Quintilian, who was not very remote from the golden age, and of Priscian, who, if much later, used the works of older grammarians. The result attained by following these guides is such that we may reasonably suppose that Cicero, hearing Latin read according to the proposed system, would recognize the language as his own, though he might have a few strictures to make. We have only to read English as so much Italian to form a conception of the amazement with which the American boy declaiming Quousque tandem Catilina would be listened to by the original audience. We are glad to see it announced that Professor Lane is preparing an elementary Latin grammar.

—To those who take an interest in the fate of country towns in New England, we can recommend as pleasant reading the pamphlet, "Address delivered Sept. 19, 1871, at the Annual Exhibition of the Farmers' Club, Princeton, Mass., by Nathan Allen, M.D." (Lowell: Stone & Huse.) It is considerably above the level of ordinary agricultural addresses, neither running off into politics nor (what is rare for doctors when on their feet) being rhetorically overdone or grammatically underdone. It is just such a talk as an almost purely farming community could best appreciate and would certainly profit by; and the speaker's well-known hobby is here entirely in place. Moreover, as a native of Princeton, he has given an agreeable historical and antiquarian flavor to his remarks which will secure for them more than local acceptance. The town had, in 1870, but 18 more inhabitants than it had in 1820, while it had 146 less than in 1840. In 1765, when the total population was 284, a little more than half were children under sixteen years of age; in 1860, out of 1,201 inhabitants, the number under fifteen was but 373. Dr. Allen makes the case worse than it is when he neglects the difference of a year in the standard age of the two censuses, and even considers 373 but a fourth of 1,201; the true ratio for the comparison is probably one-third. That the falling-off has taken place in the last thirty years mainly, would seem to be proved by this consideration: In 1840, says Dr. Allen, the number of school children (from five to fifteen) reported was just twice that of the past year, which was 235. That is, there were about 470 school-children in 1840; but if so, the whole number of children must then have been not far from 650, or nearly half the population (1,347). In the past ten years, almost one-seventh of the births has been among the foreign population, which constitutes about one-twelfth of the whole. With the decrease in school-children, Dr. Allen finds a corresponding decline in the interest taken in and money appropriated for schools, though the town has been somewhat distinguished for its educated men. "It has been said that, for half a century, there was no period of time when there was not some one individual from Princeton enrolled as a member of college," but of late years this has ceased to be true. "For a long time the place provided not only its own teachers, but had many representatives following this vocation in adjoining and distant towns. In the recollection of some present, so numerous was this class that twenty-seven teachers could be counted in one school-district, including ten in one family. These ten persons taught nearly one hundred district-schools, and had under their instruction over five thousand different pupils." Whoever has visited Princeton on its high perch on the flank of Wachusett—"there not being, it is said, an acre of level ground by itself in the place"—will confirm the Doctor's emphatic testimony to its pure air, incomparable views, and peculiar healthfulness.

—Macmillan for November has an excellent article, "American Experience in the Relief of the Poor," which gives us a clear and succinct statement of what is being done in this field in New York and Boston. Of course, the palm is given to Boston over New York for system and efficiency in dealing with the evil of pauperism; but it is admitted to be much easier to deal with it in Boston than it is either in New York or in London. After describing at length the "Charity Building" in which Boston concentrates and combines her municipal offices for the doing of good works, the author of the article, Mr. James Bryce, says: "All this goes on under the roof of the Charity Building; and, as other benevolent societies are allowed to use its vacant rooms for their meetings, the members of all these get accustomed to look on the building as the centre of charitable action for all Boston; they group themselves more and more round the leading agencies which work from thence, and by degrees come to understand the principles on which relief ought to be conducted. Considering in how many ways co-operation increases the effectiveness of each body of workers, and how essential local contiguity is to co-operation, one is not surprised to find that the Bostonians look upon the establishment of the Charity Building as the beginning of a new era in their municipal administration. . . . New York, although the management of all its public institutions, corrective as well as charitable, is fortunately vested in the same board, has no such system of combined voluntary and official action as that which has been described at Boston." Mr. Bryce's conclusion is that though "there is much that is cheering in the vigor and ingenuity as well as in the benevolence with which indigence is relieved and crime grappled with in our great cities," yet "it is disheartening to see pauperism at all in a new country, where it ought never to have been suffered to set its loathsome foot, and whence it might even now be expelled by the exercise of a little more foresight and resolution."

— Mr. Charles S. Peirce, in his review of Berkeley in the last North American, to which we promised to return, takes the occasion to trace out in the history of philosophical thought in Great Britain the sources of Berkeley's doctrines and of later developments in English philosophy. These he traces back to the famous disputes of the later schoolmen on the question of realism and nominalism—that question on which each new-fledged masculine intellect likes to try its powers of disputation. But the motive of the schoolmen who started this question or gave it prominence, was not in any sense egotistical, however pugilistic it may have been, but was profoundly religious—more religious, in fact, than anything modern, and, perhaps, more fitly to be compared to the devotion that produced the Gothic architecture than to anything else. The most remarkable thing in the essay is Mr. Peirce's interpretation of the actual question so earnestly agitated. This, it should seem, is not at all what has become the universally accepted account of this voluminous dispute—an account derived, it appears, from Bayle's Dictionary. The realistic schoolmen were not such dolts as to contend for an incognizable reality beyond any powers we have for apprehending it, nor for the existence of universals as the objects of general conceptions existing outside of the mind. They only contended (against the sceptical or nominalistic tendency) that reality, or the truth of things, depends on something besides the actual courses of experience in individual minds, or is independent of differences and accidents in these; and that truth is not determined by the conventions of language, or by what men choose to mean by their words. So far from being the reality commonly supposed—that is to say, the vivid, actual, present contact with things—the reality of the realists was the final upshot of experience, the general agreement in all experience, as far removed as possible from any particular body's sight, or hearing, or touch, or from the accidents which are inseparable from these. Yet it is essentially intelligible, and, in fact, is the very most intelligible, and is quite independent of conventions in language. The faith of the realists (for theirs was a philosophy of faith) was that this result of all men's experience would contain agreements not dependent on the laws and usages of language, but on truths which determine these laws and usages. Modern science affords ample evidence of the justness of this position.

—That this truly was the position of the realistic schoolmen, Mr. Peirce contends; and he bases his opinion and belief on an original examination of their works, such as has not, we venture to say, been undertaken, outside of Germany, for a very long time. In spite of the confirmation of this position which modern science gives, the course of the development of modern science has, nevertheless, as Mr. Peirce points out, been closely associated with the opposite doctrine—nominalism, the representative of the sceptical spirit. This appears in Berkeley's philosophy, who is a nominalist, notwithstanding his penchant for Platonic ideas or spiritual archetypes. Hume, a complete representative of the nominalistic and sceptical spirit, is an historical product of Berkeley's nominalism; and, though commonly regarded as the author of modern philosophical movements, was not, historically considered, so different from Berkeley but that Mr. Peirce regards the latter as entitled to "a far more important place in the history of philosophy than has usually been assigned to him." So far as Berkeley was a link in the chain, this is undoubtedly true. So far as Hume (in common with all independent thinkers of the sceptical type) was not such a link, he was, we think, a starting-point in the movement of thought which has resulted in English empiricism, or the so-called "Positivism" of modern science, which Mr. Peirce seems inclined to attribute to a regular development of philosophical thought. Scepticism, though perhaps never original, as we are taught by orthodoxy, and only a revival of old and the oft-exploded errors, is, nevertheless, by its criticism, the source of most of the impulses which the spirit of enquiry has received in the history of philosophy. The results of modern science, the establishment of a great body of undisputed truths, the questions settled beyond debate, may be testimony in favor of the realistic schoolmen; but this settlement was the work, so far as it depended on the impulse of philosophy, of the nominalistic or sceptical tendencies of modern thought, which has put itself in opposition, not to the faith of the realists, as Mr. Peirce understands them, but to their conservatism and dogmatism, to their desire to agree with authority—that admirable devotion of theirs. It is curious that these things, the most certain of all on which the actual arts of life are now dependent, should be the results equally of the faith of the realists and the sceptical enquiries of the nominalists. But this is enough to account for the gratitude and the indifference which we owe to both of them, especially as the confirmation which science has afforded is not of the sort which the realists anticipated. It is the empirical conjectures of the visionary, not the inspired teachings of the wise, that have established realities for themselves and for truth in general. There are many other curious points of history and criticism in this article which will engage the scrutiny of the student of metaphysics, and doubtless afford him great delight. We are afraid to recommend it to other readers, as Mr. Peirce's style reflects the difficulties of the subject, and is better adapted for persons who have mastered these than for such as would rather avoid them.

—M. Paul Lacroix, better known by his assumed name, "Bibliophile Jacob," gives us this year a companion volume to the "Art of the Middle Age," published some three or four years ago, and bought by the public with great eagerness. The work that he has now brought out is called "The Manners, Customs, and Dress of the Middle Age and of the Revival" ("Mœurs, Usages et Costumes au Moyen Age et à l'époque de la Renaissance"). It is fully equal to the former publication in beauty and in cheapness, and if the duties on imported books with the exchange on gold would allow it to be sold for the Paris price, it would have almost as great sale here as it is sure to have in France. The French excel all the other nations of the earth in the beauty and substantial value of their illustrated books, and, judging by the standard of price that rules here and in England, they are not dear, but these books of Lacroix are amazingly cheap when one considers the admirable way in which the work is done, and thinks what must have been the time, labor, and money laid out upon them. Neither in England nor in America would it be possible to produce two such books. It might be done in Germany, perhaps, but it never has been done there. Still, printing, wood-engraving, and chromo-lithography have been brought to great perfection in Germany, and if these were all, they might hope to rival Bibliophile Jacob in his special work of popularizing archæology. But German writing of this sort is too often heavy, and has never caught the French touch-and-go lightness in dealing with ponderous themes. Perhaps the Germans pity this weakness of the French, and despise them for it; but, all the same, they have it not. With the English and with ourselves the trouble is that we have not the mechanical skill. The wood-cuts in the English illustrated periodicals—the Illustrated London News, Illustrated Times, Punch, and, now and then, the Graphic—are the best of their kind in the world; but in illustrating books with woodcuts, the English are far behind both the French and the Germans. Such woodcuts as are in Mr. Whymper's "Scrambles in the High Alps" are, indeed, incomparable in their way, but such woodcuts are very rare in English books. Wood-engraving is at so low an ebb in this country that we need say nothing about it, and such chromo-lithographs as Kellerhoven's are simply unattainable here, where this useful art is nearly dead of the wounds with which it has been wounded in the houses of its friends. The game is thus clearly in the hands of the French, and they have never used their skill to make more deservedly popular books than those of M. Lacroix. The new volume is a small quarto, and contains fifteen of Kellerhoven's admirable chromo-lithographs, and four hundred and forty engravings on wood. Mr. Christern sells it half-bound in morocco, with gilt edges, for fifteen dollars.

—Those who are interested in the subject of the painted vases of Greece and Italy will find a valuable book in "Greek and Sicilian Painted Vases," by Otto Benndorf (Berlin: J. Guttentag). It contains the facsimiles of the paintings, with a description of each plate, and all the necessary information as to size, place of finding, etc. This is the only illustrated work on the subject with which we are acquainted that gives the paintings exactly as they are without dressing them up or "improving" them in any way. The well-known books of Hamilton and Moses, beautiful, attractive, and useful as they are, are yet open to the charge of falsifying their subject. The best of all ways of reproducing the vase paintings would of course be by photography, but the roundness of the surfaces presents a serious difficulty. Besides, in the vases, as in the wall-paintings of Pompeii, there is the element of color—an essential part of the thing—with which photography cannot as yet deal. No one can feel the charm, or rightly value the effect, of a Pompeian wall-picture in a photograph—we see the bad drawing and little else—and the same is true, though not to the same extent, with a painted vase. But what none of the books we have seen before this of Mr. Benndorf's makes us aware of is the extreme off-handedness of the execution. To be sure, these plates are from very rude vase-paintings, but even the finest Etruscan vases have the same character. The artist aimed at effect, and his means were of the simplest. In this Part Second of Mr. Benndorf's work, including the numbers from 14 to 30, the subjects almost all relate to funeral rites and ceremonies. Many of them are very curious. Mercury leads a soul to Charon, who is very old and deformed, while Mercury himself is a staid and disagreeable middle-aged young man. But close by, in another plate, we have Mercury young, and his sleepy wand in hand he bears upright, closely resembling one of the early Italian or German representations of the Angel Raphael in the Annunciation. In the vase-painting, Mercury's rod has no serpents twisted about it, and the twigs at the end are so mishandled that they might easily pass for the lily flowers with which the painters sometimes dress the angel's staff, which not unfrequently takes the place of the true flower-stem. These connections between the early and the later art are for ever suggesting themselves to those who are on the spot where they meet, and they have a perennial interest. The finest in sentiment of these vase-paintings shows us a lady sitting, disconsolate, by a monument hung about with garlands, to whom her attendants bring vases of ointment and more garlands in flat baskets. She herself is a sumptuous beauty, with an abundance of dishevelled hair which would suit Mr. Holman Hunt. Another has an old man approaching a tomb, on crutches, to which, while it suggests one or two striking things in the poets and in other painters, it may be a mistake to attribute too much meaning. Mr. Christern receives this work as it is issued.

—Madame Audley's "Franz Schubert, sa vie et ses œuvres" seems to be a very frank bit of conveyance from the work on the same subject by Dr. Kreissle: at all events, the lady acknowledges that she has drawn largely from the Doctor's biography of her subject, and she seems to think she has done enough by way of amends when she expresses her gratitude for the fact that, if her book is good for anything, it is to him she owes it. However, her little book is large enough for the subject, and is very readable. A very complete, or, seemingly complete, catalogue of Schubert's published and unpublished works is given at the end of the volume, translated directly from Kreissle's book. The German titles are given, and, in addition, the titles by which the works are known in France. These latter are the translation of M. Bellaugé. Mme. Audley would seem to have found some other tree of knowledge to shake and fill her basket, for she advertises a "Life and Works of Ludwig von Beethoven after the most recent documents."

—Simultaneously with the King of Italy's taking up his residence in Rome, appears Jules Favre's "Rome et la République Française" (Paris: Plon). The Republic referred to is the government of M. Thiers, and the publication is in the nature of a defence of the author's vote on the motion to refer the French bishops' petition to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the adoption of which, as is well known, was followed by the immediate resignation of M. Favre. Among the revelations contained in it are the full text of the despatch from the Duc de Gramont (July 31, 1870), informing the Marquis de Banneville of the intended withdrawal of the French troops from Rome; the verbal response of Antonelli to the subsequent announcement of the news by De Banneville; and the Chevalier Nigra's conversation with Favre in September, when, after an explanation of the reasons why Italy could not ally herself with France against Germany, he closed the long interview with an official declaration of the inability of his Government any longer to endure the status-quo as regarded Rome. The Duc de Gramont's excuses for abandoning the Pope were perfectly rational and in accord with the actual situation of both parties to the September Convention; and his argument that the withdrawal would be most advantageous to the Pope has been abundantly justified. In fact, the Pope himself, in April, in reply to a speech of the French ambassador, D'Harcourt, freely recognized the difficulties which prevented liberty of action on the part of Thiers, and asked only that he should counsel the Italian Government "to be prudent, to go slowly, not to take rash measures, nor to enter upon ways that might easily become dangerous." He even admitted that temporal sovereignty was not to be resought at such a time, and that if his States were to be offered him back, he would refuse them—asking nothing but a corner of earth (cantuccio di terra) over which he might be master, and without which he could not exercise in their plenitude his spiritual functions.

—In moderation the people of Rome are not to be surpassed by their late ruler. Their comparatively new cemetery, much frequented on account of its attractiveness, contains a monument to the Pope's mercenaries who fell at Mentana, and it lately became a question what to do with this memorial of past subjection and unavailing struggles. The city authorities, with a magnanimity which does honor to the Italian as well as the Roman character, left the stone intact, and simply added another with this inscription:

S. P. Q. R.
This Monument,
Which the Theocratic Government Erected
In Memory of Foreign Mercenaries,
Rome Redeemed
Leaves for a Lasting Testimony
Of Calamitous Times.
November 2, 1871.

"THE CITY OF GOD."*

THERE are two reasons why anybody proposing to himself a course of study in modern history should begin with St. Augustine's "City of God," of which a good translation is now for the first time presented to the English-speaking public on both sides of the Atlantic. The first is, that there is no other source from which one can get so full and accurate an idea of the mental and moral condition of the Roman world at the moment of the fall of the Western Empire; the second is, that in it Augustine produced that systematic view of the methods of God's government of the earth, and of man's relations to him, which, under the name of the "Latin Theology," or, more particularly, of "Augustinianism," or "Predestinarianism," or "Calvinism," has so powerfully influenced the thought, and even the manners and character, of some modern nations. For the theological student, the book has of course an interest of its own, derived from Augustine's position in the church, and the weight of his doctrinal expositions, and it has enjoyed for centuries a wonderful celebrity, particularly in France, where, for some time after the revival of learning, it was in extraordinary demand as a means of edification. But, apart altogether from its value as an aid to faith, it has attractions for those who occupy themselves with that perhaps most interesting of all historical questions, the nature of the moral connection between ancient Rome and modern Europe, such as no other work extant possesses; and it is all the more necessary to keep this in mind because patristic literature is just now in little repute, and the peculiar system of theology of which Augustine was the founder, and the most illustrious expounder, is fast losing its hold on the lay, and even clerical, mind in those churches in which it once reigned supreme, while some of the doctrines of which he was the first promulgator, such as the damnation of unbaptized infants, and the lawfulness of the physical torture of heretics, have come to be considered unchristian and detestable.

The book, as is well known, owed its composition in great part to the first capture of Rome by the Goths of Alaric, and was intended to refute the notion which the pagan fugitives, and especially the aristocratic fugitives who made their way to Africa, where Augustine was living, busily spread, that this great calamity was the result of the neglect of the worship of the ancient deities, brought about by the introduction of Christianity. He had partly in view also the removal of a difficulty which he found existing in the mind of Volusian, the proconsul under whom he lived, and who, though almost an "enquirer" into the truth of the Christian religion, was impeded at the outset by the consideration into which the modern mind, familiar as it is with the distinction between church and state and the spiritual and temporal power, finds some difficulty in entering—that the empire was to the Roman both country and religion, and the old gods part and parcel of the political and social fabric on which all that he possessed of faith, and reverence, and hope, and devotion had always been lavished. A religious belief which had no connection with politics, and which drew away the citizens' best emotions from politics, was, therefore, to him either monstrous or incomprehensible. This blending of earthly and heavenly allegiance, of things temporal and things eternal, which is, as we have said, so strange to the modern world, nevertheless survived the fall of the Empire, so deeply embedded had it become in the traditions which the ancient world transmitted to the Middle Ages, and it found expression at a later period in the mediæval theory of the "Holy Roman Empire," of which Mr. Bryce has given an interesting exposition in the seventh chapter of his "History," and traces of which may be seen, even in our day, in the reverence of the "Old Russian" party for their country as "Holy Russia." A striking analogy to it is presented by the Turk's feeling about "Islam," which is neither an earthly nor a heavenly kingdom, but a perfect combination of the two; and not a mechanical combination—if we may be allowed the use of a purely material illustration—but a chemical one.

Augustine's great object was to show that this difficulty was purely imaginary, and that Christianity would erect in Rome's place a city to which, either for power, or beauty, or durability, or as an object of love, and admiration, and pride, Rome could not be compared—"a city which had foundations whose builder and maker was God." In doing this, there is hardly a phase of the pagan thought or aspiration of his time which he does not describe, and he does it with all the sympathy of a man who had lived in the Roman world, tasted of its joys, and grown up in the pride of Roman citizenship. The picture of the "Civitas Dei" which he draws is one which, from the very first, fascinated the imaginations of the members of the decaying society in which he wrote. Appalled as they were by the penetration of the barbarians to the heart of the Empire, and by the rapid dissolution of the institutions which they had been bred to consider eternal, and for which, in an age of limited political experience and great ignorance, it was difficult for the ordinary man to conceive of any substitute, the earlier Christians even found in it a great source of hope and consolation, for, prior to Augustine, they had tarried on earth simply as strangers and sojourners, waiting for the second coming of the Lord. But the City of God, as St. Augustine painted it, was not wholly heavenly; it was to exist part on earth and part in heaven; to be composed both of the church militant and of the church triumphant; and the believer, in passing from one to the other, changed his abode, but changed none of his relations, whether social or political: he simply put off some cares, and some anxieties, and some hindrances, to enter into richer joys. The idea had a prodigious success, though probably at first only among the educated classes, and it went down into the Middle Ages as a precious source of hope and instruction, not to saints only but to politicians. Charlemagne's biographer tells us that there was nothing he read with so much enjoyment and edification as the "City of God," and it doubtless furnished him with the ideal goal of his civilizing labors, and even of his wars and conquests.

The vision has descended to our own day, in a somewhat more shadowy form, it is true, but still distinct enough to color a great deal of the political speculation which is ventured upon in the pulpit and by writers of the religious school, and lies hidden, perhaps, at the bottom of all such movements as that which seeks the formal acknowledgment of the existence of God and of the divine government of the nation in the Constitution, and the imposition of a "Christian oath" on all officials. The dream of the establishment of a "Kingdom of God," which is the modern translation of Augustine's phrase, will probably never vanish from the earth—a kingdom in which wisdom, and purity, and justice, and truth shall prevail, into which all the good people shall be gathered, and in which God himself shall rule with a distinctness and nearness which shall leave no room for cavilling or question about the basis of morality; and, as long as this dream lasts, it will probably be difficult or impossible to find any loftier or more eloquent delineation of its glories and delights than Augustine set before the eyes of the despairing Romans.

Of his theological system, except in its historical aspect, this is not the place to speak. Considered as a theory of human relations to the unseen world, its success, using the term in a purely mundane sense, has been great. It not only furnished the Christian Church, or rather the Western Church, with what it did not previously possess—a body of doctrine, but with a body of doctrine which survived all the mutations of states and nations, and has through thirteen centuries powerfully influenced politics, literature, character, and legislation, but with solutions of problems—liberty and necessity, in particular—which are on their face insoluble, and in defence of which men have gone in multitudes to the battle-field and the stake. Mr. Maine hints that it would be found on examination that its leading features have been derived from or have been shaped by the Roman jurisprudence, which is not at all unlikely, and it suggests a field of enquiry which somebody possessing the necessary theological and juridical qualifications ought long ago to have explored.

The Augustinian theology is, however, now losing its hold on the Christian world through a variety of influences, some social merely, and some scientific. Interest in the problems of liberty and necessity, on which so much speculation has been expended, has well-nigh died out in the general weariness of metaphysical enquiry under which, whether temporarily or not, most people are now laboring. The doctrine of election, and the cognate doctrine of man's inability to work out his salvation without the aid of divine grace working in the soul, suffers from the rapid growth of a somewhat audacious individualism, and of a no less audacious sentiment of equality, which will not hear of limits to human capacity, and will not believe in a divine justice which does not use human measures. The bold and clean-cut and material account of the origin of the world, and of the nature and incidents of man's fall, and of the resurrection of the body, which St. Augustine gives, has been largely driven out of the churches, or, at least, relegated to the region of vague symbolism, by the assaults of science, so that of the Augustinian system little remains in its integrity. It must be admitted, too, that the change, which is easier to mention than describe, which has come over the mind of the civilized world on the whole matter of religious instruction, must make it difficult for a teacher, who gravely explains Adam's transgression, and proves and illustrates it as Augustine does, to retain much influence or authority.

* "The City of God. Translated by the Rev. Marcus Dods, M.A." Two vols. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clarke. New York: C. Scribner & Co. 1871.

THE MAGAZINES FOR DECEMBER.

THE Atlantic, which ends the year with a good and readable number, makes for next year several promises that will please its own particular public, and also some that will please that wider public which is fond of magazines in general, whether or not it much admires the set of authors for whose sake the Atlantic has been well loved in Boston and vicinity, or cares much for the sort of literature for whose sake the Atlantic has found favor in places a long way from Boston. "The first of living biographers," Mr. James Parton, is to contribute in the course of the year a life of Thomas Jefferson; Professor James De Mille is to contribute a serial story, written in his "extravagant, humorous, and most fascinating vein"; Miss E. Stuart Phelps and Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford may confidently be expected to furnish occasional contributions, and other authors of proved popularity being engaged to assist these, it may reasonably be expected that the Atlantic will be found acceptable by a multitude of readers. Other readers will be glad to hear that the Atlantic is in possession of a posthumous romance by Hawthorne; that Doctor Holmes is to write a series of papers entitled "The Poet at the Breakfast Table," which will carry to completion "the design with which the famous 'Autocrat' and 'Professor' papers were undertaken"; that Mr. W. M. Baker, author of "The New Timothy" and "A Chronicle of Secession," will contribute some sketches of life in the Southern States; that Mr. Howells is to continue his essays and stories, as well as to manage the enlarged editorial department, with its criticism of music and art, and its record of political events and of scientific progress, in addition to its customary notices of home and foreign books; that Mr. Fields will give more of his reminiscences of distinguished writers with whom he has been on terms of acquaintanceship; and that, among the other contributors, we may count Mr. Longfellow, Mr. Lowell, Mrs. Stowe, Mr. Clarence King, Mr. Whittier, Mrs. Celia Thaxter, Mr. John Fiske, Mr. Henry James, Jr., Miss Cheesebro', Mr. Bret Harte, Mr. T. B. Aldrich, Mr. T. W. Higginson, and Mr. Bayard Taylor. Prospectuses are peculiarly liable to error, but there would seem to be little room for doubt that the Atlantic for 1872 may probably meet the two kinds of excellence above suggested, and be both good to sell and good also to buy. In this last number of the year several of the serial articles are brought to a close. "Watch and Ward," Mr. James's love story, has for its somewhat unexpected catastrophe the marriage of Roger to his protégée. It is a conclusion that will be more applauded among Mr. James's readers than the one towards which the story in its earlier parts seemed to draw. There is, by the bye, an unreality about some of these last chapters which had not so much shown itself in the beginning, and the story takes the reader's attention less after the characters are fairly at work upon each other than while they are being presented to us. And this, we should say, may be set down as a principal mark of Mr. James's stories. The characters are usually touched—we do not say hit off—in a way that shows nice observation and refined sensibilities; and the situation or action is likely enough to be interesting, especially if the reader is an intending lover or is, for any reason, interested in the study of the relations in which somewhat sophisticated young men and young women frequently stand to each other; but we doubt if many even of the more interested readers find the people in his stories very recollectable, or if the views of life which the stories present appear to any readers very sufficing. If it is the business of the novelist to paint society and to moralize upon it, Mr. James will doubtless be thought to have less success in the latter part of the task than he has attained in the former, while in the former his success is not yet perfect. That it is considerable, none of his readers will deny; and the careful and conscientious use of the means by which he has attained it is full of promise, as it is of good example. Perhaps we might cite as a glaring instance of the unreality to which we have referred, the behavior of Hubert's betrothed when she finds Hubert and Nora together. But the interview itself, and much of what led to it, would still remain to be defended after a good defence had been made for the ill-conduct of the New York young lady.

"Kate Beaumont" ends, in spite of all complications, with the marriage of Miss Beaumont to Mr. Frank McAllister—a pair of persons who have not been sufficiently attractive to draw much attention from the accessories of the scene. Still, the story will be read with pleasure, whether read as a brisk-moving novel or for its pictures of old-time plantation life. Of "Their Wedding Journey," Mr. Howells's story, which also now comes to an end, we are willing to let the genial author of Mr. Osgood's advertising slips speak for us. He says that this serial has been received with enthusiastic favor while appearing in the Atlantic Monthly, and that "the artistic descriptions of characters, places, and incidents; the fine observation which detects what ordinary spectators either see inadequately or miss altogether; the delightful humor which pervades the whole; and the simple beauty of style—all these combine to render this story by Mr. Howells one of the most attractive ever published in America." It is indeed a very pleasing little story, and readers, whatever may be their opinion of Mr. Hoppin as an illustrator of books, will be glad to hear that it is to come out in the holidays as an illustrated book for makers of presents. Young gentlemen and ladies contemplating matrimony might govern themselves accordingly.

In our "Whispering Gallery," Mr. Fields, getting done with Dickens, talks pleasantly about Wordsworth and Miss Mitford. Mr. Clarence King writes with his customary excellence—and, perhaps we should say, with his customary slight failing in point of self-restraint, as if the wine of the sierra air were in his blood—about the Sacramento Valley and an ascent of Mount Shasta. Mr. John Fiske, in an article which is entertaining as well as instructive, traces in philology the long descent of our devils, elves, and bogies from the supreme deities of past ages—the old order changing and giving place to new among the divinities, as among men, and the conquered gods being degraded into slaves or made outlaws. "Light and Darkness" is the title of Mr. Fiske's essay, which is written with a clearness that will make it intelligible to very unphilological readers, if not to the most unphilological.

For the rest, the Atlantic has some poetry by Mr. Longfellow and Mr. Whittier, a story by Mr. Harte, and an article by "Warrington," the Boston correspondent of the Springfield Republican, in which the history of General Butler's recent attempt to make himself Governor of Massachusetts is detailed and reviewed. The moral of the history, as here related, would appear to be that General Butler tried to introduce personal government into Massachusetts politics, and failed because the Republican party in Massachusetts disbelieves in personal government, and that the Republican party in general throughout the country equally disbelieves in it, whether it is attempted by General Butler or "the national administration itself." The story seems well told, so far as we can judge, and perhaps was worth telling, whether or not much regard is paid to the particular moral deduced. That General Butler is a little too sharp for his own good; that people in general believe bad things of him; and, finally, that, as his luck would have it, he was not only revolting to the moral sense of the best Massachusetts Republicans, but was also on excessively bad terms with some not so good, whose power he underrated—these appear to us more nearly the reasons for Butler's defeat than any horror of his methods of personal government. And the third reason, of which the writer in the Atlantic takes no account, is by no means the least. General Butler succeeded in frightening the managing politicians very badly; but they worked hard, and it is a question whether it was not they, after all, whom the Lord made his instruments in bringing the General to shame, and whether, if they had not labored sharp after caucuses, Butler would not now be the governor elect in Massachusetts. There is no certainty that he would have been rejected at the polls, despite the Massachusetts Republicans' love for a government of laws and not of men.

In Lippincott's there is rather more than the usual quantity of readable matter. Dr. S. Weir Mitchell has something to say about the phantom limbs which torture the man who has undergone amputation; Mr. Robert M. Walsh quotes from his twenty-year-old journals, written in Buenos Ayres, some reminiscences of that bloody tyrant Rosas; Miss Kate Hillard criticises Balzac, talking well about him; Dr. J. W. Palmer contributes an account of the so-called "Sharpless crayons," which are some seventy portraits in crayon of distinguished and undistinguished Americans, both men and women, at the beginning of this century; and Mr. Charles Warren Stoddard writes a little sketch—not so very much in itself, but deserving of praise for its really excellent keeping—entitled "My Long-Lost Brother." It is a story supposed to be told by a mediocre actor, and it seems to be indeed a mediocre actor—of unusually steady habits and good intentions, the enemies of the theatre will perhaps say—who is telling of his hopes and disappointments. What he has to tell is, as we have said, not very much; but we should say the reader will get from it an unaccustomed pleasure.

"Ouida's" "Branch of Lilac" is concluded in the December Lippincott's, and, as it dies, shows rather more of a family resemblance to its parents—grown-up, evil-disposed novels, than it showed at the beginning. It is, however, true to say of "Ouida" that these late short stories of hers—if, indeed, they are late ones, and not the fruit of a search in earlier filled portfolios—give hopeful signs of an improved frame of mind in their author. This "Branch of Lilac" is a painful story, but it is not an impure story; and there are in it several poetical touches such as made "A Provence Rose" a pretty and pleasing tale. "The Cold Hand" is a ghost story, by Mrs. Clara F. Guernsey, who is more circumstantial than successful in her account of the haunted house and its ghostly inhabitant, but who will find favor with some readers. It is a wonder, by the way, that no one of our publishers makes a collection of stories about ghosts, both the old-fashioned sort and the newer, less grisly kind. It would be a volume that would fascinate many, and it might, we suppose, be divested of any superstition-breeding character by a judicious admixture with the unexplained stories of apparitions and the like of some of the not less surprising stories where the hallucination has afterwards been completely explicated. For example of these last, take the remarkable story which Sir Walter Scott tells concerning the warning received in a dream by a gentleman whose fortune was at this time depending on the discovery of a document which was only to be got in case a certain aged lawyer could be made to recollect drawing it up—a recollection which he could only be made to call up by being made to recall that the gentleman's father had paid him for his services with an outlandish gold coin. Thus instructed, the gentleman obeys, gets the necessary evidence, and only after much pondering remembers that as a boy he had some knowledge of this transaction between his father and the lawyer, and that the dream did not come from beyond the grave to his assistance, but was a bringing out into full consciousness some knowledge that for many years had been subconsciously in his head.

Old and New has some remarks which seem to us judicious on the recent exhibition in Boston of pictures by Copley, Stuart, and Allston. The article on Père Besson, too, a Dominican of much artistic talent, now ten years dead, will be read with some satisfaction; and there is a translation of a Hebrew legend which will please numbers of readers, though it is not a legend of the profoundest import, nor one very profitable for instruction. Admirers of Mr. Charles Warner will find his "Sorrento Papers" agreeable, and, in the department of the magazine called "The Record of Progress," a proposal is made and argued for what will appear to most people a long leap ahead. The writer thinks that as the cemeteries diffuse ill-health about their neighborhoods, and that as every day, with its growth of population larger and larger, numbers of the living are exposed to taint from the dead, it is desirable that after death our bodies should be burnt, and their ashes used to fertilize the earth. This they do now, for that matter; and man being the creature that he is, it would be some time even after he had consented to incremation before he would make up his mind to the use of human ashes on specific edible crops, as this writer recommends. It is not clear, we should say, that the subject is one which demands immediate consideration, in this country at least.

In the Catholic World there is nothing, we believe, that calls for special mention. A writer in the Princeton Review who has been treating of the late F. W. Faber is handled severely though courteously, and with what is at least superficial fairness. With real fairness, one would say; but that description must be denied to controversy which, for instance, in meeting an assertion that Roman Catholic priests connive at the exhibition of relics which lack authenticity, replies by showing, what is undoubtedly true, that very many relics are perfectly or sufficiently proved to be what they are alleged to be. Presumably the Princeton reviewer may have had in his mind not only the class of relics to which belongs the phial of St. Justinius's blood, which the Catholic World points to, but also that other class to which belong the three several heads of St. John Baptist, say, or the shiploads of fragments of the true Cross. However, it is as well for our Protestant divines to have it brought to their attention that the country now contains a larger number of persons than formerly who were not taught and for whose instruction arguments will be necessary, and upon whom even deserved ill epithets will not be effective. Much as may justly be urged against the Romish Church, she is no exception to the rule that a sinner need desire nothing better than to have brought against him charges which he can show to be mistaken. Even the archangel Michael would not bring a railing accusation even against Satan. As for the matter which aroused the discussion between the Catholic World and the Review, it seems a wonder how such a man as Mr. Faber appears, both in his books and in his recorded life, can have any attraction for the student of his mind and character. Heroes are after all not so scarce.

"Early to fly the Babylonian woe,"

"The House of Yorke" we can recommend to most readers. The hero has a worldly aunt, who, finding him with a volume of De Maistre's in his hand, charges him with reading sophistry or ultramontanism and advises him to take up "The Age of Reason," which apparently she carries about with her, for she says, "And here you are poring over De Maistre! Pshaw! Read 'The Age of Reason.' Here it is." But he declines. No doubt the Roman Catholics have right on their side when they complain of Protestant misrepresentations of their faith and practice; but the frivolous Protestant aunts who urge Tom Paine on their nephews are about as rare as the priest who gives absolution for thirty-seven cents and not a cent less.

In the Galaxy, the best article is Mr. Welles's continuation of his account of the capture of New Orleans. Neither Admiral Porter nor General Butler's biographer, Mr. Parton, has any reason to be grateful to Mr. Welles for the publication of his recollections, unless, indeed, they meditate a course of penitence, in which case Mr. Welles will have materially assisted them to a fair start. He shows that Mr. Parton wrote in "Butler at New Orleans"—which is understood to be a humanly "inspired" book of a very flagrant kind—some things at least which were conspicuously inexact; and Admiral Porter is made to cut a very sorry figure, indeed. It is to be hoped that he has some sufficient reply to make. As the case is left by Mr. Welles, Admiral Porter was magnanimously treated by Farragut, and recompensed his commander by underhand detraction at the time, and by mean insult afterwards, when, in virtue of Admiral Porter's weight in President Grant's councils, Farragut was to some extent at Porter's mercy. As the matter stands, it will fill almost every American who knows of it with just indignation.

We do not know who Professor Thompson B. Maury is who writes in the Galaxy about "Weather Prognostics by the People," but we would call the attention of the editors of the Galaxy to the fact that whoever he may be he ought at any rate to be the author of a work called "Suggestions for the Practical Use of Meteorological Reports and Weather Maps"—a valuable little hand-book prepared in the office of the Chief Signal Officer. It teaches how one may read understandingly the weather reports which the Signal Officer has latterly been furnishing to the newspapers, and how one may even aid the observers to make their reports fuller and more specific. The Galaxy article in its facts and phraseology is rather too close to this handbook to be pleasing to the author of the latter, unless, as we say, he is Professor Maury, and the credit of the magazine article belongs to him and the credit of the book as well. We dare say that applications by proper persons, as presidents of agricultural societies, editors, and the like, will be answered from the Signal Office of the War Department by the transmission of the circular in question. Meantime, the Galaxy article will be found serviceable.

The two principal illustrated magazines, Harper's and Scribner's, are of their usual kind and degree of merit this month. Harper's has for its solidest article one on Brougham, which is well worth reading, and Scribner's is perhaps best in an illustrated article entitled "Sights in and around Yeddo," though the pictures are not as well done as the very good cuts appearing in the November number, illustrative of the wonderful Yellowstone Valley, and of General Newton's blasting operations at Hell Gate. Those were better pictures than American magazine publishers, or American publishers of any kind for that matter, have often put before the public. Scribner's promises for next year to become to some extent international, Mr. Gladstone being under engagement to write for one of the English publishers, and Messrs. Scribner & Co. having made arrangements to publish simultaneously with the publishers across the water his articles and those of other English contributors to various magazines. In the current number Mr. Stedman has some verses; Adeline Trafton describes briefly a visit to the Belgian school where Charlotte Brontë taught; the article on Yeddo, mentioned above, is one of a series of which Mr. Bayard Taylor is the compiler; Mr. G. P. Putnam writes pleasantly of "London Revisited"; Mr. Justin Winser describes the Boston Public Library; there is a poem by the new poet, Dr. Hake; and, among other matters, a love story good-natured enough to cause or cure uncalculated quantities of cynicism.

Two College Friends. By Fred. W. Loring. (Boston: Loring.)—This little story, which appeared this year in Old and New, is the most considerable work of the young author whose sad death at the hands of the Indians was lately recorded in the daily papers. Besides the present volume, he had published some of his earlier poems, many of which had already appeared in the Harvard Advocate, where they had attracted some attention by their smoothness and humor. They were, at any rate, better than most of the crude productions of students. If not absolutely good, they were yet free from extravagance and exaggeration; and that is perhaps the chief merit of this story. The author kept himself in hand, and, wiser than most at his age, only went so far as he felt the ground firm beneath his feet. The plot is simple, a little episode of war, but it is told unaffectedly, and the boyishness of treatment will suit the characters and ages of the imaginary actors. Of course, a story for which allowance of this sort has to be made cannot receive unqualified praise, nor would any one claim that it is a model of art; but it can be praised for a freedom from ordinary youthful pretensions which is almost as seldom attained as positive merit.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
A Tale of a Nest	(E. P. Dutton & Co.) $1 50
Abbot (J.), August and Elvie: a Child's Story	(Dodd & Mead) 1 50
American Tour of Messrs. Brown, Jones, and Robinson	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Bartholomew (W. N.), Teacher's Guide in Drawing	(Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.)
Bascom (Prof. J.), Æsthetics; or, The Science of Beauty	" " "
Beecher (Catherine E.), Woman's Profession as Mother and Educator	(George Maclean)
Bowman (F. C.) and Dana (C. A.), Household Book of Songs for Four Voices	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Butler (W. A.), Poems	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) $2 00
Crosby (Prof. A.), Grammar of the Greek Language, 44th ed	(Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.)
David (C. G.), A Positivist Primer	(David Wesley & Co.)
Davis (A. J.), Mental Disorders	(American News Co.)
Dickens (C.), Nicholas Nickleby	(D. Appleton & Co.) 75
Elliott (J. W.), National Nursery Rhymes	(Novello, Ewer & Co.)
Emerson (L. O.), National Chorus Book	(O. Ditson & Co.)
Emerson (Dr. G.), Le Play's Organization of Labor	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
Harrison (Jennie), The Old Back Room	(Dodd & Mead) 1 50
Heinzen (K.), Der Deutsche Editoren-Kongress zu Cincinnati, swd	(Boston)
Holcombe (Dr. W.), Southern Voices: Poems	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Household Tales and Fairy Stories	(Geo. Routledge & Sons)
Journal of the Anthropological Institute of New York, Vol. I., No. 1, swd	(B. Westermann & Co.) 50
Julian (Hon. G. W.), Speeches on Political Questions	(Hurd & Houghton) 3 00
Lee (M. and C.), Rosamond Fane	(E. P. Dutton & Co.) 1 50

THEOLOGICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY.

EDITED BY

HENRY B. SMITH, D.D., AND PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D.,

PROFESSORS IN THE UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, NEW YORK.

NOW READY.

The first volume of the Philosophical Division of this Library, containing Vol. I. of

HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY.

TO BE COMPLETED IN TWO VOLS.

BY PROF. UEBERWEG.

Translated by G. S. Morris, Professor of Modern Languages in the Michigan University; edited by Noah Porter, D.D., LL.D., President of Yale College, and P. Schaff, D.D.

One vol. 8vo, $3 50.

Professor Ueberweg had a high reputation throughout Europe as a scholar and critic. The characteristic features of his work are the compendious presentation of doctrines, the survey of the literature relating to each philosophical system, the furnishing of such biographical notices as are necessary, the discussion of controverted historical points, and compressed criticisms of doctrines from the standpoint of modern science and sound logic. The first volume of the translation contains Vols. I. and II. of the original or Ancient (Greek and Roman) Philosophy, and on Patristic and Scholastic Philosophy, respectively. The American translator had the generous assistance of the lamented author, and the latter part of the work is enriched by additions forwarded by Prof. Ueberweg expressly for this translation.

THE SECOND VOLUME OF

THE HISTORY OF GREECE.

BY PROF. DR. ERNST CURTIUS.

Translated by Adolphus William Ward, M.A. Revised, after the latest German edition, by W. A. Packard, Professor of Modern Languages in Princeton College.

1 vol. cr. 8vo, 700 pages, on tinted paper, uniform with "Mommsen's History of Rome."
Price, per vol., $2 50.

The above works sent by post or express, charges paid, on receipt of the price.

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,
654 Broadway, New York.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,
BIBLIOPOLE,
133 NASSAU STREET,
Catalogues sent on application.
Special attention given to orders by letter.

NEW SCHOOL BOOKS,

PUBLISHED THIS DAY.

SWINTON'S WORD-ANALYSIS.

A Word-Analysis of English Derivative Words, with practical Exercises in Spelling, Analyzing, Defining, Synonyms, and the use of words. By Wm. Swinton, A.M., Professor of the English Language, University, California, and Author "Condensed History of U. S.," etc. 128 pages. Price for examination, 25 cents.

The prominent points of this book are:

1. The clear and simple method of word-analysis and definition.
2. The practical exercises in spelling, defining, and the use of words in actual composition.
3. The adaptation of the manual, by its progressive character, to the needs of the several grades of public and private schools.

CATHCART'S YOUTH'S SPEAKER.

Selections in Prose, Poetry, and Dialogues, suited to the capacities of Youth, and intended for the Exhibition Day Requirements of Common Schools and Academies; with many new and original pieces. By Geo. R. Cathcart, A.M. 190 pages. Cloth, price for examination, 75 cents.

The prominent points of this book are:

1. The selections are suitable to the exhibition day requirements of Common Schools and Academies.
2. They are adapted to the understanding of the younger pupils.
3. As far as practicable, only pieces that are fresh or that have not heretofore been used in a book of this kind are presented.

ROBINSON'S EXAMPLES.

Arithmetical Examples, Mental and Written. With numerous Tables of Moneys, Weights, Measures, etc., designed for review and test exercises. By D. W. Fish, A.M. Cloth. 282 pages. Price for examination, 75 cents.

This work covers the whole ground of Arithmetic, and can be used in connection with any series, or other text-book on the subject.

TOWNSEND'S COMMERCIAL LAW.

A compendium of Commercial Law. Analytically and topically arranged, with copious citations and legal authorities, for the use of Business Colleges, Universities, etc. By Calvin Townsend, Author "Analysis of Civil Government," etc. 1 vol. large 8vo, over 500 pages. Price for examination, $5.

This work will be of great value as a text-book in all Institutions of learning where a business education is a part of the course of instruction.

Single copies of any of the above, if required for examination with a view of introduction, will be forwarded by mail on receipt of appended price.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
138 and 140 Grand Street, New York.
273 West Randolph Street, Chicago.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. Oil explosions most frequently occur from the lamp being upset and broken. By using Pratt's Astral Oil, you avoid this as well as every other danger incident to unsafe oils, it being in every respect a perfectly pure, reliable, and safe article.

LEE & SHEPARD'S NEW BOOKS.

BY MADAME SCHWARTZ.

THE RIGHT ONE. By Madame Sophie Schwartz. Uniform with "Gold and Name," "Birth and Education," "Guilt and Innocence," and "The Wife of a Vain Man." 8vo, paper, $1; cloth, $1 50.

DICK AND DAISY SERIES. By Miss Adelaide F. Samuels. 4 vols. Illustrated. Per vol., 50 cents.

1. ADRIFT IN THE WORLD; or, Dick and Daisy's Early Days.
2. FIGHTING THE BATTLE; or, Dick and Daisy's City Life.
3. SAVED FROM THE STREET; or, Dick and Daisy's Protégés.
4. GRANDFATHER MILLY'S LUCK; or, Dick and Daisy's Reward.

AMERICAN HOME BOOK OF INDOOR Games, Recreations, and Occupations. By Mrs. Caroline L. Smith (Aunt Carry). 16mo. Illustrated. $1 50.

THE MODEL SUNDAY-SCHOOL SPEAKER. Containing Selections in Prose and Verse, of the most Popular Pieces and Dialogues for Sunday-School Exhibitions. Illustrated. 16mo. 60 cents.

LITTLE PIECES FOR LITTLE SPEAKERS. By a Practical Teacher. Designed for Primary Schools. Illustrated. 16mo. 60 cents.

THE TURNING WHEEL. By Paul Cobden. Author of "Who Will Win?" "Going on a Mission," etc. 16mo. Illustrated. $1 25.

THE CHILDREN'S DELIGHT. A fine Collection of Stories and Poems, illustrated with Plain and Colored Illustrations. 4to, cloth, gilt, $1 25. Do., do. fancy binding, 75 cents.

THE INFANT'S TREASURE. Pretty Stories and Poems, with 200 Illustrations. Plain and Colored. 4to, cloth, gilt, $1 25. Do., do., fancy binding, 75 cents.

☞ Sold by all Booksellers and Newsdealers.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.
LEE, SHEPARD & DILLINGHAM, New York.

THE BEST ENGLISH PERIODICALS.

THE LONDON QUARTERLY, EDINBURGH, WESTMINSTER, and BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEWS, and BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

Regularly and faithfully reprinted, at about one third the price of the originals.

TERMS.—Blackwood or any one Review, $4 a year; Blackwood and any one Review, $7; Blackwood and two Reviews, $10; Blackwood and three Reviews, $13; any three Reviews, $10; the four Reviews, $12; Blackwood and the four Reviews, $15.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE FOUR REVIEWS FOR OCTOBER.

THE LEONARD SCOTT PUBLISHING CO.,
140 Fulton Street, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1871.

The Week.

CONGRESS has met, but, at this writing, no business has been done, beyond the organization of the committees and the reception of the Message and Reports. Under ordinary circumstances, it might safely be predicted that the winter would be devoted to President-making, and that both parties would avoid all overt acts of legislation likely to affect party prospects in the campaign. Owing to the peculiar financial condition of the country, however, the chances are that both sides will make a vigorous effort to reduce taxation. It is plain that the Government can afford the reduction, that it will help the Administration to make it, and that the Democrats will be afraid to oppose it, even if naturally inclined to do so. The Committee of Ways and Means is, therefore, more important than ever, and the revenue reform element in it is very strong. The air is thick with projects of financial reform, from General Grant's plan of so "arranging the revenue" as to promote "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," to Senator Sumner's plan of returning to specie payments by funding the greenbacks, which is a terrible falling off from his old theory that "the way to resume was to resume." It seems quite probable we shall not only have considerable reduction of internal taxation, but a slight tinkering of the tariff in the direction of free-trade. The revenue reformers seem to have made progress during the holidays, both by toning down the protectionists and by adding to their own number.

What the Democrats will do, however, it would puzzle the wisest man to say. The "passive policy" seems to gain ground pretty steadily. Mr. John Quincy Adams has during the week given in his adhesion to it in a despondent but philosophical letter, and the World is running up and down the bank naked and nervous, apparently ready to take the plunge, but afraid of the cold and the depth of the water. Civil-service reform is in the meantime in high favor on all sides, but everybody thinks somebody else should begin it, and finds the difficulties immense. The New York correspondent of the Boston Advertiser gives a very amusing account of Tom Murphy's views on this question. Tom says that he was always in favor of civil-service reform, but the difficulty he found was to get honest men into the offices. Many a weary, sleepless night he must have wrestled with this problem. In short, Satan, though considerably discouraged, is still, Senator Conkling will be sorry to hear, in the field, and active, trying to lead men astray by promises of spoils.

The President's Message consists, like all similar documents, partly of moral reflections of an expository or didactic kind on the condition of the country, partly of narrative, and partly of suggestions, but the reflections, of course, depend for their value on the character of the President's mind. General Grant's mind is not of a reflective turn, and his observations in this field are, therefore, rarely either picturesque or instructive. The narrative part of the present Message, as is not unusual, contains nothing very new—we have learnt through the newspapers nearly every fact of importance which it brings forward; but he condemns in strong terms, as delusive, the measures of emancipation put in force in Cuba and Porto Rico, and says the continuance of the civil war in Cuba continues to be "a source of annoyance and anxiety." He gives the unfortunate Catacazy the most terrible blow ever inflicted on a public envoy by the head of a friendly nation, which it must take all that gentleman's consciousness of descent from the Byzantine emperors to enable him to bear up under, and which must, as long as M. Catacazy is his official chaperon, make the Grand Duke's position during his stay in this country somewhat embarrassing.

As regards civil-service reform, he deals with it with a striking mixture of timidity and boldness. After telling about the formation of the Civil Service Commission and the result of their labors in drawing up a plan, he declares the experiment which they propose "shall have a fair trial." Now, this expression of interest, and of long-standing interest, on the subject is, we confess, considering the way the New York Custom-house has been conducted for the past year, Murphy, the Collector, being the President's intimate friend, companion, and adviser, and considering the nature of the Presidential interference in the Missouri election—to select only two instances out of many—perfectly incomprehensible to us. We do not undertake to draw any inferences from it. We simply call the attention of our readers to it. We must say the same thing of the remarkable passage in which he says that if bad men have secured places it has been the fault of the system established by law and custom for making appointments, or the fault of those who recommend for Government positions persons not sufficiently well known to them personally. The only remark we make here is, that this illustrates forcibly the difficulty, to which we adverted a fortnight ago, of ever fixing the responsibility of a bad appointment on anybody in particular. He makes one excellent suggestion, and that is that anybody who signs a letter of recommendation should be made by legislation responsible for the conduct of the person to whom he gives it.

The suggestive portions of the Message, or what are technically called the "recommendations," are of course the most interesting. The recommendations are: (1) legislation in execution of that portion of the Treaty of Washington relating to the Canadian fisheries; (2) an appropriation for determining the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, forming the boundary between the United States and British Possessions in the Northwest; (3) some action by Congress about the overdue instalments from the Venezuelans, under the award of the Commission of 1866; (4) a modification of the tariff and internal taxation—the latter to be abolished, except on spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, tobacco, and stamps, and the tariff to be reduced in such "a manner as to afford the greatest relief to the greatest number"; articles not produced at home, but which enter largely into general consumption, to be placed on the free list; and such further reductions to be made as not to "disturb home production or reduce the wages of American labor"—it looks from this as if the President had joined the "Revenue Reformers," but was determined to be safely vague as to what revenue reform means; (5) that collectors of customs be deprived of all share in the proceeds of seizures for fraud; (6) (omitting one or two trifling suggestions as to promotion in the army and navy) the purchase of the telegraphs and their annexation to the postal system; (7) legislation defining the status of Mormon plural wives and their offspring, and enabling the Territorial legislature to legitimize the latter; (8) the retention of the public lands as "a heritage to our children"; (9) the raising of the salaries of the heads of bureaus and officials requiring responsibility and character; (10) the removal of the disabilities imposed by the Fourteenth Amendment, except in the case of "the great criminals"; (11) liberal appropriations for local improvements at Washington; (12) legislation for the protection of immigrants.

In the report of the Treasury Department—which is the only one of the reports containing much that is of special interest—Mr. Boutwell makes a very striking exhibit as to the public debt; indeed, we believe, an exhibit unparalleled in financial history, and nothing could well be clearer as regards arrangement. The debt has been diminished by $277,211,892 since March 1, 1869, with a corresponding annual reduction in the interest charge of $16,741,326. Besides the statement with regard to the condition of the debt, the only things Mr. Boutwell has to say which the public will greatly care to read are his explanations with regard to the issue of the new loan to the Syndicate, and his grand plan for the restoration of American shipping. He gives the history of the new loan (now all taken), with which our readers are already familiar, and then goes on to confess once more in the simplest way his violation of the law in letting the Syndicate have the bonds three months before they paid for them, but excuses himself by the reflection that this was the only mode in which the loan could be disposed of, and that, if they had paid for the bonds when they got them, the money would have lain idle. This is doubtless all true, but beside the question. The objection to his violating the law affects not him in particular or this loan in particular, but all Secretaries and other officers and all loans. He recommends, and with good reason, an increase in the commission to be allowed in disposing of the four and a half per cent. loan, when it is brought on the market. He says that nothing can be done for one-half per cent., which is doubtless true; but he ought to have known and said this in April last.

Mr. Boutwell has abstained from any repetition of his absurd comments on the Civil Service, such as he indulged in last year; but he has made up for the omission by a disquisition on the best means of reviving American shipping. The common notion of ocean steam navigation is, that it is a pursuit in which persons engage for the purpose of making money; but Mr. Boutwell is apparently under the impression that it is an exercise or entertainment like yachting, a share of which every nation ought to have at any cost. So, after showing that the American share in the carrying trade was 71 per cent. in 1860, and has now fallen to 38 per cent., and that there is little chance of its revival in the present state of our tariff and currency, ships being now made wholly of iron, and British builders having an advantage over American builders of at least 30 per cent. in the cost of construction, cost of coal, iron, and other materials, and interest on the capital employed—and, he might have added, in local taxation—he proceeds gravely to recommend that enough money be taken out of the pockets of the American people to enable certain individuals to engage in the amusement of running ocean steamers on the same terms as the British. That is, he proposes that the toiling millions of the country shall, out of their wages, pay $13 a ton to any person or persons who shall employ American-built steamers of at least 2,000 tons burden in the foreign trade; and he evidently holds a vague notion that in some mysterious way great good would result to us all from this process of carrying our own and other people's goods and passengers over the ocean at a dead loss. In justice to him, however, we must mention that he modestly adds at the close that "he does not assume that there is no other practical method of restoring our commerce." There is one other "practical method" which far surpasses it—viz., the running of great numbers of ocean steamers entirely at Government expense, carrying passengers for a mere trifle, and feeding them well, and taking freight for nothing. If this were kept up five years, we warrant there would not be a British steamer left in the ocean, which is more than Mr. Boutwell can promise from his plan.

Our readers may remember the curious passage of arms which took place between the Paymaster-General and the Treasury Department after the revelation of the Hodge defalcation. Each sought to throw the blame on the other, and it must be admitted the Paymaster had the best of it, for he showed that he had been steadily enforcing a system of checks on paymasters which the Treasury itself had suggested as "safe"—namely, the weekly presentation to the Department of the paymasters' reports of their balances, which were supposed to be compared with the reports of the sub-treasuries in which the paymasters kept their accounts; but it appeared that no such comparison was ever made; and for this neglect of its own device, the Treasury made the singular excuse that the device in question was of no value, as it could be easily evaded. The Secretary of War now proposes, in his report, to substitute for this valuable contrivance a system of inspection, carried on by officers appointed by the War Department, whose business it will be to see that the sums which a paymaster reports as standing to his credit in a specified place are really there. This seems to be a good plan, and we hope it will be carried out. No system of checks will, of course, prevent all defalcation, until we get that grand change in the nature of man for which so many ladies and gentlemen are preparing to take out patents; but any good system ought to prevent defalcations going so far as Hodge's. While upon this subject, we may mention that, in reply to our challenge offered some weeks ago, Mr. Edgar Needham sends us from the office of the Assessor of Internal Revenue, Louisville, Ky., the report of a case tried before the United States District Court in that city, in June, 1868, in which a clerk in the United States Depository, named Bloomgart, was sentenced to six years' hard labor for embezzlement, and fined to the amount of his defalcation. The report, which is taken from the "Internal Revenue Record," closes with the remark: "It is understood that Bloomgart's friends will ask the President to pardon him." Did they do so; and with what result?

The news from Cuba is of a kind which seems to make foreign intervention in some form desirable and even probable—the control of the island, or, at all events, of the capital, having apparently passed completely into the hands of an armed mob, known as the "Volunteers," whose sole resemblance to soldiers lies in their uniform, and over whom the Spanish officers appear to possess no authority. They have for a good while been conspicuous for their turbulence and brutality, but have just committed, with form and deliberation, an act of extraordinary atrocity. A party of medical students entered a cemetery on a holiday, and in a frolic scratched one or two poor and indecent verses on the tomb of one Castañon, a Spanish partisan, who was killed by some Cubans at Key West. They then set at defiance and threw stones at a priest who remonstrated with them, and ran off. The whole school was then put in confinement till the ringleaders, to the number of eight, were discovered, and these eight were then taken from the jail by the Volunteers, in defiance of the Spanish general in command, tried by court-martial, and shot the same afternoon. Now, as long as the Spanish Government maintains even the semblance of authority in the island, it is perhaps the duty of foreign governments to abstain from intervention, but if it be really true, as this occurrence seems to indicate, that Havana is in the power of a mob, the United States can hardly be expected to look on quietly, considering how many Americans are resident in the city, and how extensive and important our commercial relations with it are. There is talk of a joint interference by this Government and that of Great Britain, which would have the advantage of relieving the United States from all appearance of self-seeking, but there would also be objections to it of a serious kind, arising out of the totally different views on the subject of the mission of the United States in the West Indies held by the politicians of the two countries, which might lead to complications. In the meantime, the Spanish Government seems greatly excited by the news, and the king, in a fit of chivalry, offers to come out himself.

The Pall Mall Gazette has an article on the "tide of speculation" now flowing in England, which those who have been trying to whitewash Mr. Robert C. Schenck's mining venture would do well to peruse. Speaking of the revival of the speculative spirit in England, it say of the enterprises which are just now appearing on the London market: "Besides telegraphs, tramways, and mines, much business is being done in a quiet way in what we must call miscellaneous schemes. There are asphalte concessions, and foreign slate, stone, and sulphur companies. . . . Undoubtedly, some will thrive, especially those that come earliest into the market; but then it is just as certain that many of them are rash or rotten, or else will be made so by inefficient or dishonest management. The invariable experience of the past assures us, that among the number must be many directors who deliberately intend to rob their shareholders, and many shareholders who are foolishly offering their fleeces to the shears. Whether they will lose their wool by degrees, or be shorn close in a herd in the next panic, we do not pretend to say." We hope the friends of Mr. Schenck in this country, and those simpletons in England who are meditating taking a "flyer" in the stock of the "Emma Mine," will seriously ponder this passage. One other thing, to which the Pall Mall alludes, we commend to the attention of this Government and of the American public. The British investor, though easily duped, is vindictive. Unlike his American brother, he does not laugh and let the rogue run when he finds he has been swindled; and the English courts supply him with the means of gratifying his love of vengeance. Now, the English law makes directors of companies whose shares people have been induced to take by fraudulent representations, or by representations which are by law presumably fraudulent, liable themselves to the full extent of their personal property to the claims of the dupes. Nay, the Master of the Rolls has just decided, in Peek agt. Gurney, that even though the directors in Gurney & Co.'s Bank had no fraudulent motive, they would have been liable to Peek to the last cent of their fortunes, and their heirs and executors after them, had Peek, the plaintiff, not delayed so long in seeking his remedy; and Vice-Chancellor Malins has just been overhauling a grand company, called the "Marseilles Land Co.," which had a great run in its day, and has expressed the opinion that "the directors had been guilty of a colorable transaction to enable them to defraud the public by rigging the market," and he pronounces the company a "monstrous scheme." Now, if the Emma Mine ever comes before the courts, do not let us be treated to the spectacle of the American Minister screening himself from judicial censure, and saving his goods from the grasp of irate shareholders, behind his ambassadorial robes. The American eagle ought not to have to use its beak and talons on sheriff's officers.

The French National Assembly, after a recess of more than two months' duration, has reassembled, and at a rather inauspicious moment. Executions which will be laid to its account rather than to that of M. Thiers—for it is the majority of the Assembly which represents the anti-revolutionary rancor of France—have exasperated a considerable portion of the people; the dissatisfaction with the indefinite prolongation of the provisional state of affairs—a state naturally distasteful to the French mind, which is more patient of extremes than of suspense and imperfect solutions—has become almost general, ultra Republicans and Imperialists vieing with each other in intensifying it; and, what is perhaps worse than all this, the Germans have again assumed a very unfriendly attitude. It was, possibly, only for the purpose of making capital—capital, also, in the strictest sense—that the German Ministers, a few days ago, in urging the passage of the military budget, "most significantly"—and successfully—warned the Representatives that France meditated revenge, and that the only safety of Germany lay in her army; but the sterner facts are these, that the French garrison has had lately to be sent away from Dijon at the direction of a German general, who thus revenged an insult previously inflicted upon some troops of occupation by the authorities of the town; that the German military authorities, in Champagne, have executed two Frenchmen guilty of assassinating a German sentinel; and that, in order to punish and prevent similar assaults, all the districts still occupied by the invaders have been placed by them under martial law. With what impressions the legislators of France have returned from their provincial homes, after a protracted intercourse with their constituents, is of course still to be learned.

There has been a good deal of wild declamation on the part of several of our contemporaries during the week, against M. Thiers and his Government, over the execution of Rossel, and several confess with great naïveté that this tragedy has satisfied them that the French Republic is no republic after all, and they characterize the execution as a piece of needless brutality, and so on. As we have never thought M. Thiers a wise man, nor ever admired his "republic," we can say with a tolerably good grace that, if it be conceded the Articles of War are a proper code for the government of an army, we think the execution of Rossel, able, brilliant, and honest though he was, was a necessity—deplorable—to be sure, but still a necessity; and that most of the lamentations over it have come out of people's breasts and not out of their heads. The great danger of France, and perhaps the very greatest, is that the instability of her government, and the love of the people for military processes, may finally hand her over completely to the army, and that the army, having discovered its power, may become a real Prætorian Guard, and put the state up at auction. Things came very near this in 1851, and if the Prussians had not had the greater part of the army under lock and key in 1870, we may be sure it would have had its say in the revolution of that year. It is of the last importance, therefore, that military men should be taught, by any process however stern or savage, that political revolutions are none of their business, and that their sole duty is to obey the government de facto. Rossel set a flagrant example of insubordination to the civil power. He, being a commissioned military man, deliberately took upon himself to say that a government elected by universal suffrage, and which was the only government France had, or pretended to have, was not entitled to his obedience; that he was competent to decide that the peace which that government had just concluded with a foreign invader was untimely and unnecessary, and, in pursuance of this decision, he actually revolted, and took the command of an insurgent force, partly for the purpose of overthrowing the constituted authorities, and partly for that of prosecuting the war against the Germans. To describe the man's position is sufficient to demonstrate its guilt and absurdity. It must be remembered, too, that if Rossel had a right to do this for his own private Republic, other officers had a right to do it for the Empire, others for the Bourbons, and others for the Orleanists. The argument that Rossel was gifted and high-minded is simply an aggravation of his offence, because the possession of these qualities only made him all the more dangerous. We must remind our Sentimentalist friends once more that the business of M. Thiers, and all other governors, is not to dispense divine justice, but human justice; that is, not to mete out to every man his exact deserts, but to save and carry on human society in peace, security, and freedom.

A debate recently occurred in the Reichstag which illustrates in a striking manner the oddities which mark the social and political condition of Germany. The constitution of the Empire provides that all states composing it shall have representative governments. The Grand Duchy of Mecklenburg has, however, nothing but a feudal government of the most antiquated type. It has a House of Lords which simply looks after the privileges of the members. The Grand Duke sometimes has a ministry, sometimes not—but takes the whole revenues for his private civil list, and publishes no accounts. The taxes are voted by a "Landtag," composed of "knights" holding landed estates, and of the Burgomasters of the cities, who meet on horseback in the open air, like the old Polish Diet, and race about in an enclosure, talking promiscuously, without rules or forms, and they arrange the public burdens, it need hardly be said, so that they shall not fall heavily on themselves. Under this state of things, the population is rapidly declining under the influence of emigration, and what remains of it demands reform. The Reichstag has granted their request after a stormy debate, in which old Bebel the Socialist, who thinks women will probably have to be bastinadoed in the good time coming, voted with the Conservatives, on the general ground that the Empire was itself a humbug, "a mere fig-leaf to cover naked Cæsarism." Indeed, he thought all constitutions were a sham. He was so obstreperous that the House finally instructed the Speaker to silence him.

THE SOUTH.

THE passages of the President's Message relating to the South are, after all, the most important part of the whole document. All the evils, abuses, misfortunes, and calamities to which he calls attention are mere trifles—clouds passing swiftly over the national sky—compared to the condition of the States lately in rebellion. It is comparatively easy to reform the tariff or the civil service, or reduce the taxes, or return to specie payments, or civilize the Indians, or protect the immigrants, or get the overdue instalment from Venezuela, or bring Mexico to reason on that matter of "the free zone"; but it is almost as hard to give order, peace, and security to the southern half of American society as to medicine to a mind diseased, or pluck the rooted sorrow from the brain. We do not need to tell any of our readers what the state of things in that region is. It is not simply that men suddenly raised from a condition of bestial servitude, inheriting the weaknesses of barbarism, aggravated by the weaknesses of slavery, have been admitted to participation in the rights and responsibilities of free society; it is that they have been put in full and exclusive control of that most delicate and complicated piece of mechanism known as the government of a civilized State, with its debts, its credit, its system of taxes, its system of jurisprudence, its history, its traditions, its thousand knotty social and political problems. We say "exclusive control," because we do not call the division of power which the negroes have made with the Northern carpet-baggers a real division. The carpet-bagger is not a politician; he has no aims, opinions, ideas, passions, or prejudices; he is simply a man who has not succeeded in any of the ordinary walks of industry, and who, while travelling in quest of better luck, has got employment from the Southern negroes in managing the machine which the war threw into their hands, and with the nature of which they are not themselves familiar; and he does this with the firm determination of making all he can out of the job, and with no other determination whatever.

The condition of the negro after emancipation—that is, his ignorance and want of experience, combined with his position of estrangement from or hostility towards his white neighbors—attracted the carpet-bagger as naturally as a dead ox attracts the buzzard. The lower class of demagogue scents an unenlightened constituency at an almost incredible distance, and travels towards it over mountain, valley, and river with the certainty of the mariner's compass. But then we hastened his coming by our legislation. We deliberately, and for an indefinite period, excluded all the leading Southern men from active participation in the management of their local affairs, by a discrimination not unlike that which would be worked in this city, but very much worse, if every man who had not at some time belonged to the Tammany Society were declared incapable of holding office. It was before the war the time-honored custom of the Southern States, and a very good custom too, to put their ablest men, and men of the highest social standing and character, in office. The consequence was that it was these men who figured most prominently in the steps which led to the rebellion and in the rebellion itself. When the war was over, we singled these men out, and not unnaturally, for punishment by the Fourteenth Amendment and other legislation, but we forgot that, as the President points out, they were no worse, so far as disloyalty went, than the rest of the community. They broke their oaths of allegiance to the United States, but the other white men of the South would have done the same thing if they had got the chance of doing it by being elevated to office, either under the United States or under the Confederacy. We forgot, too, that when putting a mutinous crew in irons, the most justly indignant captain leaves at liberty enough able-bodied seamen to work the ship.

There were, in short, two ways, and only two, of dealing with the South after the war, neither of which we adopted. One was to treat the whole community as hostile or diseased and disorganized, and take charge of it from top to bottom, administer its justice, manage its finances, provide it with security of life and property, until such time as we were satisfied that it was competent to take charge of itself. This was the course which the highest statesmanship prescribed, but there were grave constitutional and political difficulties in the way of resorting to it, and, although we have at various times advocated it, we have never been disposed to find fault with the majority in Congress for shrinking from it.

The other way was to treat the whole community as made up of unfortunate Americans, equally entitled to care and protection, demoralized by an accursed institution for which the whole Union was responsible, and which the whole Union had connived at and, down to 1860, had profited by; rent and desolated by a bloody war; disorganized by the most radical social and industrial revolution ever witnessed. The first view was European, rather than American; this was purely American. It had no constitutional difficulties, or at least not so great constitutional difficulties, in its way, and it accorded in all respects with the habits and temper of the people and the machinery of the Government. We adopted neither plan, however, but a combination of the two, and the worst possible combination, the results of which have been positively infernal. In the idea that we were befriending the negroes, we gave them possession of the government, and deprived them of the aid of all the local capacity and experience in the management of it, thus offering the States as a prey to Northern adventurers, and thus inflicting on the freedmen the very worst calamity which could befall a race newly emerged from barbarism—that is, familiarity, in the very first moments of enfranchisement, with the processes of a corrupt administration, carried on by gangs of depraved vagabonds, in which the public money was stolen, the public faith made an article of traffic, the legislature openly corrupted, and all that the community contained of talent, probity, and social respectability put under a legal ban as something worthless and disreputable. We do not hesitate to say that a better mode of debauching the freedmen, and making them permanently unfit for civil government, could hardly have been hit on had the North had such an object deliberately in view. Instead of establishing equal rights for all, we set up the government of a class, and this class the least competent, the most ignorant and inexperienced, and a class, too, whose history and antecedents made its rule peculiarly obnoxious to the rest of the community.

Out of this state of things Ku-kluxing has grown as naturally as Whiteboyism grew out of Orange rule in Ireland, and Klephtism out of Turkish rule in Greece. We condemn the Whiteboys, the Klephts, and the Ku-klux; we read the patriotic, humanitarian, and law-loving denunciations of the last, which appear in the loyal papers of the North, with proper concurrence and approval. We cannot gainsay anything anybody says of the atrocity of riding about the country at night with one's face blackened, murdering and whipping people. But we confess we condemn Ku-kluxing very much as we condemn the cholera. We are opposed to the cholera. It is a loathsome disease, and brings terrible suffering on any community which it assails; nothing too bad can be said about it. But we know that it originates in filth and bad drainage, and if anybody proposed to us to proclaim martial law in the alleys in which the filth was found, and imprison the people who made it, we should refuse to support such a measure. Not all the stump orators in the country or all the roaring editors inveighing against dirty people for ten years would shake our determination. We should support nothing, and recommend nothing, and believe in nothing, but an honest cleansing of the infected places by the Board of Health. There is no more use in getting in a rage with Ku-kluxery, and sending cavalry and artillery after it, than of legislating against pestilence, as long as nothing is done to remove the causes. It is useless to proclaim York and Spartanburg, and lock up your hundred and sixty-eight prisoners, as long as the Charleston Ring is engaged, under the protection of United States cannon, in taking people's property under the name of taxation and appropriating it to their own use, and as long as the men whose fathers for half a dozen generations have lived and died in South Carolina, and who really love the State, find that, while they may not touch its affairs, Northern adventurers are at liberty to make fortunes out of the mismanagement of them. Of course, the Southern whites, if wise, Christian men, would accept their misfortunes in a different spirit; but the difficulty of all government arises out of the fact that most men are not wise or Christian. The governmental problem everywhere consists in the manner of dealing with men as they are and not as they ought to be, and it is the business of the legislator to look at turbulent people, if he can, not as objects of dread and hatred, but as phenomena to be regulated, or controlled, or removed. There is no more place for passion in dealing with South Carolina than in setting a broken limb or tying up an artery. We care nothing about the stories brought back by the Ku-klux Committee—very likely they are every word true; but they do nothing towards the solution of the problem before us. If when a mangled man was brought to a hospital the house-surgeon refused to bandage him until he had sent out a party of his assistants to find out exactly how he came by his injuries, whether it was in a fight, and if so, who began it, we should all be very angry, if we did not laugh; and yet the late Congressional investigation is something not very dissimilar.

THE BASIS OF ALL REFORM.

The Tribune has been engaged for two or three weeks past in the discussion of a reform which is, we believe firmly, the basis, or at least the guarantee, of all other reforms—the reform of the judiciary—but it is surrounded by difficulties such as other reforms have not to encounter. In the first place, the subject is highly technical; to understand the nature and extent of the judicial abuses, much technical knowledge is necessary, and this knowledge is confined to the members of one profession. Moreover, these abuses do not, like the abuses in the administration of State or City finances, come home directly to all taxpayers. The assault on the Tweed Ring possessed the enormous advantage of being directed against iniquities which everybody, even the most ignorant laborer, could understand and measure. A child can be roused into reformatory indignation by being told that he has been charged for a hundred yards of carpet when he has only got two, or that he has been made to pay for plastering a whole house when nothing was plastered but the hall. In other words, the Ring frauds were committed in matters with which everybody is familiar, and about which everybody is concerned, and were capable of estimation in dollars and cents. It is, of course, not possible to put on paper the exact measure in figures of the damage the City Hall thieves have done to the community, but it is possible to put down in figures a sufficient portion of the damage to rouse wrath which can really be called popular.

The damage done by the condition of the judiciary cannot, however, in any way be made thoroughly plain to the popular comprehension. The unjust judge does not work his iniquity by going straight to the treasury and taking what he wants; he supplies himself by the dexterous use of a body of rules of procedure which only lawyers understand; and he does not levy his toll, as the Ring did, on all men indiscriminately; he levies it on the small class who have the misfortune to be driven into litigation. It requires, therefore, not simply technical knowledge, but a certain amount of cultivated imagination and a strong public spirit, to follow him through his rascalities and fathom his guilt. And yet, of all offenders against the common weal, he is the very worst. It is not in the diffusion of a sense of insecurity with regard to property and person through the community that his villany lies, though there is enough of it in this. It is in the extent to which the spectacle of his corruption destroys the popular faith in the very existence of justice and truth and goodness. Other men may be found false and unfair without exciting more than anger, because they make open profession of pursuing their own interest; but when the very class which is set apart to deal out justice proves rotten, it makes men doubt whether there be anything but rottenness anywhere, whether there be really any barrier between anybody's greed or lust and the gratification of it but his purchasing power; and whether all the virtues are not empty names, useful in poetry, but worthless in actual life. Somebody has said, and well said, that when one has lost his faith in man, he cannot very long preserve his faith in God; and we may be sure that those who have seen a judge bought and sold do not preserve much faith in anything but clothes, food, and wine. In spite of all that has been said and written on this subject, we doubt if there exists anywhere, as yet, an adequate appreciation of the weight of the blow which we have struck at the highest interests of modern civilization by the production, in this great democratic city, of the spectacle of judges acting on the bench for several years in unchecked concert with criminals, and aiding them openly, without any attempt at disguise, in the seizure or conversion to their own use of enormous amounts of property. To suppose that any community can wash out such a stain as this by one vote at one election is simply absurd, and in saying this we put aside the gross indecencies of which some of these judges have been guilty in open court—indecencies the like of which have never been listened to in the tribunals of any people civilized enough to have courts, and the effects of which we are quite sure the generation which has heard them can never get over.

Now, this great shame and calamity originated in the triumph of this theory, that, to have a government democratic, all officers must be elected, judges among the number—a theory of which everybody's experience of human nature might have sufficed to demonstrate the absurdity when it was first stated; and it has gained currency, like some other theories of the same kind, through men's allowing phrases to take the place of facts in their reasonings about politics. The two great facts of every judicial system are, that you cannot have judicial independence without fixity of tenure, and that the bar alone is competent to pass upon the judicial competency and honesty. The only way of getting rid of these facts is by a change in human nature and the reduction of our jurisprudence to Turkish simplicity, and the assimilation of the judges, as far as possible, to the cadi. As long as we expect our bench to be pure, and the controversies which arise out of a highly complicated state of society to be adjusted with nicety, we must, in the first place, recognize, with regard to the judges, the existence of that weakness in human nature of which we are all conscious, and from which all Christendom prays every day to be delivered—temptability. Nobody, however, has any right to pray that he may not be "led into temptation" who has just helped to put a fellow-man in a position so full of temptation as a judge's is, and has deliberately withdrawn from him every artificial aid in resisting it.

But there is no use in electing or appointing judges, no matter how good, unless we set a learned and upright bar to watch them, because nobody but lawyers are competent to watch them; and no class of men has, as yet, been produced in any country which is capable of doing its duty without watching. A foolish thing was done in this State when judges were made elective for short terms, but the removal of all real tests of fitness for admission to the practice of the law crowned the folly. The result has been that the corrupt and ignorant judges who mounted the bench under the new system speedily found themselves surrounded by a silent and submissive or collusive bar, and the two together—the one boldly and defiantly, and the other quietly and sneakingly—went to work to make their fortunes, and turned the people's courts of justice into a kind of shambles, where decisions were sold like meat.

An attempt is now at last being made to put an end to this great iniquity. It was begun by the adoption of the judiciary amendment to the State constitution last year, lengthening the judicial term of office. It was continued by General Barlow's exposure of the Erie litigation, and the formation of the Bar Association, but it will not be completed without the impeachment and removal of three men who now disgrace the bench. This has not been possible hitherto because the Ring had the Legislature under its control, and the conscience of the bar and the public were so dead that it seemed as if nothing could rouse it. Now there is no longer either obstacle or excuse, and the work must be done, because if it is not done—if this Legislature be allowed to separate without purifying the bench—the formation of another Ring will be only a question of months.

But it is a work in which all can aid, and in which a great many must aid. The New York Tribune has entered on the work of exposing the system under which the rascals work, and we sincerely trust that the Times will not be prevented by the disgusting professional jealousy which has made the share of the newspapers in the reform movement at times so ludicrous, from heartily co-operating. The Bar Association has appointed a committee to prepare cases against the three rascals, but it wants money and evidence. The money ought to flow in in abundance; and we tell everybody who voted against the Ring last month that his labor was vain if the present movement is not sustained. The labor of collecting and arranging the evidence to be placed before the Legislature will be very great; it can only be performed by lawyers, and the lawyers who perform it must temporarily give up all other business, and must, therefore, be paid; and we may add that contributions ought not to come simply from this city or this State. The condition of the New York Bench is the concern of every citizen of the United States, because nearly every man's property comes directly or indirectly, at one time or another, within their grasp; and we have no hesitation in expressing our earnest conviction that the production of these three villains before the Legislature next January, and their trial and deposition, will be the most striking, fruitful, and hopeful contribution which the cause of morality and good governmetnt has received in our time. There is no corner of the Union in which its effects will not be felt; there is no court-room which it will not do something to purify and keep pure; there is no man whose title to the fruits of his industry will not be strengthened by it; and there is no reformer, nor any one who is laboring in any field, however humbly, to bring in the reign of "nobler manners and purer laws," whose zeal it will not quicken. We therefore ask for the movement the assistance and sympathy of all good people everywhere. But, like all movements against a deeply-rooted iniquity, it cannot succeed without the display of considerable self-sacrifice on the part of a few men. Those who know, and have preserved a timid silence, must now come forward and testify. The time for retailing the stories of judicial monstrosity in clubs, and parlors, and dining-rooms has gone by. The reasons for silence have passed away too. There is now a good prospect of bringing the offenders to justice, and thus putting an end, we hope for ever, to the system which converted the Bar of this city into a body which we can hardly compare to anything in history but Nero's Senate. To greater degradation than that involved in listening in silence to Barnard's jokes, and going timidly before Cardozo's "receivers" in quest of purchased "justice," surely no educated man, or any man of decency and self-respect, has ever submitted.

AN ENGLISH WATER-COLOR EXHIBITION.

LONDON, November 14, 1871.

LONDON is not only the richest place in the world in art treasures, but the place where what there is is most readily seen, and to the best advantage. There is not only a succession of exhibitions of original production, but every now and then the resurrection of a choice collection of old work, which brings from portfolios and drawing-room walls the best examples of the early English painters. Such an exhibition is now open as a "Loan Exhibition in aid of the National Hospital for Consumptives," etc., and to those who would know what English art is at its fountain-head, it is an invaluable opportunity.

There is that in the material and processes of water-color painting which adapts it most singularly to the art tendencies of Englishmen. They are, as I have before said, impatient of training, and almost universally deficient in the scholastic qualities in drawing and in the certainty of execution inseparable from good oil painting. The largeness and generalization in the way of getting at the subject in hand necessary to great work in oil, especially to purity of color combined with other technical qualities, occur in the English art world only phenomenally, and these find no school to develop them; and if anything is necessary to good work in oil, it is to know perfectly what you are going to do before you lay the foundation, and to proceed from general to particular, adding to the completeness of one's work by development of detail, not building it up as coral insects do with theirs. And this for the simple and most conclusive reason that the material of oil colors does not permit of changes and repentirs without destruction to the purity of the color: a coating of oil color once laid on must have a sufficient time to dry before it is overpainted, or else the upper and under color will mingle and foul each other in a most destructive manner; and to get the best results demands a thorough comprehension of every step in the completion of the picture before beginning it which is not in accordance with the English way of attacking art. But water-color permits any amount of change, repainting, rubbing out, etc., and then following up the work with a facility equal to that of a first start—the almost immediate complete desiccation of the pigment protecting it against ultimate change. And, in other respects, the material accords with the national temperament and genius in its facility for expressing pictorial motives of great simplicity and power—renderings of effect—for quick work by men impatient of completeness, and for a certain purity and intensity of color in which, I think, Englishmen find more pleasure than any other nation. It is not safe to generalize on such questions without long observation; but a range of nearly twenty years' study of English exhibitions and painters will, I believe, justify me in saying that the dominant pleasure in art with the public as with the profession is in a local purity and splendor of colors, even where the larger relations of color are wanting; and for these water-color is unapproachable. There are cases in which they are combined with the greatest range of power, as in Turner and William Hunt, but these are not examples of the school so much as exceptional illustrations of its tendencies. No other school, probably, would have produced either of those men.

On entering an exhibition of the nature of this under notice, there is a most marked relief from the general impression of garishness and exaggeration which any new exhibition gives; and if I were to present a view of English art at its best and with its most genuine motives present, I would rather take this than any of the annual exhibitions. Old David Cox especially strikes me as embodying one of the finest and most characteristic qualities of the English nature—the most complete and superb abandon to the large and poetic impression of the landscape of England, with a mighty grasp of its essential facts—its woodiness, its cloudiness, the breezy freshness and humid air which we, who have lived most of our lives out of it, distinguish more plainly than Englishmen, perhaps, as its difference from other lands. In this, the great quality of landscape painting, in the perception of its unity and meaning, in a masterly execution, striking straight at the heart of the motive and telling the story as no one could who did not feel infinitely more than he saw in nature—feel by the intensity and purity of the emotion which she awakened in him, and which makes the subjective side of art—no man, since the great Venetians, has equalled Cox; no man amongst them has surpassed him, even in that perfect execution which shows itself in rapidity and unhesitating certainty of hand. The way in which he renders, with all its most essential qualities, the broken sky, out of which the rain has just fallen, with delicate aerial grays melting into the blue—the energy with which the forms are drawn, and the swing of cloud and tree, are incomparable. But in range of color, Cox is almost on the extreme of simplicity—a step only above monochromatic, but refined, harmonious, and complete as Pan's oaten pipe.

A completer artist as to training and versatility of qualities was W. Muller, of whom it is said that one of Cox's great delights was to see him paint, which can well be believed, for no such drawing was to be found in the early school—such broad, masterly treatment of form, accompanied by thorough, honest definition of it. Muller's sense of harmony in lines, too, was far greater than Cox's or any other of his contemporaries', except Turner's. To him the classic was a feeling akin, and one wonders if he was an Englishman. But in all his power, there is a little too much art, and he remains cold to us. Another painter of the pure water-color school who is strong in this exhibition is Copley Fielding. Fielding's range was a small one, and his color, like Cox's, not much more than a tone—the simplest possible harmonies; sometimes of gray sea and sky, pitiless and unbroken gloom, sometimes of golden sunset effect, glowing grays and browns. In one of the drawings here, there is a sky and sea painted with a power of concentration and an energy of action in the elements which press close on Turner's best period. The torn, driving, writhing clouds, in which one catches almost ghostly forms, so strong in anatomical structure are they, so like muscular action as they swoop down on the foam-driven sea, the long-drawn-out and goaded waves, the solemn unity of the whole, make this drawing, "The Mull of Galloway," one of the finest examples of what may be done with water-color that I can recall. Fielding had another form of art which was exotic, and is not of permanent value for that reason. It is in the Claude vein—pretty compositions of vale and hill, babbling streams, and pastoral individuals planted along the pictorial waysides—all very pretty and Claude-like and immensely popular, and, like all popular things, very poor.

Another of the great dead men whose work shows very strong here is Cattermole, who for certain qualities of design and in small figures is most admirable—certain in his results, and with a most happy sense of the naïve and accidental in his figure-grouping and arrangement of accessories—composition of the true sort. He dealt in interiors, in middle-age skirmishes and incidents, baronial reminiscences. His types of men, as men, whether monks or barons, were, it must be said, conventional, and rarely depended for their ideal on anything deeper than the skin; but they were picturesque, full of fire and action when these qualities were most needed, and of that kind of picturesqueness which is the shell of the object rather than the true character of it. But in all that element of figure drawing which is the supreme excellence of it, exact expression of the function of the figure, dramatic activity—the contrary of the pose plastique of such men as Meissonier, or the tableau vivant of Raphael (taking these at their best)—extra-academical excellence, and thorough and genuine go, Cattermole has few equals in art. Like the others whom I have named, he is not a colorist otherwise than so as to avoid always bad color and maintain quiet harmonies of gray and brown. Elaboration he always avoids, and his execution remains rapid and sketchy, full of the better finish which tells essentials, and leaves to a more vulgar sense the realization of the trivialities of the subject.

Dewint, too, is one of the passed-away masters of water-color in whom the same sense of the pictorial unity which is the one uniting quality of all great landscape painters, and which alone will make a landscapist great, is the dominant characteristic, but with Dewint there is a sense of repose which Fielding imitated, and Claude even rendered, imperfectly except in rare cases, with a tone of seclusion and isolation which few painters have given so well. In his execution there was a deliberation and careful weighing of the touch which aid the repose and unity of the picture surprisingly, and at times a deep and touching sentiment in keeping with the qualities I have noticed which entitle Dewint's, like the other names I have called up, to be enrolled amongst those who have, and will have, as long as art is what we now know it, a place amongst its teachers.

If to these I add Nestfield, a painter of mountain torrents, with a lovely sense of the picturesque and pure in nature, an opalescent color at all times conventional and studio-tinged, but with an individuality decided beyond question; and a couple of drawings of Barrett, a man with a sense of the value of tone and gradation which places his pictures amongst those of the true and noble school, I shall have gone through what is best noteworthy of the old time in this exhibition.

Of the new water-color school there is a gorgeous display of old William Hunt, the father of the modern manner of water-color painting, in which the insistance of the old or "pure water-color" school on transparent methods gives place to a system of working so like oil-painting, and so largely keeping all the facilities of oil while calling in those of water, that there can be no question of a certain superiority of general result in it over all other methods of painting for small works. In it we see the solid impasto of oil, the purity and freshness of water-color, with a rapidity of execution and a combination of the deliberation and solidity of oil with the facile laissez-aller of water—all the strength and luminousness of oil-color and that sparkle and brilliant pigmentary quality which only water-color can give. As to permanence, too, the palm must be given to water-color, and this is clear as may be, from the short time involved, in the drawings of Hunt, which have every quality of fresh and intense color which they would have had in the beginning; and again in the water-colors of Turner (of which there are a few poorish samples here), which always retain their relations and harmony without change or blackening, while in many cases the oil-pictures of the same epoch are wrecks.

It is to be hoped that in any collection of educational intent to be made in America, examples of these old English painters might be included, and of the greatest excellence attainable. They will be worth—to such an art as ours must be—whole galleries of old masters and gems of study abroad. There is, since the early Italian and Venetian painters, nothing so fresh, so pure, so full of the genuine abandon of the artist to the animus of nature, as these men of whom I have been attempting to give you an idea.

W. J. Stillman.

Correspondence.

THE CHICAGO ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: It may be worth while to say that Dr. Reilly, commenting on my letter to the Nation from Chicago, was mistaken in presuming that "the other of the both to whom your correspondent refers was John A. Kennicott, Robert's father." Keeping green the memory of both father and son, in my first visit to Chicago after their death, I asked after others of the family. I was told that there were two brothers, both of whom shared, in some degree, the dispositions which had led Robert to his distant grave, and that one of them could be found constantly at the Academy of Sciences. Going thither for the purpose, I did find him, closely associated with Dr. Stimpson, and engaged at the time in some special investigations, the value and bearing of which Dr. Stimpson was kind enough to explain to me, and in which he expressed much interest. Mr. Kennicott himself told me that he had abandoned other pursuits in order to devote himself to science. Two years afterwards, I was informed that he was dead, possibly because my enquiry was supposed to refer to the more distinguished naturalist, his brother. Since reading Dr. Reilly's communication to you, I have ascertained that, meeting a very sad affliction soon after I saw him, he left Chicago, and that, though for the time being lost to his friends, he still lives.

I need hardly say that the much more important position of Dr. Stimpson was known to me. Dr. Reilly has misapprehended my reason for not mentioning him. My intention was limited to an authentic outline of certain matters of public concern, as they were presented to rapid observation at a particular moment after the fire. An expression of personal sympathy with a single living individual by name could hardly have been admitted to my long letter without the introduction of the names of many others in whose misfortunes the public have an interest.

I was influenced, however, in the little I said of the Academy, and in saying no more than I did, by other reasons. This institution was a centre from which emanated certain influences of great importance for a region of vast extent and unbounded promise. Simply as an exhibition to smatterers on the one hand, and to disciples of Mammon on the other, of what scientific study really is, and what it involves, it was in its place invaluable. We could have better spared some score of little colleges and universities. The value of contributions in aid of such institutions depends largely upon the degree in which the wants they are intended to supply can be met by others already in existence, and upon the number of those in the community who understand in what their usefulness consists, and whose aid in their support may consequently be counted on. In this view, I know of no object at Chicago to which it is more important that contributions should be directed than the Academy of Sciences. Most of the small number of those by whose gifts it had been built up have probably lost almost all they possessed by the fire. There is but one other object which I should put on the same level, and that is a similar centre of influence in respect to Art.

If, therefore, I failed to manifest an intelligent sympathy with the sentiments which my letter has given Dr. Reilly occasion to express, it was simply because I thought that these objects might better be brought to the attention of the readers of the Nation at a later period, and by some one better qualified to present them. I trust that an authorized account may soon appear of the collections destroyed, of the work interrupted, and of the plans now forming for the future of the Academy.

Fred. Law Olmsted.

New York, November 30.

IMPRISONMENT IN CIVIL ACTIONS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Permit me to express a sincere regret at seeing the Nation joining, at such a time of general laxity in morals as the present, in the popular outcry against imprisonment for debt. It was to be expected, after Judge Barnard's recent jail-delivery—a proceeding likely to prove as ineffectual as it was high-handed—that the Nation would treat its readers to a scholarly survey of this subject, as viewed from the standpoint of the student of social philosophy. The enquiry is at least pertinent, whether our modern social conditions are not so changed as to nullify the hackneyed arguments against imprisonment for debt?

The Nation's propositions appear to be two: first, that this "outrage" against the "sacredness of the person" fails of its end—namely, the securing of payment; and, second, that it is too severe a process in what the Nation is pleased to call only "quasi-criminal" cases. The first proposition merely raises a question of fact, and would not probably have been advanced had the writer in question (Nation, Nov. 16) had some experience in the collection of debts. The difficulty is that it contemplates only two classes of debtors, those who are utterly poor, and whom it would be useless as well as cruel to imprison, and those who, having property, will quietly hold it within reach of the sheriff's attachment. It ignores altogether that very numerous and, in large towns, rapidly growing class of debtors who have no property, who take good care never to have it, and yet who manage to live very comfortably on what they owe. They may have salaries, to be sure, but not to pay debts with. They perform with these the much more important function of sowing with lavish hand the very confidence from which a harvest of debts is soon to be reaped. In this free-handed policy society not only encourages them, but all its training of them is directed to this end. Dishonesty has come to fear only one thing—failure. It dreads no other shame; society has taught it none other.

Again, the very conditions of trade are altered. The commerce of this age pre-eminently is conducted on credit. Every man who renders a service must wait for his pay. Meanwhile, in the vastness and floating character of our population, he can know of his debtor's integrity and ability very little—almost nothing. Many times, the only precaution he can take is to enquire of his standing in the community, which, as everybody knows, is in these days a treacherous index of his character. What, then, is the creditor's remedy? He has laid out material, labor, skill, time for a man who, as he presently discovers, is not going to requite him. It is idle for you to laugh at him and say, "Sir, you ought not to have trusted this X., not knowing him to be a reliable party." He will tell you, "But I had to trust him, or not trade; and, besides, he was much respected in the community, and had as friends some most eminent men; he was lavish in spending, hospitable in entertaining, generous in subscribing to benevolent projects; how could I know he was a cheat?"

Suppose, now, that a law were introduced, as the Nation suggests, permitting in such a case the attachment of X.'s property. But it turns out that X. has no property. Or, if he has, he lives, as thousands of others do, like the Arabs of the desert, his present abode a mere resting-place, his property consisting of movables, and ready to vanish at the first scent of the sheriff. That this is especially common in this city, and growing alarmingly more so, the Nation itself has heretofore ably shown. It may be safe to say that over one-half of the "bad debtors" are men living in comparative luxury, and freely spending their money for all sorts of personal pleasure, while the tailor and doctor and landlady and washerwoman, and a host of others outside, are helpless and without hope. "What are you going to do about it?" Our writ of attachment must needs be a vast deal nimbler process to reach some of these cases than the law ever yet succeeded in making it.

Now, the responsibility for this state of things is largely with society. Of society, then, it is right to demand a remedy. So far as it will help us by giving us the writ of attachment against property, we shall be grateful; and especially thankful shall we be if the Nation will assist us during the coming legislative session in getting the scope of that writ greatly extended. But there are debtors against whom is not only precaution powerless, but this writ also is unavailing. The only possible thing they dread is the curtailment of their sensual pleasures. The precise argument which the Nation has so ably advanced in the case of Tweed, Sweeny & Co. applies to all other unscrupulous men whom our society nurtures and applauds. Let a wholesome terror of the jail stand over these debtors, and there would be fewer of them who could not pay their debts. The amount of maudlin sympathy these precious rascals are just now getting from the public would be incredible to any one who had not noted the degeneracy of business morals in late years. To talk about the "sacredness of the person" under these circumstances is like talking about the sanctity of the Hindoo bull, which must not be molested, though the creature be eating up your cabbages or break into your china-shop. Nobody's person is so sacred that he must be permitted to go on living at the expense of his neighbors, when the only thing that will stop him is the apprehension of his person. Such living, too—and here a single word upon the Nation's second proposition—is in most cases morally a fraud, and not so "quasi-criminal" as we are asked to suppose. The man who employs a physician, or dentist, or tailor, or who trades on credit with a grocer or butcher or dealer of wares—holding himself out by his appearance, dress, manners, and position in society as one able and intending to pay—does not, in my mind, fall very far short of the swindler if he fails to pay. The law, alas! does not yet define him as such; but, nevertheless, these are the things which, "when done with a less dainty grace, plain folks call theft."

New York, Nov. 25, 1871. E. P. W.

Notes.

The Rev. Edward Everett Hale's "Ten Times One is Ten" appears to have taken root in Chicago, where, out of the ruins of the fire, has sprung up a Young Men's Christian Union, bearing Harry Wadsworth's motto: "Look up, and not down; look out, and not in; look forward, and not back; lend a helping hand." This new association, having a hearty, non-sectarian support, is to build, next spring, a large hall near the business centre of the town, for lectures and music, in connection with a reading-room, gymnasium, etc., and a library. This last is one of the chief objects of the Union, and commends itself to those who seek an opportunity to aid in the restoration of Chicago. Its central position will for some time make it the most useful, and, indeed, the only easily accessible library for the north and west sides. Its present quarters are at 812 Wabash Avenue, and we believe donations of books and papers will be welcomed.——A movement is on foot to petition Congress to grant each State, out of the public lands, a million acres in trust for its university—or for some one of its colleges, which would then become, we suppose, the State university. The movement is from and on behalf of the South especially, though the projectors of it feel that if the law is not made to cover all parts of the country alike, its chances of being passed are not good. We are far from saying that Congress would not do well to endow the Southern colleges, but we doubt much if the public lands are in this case a proper or the best gift; or if the State Governments of the South, present or prospective, would be safe trustees; or, finally, if any help should be extended except on condition and in the proportion of self-help by the people of the Southern States themselves. In other words, we would have the Government imitate the disbursement of the Peabody Fund.——The Week, "a résumé of current opinion, home and foreign," is the title of a sixteen-page paper, large quarto, just started in this city. We believe it is yet to be proved how real a demand there is for a publication of this nature, in which politics are assigned the leading place. The Week deals not only with politics but with literature, art, music, and the drama, besides devoting a little space to the news of the day, and publishing the first four chapters of Turgeneff's novel, "Smoke." The classification of this first number is noticeably defective, and to omit the dates of the newspapers and periodicals quoted from is a serious oversight; the typography, too, is neither so accurate nor tasteful as it might easily be.

—Miss Thackeray is about to bring out a novel on which she has been at work for several years. It will be called "Old Kensington," and will appear simultaneously in the Cornhill Magazine and in Scribner's Monthly. Those who know the facile pen and subtle artistic taste which Miss Thackeray has so largely inherited from her father, and who remember the "Story of Elizabeth" and the "Village on the Cliff," will be glad to learn that those who have seen the new story pronounce it entirely worthy the author and her name, and a great advance on her previous works. Her taste, like her father's, is eminently pictorial, and her tableaux are evidently drawn from life.

—The new edition of Gauss's "Theoria Motus Corporum Cœlesticum," which has just been published by Perthes, in Gotha, and which is designated as the seventh volume of Gauss's works, and is accompanied by a copy of the original vignette, might easily be mistaken, says the Royal Society of Sciences in Göttingen, for a part of the complete edition of Gauss's works edited by that Society, and now in press. This is not the case, however, and the title, "Gauss's Works, Volume VII.," was chosen without their consent.

—The American Ethnological Society having fallen into decay, and the science of ethnology having meantime been swallowed up in the broader science of anthropology, the active members of the society undertook, two years ago, to transform it into the Anthropological Institute of New York, which was finally incorporated in March of the present year. Its president is Hon. E. George Squier; vice-presidents, J. C. Mott, M.D., and George Gibbs; recording secretary, J. G. Shea; and custodian, George H. Moore. The reconstructed society has a wholesome fear of endowments, and even proposes to dispense with a building of its own for its archives and collections, judging that these will be gladly accepted by public institutions, which will, in return, furnish ready access to them. Messrs. Westermann & Co. have issued No. 1 of the Journal of the Institute, with an attractive table of contents, several of the articles being illustrated. A translation of Paul Broca's "Progress of Anthropology in Europe and America" has the merit of an historical résumé, and the peculiar interest of showing what difficulties the earlier attempts to study the origin and development of mankind encountered from religious and political prejudices—slavery, for example, proving as great a stumbling-block in France as in the United States. The stimulus given to these attempts by the formation of Fowell Buxton's "Society for the Protection of the Aborigines," is a curious instance of the reaction of philanthropy upon science. The paper on the sculptured rocks in Belmont County, Ohio, is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of these prehistoric remains. In the article on "Von Martius on South-American Ethnology," we find the following suggestive quotation:

"The Brazilians frequently live in small detachments, being kept apart by the chase; sometimes only a few families wander together; often it is one family alone. Within the family the language suffers a constant remodelling. One of the children will fail to catch precisely the radical sound of a word; and the weak parents, instead of accustoming it to pronounce the word correctly, will yield, perhaps, themselves, and adopt the language of the child. We were often accompanied by persons of the same band, yet we noticed in each of them slight differences in accentuation and change of sound. His comrades, however, understood him, and he was understood of them. As a consequence, their language never can become stationary, but will constantly branch off into new dialects."

—The entire collection of paintings belonging to Mr. Alexander White, of Chicago, is to be sold at auction at the Leavitt Art-Rooms, 817 Broadway, corner of Twelfth Street, on the evenings of Tuesday and Wednesday, Dec. 12 and 13, commencing at half-past eight o'clock each evening. The collection consists of 163 paintings by American, French, Belgian, and German artists, the property of Mr. White, and there have been added to it, to be sold at the same time, by the consent of Mr. White, five paintings belonging to Ex-Governor Wm. Bross, of Chicago. Taken altogether, it is a long time since such an opportunity has been offered to lovers of modern pictures to buy so many excellent examples of the work of distinguished artists of our day. Mr. White has shown great taste and judgment, and done a good work, in bringing together such a collection, where there are not a half-dozen pictures that have not some good qualities, while the greater number are of uncommon merit. It is a great pity that a gallery brought together with so much pains and at so much cost, cannot be held together and bought as it stands, or nearly so, for our Art Museum. It represents very fairly a phase of art that is passing away, if, indeed, it be not already past, and it would be very difficult to replace these pictures, supposing it to be some time thought desirable, as it surely will be, to represent this phase of art in our coming National Museum.

—There is one branch of physiological investigation in which the public have a very direct interest—namely, the laws governing, and the effects on the human economy produced by, muscular movement. The literature of this subject is very voluminous, though greatly diffused in pamphlets, monographs, and transactions of societies. The most recent and, on some accounts, the most remarkable experiments have been those of Prof. Austin Flint, jr., touching the excretion of nitrogen as a consequence of muscular exercise—performed, as is well known, during the extraordinary exploits of the pedestrian Weston. In reviewing the history of these and similar researches, in which the thermometer (measuring the amount of heat), the Archimedean test (weighing the loss of substance), the dynamograph (writing out the results on the nervous system), and the sphygmograph (tracing the effect on the circulation) have played an important part, it would seem as if the two latter instruments had assisted us to a practical conclusion which may be thus stated: Repeated contractions of the same muscles, or of different sets of muscles, in overcoming uniform resistances—as the weight of a dumb-bell, or of the body—render "the nerves" unsteady, and make the heart beat more rapidly but less efficiently. On the contrary, an exercise which systematically arouses a person's latent muscular strength, by overcoming successively increased weights or resistances, produces a tangible and definite increase of steadiness of "the nerves," and a slower rate, but a fuller and more equable volume of the pulse. If these observations are well-founded, and of general application, they lend decided support to Dr. Winship and his disciples in lifting and "lifting cures."

—Mr. J. W. Beekman's "Centenary Address, delivered before the Society of the New York Hospital, July 24, 1871," is not only valuable as an historical retrospect, but as repeating and enforcing the lessons of experience in regard to the proper construction and uses of general hospitals. On this ground it may be recommended to the medical profession everywhere. Mr. Beekman rescues from comparative obscurity the name of an eminent New York surgeon, Dr. John Jones, whose advanced sanitary notions were of the greatest service to our soldiers in the Revolution and the war of 1812. He was the author of "Plain, Concise, Practical Remarks on the Treatment of Wounds and Fractures" (New York: John Holt, 1775), and readers of his "Short Appendix on Camp and Military Hospitals," which Mr. Beekman reprints in full, will be surprised at the author's wisdom in matters of hygiene. Old New York below Canal Street, and especially in the neighborhood of the hospital on Duane Street, falls within the scope of this centenary address, and affords some amusing reminiscences. For the benefit of country visitors to the city, we may quote that "where the Astor House stands there was, in 1780, an encampment of negro slaves, who had been enticed by Lord Dunmore from Virginia. They died of small-pox in large numbers, and were buried in the field where Stewart's store, corner of Broadway and Reade Street, now is."

—Messrs. Little & Brown, Boston, have received copies of the "Works in Verse and Prose of the Right Honorable John Hookham Frere," including translations of the Acharnians, the Knights, the Birds, the Frogs, and a portion of the Peace: the last-named was never printed, the others are only circulated among the friends of the author. If Coleridge's seeming extravagant estimate of Frere may be trusted, this announcement ought to excite no little interest in the world where letters are loved; he says of these translations: "A work of which (should the author be persuaded to make it public) it is my most deliberate judgment and inmost conviction that it will form an important epoch in English literature, and open out sources of metrical and rhythmical wealth in the very heart of our language of which few, if any, among us are aware." Lowndes (Bohn's Ed.) gives the dates of the printing of the translations as follows: "The Frogs, 79 pages, London, printed by Nicol, 1839. Printed twenty years before, but only partially issued. The Acharnians, 70 pages. The Knights, 89 pages. The Birds, 104 pages. These last three pieces were printed at Malta, all in quarto."

—We trust it will not seem discourteous to a distinguished visitor to our country to tell over again a famous anecdote relating to the visit made by Peter the Great, "The Czar of Muscovy," to England in 1698. Wishing to be near the Royal Dockyard at Deptford, in order more easily and effectually to carry out the purpose of his journey, which was to study shipbuilding and the management of ships, he hired the house at Sayes Court, a country-seat of John Evelyn, the famous author of the "Sylva." The Czar, as Evelyn says in his "Memoirs," made it his court and palace, new furnished for him by the King; but he and his followers made a poor return for the hospitality. Whilst the Czar was in the house, Mr. Evelyn's servant wrote to him: "There is a house full of people and right nasty. The Czar lies next your Library, and dines in the parlor next your study. He dines at ten o'clock and six at night, is very seldom at home a whole day, very often in the King's Yard, or by water, dressed in several dresses. The King is expected there this day, the best parlor is pretty clean for him to be entertained in. The King pays for all he has." Yet one piece of damage done by the Czar could not possibly have been paid for by the King. In the "Sylva" Evelyn exclaims, in his account of the holly: "Is there under heaven a more glorious and refreshing object of the kind than an impregnable hedge of about four hundred feet in length, nine feet high and five in diameter, which I can show in my now ruined gardens at Sayes Court (thanks to the Czar of Muscovy) at any time of the year glittering with its armed and varnished leaves?" One of the favorite amusements of Peter was to seat himself in a wheelbarrow, and make his officers force him through this "impregnable" hedge and drag him back again.

—A very good illustration of the well-established propensity of the ex-Emperor of the French to meddle with affairs whose direction has been confided to others, is to be found among the extracts from the Diary of M. d'Ideville, who was the French chargé d'affaires at Turin when Cavour was Minister, which he has been publishing in the Journal de Paris. We quote from the Pall Mall Gazette. One of these extracts contains an amusing account of an interview which took place between Cavour and Prince La Tour d'Auvergne, the French Ambassador, in 1860. The Prince had instructions to read to Cavour a despatch from Count Walewski, in which the Italian Government was plainly threatened with the displeasure of the Cabinet of the Tuileries in case it should continue to encourage the annexationist agitation in the Duchies and Central Italy. The despatch stated that any attempt to annex those territories would be regarded as a breach of treaties, and that if the King, disregarding the warnings of the Imperial Cabinet, should place his throne in danger by such an adventurous policy, he would be left to his fate. Cavour listened attentively to the reading of this despatch, leaning his head on his hands and saying not a word. When the Prince had finished, and added a few confirmatory remarks of his own, Cavour rejoined, "Yes, yes, mon cher Prince, you are right; what M. de Walewski writes is not calculated to encourage us; this is indeed a sharp reprimand. But," he proceeded, a gleam of satirical glee playing across his face, "what will you say when I read you a letter which has come to me direct from the Tuileries, from a personage whom you also know?" Upon this he took out of his pocket a letter of the same date as Walewski's despatch, in which M. Mocquard confidentially informed him, by order of the Emperor, that the projects of annexation were by no means unfavorably regarded in Paris, and that he (Cavour) need not trouble himself about any complications resulting from them. The Prince was, of course, dumbfounded; he could only bow, and, folding up Count Walewski's despatch, he hurried back to the embassy.

—As a companion picture to the above, we quote from the same journal an anecdote which may perhaps induce the reflection that Cavour may have had as much trouble with his master as La Tour d'Auvergne had with his. King Victor Emanuel having received a letter from Napoleon III. in which the latter revoked certain promises he had made to him on a former occasion, was furious, and took the first opportunity of venting his anger on the Emperor's representative. At the next court ball he summoned Prince La Tour d'Auvergne to his presence in a private room, and addressed him in these words: "After all, what is this Emperor of yours? The last comer among the European sovereigns—an intruder and a b . . . [bastard?] Let him remember what he is, and what I am—I, the head of the first and oldest royal dynasty that now reigns in Europe." Prince La Tour listened to this outburst with as much calmness as he could command, and then observed, "Sire, you will permit me not to have heard a single word that you have spoken." The King said nothing, and turned away. In the course of the evening, however, he came again to the Prince, and tapping him familiarly on the shoulder, whispered in his ear with a smile, "You need not report our conversation of to-day to Paris, cher prince. Besides, you told me yourself that you did not hear what I said."

—It appears that Jules Favre, or, as he will have it, his copyist, omitted from Count d'Harcourt's note relating his now famous interview with the Pope on April 26, the important words ce n'est pas que in the connection: "All I desire is a little corner of earth where I shall be master; not that if my States were offered back to me I should refuse them, etc." The words can be called important, however, only as regards the sense of the sentence from which they were immediately detached. They in no wise alter the fact that the Pope showed a reasonableness, and a disposition to be reconciled to the new condition of Italy, which threw consternation into the clerical ranks, and made them eagerly clutch at the straw of an inaccuracy in the report of his speech. It is still true, whether or not the Pope would accept his former possessions, that he does not covet the burden of temporal sovereignty, and does not regard the want of it as fatal to his office or the church. And it is further true that Italy has solemnly guaranteed to him, and that he now holds, safe from intrusion by the civil authorities as well as by the mob, his coveted coin de terre, of which he is absolute master, and where he can "exercise in their plenitude his spiritual functions."

MAINE'S VILLAGE COMMUNITIES.*

SOMEWHAT over a year ago (see the Nation, No. 273), we called attention to some interesting investigations in regard to mediæval village communities in England. Communities of this nature in India, and in certain Slavonic countries, had been described in Maine's "Ancient Law," and connected, by manifest proofs, with a primitive patriarchal condition of society. Mr. Maine seems to have been unaware, at the time of the publication of this work, of traces of a similar institution in Teutonic countries; but the treatise of Nasse, described in the article alluded to above, and the more extensive discussions of Von Maurer—most of them, if we are not mistaken, published since the work on "Ancient Law"—have supplied the missing link in the investigation, and showed that the Teutonic nations possessed village communities quite as distinctly organized, and quite as characteristic, as either Hindoos or Russians. It is to sum up the results of these various enquiries, and show their place in comparative jurisprudence, that Mr. Maine has prepared these six lectures upon "Village Communities." They were originally designed, he tells us, as an introduction to a longer course, but are published by themselves with the hope that "they might possibly help to connect the special sets of investigation, each of which possesses great interest, but is apparently conducted in ignorance of its bearing on the other."

It is not to be expected, therefore, that this work should have the originality of the treatise on "Ancient Law." It is rich in profound and suggestive observations, and, no doubt, it requires as high an order of powers to discern the points of connection between independent lines of investigation, and bring them under one generalization, as to pursue the investigations themselves. But the establishment of the general principle had, in the main, been accomplished in the previous work. The special service done by the present discussion is rather in extending the generalization, which had been made for two branches of the Aryan race, so as to include a third, and that the one to which we ourselves belong. In these lectures, especially in the third, we have the results of the investigations of Von Maurer and Nasse presented with great clearness and compactness, while the fourth lecture proceeds to point out the parallelisms with the agrarian institutions of India, and the light which they throw on the institutions of the West. We have, therefore, a much fuller and more detailed account of the Indian village communities than that which is given in "Ancient Law"; while the sketch given of the primitive communism of England will be new to almost every one. It is not too much to say, therefore, that this work will prove as fundamental and indispensable to the student of history as the former. "Ancient Law" gives him the clue to the development of political and legal ideas in the history of society; in "Village Communities" he finds the clue to some of the most vexed and puzzling questions in mediæval institutions. Certain points now for the first time become comprehensible; certain chapters must be rewritten.

This primitive community is thus described by Mr. Maine (p. 78):

"The ancient Teutonic cultivating community, as it existed in Germany itself, appears to have been thus organized. It consisted of a number of families standing in a proprietary relation to a district divided into three parts. These three portions were the mark of the township or village, the common mark or waste, and the arable mark or cultivated area. The community inhabited the village, held the common mark in mixed ownership, and cultivated the arable mark in lots appropriated to the several families.

"Each family in the township was governed by its own free head or paterfamilias. . . .

"Confining ourselves to proprietary relations, we find that his right or (what is the same thing) the rights of his family over the common mark are controlled or modified by the rights of every other family. It is a strict ownership in common, both in theory and practice. When cattle grazed on the common pasture, or when the householder felled wood in the common forest, an elected or hereditary officer watched to see that the common domain was equitably enjoyed.

"But the proprietary relation of the householder which has most interest for us is his relation to the arable mark. It seems always in theory to have been originally cut out of the common mark, which indeed can only be described as the portion of the village domain not appropriated to cultivation. In this universally recognized original severance of the arable mark from the common mark, we come very close upon the beginning of separate or individual property. The cultivated land of the Teutonic village community appears almost invariably to have been divided into three great fields. A rude rotation of crops was the object of this threefold division, and it was intended that each field should lie fallow once in three years.

"The fields under tillage were not, however, cultivated by labor in common. Each householder has his own family lot in each of the three fields, and this he tills by his own labor and that of his sons and his slaves. But he cannot cultivate as he pleases. He must sow the same crop as the rest of the community, and allow his lot in the uncultivated field to lie fallow with the others. Nothing he does must interfere with the right of other households to have pasture for sheep and oxen in the fallow and among the stubble of the fields under tillage."

It is shown further on that the system here described as Teutonic existed in full in England. A passage from the works of Mr. William Marshall, who wrote in the early part of this century, and of course had no notion of the theory which his words go to confirm, describes the system which prevailed in a large part of England, in language which would apply almost without change to the primitive institution made known to us by Von Maurer and Nasse. Traces of it remain even at the present day; for instance, a large common arable field was close to Oxford, and "the grassy baulks which anciently separated the three fields are still conspicuous."

When we said that the present work could not be expected to present new and original views, like that upon "Ancient Law," but rather to combine and generalize several distinct sets of enquiry, we should have excepted the two closing lectures, which develop the leading ideas one or two steps further, and may be pronounced as original and striking as any portion of the author's writings. These treat of "The Process of Feudalization" and "The Early History of Price and Rent," thus touching the field of history on the one hand and that of political economy on the other. Feudalization consisted, not in dissolving this village community, but in turning it into a "manorial group." The waste now was considered to belong no longer to the community, but to the lord of the manor, subject, however, to all the rights of use which had existed before. In this manorial group there are two classes of tenants, the freeholders of tenement lands (the so-called socagers) and those holding by servile tenure—that which became copyhold and "customary freehold." The first of these "correspond in the main to the free heads of households composing the old village community." They continued to maintain the same usages as under the old system. The second class, holding portions of the "lord's domain," consists of villeins and others, colonized by him upon the common land, which has now become subject to the lord's "right of approvement." This manorial group has heretofore been the starting-point in the history of English landed property. In future, we are to recognize in it only the feudalized form of the village community. And this process of feudalization, it is shown, was going on in the primitive Teutonic communities even before that contact with Roman law and institutions which certainly hastened the process and affected very materially the form of the result.

The chapter upon "Price and Rent" is equally instructive, and forms an appropriate sequel to the chapter in "Ancient Law" which traces the origin of the idea of property. The great fundamental principle of competition, Mr. Maine shows, is hardly recognized at all in transactions of these early times, rent scarcely existing, and price being purely customary between members of the same community. It was only when members of one community had business dealings with those of another, or when strangers entered into landed relations with any community, that the principle of competition came in. This is illustrated by the fact that even now, wherever the manorial group exists in England, rackrents are rare. Two most important principles in political economy—the right of individuals to property in land, and the rule of competition in buying and selling—are shown not to be the primitive and ultimate facts which we wholly assume them to be, but to have been developed at a comparatively late stage in the history of institutions. The conception of absolute property in land "appears to me," he says, page 158, "to have grown out of the ownership of the lord in that portion of his domain which he cultivated by his immediate personal dependents, and therefore to be a late and gradually matured fruit of the feudalization of Europe." It is easy to see the important practical bearing of this doctrine. Mr. Mill, in a review of the book in the Fortnightly Review, says significantly that "if the nation thought proper to reverse the process [which it has hitherto pursued], and move in the direction of reconverting individual property into some new and better form of collective, as it has so long been converting collective property into individual, it would be making a legitimate use of an unquestionable moral right." It ought to be remarked, however, that Mr. Mill does not consider this conversion of the community into the manorial group to have been an unmixed evil. In these cultivating communities "the land was free only in the sense of being free from feudal services, but it was enslaved to custom. An intricate net of usage bound down the alluvial owner, as it now binds the Indian peasant, to a fixed routine of cultivation" (p. 164). Now, the lord was free from these vexatious restrictions; and it was only this freedom and his authority over the waste that made it possible for Europe to be reclaimed from swamp and forest, and brought under cultivation. To absolute property in land, again, "we unquestionably owe such an achievement as the cultivation of the soil of North America" (p. 165).

* "Village Communities in the East and West. Six Lectures delivered at Oxford by Henry Sumner Maine, Corpus Professor of Jurisprudence in the University, formerly Law Member of the Supreme Government of India, Author of 'Ancient Law.'" London: John Murray. 1871. 8vo, pp. 226.

We had marked a number of striking passages for quotation, but our space will permit only one: "The very small place filled by our own English law in our thoughts and conversation is a phenomenon absolutely confined to these islands [and to the countries colonized by Great Britain?] A very simple experiment, a very few questions asked after crossing the Channel, will convince you that Frenchmen, Swiss, and Germans of a very humble order have a fair practical knowledge of the law which regulates their every-day life. We in Great Britain are altogether singular in our tacit conviction that law belongs as much to the class of exclusively professional subjects as the practice of anatomy" (p. 59). We are gratified to find, on page 201—closing the last lecture—a quotation from our sketch of the New England village system, referred to above, with the words: "This is not only a tolerably exact account of the ancient European and existing Indian village-community, but it is also a history of its natural development, where the causes which turn it into a manorial group are absent, and of its ultimate dissolution."

BEHIND THE BARS.*

Most readers of this painfully interesting volume will agree with its editor in his opinion that it is "well deserving of popular attention," and will be inclined to assent to his opinion that it is also "worthy of the notice of professional and scientific enquirers" who are seeking after the best methods of treatment in cases of insanity. But it may doubted if he can expect many readers to say, as he seems to say, that the author is not often the reverse of philosophical in tone and statement and argument, or that she is never "actuated by a desire to cavil needlessly." Not that the book is not, to all appearance, perfectly well intentioned; nor that it does not in the main breathe a truly humane spirit; nor that it does not contain a great deal of sensible suggestion and remark. But it gives numerous indications of having been written under a sense of irritation which, indeed, seems not unnatural if one considers the trying circumstances in which a delicately reared woman must find herself when compelled to become one of many patients in a large asylum, but which, nevertheless, natural as it may be, is not the state of feeling in which one writes accurately and justly. Inaccurately, and with some injustice, we should say that the author of "Behind the Bars" writes in several of the passages before us; and this is to be regretted the more because of the praiseworthy nature of her attempt and its inherent difficulties. Nothing is plainer on the face of it than that the most carefully moderate and truthful complaints of their treatment made by persons who have ever been known as of unsound mind are easily, almost inevitably, put aside as imaginary, and heard with pitying disbelief rather than with any respect or real attention. And we should suppose that as nothing can be much more baffling and disheartening than to find one's just complaints so treated—to find one's most rational expressions of misery taken as good reasons for pitying one or inflicting further misery—this, we should imagine, would make any person who has ever had experience of it doubly and trebly solicitous to use, in depicting the system which he wishes to have abolished, the most subdued coloring at all compatible with the truth and with effectiveness of representation. But our author has either failed to perceive this or else has been unable to act coolly in her perception of it, and we doubt if the friends of the asylum management which she condemns will not readily forgive her for the larger portion of her book for the sake of the support which the other portion of it indirectly gives to them and their system.

It is to this and other similar portions that we refer more particularly when we speak of the book as being of rather painful interest, though, of course, the nature of the subject is such that of necessity there can be nothing very pleasing in the discussion of it. Still, it requires discussion, and we should be sorry to say anything to deter any one from looking at it in the light in which the writer sets it, albeit she has, we suspect, made the mistake of setting it in a light which unduly deepens the shadows, whether we think of truthfulness to the facts or of the advisability of her course as an advocate. She partly gives away her case. For instance, in talking about the supply of the table at the asylum in which she was a patient, she gives a description which seems to make it probable in a very high degree that asylum breakfasts, both as regards the time and manner of service and the quality and variety of the food, would be found extremely distasteful by a well-nurtured lady, of weak appetite and delicate tastes, accustomed to rise late and to think of her breakfast as being almost anything rather than "a meal of victuals." And further, even if such a person were thoughtful and reasonable enough to admit fully that in large establishments there must be rules and regulations, and a methodical strictness of practice which it is one of the blessings of home life to be free from, nevertheless she might, we suppose, justly complain if the patient paying a high price for board is not permitted to consult her ease by taking her breakfast at some other hour than the usual farm-house hour, and with as little as possible of the penitentiary or boarding-school formality. But, admitting this to be entirely true, and that the asylum dinners also—like dinners in other places—are sometimes badly dressed, and sometimes consist of dishes not tempting to either an ill or well person's appetite, it nevertheless looks very much as if the author were unfair, if not uncandid, in her account of the kitchen and table of her asylum.

There are other chapters in "Behind the Bars," as well as this chapter with the queer heading of "Chops and Tomato Sauce," where there is now and again a heat and carelessness which dispose the reader to distrust. It is, for example, a more serious charge than the reader can fairly be expected to entertain, which is hinted against the medical men of the asylum she describes, when the conjecture is given that they send the night-watcher with his lantern among the patients with a view of breaking up their sleep, it possibly being a part of the doctors' theory "to exhaust nature au fond before the recuperative regeneration begins." And it was hasty to make these two assertions: one urges that "no one should believe that any person except a demented one would choose the life of an asylum . . . unless it be that something in the system has fostered and finally brought them to a sort of despair of any other." The second contradicts the first, and says that "there are, it is well known, a few patients here who are not insane, but nervous, of delicate organization, or temperaments too apprehensive to battle with the world, and who here find just the sort of routine necessary for them. And they themselves have chosen it."

But if we have spoken at some length of the principal defect of "Behind the Bars," it was not because its principal defect is the principal part of it; nor, as we have said, because we would deter any one from looking carefully at the subject as this book presents it. It is true that the author is not an expert in the study of mental alienation and its proper treatment; and no more are most of our readers. But it is true, too, that in presence of the very diversified forms of this calamitous disease, and its difficult and often occult nature, it is perfectly common for many persons called experts to be as much at fault, or nearly as much at fault, as most laymen, whether such laymen as have never had experience of insanity in their own persons, or such as, like the writer before us, know by personal experience something of what insanity is, and something, however little, of what measures they found helpful to them, and what injurious. It is not the skilful and studious alienist who will refuse to listen to records like "Behind the Bars"; nor is he the person most likely to reject the aid of enlightened lay opinion in imposing better methods and systems on the asylums, far too numerous, which are still managed in accordance with discredited notions as to the relations which should exist between the insane and their attendants. Non-professional opinions and the views of recovered patients are much more likely to be scouted by such medical men as the routine of a system has subdued into something resembling apathy, and whose dicta are perhaps not more valuable, while their spirit of enquiry is much less active and valuable, than the opinions and efforts of laymen who have no system to assert, but only a warm sympathy with some afflicted friend or relative. It will, for instance, perhaps be the unprofessional man of fair intelligence, quite as often as the asylum doctor of fair education and ability, who will give his assent to these words of an eminent authority, Dr. Maudsley: "There can be no greater fallacy than that of supposing what is called a moderate use of mechanical restraint to be consistent with a general plan of treatment in other respects humane and beneficial. It must be dispensed with altogether, or deterioration will ensue in the patient, and all kinds of neglect and tyranny will be engendered by degrees, until restraints become the usual substitutes for forbearance and watchful attention. It is necessary that the abolition of restraint should be absolute to be efficient; the principle of the non-restraint system will admit of no compromise . . . I do not hesitate to express a strong personal conviction that the use of mechanical restraints in any asylum, public or private, is an indication of a badly managed institution." These are the words of a physician who has wholly discarded that conception of insanity which regards the lunatic as a man under demoniac influence, a maniac, to be chained like a beast in a cage. And his conception of a rightly managed asylum is not that multitudes of madmen, of all degrees of mental aberration, from the least to the greatest, should be massed together and guarded and disciplined by hired "attendants," who also scrub floors, wash windows, and cook, and who are seldom fitted by education of any kind for their arduous and delicate labors and trusts. That there should be a staff of competent physicians and of trained attendants so numerous that individual attention can be given to individual cases; and that at the same time the patients should be so few that the individual patient shall be in no danger of being sacrificed to the patients collectively—or, in other words, to the necessary discipline of an establishment too large to be much better than a house of detention, instead of a house for curing the sick—that would be nearer Dr. Maudsley's notion of a true asylum than most of the institutions in this country or in England which bear the name of asylums.

* "Behind the Bars." Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1871.

It is by what it can do to help in forming a body of public opinion favorable to this new order of asylum that the book before us has its value, and may, with due reserve, be commended to general attention. It settles no questions, but passages in it such as this that follows will lead to profitable reflection. And the people who have a near interest in the settlement of the questions it suggests are more numerous than would be suspected by those who have given little thought to the statistics of insanity. The author is speaking of attendants who in the asylum of her residence were mostly young girls of the rank of farmers' daughters, and who preferred to be "attendants" in an "institution" to being "servants" in private houses, where they would have had somewhat similar but much less onerous work to do:

"There is a strange inconsistency in the picture of these youthful, childish, inexperienced, romping females attempting, after a fashion, to nurse and protect some 'depressed' or 'excited' matron or octogenarian. Imagine the spectacle of two or three voluble, romping attendants conducting an infirm, tremulous old lady-patient to her bedroom at night. They gabble about her, like monkeys, of their own personal affairs, meanwhile twitching at a string or a button which refuses to undo itself quick enough for their accommodation, while they say to the patient, 'Come, come, auntie, hurry up; how slow you are!' or, 'What a torment you are!' or, by way of threat, 'Shall I put the jacket on you?' Taunts and expressions of this sort, though not positive cruelties, are needless, and come not from bad hearts but light heads, and are the effect of another error in the system of employing too young attendants for the care of the insane. . . . The physician does not know what passes between them [the attendants and the patients], and if a difficulty comes up the attendant's story is preferred to the patient's, which, of course, out of respect to his disease, must be refuted. And here lies an immense power. The attendant feels its importance, and from a sense of personal self-aggrandizement come the refusals, the orders, the threats, the disappointments, and petty everyday annoyances to the patient. Here is a practical instance of the woman holding the power that is in reality the man's. And, in nine cases out of ten, a woman possessing authority that is not regulated and tempered by the affections, will abuse and degrade it. . . . They can handle patients very roughly. What would be done, let it be asked, with a patient who threw a knife across a dinner-table lined with patients? Reason and sanity would at once suggest the 'noisy gallery' and the strait-jacket. But the writer has seen an attendant, who lost her temper while serving a patient, do this thing. Was any report to matron or physician ever made of this insane act? At another time, an attendant, provoked because an inmate would not eat, has been seen to take the gravy from the plate, and rub it deliberately with her hand all over the face of the patient. Now, when one considers that the attendants may have it all their own way, and may commit acts like these, while there is no loophole of redress for the patient, would it not seem to be an important duty in the reformation of the whole system to consider the attendance, and the wrongs that are possible to accrue from its present arrangements?"

"The wrongs that are possible to accrue" are, indeed, the ones to be most considered. The author freely admits that the attendants whom she had opportunities of observing were, on the whole, good girls, who meant well and worked hard and earned their wages. But that the system needs revision seems clear; and so much misery is possible under it, so much has been ignorantly inflicted under it, that we may properly commend almost any book—even if it does do some injustice, and though it does take a good deal too easily a most difficult problem—which will help to make our Uticas and Kirkbrides and Somervilles more like the famous "city of the simple" in Belgium, where for generations lunatic patients have been cared for in the village families, and where it is said that for generations "no such article as a strait-waistcoat has existed in all Gheel."

History of the National Peace Jubilee and Great Musical Festival. By P. S. Gilmore. (Boston: Lee & Shepard).—It is wonderful what a man completely possessed by one idea, and blessed with blind faith and pugnacity sufficient to carry it out in face of every obstacle, can accomplish. If he is fanatically inclined, he may found a sect, and gather together a vast community, as Brigham Young has done in Utah. If he is musically inclined, he may get up a prodigious festival, that shall set all New England singing, as Gilmore did in Boston two years ago. If his monomania is of a very aggravated type, he may write a book of seven hundred and sixty pages about it. And this, too, the irrepressible Gilmore has done. Even here he does not stop; for he is busy organizing another musical festival, to be given in Boston next June, in which not New England only, but all the world, shall take part. Every nation in Europe is to send a band of its best musicians, and a day is to be set apart for each nationality represented. Instead of a chorus of ten thousand voices, one of twenty thousand is to be organized. The orchestra is to consist of two thousand instead of one thousand players, and the building is to hold one hundred thousand people, in place of the fifty thousand who gathered in the Coliseum of 1869. As everything is subjected to the doubling process, we may then look for another volume of fifteen hundred and twenty pages which shall record the affair.

Mr. Gilmore's book is exactly such a production as we might look for. To say that it is egotistical but faintly expresses its character in this respect. From title-page to conclusion it is all Gilmore. What he thought, what he said, whom he saw, what they did and, above all, what he did, is the record of every page. The ingenuous man has even written out and printed the prayer that he offered up in the secret closet in the hour when he feared that the whole affair was about to collapse. His hopes and fears, trials, obstacles, and final triumph, are all spread upon the record. Even the names of the ten thousand singers, the thousand instrumentalists, the artillerists, anvil-beaters, and the very ushers at the doors, are set down. A large part of the book is made up of comments of the press on the progress of his undertaking and its culmination. The author has also improved the opportunity to reflect on such persons as failed to give it support. He is particularly severe on Mr. John S. Dwight, of Boston, the editor of the Journal of Music. Mr. Dwight is known to all who are interested in musical art as a man whose life has been devoted, in a quiet, unobtrusive way, to fostering and encouraging the highest and noblest forms of the art. It was absurd in Mr. Gilmore to suppose that he could harness him, and men like him, to his noisy, flaring musical chariot; and it is still more absurd on his part to indulge in foolish abuse of them because they would not permit themselves to be made the instruments of his egregious vanity.

Mr. Gilmore's history is long-winded and desultory. It is without literary merit, but has that sort of interest which pertains to all unreserved narratives of personal experiences. In all other respects, it is merely a literary curiosity.

Doings in Maryland; or, Matilda Douglas. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1871.)—It is seldom that the persistent reader of fiction gets hold of a poor novel from which so much amusement is derivable as from this. There is such a total disregard of every principle of good writing that the reader at times takes the book for a caricature, but the plot and occasional touches of sentiment rigidly forbid his adopting so favorable a view. We need only say that it describes the heroine's sufferings from poverty, the insolence of school committee-men, and rejected love. With all its faults, much of it has the air of being drawn from life. The love story, however, is a wilful addition. Here it is:

"An advertisement announced to the public the fact that a certain scientific and literary professor—name withheld—having a few leisure hours at his disposal, would give private lessons to individuals—ladies and others—in Latin and other languages. This was just the opportunity Mattie desired; she gladly embraced it, and placed herself under the instruction of the advertiser, who turned out to be the distinguished Professor Waverly." "Professor Waverly had arrived nearly at the meridian of life, and was yet unmarried. . . . The professor's person and accomplishments were all the capital he possessed, and, like a sensible man, he determined to invest to the best advantage; or, in other words, he was a determined fortune-hunter, and no bait worthy of his sublime acceptance had as yet been laid at his elegantly compressed feet." "Praise from others only strengthened Mattie's heart for exertion as meat strengthens the body for labor; but sweet words of approbation from him acted upon her like draughts of fourth-proof brandy, exhilarating, intoxicating, maddening her brain, boiling along her blood."

He prefers to marry a "rich deformed idiot." Mattie is aggrieved, and resolves to demand an explanation, "but——her tongue cleaved to the roof of her mouth, her lips refused to shape the words, her tormentor was so unapproachably haughty. She was reading Latin: blunder followed blunder in quick succession; love quite obscured the Latin. He saw the conflict that was going on in the mind of his victim, and looked on with feelings akin to the feelings of a cannibal who, with watering mouth, watches the broiling of a plump infant, and knows by its faint and fainter moan that it is almost cooked. At length, when his cannibal appetite was sated with the sight of broiling humanity, he brought the lesson to a close, and informed the roasted girl that the next operation of the kind would close the series, as he could attend to business of that kind no longer." She recovers, however, and marries Allston the painter.

We have no space for further extracts, and, indeed, choice would be difficult where there is so much that is tempting.

 For a review of Children's Books, see the accompanying Christmas Supplement.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Barker (Lady), A Christmas Cake in Four Quarters	(Macmillan & Co.)	$1 50
Birch (C. M.), Reveries of Song	(Bell & Daldy)	75
Bryant (W. C.), The Song of the Fountain, illustrated	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Colange (L.), The National Encyclopædia, No. 1, swd	(F. B. Felt & Co.)	40
Collins (C. W.), Sophocles	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	1 00
Fishwick (H.), History of the Parochial Chapelry of Goosnargh	(Trübner & Co.)	3 00
Johnson (Rev. S.), Labor Parties and Labor Reform, swd	(Boston)
Little Folks, Vol. I	(American News Co.)
Macquoid (Katharine S.), Patty	(Macmillan & Co.)	1 75
Morris (Rev. F. O.), Dogs and their Doings	(Harper & Bros.)
Markham (C. R.), Ollanta: An Ancient Yuca Drama	(Trübner & Co.)	75
Nicholson (H. A.), Text-Book of Geology	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Text-Book of Zoölogy	" "
Nine Years Old: a Child's Story	(Macmillan & Co.)	1 50
Norris (Emilia M.), Adrift on the Sea	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)	1 00
Owen (R. D.), The Debatable Land between this World and the Next	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Paez (R.), Ambas Américas: Contrastes	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Passavant (J. D.), Raphael of Urbino, and his Father	(Macmillan & Co.)	12 00
Pressensé (Rev. E. de), Jesus Christ: His Life and Work	(Carlton & Lanahan)	1 50
Pim (Hon. J.), Ireland and the Imperial Parliament, swd	(Dublin)
Proctor (Edna D.), A Russian Journey	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	$1 50
Reclus (E.) The Earth	(Harper & Bros.)
Roe (A. S.), Resolution: a Tale	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)	1 50
Smith (Julia P.), Brazen Gates	"
Spielhagen (F.), Problematic Characters	(Holt & Williams)	1 50
Through Night to Light	"	1 50
Seymour (S.), Review of the Theory of Narrow Gauges, swd	(D. Van Nostrand)
Stowe (Mrs. H. B.), My Wife and I	(J. B. Ford & Co.)	1 75
Schouler (W.), A History of Massachusetts in the Civil War, 2 vols	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Sanford (Mrs. D. P.), Five Happy Children	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)	1 50
Smith (W.), Hallam's Middle Ages, Student's ed	(Harper & Bros.)
Sermons by the Paulists, Vol. VI	(Catholic Pub. House)
Societyism and its Evils, swd	(Sheldon & Co.)
Songs of the Heart	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Spencer (H.), Philosophy of Style	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Taylor (B.), Illustrated Library of Travel, etc	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Tennyson (A.), The Last Tournament	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	1 52
The Workshop, No. 11, swd	(E. Steiger)	40
Tandon (M.), The Wonders of the Sea	(Robert Turner)
Tautphœus (Baroness), Cyrilla; a Tale, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	75
The Children's Magazine, Vol. I	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
The Merrie Heart; Nursery Rhymes	(Robert Turner)
Thompson (Rev. J. P.), Home Worship	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)
Trollope (T. A.), Durnton Abbey; a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	50
Tyng (Rev. S. H.), The Rich Kinsman	(Prot. Epis. Soc.)	1 00
The Prisoners of St. Lazare	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Trowbridge (J. T.), Jack Hazard and His Fortunes	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	1 50
Taine (H.), On Intelligence	(Holt & Williams)	5 00
History of English Literature	"	5 00
The Mighty Works of Jesus Christ: Illustrated	(Pott, Young, & Co.)
Ueberweg (Dr. F.), History of Philosophy, Vol. I	(C. Scribner & Co.)
Ward (Mrs. F. M.), The Vagabond	(T. Whitaker & Co.)
Claude Spencer; and Waddles	" "
Watson (J. W.), Beautiful Snow, and other Poems	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	2 00
Wood (Lieut. O. E), West Point Scrap-Book	(D. Van Nostrand)
Woolsey (Rev. T. D.), Two Sermons Preached at Yale College	(C. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Walden (Rev. T.), Our English Bible and its Ancestors	(Porter & Coates)
Wilson (J.), Treatise on English Punctuation, 19th ed.	(Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.)
Yonge (Miss C. M.), Little Lucy's Wonderful Globe	(Macmillan & Co.	2 00
Zell's Descriptive Hand-Atlas of the World, Parts 5 to 10, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell)	50

THE STANDARD.

TAINE'S ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Vol. I. Royal 8vo, cloth.

To be completed in two volumes. Vol. II. nearly ready.

Per vol., $5.

THE LONDON SPECTATOR SAYS:

"The half-Carlylian brilliancy of the book is a mere trifle in comparison with the merits of its substance. It will take its place in the very foremost rank of works on the literature of England. . . . No English book can bear comparison with it for richness of thought, for variety, keenness, and soundness of critical judgment, for the brilliancy with which the material and the moral features of each age are sketched."

THE NEW YORK EVENING POST SAYS:

"No history of our own literature equally learned, honest, and entertaining has ever been written by an Englishman. It is the easiest to read of all books about books. . . . Who ever before heard of a literary historian who is never tedious? Yet this praise cannot be withheld from M. Taine. . . . The great name of M. Taine must stand as the voucher for its importance, and for the absolute necessity of an acquaintance with it on the part of every man who would know what contemporary scholarship is doing in this field."

HOLT & WILLIAMS,
25 Bond Street, New York.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, BAZAR,

$4 PER YEAR EACH.

$10 a Year for the Three.

$7 for any Two.

An Extra Copy of either gratis for every five Subscribers at $4 each in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE sent by mail on receipt of six cents in postage stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THE COMPREHENSIVE SPEAKER.

Designed for the Use of Schools, Academies, Lyceums, etc., carefully selected from the best authors, with notes by Henry T. Coates. Large 12mo, 672 pp., half bound, cloth sides, $1 75.

From the New York Daily Tribune.

"It contains a judicious selection of pieces from the best authors, omitting all of doubtful morality, of a sectarian or political character, and of transient literary value. Great care has been taken in the selection of extracts to give the genuine text of the author, without the errors in quotation and punctuation which are such a frequent blemish in this class of school-books. A large proportion of the contents are from American authors, furnishing the materials for a comparative survey of our native literature."

From the Philadelphia Press.

"On careful examination, we do not hesitate to characterize it as the best compilation of its class that has ever come under our note. The merits of this large and valued collection are numerous. Hackneyed pieces have been carefully excluded, and political and sectarian pieces are not to be found in its pages. There are, of course, some humorous passages, in prose and verse, but none that are immoral or vulgar."

From the Christian Union. (Henry Ward Beecher, Editor.)

"Of course the work of compiling such a book as this is involves difficulties which do not appear to the superficial critic. The enormous mass of available matter has to be winnowed with great care and judgment; the hackneyed extracts, which in the days of the old United States Speaker were declaimed until every boy knew them by heart from simply hearing them, must be avoided; and yet it will not do to omit many of those thrilling passages in the Reply to Hayne, the Declaration of Independence, and a hundred others. Mr. Coates has certainly done his task well and faithfully, and the introductory remarks which precede the body of the work are characterized by good sense, and are evidently the result of considerable thought and observation. The plan of the volume is a natural subdivision of the selections first into prose and poetry, and then into narrative, historical, forensic, etc., the design evidently being that a reading class shall not go through, as it were, from Genesis to Revelations, but shall, in the judgment of the teacher, read 'Mrs. Candle on Lending Umbrellas' on a rainy afternoon, or the 'Impeachment of Warren Hastings' when the public is excited about official corruptions. The selections are good so far as we have examined them—and we have done so with considerable care—being taken from the best current literature, as well as from that which will always be regarded as classical where the English tongue is spoken."

Send for a Descriptive Circular.

Copies sent to teachers on receipt of one-half the retail price.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,
822 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

TO BOOK-BUYERS.—MAYHEW & WHITTLE will send post free, on application, which may be made direct to them, or to J. Wiley & Sons, Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, or J. Sabin & Sons, 84 Nassau Street, New York, their new Catalogue of Books collected expressly for the American market. Mayhew & Whittle, 6 Vinegar Yard, Brydges Street, London, England.

BEAUTIFUL GIFT-BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

THE CENTURY OF QUEENS, with Sketches of some Princes of Literature and Art. 4to, cloth gilt, $6: French morocco, $10; Turkey morocco, $12.

POEMS OF MEMORY AND HOPE: Being a choice selection from the Poems of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, with beautiful illustrations by Hennessy and Thwaites. Cloth, full gilt side and gilt edge, $3 50; morocco, $6 50.

BROWNING, ELIZABETH BARRETT, POETICAL WORKS OF. Complete in 1 volume 8vo. Illustrated by Eytinge, Hennessy, Thwaites, and Bush. Cloth plain, $5; cloth gilt, $6; half calf, $7 50; morocco, $10.

FESTUS: A Poem. By Philip James Bailey. Illustrated with eleven fine full-page steel engravings by Hammatt Billings. 8vo, cloth, plain, $5; cloth gilt, $6; half calf, $7 50; morocco, $10.

ROCHEFOUCAULT'S MAXIMS AND MORAL REFLECTIONS. Red Line edition. 18mo, cloth, red edge, $1 25.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent post-paid on receipt of published price.

JAMES MILLER, PUBLISHER,
647 Broadway, New York.

FOR SALE—LOW.

A few Large Paper Copies of
DE TOCQUEVILLE'S DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA.

CHARLES W. SEVER,
UNIVERSITY BOOKSTORE, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

WANTED.—A Partner, Active or Special, with $10,000 in the manufacture of new articles in the fancy goods line. The whole amount of $10,000 will not be required at once, but may be invested as the business may require. The business is already started. Call on or address J. B. COLT, at 268 Union Street, Brooklyn, in the evening, or at the office of L. W. Starr, Printer, 22 Spruce Street, New York, from 2 to 4 P.M.

ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH & CO.

"THE ARTISTS' BOOK OF THE POETS."

In an elegant quarto volume, beautifully printed on toned paper, and bound in cloth, extra gilt, $6; morocco antique, $9; Levant mor., $10.

THE FESTIVAL OF SONG.

A SERIES OF EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

By the Author of "Salad for the Solitary," "Evenings with the Sacred Poets," etc., etc.

SUPERBLY ILLUSTRATED WITH SEVENTY-THREE ORIGINAL DRAWINGS.

"'The Festival of Song' is a veritable gem, or rather a carcanet of gems."—New York Tribune.

"The best breathings of the best poets; the exquisite pencillings of our best artists; an accompanying letterpress of most genial and sympathetic comment, anecdotes, and criticism; the whole framed, as it were, amid mechanical surroundings at once dainty and gorgeous."—Boston Post.

"The illustrations are in the highest style of engraving; the type, paper, and binding are sumptuous, and the work commends itself alike to all lovers of art and of letters—to the eye and the mind, to the taste and the imagination."—Boston Transcript.

"'The Festival of Song'—beautiful in every respect—is a string of diamonds, made up by a connoisseur in precious stones."—W. C. Bryant.

"One of the most beautiful volumes yet published in this country, we recall nothing so successful, not forgetting the 'Illustrated Sketch Book.'"—Round Table.

"This exquisite book admirably illustrates the present advanced state of art in this country; and the literature of the volume comprises the quintessence of our best English poetry, ancient and modern. Here are assembled, in a single volume, our great poets with our great artists."—Home Journal.

"'The Festival' will make cheerful many homes of taste and elegance by its incomparable combination of poetry and art."—Providence Journal.

SONGS OF THE SPIRIT.

HYMNS OF PRAISE AND PRAYER TO GOD THE HOLY GHOST.

EDITED BY

RIGHT REV. WM. HENRY ODENHEIMER, D.D.,

AND

REV. FREDERICK M. BIRD.

650 pages, small 4to, bound in cloth, gilt, $5.

The scope and spirit of the book are thoroughly catholic. All religious bodies and all schools of thought, which recognize the Deity of the Holy Ghost, are represented in it. The amount of material may surprise those who remember how little on this subject is found in ordinary Hymnals and Collections of Sacred Verse. The whole domain of hymnody has been drawn upon with no sparing hand. Few of the Hymns have been taken from other than original sources, and the text may be relied on as unaltered and unabridged in nearly or quite every case, except when the contrary is stated.

The book is elegantly printed on superfine paper, and is tastefully bound in cloth.

ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH & CO., 770 Broadway, Corner Ninth Street, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price.

HURD & HOUGHTON, NEW YORK.

THE RIVERSIDE PRESS, Cambridge.

PUBLISH THIS DAY:

MACARONIC POETRY.

Collected, with an Introduction, by James Appleton Morgan, A.M. In 1 vol. 16mo, antique style. Pp. xvi. 300, cloth, red edges, cover stamped in red and black. Price $2 75.

The Macaronic system is a system of Latin inflections joined to words of a colloquial tongue; but, besides the ingenious verses which have sprung up within the limits of this definition, there is a great variety of quips and conceits formed by the odd mixture of ancient and modern tongues. Mr. Morgan has made the first considerable collection of these that has appeared. He has included the famous Pugna Porcorum, some four hundred lines long, each word beginning with p; and with great industry has ferreted from their hiding-places an extraordinary number of learned nonsense verses of every description. Many will recall Dr. Holmes's Macaronic in the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," beginning;

"In caudent ire the solar splendor flames,
The foles, languescent, pend from arid rames;
His humid front the cive, anheling wipes,
And dreams of erring on ventiferous ripes."

Professor Lowell also has played with these learned toys; and it is appropriate that a lawyer should collect these ingenuities, since no class probably has contributed more to the stock. Mr. Morgan has given a lively setting of note and comments, and the volume has been given a pedantic dress very fitting to its contents.

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

THE LAST TOURNAMENT.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

1 vol. 16mo, with Five Illustrations, $1 25.

This new poem is an addition to the charming series of "Idylls of the King." It contains about 1,000 lines, and is of the same lofty and finished order of poetry with the previous Idylls, which have already taken rank among the world's classics.

HISTORY OF MY PETS.
RECOLLECTIONS OF MY CHILDHOOD.
STORIES FROM FAMOUS BALLADS.

BY GRACE GREENWOOD.

New, revised, and enlarged editions. With Illustrations. 3 vols. 16mo, $1 each.

These are new and much enlarged editions of books that can never grow old. They are written with a freshness, vivacity, and charm of style that render them exceedingly attractive to the youthful readers for whom they are intended.

TENNYSON'S POEMS.

FIRESIDE EDITION.

New stereotype edition, in miniature volumes, beautifully bound in vellum cloth. 10 volumes. Put up in strong box. $10.

This new issue of the Laureate's works corresponds admirably with the exquisite elegance and taste of the poetry they contain.

☞ For sale by all Booksellers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the Publishers,

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO., BOSTON.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S GIFTS for sale by the Publisher of the Nation, 5 Beekman St., New York.

ACROPOLIS OF ATHENS. Twenty-six Views, Topographical, Picturesque, and Architectural. Photographed by W. J. Stillman, late U. S. Consul in Crete, and printed in permanent pigments by the Autotype Company, of London. Elegantly bound in one volume, folio, with descriptive text. Edition strictly limited to 100 copies. A few copies still on hand. Price, delivered at the Nation office, $25.

VIEWS IN GREECE AND CRETE. Photographs by W. J. Stillman, and furnished separately to order at from 50 cents to one dollar, according to size and mounting. Catalogue furnished on application.

PHOTOGRAPHS FROM THE OLD MASTERS. Direct from the paintings themselves, and not from engravings. The following on hand, others imported to order in lots not less than $10 in amount:

Titian, Venus.—Paul Veronese, Supper at Emmaus.—Rubens, Helena F.—Raphael, Madonna with Veil. (All the foregoing large and unmounted. Price $2 25 each, plus postage.) Botticelli, Madonna.—Memling, Virgin and Child.—Claude Lorraine, Landscape.—Fra Angelico, Transport of the Virgin.—Masaccio, Old Man. (All these small and unmounted, price 85 cents each, plus postage.)

Address PUBLISHER OF THE NATION.

"THE LIVING AGE has no equal in any country.—Phila. Press.

"It stands at the head of nineteenth-century literature."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"The best periodical in America.—Rev. Theo. L. Cuyler.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE,

Issued every Saturday, gives fifty-two numbers of sixty-four pages each, or more than

Three Thousand Double-Column Octavo Pages of reading-matter yearly; and is the only compilation that presents, with a satisfactory completeness as well as freshness, the best Essays, Reviews, Criticisms, Serial and Short Stories, Poetry, Scientific, Biographical, Historical, and Political Information, from the entire body of Foreign Periodical Literature, and from the pens of the ABLEST LIVING WRITERS.

It is therefore indispensable to every one who wishes to keep pace with the events or intellectual progress of the time, or to cultivate in himself or his family general intelligence and literary taste.

EXTRACTS FROM NOTICES.

"Were I, in view of all the competitors that are now in the field, to choose, I should certainly choose 'The Living Age.'"—Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

"In no other single publication can there be found so much of sterling literary excellence."—New York Evening Post.

"The best of all our eclectic publications."—The Nation, N. Y.

"The ablest essays, the most entertaining stories, the finest poetry of the English language, are here gathered together."—Illinois State Journal.

"For thinking people, the best of all the eclectic publications, and the cheapest. . . . It is a monthly that comes every week."—The Advance, Chicago.

"It gives to its readers more than three thousand double-column octavo pages a year, of the most valuable, instructive, and entertaining reading of the day. 'History, biography, fiction, poetry, wit, science, politics, criticism, art—what is not here?' It is the only compilation that presents with a satisfactory completeness, as well as freshness, the best literature of the almost innumerable, and generally inaccessible, European quarterlies, monthlies, and weeklies—a literature embracing the productions of the ablest and most cultured writers living. It is, therefore, indispensable to every one who desires a thorough compendium of all that is admirable and noteworthy in the literary world."—Boston Post.

Published weekly at $8 a year, free of postage.

Address

LITTELL & GAY, Boston.

The best Home and Foreign Literature at Club Prices.

["Possessed of 'Littell's Living Age' and of one or other of our vivacious American monthlies, a subscriber will find himself in command of the whole situation."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.]

For Ten Dollars, The Living Age, weekly, containing the cream of Foreign Periodical Literature, and either one of the leading Magazines of Home Literature named below, will be sent to one address for one year, viz.:

Harper's Monthly (or Weekly, or Bazar), The Atlantic Monthly, Lippincott's Monthly, The Galaxy, Old and New, Scribner's Monthly, The Overland Monthly, or Appleton's Journal (weekly); or, for $8 50, The Living Age and Our Young Folks. Address as above.

ON the 30th instant will be published, No. 36, December, 1871, completing Vol. 3.

THE AMERICAN BIBLIOPOLIST:

A Literary Register and Monthly Catalogue of Old and New Books, and Repository of Notes and Queries.

The new Number will contain, with other articles, New York City in 1661, the Story of an Old Map. Notes on the History of Fort George. International Copyright. Newspaper Patronage. The New Zealander. The Copyrights of "Hamlet" and "Paradise Lost." Poems of Rev. Stephen Duck. Boswell and the Keeper of Newgate. Dr. Johnson and Charles Dickens. George Borrow's Works. Origin of Racine's Comedy of "Les Plaideurs." Story of Lavater. Viscountess Keith, a Relic of the Last Century. The Koran. The London Book Season. The late Sir Roderick Murchison. Mr. Prescott's Library. The late Thomas Roscoe. The Signers. A Receipt for a "Poem in Dialect." Origin of Chambers's Journal. A Scene at Carlton House. "Gutted" Oysters. Anecdote of Goethe. The late Mr. Babbage. A Catalogue of Holiday Books. A Catalogue of a Choice Collection of Works relating to the Drama. Literary Gossip. Book Notices, etc., etc.

Subscription $1 per year. Cheap Edition, 50 cents.

☞ Send stamp for Specimen Number.

J. SABIN & SONS, 81 Nassau St., N. Y.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE

ON THE

BANKRUPT LAW.

THIRD EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

JESUS CHRIST:

HIS LIFE AND WORK.

BY E. DE PRESSENSE, D.D.

Translated by Annie Harwood.

12mo, pp. 320, price, - - - - - - - $1 50

In the Preface to this work the author says: "This popular edition of the Life of Christ differs from the work that I published a year ago (and which in eight months reached its third edition) by the absence of all that was purely scientific. It appeared to me desirable in this edition, which addresses itself to readers of the most various classes, to avoid, as far as possible, all debatable and controversial points. I hope that in this new form this book, in which I have embodied the most cherished convictions, will meet with a wide circulation."

The following are some of the notices of the press of the author's larger work:

"Pressensé is not only brilliant and epigrammatic, but his sentences flow on from page to page with sustained eloquence which never wearies the reader."—Spectator.

"One of the most valuable additions to Christian literature which the present generation has seen."—Contemporary Review.

CARLTON & LANAHAN,

805 Broadway, New York.

BEST HOLIDAY GIFT,

OF CONSTANT AND PERMANENT VALUE,

IS

WEBSTER'S

NEW ILLUSTRATED DICTIONARY,

FOR PARENT, CHILD, TEACHER, PASTOR, FRIEND.

Sold everywhere, in common and fine bindings.

GET THE BEST.

WEBSTER'S

UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

10,000 Words and Meanings not in other Dictionaries.

3,000 Engravings. 1,840 Pages Quarto. Price $12.

FROM VICE-PRESIDENT COLFAX.

SOUTH BEND, IND., Oct. 28, 1871.

MESSRS. G. & C. MERRIAM:

DEAR SIRS: The hour I have just spent in looking through your latest edition of that remarkable work, Webster's Dictionary, has impressed me more than ever before with the debt of gratitude we owe to Noah Webster for having, "despite a feeble constitution, and amidst obstacles and toils, disappointments, infirmities, and depressions," given thirty-five years of his life to the enormous labors incident to its preparation. Scarcely less valuable are the additions made to it by the eminent writers who have so expanded the text in Definitions and Illustrative Citations, as well as in the Supplements of Synonyms, Phrases in all the modern languages and their meaning, Principles of Pronunciation, etc.; while the publishers, in the unsurpassed beauty of its typography, and the 3,000 illustrations, which add so much of attractiveness and instruction to its pages, have nobly done their part towards the completeness of this great work of our century. Whenever I wish to ascertain exact definitions I consult it, and that is quite often.

Yours truly,

SCHUYLER COLFAX.

A necessity for every intelligent family, student, teacher, and professional man. What Library is complete without the best English Dictionary?

ALSO,

WEBSTER'S

NATIONAL PICTORIAL DICTIONARY.

1,040 Pages Octavo. 600 Engravings. Price $5.

The work is really a gem of a Dictionary, just the thing for the million.—American Educational Monthly.

Published by

G. & C. MERRIAM, Springfield, Mass.

Sold by all Booksellers.

JUST PUBLISHED.

A SUPERBLY ILLUSTRATED HOLIDAY GIFT BOOK.

SONGS OF THE HEART,

Selected from many sources. Illustrated with designs by T. Moran, Miss Ledyard, Miss Hallock, Hennessy, etc. Engraved by Linton, Bogart, etc., and with several Autographs.

Uniform with "Songs of Life" and "Songs of Home."

1 vol. square 4to, cloth, $5; morocco extra or antique, $9.

This is another part of the very popular reissue of "Folk Songs." Besides the artistic attractions of that superb work, it contains numerous illustrations, in the very happiest and most effective style, of Moran, Miss Hallock, Miss Ledyard, and others. In subject this part of "Folk Songs"—the Songs of the Heart—is the most appropriate possible for the season.

☞ READY SHORTLY.

INSECTS AT HOME.

Being a popular account of Insects, their Structure, Habits, and Transformations. By the Rev. J. G. Wood, M.A., F.L.S., author of "Homes without Hands," "Bible Animals," "Strange Dwellings," etc. In 1 vol., uniform with "Bible Animals." With a Frontispiece in Colors, and upward of 700 illustrations (21 of them the full size of the page), engraved on wood by G. Pearson, from original designs by E. A. Smith and J. B. Zwecker. 8vo, cloth, $5.

Mr. Wood's previous very popular works give the only assurance needed that this volume is the most useful and reliable guide in this fascinating department of study and investigation ever issued. While sufficient attention is given to the anatomical structure of insects, much larger space is devoted to a description of their habits and to exceedingly interesting anecdotes connected therewith. The illustrations, which are a prominent feature in all of Mr. Wood's books, are very numerous and accurate, and peculiarly graphic.

The above works sent by post or express, charges paid, on receipt of the price.

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,

654 Broadway, New York.

WEST POINT SCRAP-BOOK.

BEING A COLLECTION OF

LEGENDS, STORIES, SONGS, ETC.,

OF THE

U. S. MILITARY ACADEMY.

BY LIEUT. O. E. WOOD, U.S.A.

Illustrated by Sixty-nine Engravings and a Copperplate Map.

Beautifully printed on tinted paper. 8vo, cloth, $5.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street, New York.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

133 NASSAU STREET,

Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

VALUABLE NEW BOOKS,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

RECLUS'S THE EARTH. The Earth: a Descriptive History of the Phenomena and Life of the Globe. By Elisée Reclus. Translated by the late B. B. Woodward, and Edited by Henry Woodward. With 234 Maps and Illustrations, and 23 Page Maps printed in Colors. 8vo, cloth, $5.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF CATHARINE M. SEDGWICK. Edited by Mary E. Dewey. With Frontispiece and Two Steel Portraits. 12mo, cloth, $2.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF THE MIDDLE AGES. View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages. By Henry Hallam, LL.D., F.R.A.S. Incorporating in the Text the author's Latest Researches, with Additions from Recent Writers, and adapted to the Use of Students. Edited by William Smith, D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, cloth, $2. (Uniform with The Students' Series.)

THE STUDENT'S ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE EAST. From the Earliest Times to the Conquest by Alexander the Great. Including Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Media, Persia, Asia Minor, and Phœnicia. By Philip Smith, B.A., author of "The History of the World." Illustrated. (Uniform with The Students' Series.) 12mo, cloth, $2.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL OF ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By George Rawlinson, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. 12mo, cloth, $2 50.

DOGS AND THEIR DOINGS. By the Rev. F. O. Morris, B.A., author of "A History of British Birds," "Natural History of the Bible," etc. Elegantly Illustrated. Square 4to, cloth, gilt sides, $1 75.

NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1872. With nearly 150 Illustrations, from Original Designs by Thomas Nast, made expressly for this Almanac. Crown 8vo, paper, 30 cents; four copies, $1.

THE RISE AND FALL OF THE PARIS COMMUNE. With a full Account of the Bombardment, Capture, and Burning of the City. By W. Pembroke Fetridge, an Eye-Witness of the Events Described, Editor of "Harper's Hand-Book of European Travel," "Harper's Phrase-Book," etc. With a Map of Paris and Portraits from Original Photographs. Large 12mo, 516 pages, cloth, $2.

KINGSLEY'S WEST INDIES. At Last: a Christmas in the West Indies. By Charles Kingsley. Illustrated. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

FRESH NOVELS,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

DURNTON ABBEY. By Thomas Adolphus Trollope, author of "Lindisfarn Chase," "A Siren," etc. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

HANNAH. By the author of "John Halifax." 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE PREY OF THE GODS. By Florence Marryat (Mrs. Ross Church), author of "Her Lord and Master," etc. 8vo, paper, 30 cents.

JOSHUA MARVEL. By B. L. Farjeon, author of "Grif." 8vo, paper, 40 cents.

ANNE FURNESS. By the author of "Mabel's Progress," "The Sacristan's Household," "Veronica," etc. 8vo, paper, 75 cents.

NEW LIBRARY EDITIONS by the author of "John Halifax":

Olive—Ogilvies—The Head of the Family—John Halifax—Agatha's Husband. 12mo, cloth, $1 50 per volume.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of six cents in postage stamps.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

THIS DAY IS PUBLISHED:

WINE: a Treatise on Its Origin, Nature, and Varieties. Being a Complete Manual of Viticulture and Œnology. By J. L. W. Thudichum, M.D., and Auguste Dupré, Ph.D. Medium 8vo, with numerous Illustrations, $9.

"A treatise almost unique for its usefulness either to the grower, the vender, or the consumer of wine."—Wine Trade Review.

THE THEORY OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By W. Stanley Jevons, M.A., Professor of Logic and Political Economy in Owens College, Manchester. 8vo, $3 50.

THE MINISTRY OF NATURE. By the Rev. Hugh Macmillan, author of "Bible Teachings in Nature," etc. 12mo, $2.

THE SOUTHERN STATES SINCE THE WAR, 1870–1. By Robert Somers. With Map. 8vo. (Next week.)

THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS. By the Rev. F. D. Maurice, Professor of Casuistry and Moral Philosophy in the University of Cambridge. New and revised edition. 12mo, $2 50.

MRS. MACQUOID'S NEW NOVEL.

PATTY. BY KATHERINE S. MACQUOID. 12mo, $1 75.

ELEMENTS OF ROMAN LAW. By Gaius. With a Translation and Commentary by E. Poste, M.A. 8vo, $6.

THE PHILOLOGY OF THE ENGLISH TONGUE. By John Earle, M.A., sometime Professor of Anglo-Saxon at Oxford. 12mo, $2.

"Every page attests Mr. Earle's thorough knowledge of English in all its stages, and of the living Teutonic languages."—Academy.

"A work calculated to be of great use to students who have gained familiarity with one or two grammars, and wish to know something of the common principles underlying them. As it appears to our judgment after an attentive perusal, it is the work of a competent scholar illustrating with much copiousness a subject with which he has long been familiar."—London Guardian.

GREEK VERBS, Irregular and Defective; their Forms, Meaning, and Quantity. By William Veitch, LL.D. (Edinburgh). New edition, revised and enlarged. 12mo, cloth, $4.

For MACMILLAN & CO.'S new Juvenile and other Christmas Books see Supplement to this week's Nation. Also their Select Catalogue of Books for Christmas and the New Year sent free by mail to any address on application to the Publishers, 38 BLEECKER STREET, New York.

THE BEST ENGLISH PERIODICALS.

THE LONDON QUARTERLY, EDINBURGH, WESTMINSTER, and BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEWS, and BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

Regularly and faithfully reprinted, at about one third the price of the originals.

TERMS.—Blackwood or any one Review, $4 a year; Blackwood and any one Review, $7; Blackwood and two Reviews, $10; Blackwood and three Reviews, $13; any three Reviews, $10; the four Reviews, $12; Blackwood and the four Reviews, $15.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE FOUR REVIEWS FOR OCTOBER.

THE LEONARD SCOTT PUBLISHING CO.,
140 Fulton Street, New York.

NEW YORK CHURCH BOOK STORE.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF THE LATE REV. DR. MAHAN. Edited by the Rev. J. H. Hopkins, jr. 3 vols. 8vo.

Vol. I. Church History.
Vol. II. Palmoni and Mystic Numbers.
Vol. III. Miscellaneous Writings.

Vol. I. will be ready about December 14. Price $4.

The Subscription price for the set will be $10, payable, $3 on the delivery of Vol. I., $5 on delivery of Vol. II., and $2 on delivery of Vol. III.

THE RITUAL LAW OF THE CHURCH, with its Application to the Communion and Baptismal Offices. To which is added, "Notes upon Orders and the Articles." By Murray Hoffman, author of the "Law of the Church" and "Ecclesiastical Law in the State of New York." Price to subscribers, $3; to non-subscribers, $4. (In the Press.)

Persons wishing to avail themselves of the subscription prices of the above books should send their names and addresses at once to the Publishers.

NEW BOOKS.

HISTORICAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. By the Rev. G. Rawlinson, M.A. 18mo, cloth, 75 cents.

THE FOUR GOSPELS. Arranged in the form of an English Harmony from the Text of the Authorized Version. With Analysis and Four Maps. By the Rev. J. M. Fuller, M.A. Post 8vo, cloth, 75 cents.

COMMENTARY ON THE NEW TESTAMENT. Containing the Acts, Epistles, and Revelation, according to the Authorized Version. By various authors. With Map. Crown 8vo, cloth, red edges, $2.

MORAL DIFFICULTIES CONNECTED WITH THE BIBLE. Being the Boyle Lectures for 1871, preached in her Majesty's Chapel at Whitehall. By the Rev. J. A. Hessey, D.C.L. Post 8vo, cloth, 75 cents.

THE MINISTRY OF NATURE. By Rev. Hugh Macmillan. 12mo, cloth, $2.

NEW AND CHEAP EDITIONS.

THE PRINCIPLES OF DIVINE SERVICE. An Enquiry concerning the True Manner of Understanding and Using the Order for Morning and Evening Prayers, and for the Administration of the Holy Communion in the English Church. By the Rev. Philip Freeman. 2 vols. 8vo, $6.

AN EXPLANATION OF THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES. With an Epistle Dedicatory to the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D. By the Rt. Rev. A. P. Forbes, D.D., Bishop of Brechin. 8vo, cloth, $5.

LECTURES ON CHURCH DIFFICULTIES. By the Rev. J. M. Neale, M.A. With Introduction by the Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, M.A. 12mo, cloth, $2 50.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.,
Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

PRICE, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
596 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1871.

The Week.

THE New York Times, replying to the Brooklyn Eagle, has published a very explicit and apparently semi-official denial of various charges against the President which have for some time been going the rounds of the press, under the head of nepotism and gift-taking, and participation in speculations provided for him by politicians or office-holders. It denies flatly that he has ever received a dollar's worth of property by way of present since he became President. His St. Louis farm was in part inherited by Mrs. Grant, in part bought by the $100,000 which was raised and presented to him by citizens of New York after the close of the war. With the remainder of this sum he paid off a mortgage on his house in Washington, and bought and furnished the house at Long Branch, which he has been accused of receiving from Tom Murphy. His other property is derived from savings on his pay as Major-General during the war, and from a house which was presented to him by some admirers in Philadelphia while he was General of the army. The stock he holds in the Seneca Stone Company, on which a charge of political jobbery has been based, he bought as an investment, but it has never paid him a cent, and he would like to sell it to some of his enemies.

In dealing with the charges of nepotism, the Times is not quite so successful. Of twenty-five cases, on which charges have been based, it shows that in twelve the appointees "are no relations," or—if the Times will allow us to make the suggestion in the interest of good English—no relatives of the President. Of the relatives, three were appointed before General Grant came into office; but one of these, the President's father, who is postmaster at Covington, Ky., is well-known to be unfit for his place, and ought not to have been retained; and although thea ppointment of the Rev. J. Cramer, a Methodist minister, and the President's brother in-law, as Consul to Leipsic by Lincoln, may have been a good one, it is hardly fair to talk of his promotion to the Danish Mission by General Grant as a "transfer." Nor is it a sufficient answer to the charge of appointing George W. Dent, another brother-in-law of the President, to the appraisership of customs at San Francisco, that "he was strongly recommended by the California delegation." Civil-service reformers will be rather amused by this. To defend the appointment of another brother-in-law, James F. Casey, as collector of the port of New Orleans, by saying that he has taken the custom-house in that city "out of the hands of politicians," is also taking too great a liberty with the popular intelligence. It is also evasive, at least, to say that Lieutenant Grant has gone to Europe "on duty on the staff of the General of the army," seeing that the General of the army has not himself gone to Europe on duty, or in any public capacity, but as a private citizen, and has, therefore, no "staff" with him, and no work for a staff to do, and that the army regulations forbid the granting of leave of absence to any officer who has not served for two years with his regiment. On the whole, however, the Times brings the President very well out of the mire.

Nothing has as yet been heard, or at least has been communicated to the public, from Mr. Schenck about his connection with the Emma Silver Mine. The Tribune, which has endeavored from the first to put a good face on the matter, has recurred to it within a day or two, and says that Mr. Schenck was a director of the company before he took the English mission or expected to get it, and declares this to be "conclusive" proof, if we understand the passage rightly, that Mr. Schenck has not been guilty of any impropriety in doing what he has done. The question is, however, not when Mr. Schenck got his directorship or what he expected when he got it, but, Is he using his official position in a foreign country, to which he has been accredited as an envoy, to help a band of speculators to sell stock to foreigners, which they know and he knows they could not sell in this country, and which the simple name of Robert C. Schenck would not help them to sell in any country? The "Company" is not an ordinary commercial company carrying on a legitimate business. It is a mere collection of persons in want of a large sum of money, and their project is not an ordinary commercial venture, but what any business man would call a gambling enterprise. There is no rule of the diplomatic service forbidding a minister to open a faro-bank in the legation, but one who did so would assuredly be recalled. The principal promises and professions of the prospectus of the Emma Mine are such as, under the most favorable circumstances, few or no respectable mining engineers or experts in this country consider justifiable; and one of the most important portions of it contains representations which are untrue, and are evidently intended to deceive. For these representations Mr. Schenck would, should the bubble burst, be personally liable under the English law, were he not clothed with diplomatic functions; and we ask that he shall not be allowed to use his official position to secure people's money, and then turn round and shield himself behind it from their just pursuit. It was his duty to quit the Emma Mining Company when he took the mission; not having done so, it is now his duty to quit the mission. If it be really true that he held the directorship before he got the mission, it both strengthens the suspicion that he was pushed for the mission because he held the directorship, and renders one passage in the prospectus in which his connection with the enterprise is mentioned highly disingenuous, to use a very mild term. The impression there conveyed is that, being the United States Minister, his attention was drawn to the company, and that, having satisfied himself of its trustworthiness, he determined, in spite of his official position, to lend it the aid of his name. But the speculators have sold their stock at a premium, as might have been expected.

The effect of the President's Message on the country at large seems on the whole very favorable. Most of the recommendations are received as either praiseworthy or harmless, though one passage has created some excitement in religious and philanthropic circles, where he commends his Indian policy, not only because it is "humane, Christian-like, and economical, but because it is right." The long-talked-of resignation of Mr. Fish at last took place, but no sooner was the name of his successor, Mr. Edwards Pierrepont, of this city, announced, than there was a great outburst of affection for Mr. Fish, several senators going so far as to sign a memorial to him begging him to remain in his place. This display of feeling has, of course, embarrassed Mr. Fish a little, and the President a good deal, but the probability seems to be that the former will retire at all events. While we sincerely admire Mr. Fish, and wish heartily he could retain the office he has filled so ably, it must be admitted that if he had any good reason for sending in his resignation, it would be somewhat ridiculous to withdraw it for the gratification of a few senators. The desire for a change exists most strongly among the Cuban partisans, who look for a change of policy with regard to the island.

The week has been marked in Congress, as is usual in the brief interval before the holidays, by the introduction of divers bills and resolutions, of which the most remarkable was Mr. Sumner's for the abolition of the internal revenue system, including the income tax, in the course of the coming half-year, leaving nothing of it except the sale of stamps, and transferring this to the Treasury; but, as the bill apparently increases the duty on spirits, and there are doubts of the power of the Senate to do anything of this kind, and the bill has been referred to the Finance Committee, it will probably be anticipated in the House. Mr. Trumbull introduced a resolution providing for the revival of the Committee on Retrenchment, showing its necessity by illustrations of the abuses in the New York Custom-house under Murphy, whom Senator Edmunds manfully defended, proving his superiority in efficiency to his predecessors by the exceedingly impertinent fact that he collects more money at less cost under a simpler tariff. Mr. Trumbull made his speech a powerful appeal for civil-service reform.

Mr. S. S. Cox has brought in an international copyright bill, embodying Mr. Appleton's plan of giving foreign authors a copyright on condition that they employ an American publisher, which would be a great improvement on the present state of things, but is open to the strong objection that it is only a mitigation of the injustice which all owners of literary property now suffer, inasmuch as it restricts the author's market seriously, and deprives him of the benefit of free competition among all publishers. To tell a man he shall not sell his ideas unless he employs A. to print them, is, when analyzed, perhaps as outrageous a form of taxation as ever was invented, the real character of which is disguised by the fact that it is foreigners who are exposed to it. The true course, and the highly civilized one, and the one, let us say, to which we are coming as surely as the world rolls on, is to offer copyright to all nations which concede it to us, without buts or ifs, and then leave authors and publishers, without regard to race, creed, sex, color, or previous condition of servitude, to make what they can out of each other.

The South Carolina bonds have risen slightly, under the belief that the worst is now known about the State finances, and that repudiation will not take place; but the taxpayers are still furious, and, on the 5th inst., there was a fierce assault on the Ring, and a vigorous demand for their impeachment made in the Legislature. The excuse made by Parker, Scott & Co. for getting so many bonds printed is that they wanted them to use in the conversion of the State debt. It appears, however, that in doing this they acted without any legal authority. The Act of March 23, 1869, providing for the conversion of the State debt, provided two things expressly: (1) that no conversion bonds or stock should be issued except on the signature of the Governor, and the counter-signature of the Treasurer; (2) that no stock or bonds should be thus signed, countersigned, or issued, except on the application of a person or persons holding the old stock or bonds, and desirous of converting. Such applications have been made, but only to the extent of $1,200,000, while the Governor and Treasurer confess that they have printed, signed, countersigned, and issued to the State Agent in this city, for sale or pledge, over $8,000,000 of these bonds, without any application whatever—and this is only a portion of their frauds and evasion of the law. In fact, they have issued bonds in almost precisely the same way as the New York Ring, and there is now an outcry, and a highly respectable one, for their impeachment, and even for their committal to the penitentiary.

The Times must not be angry because we hoped it would not be prevented by "professional jealousy" from following up the Tribune's war on the judicial abuses. We meant nothing offensive. We ought, perhaps, to have said "professional delicacy," because we had in our mind that curious feeling which, whatever its name be, leads newspapers to regard an exposure of an abuse of any magnitude as the property or "claim" of the journal which first makes it, and a matter of comparative indifference, if not of positive hostility, to all others. It is the feeling which led one writer last summer to advise the Tribune not to trouble itself about the Tammany frauds, as the Times "owned them in fee simple," and it has been at the bottom of a great deal of the carping and abuse of which the Times itself has been the object. That the Times has ever felt it we have not insinuated; we simply hoped that it would not be affected by it with regard to one abuse which the Tribune has taken the lead in exposing. The insinuation of the Times that the Nation was afraid to attack Tammany, and never did so till the Times had made it safe, is very cruel and unkind. Why call attention thus publicly to our constitutional timidity and dislike of attacking things?

The Wyoming Legislature recently sought to put an end to the experiment of woman suffrage, which has now lasted two years in the Territory, and repealed the act, but the Governor vetoed the repeal. What has been the result of women's voting it is impossible to make out very clearly. Its opponents have been rather reticent, but some say that it was merely intended to advertise the Territory, and draw population, and, having served this purpose, ought to be abolished, but the Democrats allege—and this is probably the main reason—that the women all voted the Republican ticket. The champions of the women in the Legislature—or champion, for we have only seen one speech—indulge in such highflown accounts of the working of the measure, and, above all, of its effects on drinking and "lechery," that it is impossible to tell where the prose ends and the poetry begins. In the meantime, the winter campaign has been opened by a session of the Boston Association in Washington—which seems to have been quiet and unobtrusive, as the New York "Pantarchists," under Woodhull, claim that region for their own, and count most of the local suffragists under their banner, owing to their being the discoverers and promulgators at the capital of what some call the "New Idea," and others the "Short Cut," namely, the right of women to vote under the Fourteenth Amendment. Woodhull was there, but skirmished round the outskirts, firing volleys of the Weekly into the hall, and terrifying the occupants of the platform by the prospect of a coup de main.

In the meantime, the hostility between the two branches is fiercer than ever, owing to the continued "advance" of the Woodhull views, she having lately publicly claimed the "natural right" to a husband a day. Mrs. Stanton, the great original suffragist, who is fresh from eulogizing Mrs. Fair, the California murderess, comes out in the Golden Age with a lovely article on Woodhull, whom she compares to the "Lilium Laudidum," whatever that plant may be, and asks, if even all that is said of her be true (which she denies), what of it? and says:

> "The processes of her education are little to us; the grand result is everything. Are our brilliant flowers less fragrant, our luscious fruits less palatable, because the débris of sewers and barn-yards have enriched them? The nature that can pass through all phases of social degradation, vice, crime, poverty, and temptation in all its forms, and yet maintain a purity and dignity of character through all, gives unmistakable proof of its high origin, its divinity."

She also administers a vicious dig, we presume, to some members of the Boston wing when she says that "some women with two or three husbands living at the same time are afraid of her," who is strictly "monogamic."

At this writing the Prince of Wales is slowly dying of typhoid fever, caught while staying at a country house in Yorkshire, presumably from the effects of bad drainage—his case closely resembling and running the same course as his father's. The excitement in England is intense, and promises a period of overflowing loyalty, which is perhaps deepened a little by remorseful recollection of the Prince's unpopularity during his lifetime. He was so far from being the kind of Prince the times called for and the public desired, that he was the victim of incessant sneers, depreciation, and scandal some of which had foundation, but the worst of it apparently none. The fact seems to be that his mental powers were very feeble—he fell asleep over a book, and could not converse with a cultivated man, and had gained little by education, and had a strong and hearty animal nature, like a boy's, and, indeed, a boy he seems to have remained to the last. But he was kindly, polite, and discharged the duties of his station as well as his powers would allow; would have made a fair constitutional king, and carries to his grave the regrets of his friends and dependents. The probable effect of his loss on English politics we have ventured to predict elsewhere.

In the great centres of trade and finance, the threatened death of the Prince has not produced the disturbances which were at one time feared. For a moment, the alarm in London at the sudden relapse assumed an air of panic, consols fell nearly one-half per cent., American bonds and other securities declined more largely, and the whole Continent participated in the shock. But the inherent buoyancy of all the European markets rapidly overcame the influence, and prices of securities and of leading staples are higher than when the Prince fell ill. In truth, the English and German money markets are at this moment undergoing a process precisely similar to that experienced during the second and third year of our war. After we suspended specie payments and were compelled to become heavy buyers of foreign products to supply our own deficiencies, our entire metallic currency was gradually exported to Europe. The sudden influx of so much gold and silver coin into countries where credit is based exclusively upon specie produced its inevitable result—an enormous and unhealthy increase of credit, the wildest speculation, an absurd increase of stock companies for every imaginable purpose, universal inflation, and, finally, the great panic of 1866, made doubly famous by the failure of the great house of Overend, Gurney & Co. Like causes are now producing like effects. The suspension of specie payments in France is flooding England and Germany with a stream of coin far exceeding in magnitude that from this country, while the United States, owing to their early development of paper-money and of banking facilities, have always held but a very small proportion of metallic currency. France, owing to its political insecurity and the wealth of its ignoranty peasantry, has always had the largest specie currency of any country in Europe. The influence of its abandonment of coin payments upon its neighbors is proportionately powerful and intense. Both England and Germany are on the high tide of a career of financial delirium that will probably end, as that of 1866 did.

For the time being, the United States are benefiting largely by the prevailing inflation. American securities of every description are eagerly sought for investment, and large amounts of foreign capital are steadily coming here for productive employment. In spite of an already heavy indebtedness and accumulating arrears of interest, the tide of investment is so great as to overbalance all other financial considerations. The foreign exchanges continue consequently extremely favorable to this country, gold has again declined, and has touched the lowest point since 1862, while money continues easy, and the prices of all securities on the Stock Exchange are rapidly advancing. The trade of the country has likewise improved, and prices of almost all the leading staples are also higher. Grains are firm, cotton and meats higher, groceries and dry goods dull but firm, coal again lower, and real estate somewhat more active. It is not to be denied that the course of the markets is far more satisfactory than could have been anticipated, and this result is no doubt largely due to the more conservative character which has marked the trade and finance operations of the country for the last three or four months. Whether the strong wave of European speculation will unsettle us materially is now the important question of the financial future.

The outcry against the Thiers government for executing Rossel has been very great in England as well as here, and was, of course, increased by the account of his manly bearing in his last hours. The condemnation of M. Thiers by foreigners on this ground, however, is only another illustration of the curious horror which prevails about other people's wars and excesses. There is now no nation which can see the slightest reason for any other nation's fighting, even to suppress a rebellion, and which is not greatly troubled by the punishment of other people's rebels. The French army, as it has come out of the war, undisciplined, demoralized, bewildered by revolutions and counter-revolutions, is perhaps the most terrible enemy France has. For a civilian president to show the slightest weakness in dealing with insubordination in its ranks would probably end in making the government the mere tool of military conspirators; and a more dangerous and flagrant case of insubordination than Rossel's perhaps never occurred, for he not only headed a revolt, but he endeavored to disregard a treaty of peace made by the government with a public enemy. One of our papers has compared his case to Armand Carrel's, but the only resemblance lies in the fact that both men were French officers. Carrel resigned his commission, and went and took part in a Spanish insurrection against the Spanish government. The subsequent participation of the French army in the struggle arrayed him against his own countrymen, but only technically and incidentally, and for this he was condemned by one court-martial, but a second one, on a new trial, acquitted him. Rossel left the French service for the simple and sole purpose of fighting the French army on French soil, and for some weeks assisted a band of insurgents in holding the French capital against the French government. His excuse that he was not satisfied with the Treaty of Peace belongs to the same category as Lord Thomas Fitzgerald's defence, when accused of setting fire to the Cathedral of Cashel: "That he did set fire to it, but he thought the archbishop was inside."

President Thiers's message to the reopened National Assembly—if we may judge by the Cable abstract—is a document of no particular importance or interest, as it almost entirely avoids touching upon the vital questions now agitating France. It announces that the French Government has notified the British of its intention to abrogate, in due time, the commercial treaty between the two countries, as well as of its willingness to renew it on a readjusted basis; speaks of the necessity for France of "enduring" a policy of "dignified peace," and of accepting war only if forced upon her—which may be a kind of disguised warning to Prince Bismarck and his generals in the temporarily occupied French territories; makes the fallen Imperial government responsible for this degraded state of the lately so mighty nation; speaks in ambiguous expressions of what France must do, in case of need, for the Holy Father, and of her friendly relations with Russia, and in very emphatic words of her sympathies for the Austro-Hungarian Empire—which is probably intended to catch the new director of its foreign policy, Count Andrássy; and, in internal affairs, advocates the establishment of general compulsory military service in time of war, and the limitation of the annual contingent, in time of peace, to ninety thousand men.

The sittings of the National Assembly immediately following the reading of the presidential message seem to have been as stormy and turbulent as the tone of the latter was calm and non-committal. Radical motions were presented from various camps severally demanding the removal of the Assembly and the seat of government from Versailles to Paris; a vote of urgency upon the question of the future form of government; the annulling of the Napoleonic decree confiscating the property of the princes of the House of Orleans; and a vote of censure against the Committee of Pardons for its want of clemency toward the convicted Communists. During the discussions, violent recriminations took place between the Monarchists and ultra-Republicans, especially on the occasion of a renewed attack on the Committee of Pardons, when the sitting had to be suspended. The temper in which the legislators of France have reassembled is thus decidedly bad, and when the preliminary skirmishes on the many momentous questions of the day and the future will have to give place to decisive parliamentary combats, there is no telling how far political frenzy and party blindness may go. Outside of the Assembly, republicanism seems to be gaining ground, as it is also in Spain, as her late municipal elections show. The latest Cable despatches—at least in the form in which they are laid before us—speak also of a great triumph of the Spanish Republicans in the general Cortes elections; but we do not believe any such to have taken place, the Cortes having a few weeks ago been prorogued but not dissolved.

WHAT THE NEW CHARTER SHOULD PROVIDE.

THE people of New York have answered at the ballot-box, in a way full of significance and promise, moral and political, the taunt of the Ring, "What are you going to do about it?" but how to secure in a new charter the fruits of the late election, which has so electrified the public by its unanimous condemnation of the abuses in our own city government, remains for us the problem of the day. For it is to be apprehended and expected that the politicians will endeavor so to frame the new charter as to secure advantages to themselves and their parties in the City of New York, by making the machinery of the city government subserve, as heretofore, their ends, personal and political; and it is already plain, even to those not inside politics, that the attention of many, in both parties, who honestly desire the good of New York, and who have so far done good service, is being distracted from the main question of what can be done to secure us an honest and economical government, by intrigues of whose success, so far as they are in the interest of the Republican party, there is, of course, the greatest danger—the Legislature being so largely Republican, a Presidential election so near at hand, and the vote of the City of New York of so much value in determining upon which side the electoral vote of the State shall be cast. Yet nothing is more certain than that a charter for this city, framed in the interests of the Republican party, cannot stand long, considering how large the Democratic majority in the city is, and how evenly balanced parties are in the State.

We hear further of discussions in reference to the charter which make it plain that remedies for the evils with which we have been afflicted are likely to be sought in mere improvements and alterations of the machinery of the city government—a necessary consequence of the fact that those most looked to, and most naturally so, for suggestions and advice in regard to the new charter, are men of political experience, whose suggestions are of improvements in the details of the system, with which they are familiar, and upon the abuses and defects of which their attention has been most closely fixed. Yet, it may be laid down as a first principle, that whatever the machinery may be, unless new forces can be introduced to act as checks and correctives of the administration of the city government, nothing of permanent value will be effected, because, in this country, where the inducements are so great to private enterprise, public employments will, as the rule—some grades and kinds obviously excepted—be sought only by those who are driven to it by misfortune or lack of capacity for better and more lucrative occupations; or by a class who, having ability, are yet sufficiently devoid of principle to seek office with the view of making out of it all the profit and advantage to themselves, pecuniary and otherwise, that their places admit of. Now, if it be true that such a class of men, incompetent on the one hand or unscrupulous on the other, are likely, so long as the public service remains what it is, to form the majority of those who seek office, it must be perfectly plain that, however well-devised the machinery of the new charter may be, and however things may work at the outset, it will not be long before we relapse by maladministration into a condition of things like in kind, if not as bad in degree, as that from which we suffered under the Tweed dynasty.

For only Sentimentalists in politics can fail to admit that it is not by the ballot that we can in truth supervise and control our public servants, or even judiciously select them. Frequent elections, so far from affording us the means of so doing, in reality only make the honest citizen, whose first and most engrossing concern must be about the employment by which he wins his bread, a more easy prey to the politician by trade, who, if elections came at long intervals, as in the earlier days of the Republic, could not exist; but who now, living off the money spent on or contributed one way or another for services rendered on those occasions, devotes himself as his business, whether in or out of office, to the organization and manipulation of political clubs, primary meetings, and all the machinery of repeaters, ballot-box stuffers, rascally registers and inspectors of votes, by which the honest voter is misled, confused, betrayed, and swindled. And it is, we are sure, the consciousness of this state of things, and their hopelessness of effecting anything at the polls in the face of it at ordinary elections, which, more than indifference, has of late years prevented our influential citizens from taking that part in the direction of our city affairs which they ought, and which it is most desirable for them to take. And we may confidently assume for the future that such devotion to the public interest as was manifested at the late election will be called forth, as things now are, only at long intervals, when, as in that case, the danger is great and deeply felt, and the condition of things such as promises so general a union of the more intelligent members of society as will give individual voters hope that the efforts and sacrifices they may make in the cause will be repaid by success.

If, in seeking for security in the future against a recurrence of the evils we have been suffering under, we trace back the causes which produced them in the past, we shall certainly agree that want of information as to the true state of our municipal affairs was one of the principal causes of their coming to so bad a pass, and that want of means for enforcing accountability was another. And it may be asserted with perfect confidence, that if intelligible statements of the condition of the various departments of the city government are published frequently, and the means is afforded by proper legislation of enforcing responsibility on the part of officials in a summary manner, office will have no attractions except for honest men, to whom, in such a condition of things, it will be honorable employment. Existing laws require the publication annually by the Comptroller of his accounts; but for a period of over two years such publication was avoided; and while some two millions of dollars were paid away within eighteen months for printing, nothing of any real value in the way of information was given for it to the public, the money spent for this so-called advertising having been used in fact to subsidize the press and prevent it from giving alarm while robbery was going on. On the other hand, the publication by the Times of the facts which it was able to gather in regard to the accounts connected with the Court-house and other jobs, produced, as everybody knows, the impression upon the public which has resulted in the overthrow of the Ring.

With such signal evidences of the value of publicity in reference to the operations of the city government, we should require, as one of the provisions of the new law, a monthly publication by the various departments of the city government, under very severe penalties, recoverable against their several heads, of all the information of value to the public in regard to city affairs, not merely as to the state of the cash accounts, but also as to contracts, pay-rolls, and other information requisite to a perfect understanding of the way in which the business of the city is being done. And in order to prevent the subsidizing of the press, this information should be published in a monthly bulletin of its own by the city, the printing of which can be contracted for, like any other work done for it. Such publication is due, it may be further remarked, not merely to those whose money is expended—the taxpayers—but to all those mechanics and contractors who are entitled to do work for the city, if they are willing to do it on acceptable terms. A contract for excavating earth, paving streets, or performing any other service which is made at a rate above the value of the work done, is a piece of favoritism, obviously at the expense not only of the taxpayers, but of the class of contractors by whom the work might be done, if they had the chance, at a fair market rate. These facts and figures being presented, the daily press, whose readers would be interested in the information to be gathered from these reports, might be safely trusted to condense the information they contained, and present it in a most serviceable and telling way. Under such an arrangement, the organ of the builders would criticise, if there was anything open to criticism, the details of contracts interesting the class to which its readers belong; and so of other avocations and organs of class opinion.

This publication should cover all the departments, even where their province is not to supervise work and spend money, but where, as for instance in the case of the Superintendent of Building, the duty is to guard the public safety. The recent developments in the controversy between Superintendent McGregor and the builders have made evident what was already well known to many, that a department instituted for the public protection may be made, by an abuse of its power, an instrument of oppression to those who are subject to it, and a source of danger to the public. The Superintendent of Buildings should, therefore, for example, be required to publish monthly the nature of the permits he has given, specifying to whom they are given, and for constructions of what nature, as to thickness and height of walls; and then, obviously, permits in violation of law would die a natural death.

And, generally, this publication should include a summary of all contracts entered into by the city for work, supplies, or service during the month preceding. The expense and the preparation of such a summary and of its publication, though even 100,000 copies were printed (and one-tenth of that number would be amply sufficient) would be very much less than might at first sight be supposed, and perhaps we may hereafter endeavor to make this apparent by figures; but, whatever the expense, nothing can be plainer than that no money could possibly be better expended than in thus putting all classes of citizens in possession of the information which, as taxpayers or workers, so nearly concerns them, and nothing can be more obvious than that dishonest and unfair contracts would not be sought if the knowledge of them would come to the public so soon after they were made. Instances will readily occur to those who are at all familiar with the history of city contracts, especially the larger ones; as to which it is perfectly safe to say that they never would have been sought, unjust as they were to the interests of taxpayers, if the parties engaged in engineering them through had not relied upon secrecy, or a limited knowledge of the facts, for their security in the outrage. The mere certainty of their work so soon seeing the light would have infallibly deterred them from even making an effort to obtain unfair advantage.

As regards accountability, we propose that the law shall give to any number of taxpayers, paying collectively a certain specified proportion of the taxes—say one-tenth, or what you will—the power to proceed against officials, or the city government in its corporate capacity, in the courts, and against individuals by impeachment before the Governor, in cases of maladministration or neglect or violation of the laws regulating official action. The reason for this proposition is, that such a right of interfering with the working of the machinery of the city government being too dangerous a one to be given to individuals, and the repugnance of popular sentiment in this country to anything like a privileged class rendering it impossible to provide for a property qualification (with any hope that a charter embodying that feature as a check will be allowed to stand), this alternative, which confers no privilege, but merely recognizes a right on the part of any number of individuals having a certain stake in the expenditure to enforce honesty in the direction of it, is suggested with confidence that it will associate the elements of a real and vigilant control. It is perfectly evident that such a plan will have the great advantage of admitting the association of taxpayers having similar political views or like interests of any nature; and by making the proportion no greater than a tenth or an eighth, it will be entirely feasible to associate the necessary number of taxpayers; and the result would be that office-holders will act always under a sense of responsibility, subject to a control which can reach them at a moment's notice.

And now, finally, to secure permanence for these enactments, let them be dealt with as principles, and enacted not in a charter for the City of New York, but in a general law, applicable to all communities in the State living under municipal government; for, as we all know, there are rings in other cities of the State besides New York, and it is obvious that, by passing a general law, embodying these principles, for the protection of their citizens also against unscrupulous men in office, we shall not only bring in new forces of supervision and control, but secure the support of the taxpayers and honest citizens in all those communities to guarantee the permanence of such enactments; whereas, if we embody them only in charter for the City of New York, some future Legislature in which the corruptionists have a majority may, by abolishing that charter, sweep away with it those safeguards also.

We may well be encouraged to attempt this sort of general legislation by the history of the general legislation in this State thus far; and we are sure to have for it the good word of the present Governor, who has always been a wise and consistent advocate of the principles of general as against special legislation. It is not many years since one of the most potent sources of corruption in our Legislature was the strife which was continually going on there for special legislation in the form of bank charters; and in the Times of Saturday week, December 2, there was a reference to the action of Governor Tompkins, who, by proclamation in 1812, went the length of terminating that session of the Legislature because of evidence which satisfied him that the applicants for the charter of a bank in this city had resorted to bribery to effect their ends. Thus the Legislature was corrupted in the getting of charters, and the charters themselves were drawn as strongly in the interests of those who secured them, and, consequently, as decidedly against the interests of the public generally, as it was possible to draw them and secure their passage. As a consequence, there was not only corruption within the Legislature, but rascality in the banks, and those who can remember the old "Safety Fund" times will remember how often the public was swindled by these specially chartered institutions. Yet this state of things, which was so bad, and which had existed so long, was changed completely, finally, and at once by the passage of the General Banking Law, which threw the business open to all comers who were willing to associate themselves together, and give, by publication and otherwise, the security to the public for which that law provides. Since that time, the public have found in the supervision of the State Superintendent, and the monthly publications of the condition of the banks required by law, a perfect security, and the Legislature has been freed from the solicitations and controversies which formerly occupied so much of its time, and was so fruitful a source of the corruption, such as it was, of that day.

It is not to be doubted that the same beneficent effect would follow the same sort of legislation in reference to cities, which are but corporations, as banks and railroad companies; and it is most earnestly to be hoped that no considerations of supposed party advantage, or personal interest and ambition, nor any devotion to pet plans and projects which have reference only to improvements in the machinery of city government, will be allowed to interfere with or prevent an honest attempt to secure such a general law as shall embody and enforce these most important principles; for if we can only establish them once as principles, they will not only commend themselves in application, but will have, for permanence and security against change, the great advantage which principles always have as contrasted with mere temporary expedients, however well devised.

REPUBLICANISM IN ENGLAND.

THE illness of the Prince of Wales has given fresh interest to the question what progress republicanism is making in England, and what likelihood there is of an early change in the form of government. If we are to believe some of our speculators about the political future of England, the death of the Prince removes the last prop from the throne, and makes its downfall certain on the demise of the reigning queen, if, indeed, Sir Charles Dilke's exposures of the internal economy of the royal household do not lead to its overthrow before that time, to the huge delight of the masses, who are now all ripe for revolution in the interests of pure democracy, if not for an attempt at a modification in the mode of distributing property and rewarding labor. What has helped to diffuse this opinion on this side of the water it is easy enough to see. The Reform Bill of 1866, admitting the working-classes to a share in the government, was undoubtedly a long and bold step in the direction of democracy.

It was accompanied, too, or rather preceded, by a remarkable change in the tone of English thought on religious, political, and social questions, wrought by the influence of such philosophers as Mill, Spencer, and Huxley. The preaching of these men has indeed effected what may almost be called a complete revolution in the way in which the educated Englishmen of the present generation approach the problems of life and death and judgment, things present and things to come, and it is a revolution which may be called marvellous, when we consider the brief period in which it has been effected. That the men who knew Oxford in the days of Newman, and Keble, and Pusey should see Oxford the headquarters of an aggressive radicalism, both in church and state, is, indeed, one of the strangest incidents of our time; and how little those who do not live in close contact with English life were prepared for it is well illustrated by the story, whether true or false, of some of the American bishops who visited Oxford at the time of the Pan-Anglican Synod, and, fancying themselves surrounded in a common room by High Churchmen, sought to exchange high-church views with a group of amused rationalists, whose principal spiritual difficulties related to the immortality of the soul or the existence of a God. The new state of mind naturally shows itself more prominently in politics than elsewhere, and those who remember the very narrow range in which the most radical liberal of the upper classes allowed his reforming fancy to roam thirty years ago, are greatly startled now on finding themselves constantly thrown into the company of English gentlemen who are ready for almost any change, and who talk of the throne as a piece of old furniture, and all well-established institutions as objects of at least grave suspicion. The working-classes, too, in the large towns are fairly launched into the discussion of the labor problem, and, no longer content with temporary triumphs over capital, are seeking, like their Continental brethren, though in a different spirit and with different weapons, for some mode of making themselves, as they say, independent of it.

One may see all this, however, and a good deal more, and yet doubt, as we doubt gravely, whether there is in England anything worth calling a "republican movement," and whether the eager expectation with which some observers here are looking for it is not simply a bit of that longing for great signs and wonders and vicissitudes in Europe, and startling illustrations of the instability of old societies, which makes up two-thirds of the political philosophy of a great many honest souls. That England will eventually be a republic, we do not in the least question; that she is advancing in the direction of a republic is plain enough; but that anybody now living will see an English republic and that the death of the Prince of Wales, or the Queen's incapacity, or the growing indifference of the people to the royal family, will materially hasten it, or that, when it comes, it will come as the result of a great social and political convulsion, or with guns and trumpets, nobody who has read English history, or knows much of the English character, will readily believe. The republic will probably be established in the most humdrum fashion possible by a vote of the House of Commons, and as a commonplace and long-expected incident, for which everybody was prepared; perhaps as the result of the indifference of the reigning monarch for the crown, or of the excessively farcical character of his share in the administration. There is a process with which American politicians are not unfamiliar, and of which the newspapers talk a good deal—"the sweeping of the country like a prairie fire" by "a new idea"—and it is apparently through this, or something like it, that many people expect to see the democracy take possession of the United Kingdom. But the fact is, that not only do ideas not sweep England like a prairie fire, but there is no country in the world in which a general proposition, especially in politics, finds it is so hard to get a foothold, or in which it finds so few partisans. In fact, there has been hardly a reform effected in English history which had not to be stripped carefully of everything which might suggest its connection with any logical or far-reaching revolution before it could gain support. Charles I. was beheaded for fighting against himself, and James II. was declared to have lost the crown because he "abdicated." The legislative union with Ireland was effected by means of "cash down," and not by pictures of imperial strength or glory. The Reform Bill of 1832 recognized simply the absurdity of having the Lower House largely appointed by the Upper, and giving representatives to the sites on which burghs once stood. It must be remembered, too, by those who think that England is on the inclined plane of revolution, that the Reform Bill of 1866 was really not the product of working-class clamor, but of an agitation got up by middle-class politicians engaged in a race for votes, and that it was passed by a Tory Minister in a curious juggling attempt to get the better of his rival, and to the disgust and astonishment of his own followers. Probably nobody had so much to do with precipitating the question on the House of Commons as Mr. Bright, who is now opposed to all further reform, and who, in his present stiff-necked indifference to radical aims, as well as in most other points in his character and career, is a typical Englishman. In fact, nothing was more remarkable about the last extension of the suffrage than the refusal and neglect of the working-classes to demand it.

It is safe enough to deduce from all this the conclusion that the very radical temper is confined to a small set of able men, who will, doubtless, have a large share in the political work of the next thirty years, and will make their radical ideas tell upon it; but this temper does not spread in any appreciable degree among the masses. In fact, the various classes of the community are occupied with far other things than the form of the government. The farmers and landed gentry are bigotedly conservative; the farm-laborers have not yet risen to the point at which the political field becomes visible and comprehensible. The dissenters, who compose the bulk of the active, thinking, earnest, and energetic portion of the middle-classes, are occupied about education. Their political radicalism exhausts itself in a desire to disestablish the church—by no means because they dislike churches, but because they revolt against legal inferiority. The working-classes—that is, the artisans of the towns—are excited about the labor question, but in the English way. There is probably not over one English mechanic in a thousand to whom the aims of the Internationals are not nonsense, and who does not think of the possibility of a general reorganization of society on a new basis, and the enrolment of everybody in the service of the state, as a poor joke. He seeks some easy and comprehensible process of getting a larger share of profits, or of establishing co-operation, and, in short, of gratifying that great Anglo-Saxon passion of "rising in the world," or "getting on"—that is, rising into the class above him. Those who fancy that he desires a change in the form of the government, as a means of securing more comfort, or dignity, or power, or making a nobler state, both underrate the intense practicalness of his mind, and overrate the part played by the imagination in English politics.

If, in reply to this, our attention is called to the large audiences drawn by Sir Charles Dilke's attack on the crown expenses, we reply that a baronet discoursing on the economy of the royal household—one of the most fascinating subjects on which the English mind can dwell—would be sure to draw an excited crowd even if he only explained "the Queen's housekeeping," and would make his fortune, at even a penny a head, if he described minutely a dinner-party at the palace. An attack on the royal expenses has, of course, attractions of a sensational sort which no eulogy or description could have; but that a demonstration made in stump speeches, that the crown costs two million a year, when it could be kept up for a million and a half, will seriously incline Englishmen to abolish the monarchy, is one of those curious notions which one is tempted rather to analyze than refute. The English Government, just as it is, is based in the main on habit, and habit has led the people to bear with it for a thousand years, in spite of great abuses and anomalies. If logic was stronger in England than habit, it would have been changed long ago; and if the expense of monarchy was a feature of it by which the English mind was ever strongly affected, the crown could never have come down to our day, and the popular affection for the present wearer of it would not have been strongest when her outlay was most lavish. In fact, if there be one deduction which can be more clearly drawn than another from the course of English history and from observation of English character, it is that the thing about which Englishmen are least disposed to be concerned is the form of their government, and that in the work of reforming their constitution it is probably the very last thing they will touch.

We dislike predicting, because we admit that all predictions are of little value, but a prediction as to the probable course of events would seem almost a necessary sequel to what we have been saying. We shall consequently venture to assert that the death of the Prince of Wales will cause a great revival of sentimental devotion to the monarchy, and that this devotion will be lavished on the young widow and her children, and that her eldest son will become the object of extravagant hopes and expectations, which will render the prolonged regency not simply safe but a source of strength to the crown; and that there will be during the regency a strong disposition to discountenance all agitation that is either revolutionary in its character or tendency. What will happen after the heir comes of age will depend on his character, and it would be useless to deny that the rationalizing process is going on in politics and society sufficiently fast to make a king's place increasingly difficult to fill, and to make the most loyal people increasingly exacting. To say that kings and princes are an anachronism is to talk absurdly. Nothing is an anachronism in government which the society which lives under it demands and reveres. There will a time come, doubtless, when it will be considered very silly for people to demand "magnetism" in a candidate for the presidency or governorship, but till that time has come "magnetism" is a respectable quality, which candidates ought to have, let philosophers laugh as they may. There is, indeed, nothing more remarkable in political discussion than the calm way in which even able writers assume that mankind ought to be, and is eager to be, governed by pure reason, and the difficulty they find in understanding how men can be moved by a sentimental view which they themselves do not share. This difficulty is really the great hindrance to the good government of Ireland by the English, who will have it that the Irish political ideal is antiquated and preposterous.

A FAMOUS FIELD.

THERE is a little patch of a square mile or so, in the midst of the rich Sussex landscape in England. Through it, in low ground, sluggishly flows a small brook, and from the brook ridges slope up gently on either hand. It is covered for the most part with the green, thick English grass, dotted now and then by old elms and oaks. A gray, half-ruined wall, toothed with battlements along the summit, runs along one verge of the field; and there are two or three old towers, forlorn, through desertion and decrepitude, as Lears, whose comforting Cordelias are masses of close-clinging ivy—wall and towers suggesting a splendor that has now departed. What happened here in October, 1066, decided some important things; for instance, that in the sentence that is now being written there should be nineteen words of Saxon origin and four of Latin; and that in general, when we write and talk, about a quarter of our speech should be derived from Rome, and three-quarters from the German forests. To this field, if we may trust Guizot, date back England's liberties, and, therefore, America's liberties. Through what happened here, it came to pass that there was at length a Magna Charta—corner-stone of the structure of Anglo-Saxon liberty; and, after an interval, a declaration of independence and a constitution of the United States—cornice and frieze of the noble pile. It was decided there, in fact, that those of us of English race are what we are in mind and body; a cross, namely, between two tough stocks, each of which contributed precious qualities of brain and brawn to form a race which in the nineteenth century should stand so high. The field is that of Hastings, where the Normans under William beat the Saxons under Harold. Thence came a blending of tongues; thence a blending of traits, on the one hand enterprise, on the other sturdy fortitude, into a national character, too full of spring to break, too hard to be wasted, as carbon and iron blend together into steel.

One day, at the end of September, I stood on the beach at Hastings, a watering-place of some fashion on the south coast of England. It was a slope covered with rough shingle, close upon one edge of which crowded the blocks of the modern town, and, on the other, the waters of the English Channel. On the summit of a high cliff to the eastward was the ruin of a Norman castle—cliff and ruin so in sympathy through a long community of stormy exposure, that the turf and rock of the downs seemed to rise into moss and masonry with scarcely a perceptible dividing-line. In front lay in the motionless air the wide glassy level of the Channel, with the horizon line blotted out by the afternoon haze. Coasters lay at anchor off the beach, somewhat dim, with their sails hanging slack. There was a sound of oars from pleasure-boats; and, as I stood on the beach, the sailors came up and pressed me to row with them. Close by, among the many promenaders, a Sunday-school from an interior village was holding a picnic. A day or two before, the Prince Imperial from France, with the Empress, just driven from Paris, had landed in Hastings from Normandy in great distress. Mother and son were still in the town, and, not improbably, among the groups on the beach. It was in a different way that a prince from France landed at the same spot eight hundred years ago. Had I stood then on the shore looking southward through precisely such September mist upon a motionless sea, I should have seen countless sails floating up in the offing; and, in the front of the fleet, an ornamented bark, with a great cross on its flag, a sail marked with a coat of arms of three lions, and on the prow a brazen child, holding an arrow and a bow bent to shoot. The chronicler, William of Malmesbury, says the sails of the vessel were crimson. These were kept turned to the wind, and aided by oars until finally the keel grated upon the shore; and the multitude of craft that followed, bringing 60,000 men, ranging eastward and westward for miles on either hand, were beached one after another by their crews in a similar manner. Over their sides instantly sprang a multitude of archers; then of knights; then from the holds of the ships were led the horses, full of mettle from their long confinement, which pranced on the sand and filled the air with their neighing. Lastly, on the ship whose prow bore the brazen child, a tall, strong man approached the side. His hair and beard were light, his face florid. It had power and decision, bespeaking a character fearless, enterprising, cruel. As he leaped down in his armor from the low vessel upon the wet sand, his foot slipped, and he fell forward upon his two hands. The thousands watching him from the decks of the vessels and from the beach sent up at once a cry of distress, for it was taken as a sign of evil omen. Several of the chroniclers say it was a knight standing by who gave a favorable turn to the incident by a sudden explanation; but I like best the account of Wace in the fine old "Roman de Rou," whose father was a soldier in that host, and had, no doubt, told the whole story to the son. It is, that the strong warrior sprang up vigorously, and holding on high his dripping hands full of wet sand: "See, my lords," he cried, "by the splendor of God, I have taken possession of England with both my hands. It is now mine, and what is mine is yours!" It was Duke William of Normandy. How he and his followers looked, with their kite-shaped shields, their helmets with their "nasals" projecting down from the front, their chain-armor, their boots of steel or strips of variegated cloth wound about the leg from knee to ankle—all this we know from the Bayeux tapestry. What they said and did was rehearsed at length by many a patient monk, and far more picturesquely by the minstrels, who told the tale to the sound of the harp many generations after to king and noble. The Saxon king, Harold, was beset with enemies. He overthrew in the north a rival claimant; but it was at that very time that the crimson sail came leading the Norman fleet from the southward, when the Saxons, though victorious, were weakened and disorganized. Harold, however, hurried to meet the new enemy, leaving behind in his impetuosity all the strength of the northern counties. He made a hasty levy of forces in London and in the south, and came swiftly towards the coast, hoping to take William by surprise. Finding the hope vain, he drew up his army a few miles from the shore, and waited for the Norman onset.

Turning from the calm sea and the beach which those historic keels had grated, I followed back on William's track to the scene of the engagement. I rode through farms and handsome estates where there was nothing to suggest what filled my own thoughts but the name of the station at which I finally alighted, Battle. Thence I walked into the High Street of the little town, whose existence dates back even to the great day when it was called Senlac. Each receding century had left its wave-mark on the little ridge where ran the principal street. The railroad depot was a wrinkle which to-day had made, and going from thence there were waifs deposited now by one time and now by another. There was a portico on which beaux of George the Fourth's time might have stood in surtouts and high stocks; old thatched roofs, with "house-leek green" among the weather-beaten mass that came from a hundred years back; projecting upper-stories from Cromwell's day. Close to the church I got glimpses of a lovely vicarage, withdrawn into quiet, whose shadow-dappled front had the elaborate gables and bow-windows above and below that marked it as Elizabethan, and the church itself was partly at least from the Wars of the Roses. But at the end of the street rose a structure so massive and venerable that it subordinated to itself the whole of the little village. It was two-storied, guarded at the ends by solid turrets, and battlemented at the top. In the centre was a broad, low-arched gate, above which the front rose sixty feet into a huge square tower. The side of the gateway was sculptured with the heads of Plantagenet kings and queens. Everywhere over the front the weather had eaten into the hewn stone, so that it was marked and crow's-footed as an old man's face. There was no decrepitude, however, but the halest old age. I went up to a narrow open door close by the broader portal. I found the masonry was many feet in thickness, and the door-step firm and serviceable, though deeply grooved by foot-beats. From the dim room beyond, lit by slits in the thick wall, a woman came forward to answer my enquiries. It was the gateway of famous Battle Abbey, built by William to commemorate the victory on the spot where he won it. Following the direction, I turned out of the High Street into a footpath, skirted the enclosure of a park, with a ravine to the right which once was full of wounded Saxons, and came out at last upon more open ground—a ridge of greensward, with now and then a tree, the ground from which descended to a little brook, then rose again into an answering ridge. The whole was traversed here and there by hedges; there were stacks about farm-houses; sometimes the brown thatch of cottages; to the left, the irregular line of the ruined abbey, with the fresher buildings of a nobleman's seat—all sweet under the subdued light of the autumn afternoon. I stood on the spot occupied by Harold's vanguard, the men of Kent.

I counsel all who make a pilgrimage to Hastings to take as a guide for the battle-field the old "Roman de Rou," either the translation, or, still better, the original Roman-French, as Thierry gives it in an appendix. A little previous study will make it intelligible enough to a reader of ordinary French; and, if it is crossed now and then by an obscurity, the fine chivalric picture is hardly injured. It is like the fierce beauty of knight's face suggesting itself through helmet-bars; and the prompt iambics of the metre strike the ear with a vigorous music, like the rhythmic hoof-beat of a troop ranging for a charge. I could easily trace from point to point the progress of the battle. Right from my position had the handsome king, the idol of his people, run his simple entrenchment—a line of stakes, between which osiers were twisted. This marked the front of the position; and about the knoll to the left, a stronger and higher enclosure of the same sort seems to have been made for the protection of the Saxon standard, the figure of a fighting man embroidered upon a banner and richly set with green and gold. The Norman monk, Ordericus Vitalis, while condemning Harold as cruel and perjured, shows him in attractive colors. He had a fine mind and ready eloquence, was intrepid and courteous, stalwart in figure and of great strength. He appears in the Bayeux tapestry in a tunic of iron rings, and probably on the battle-day wore his crown upon his helmet, as was the custom of the kings of his race. The banner shone and sparkled above a strong, yellow-haired host, among whose weapons the two-handed axe was conspicuous. Their shields were round, with a boss in the centre. Probably, since the levies came in hastily at the king's call, some wore the ancient picturesque Saxon armor, described by Sir Samuel Meyrick, heirlooms from warriors who had fought against the Danes, plates of tough, hard leather overlying one another on a long-skirted tunic, leaf-shaped and stained variously, brown, orange, or scarlet, so that they must have seemed to have clothed themselves from the October woods that were gorgeous about them. Raising my eyes and glancing across to the opposite slope, I tried to call up a vision of the Norman columns, troops of horsemen in steel, with front and flanks guarded by archers and pikemen in quilted coats or girt about with hides. I thought I could nearly fix the spot where the duke, putting on his hauberk, threw it over his shoulder, the back side in front. Those who stood near were sorely alarmed at the bad omen, as at the landing; but the ready leader changed it in an instant, crying out: "The hauberk which was turned wrong by me and then set right signifies that a change will take place out of the matter which is now stirring. We shall see the name of duke changed to king." The duke then mounted his Spanish charger, and careered before his retinue, who burst forth into impetuous tribute to his strength and prowess. Down the slope there at nine o'clock moved the Norman lines. But the page of battle about to be written in blood was illuminated at its edge with picturesque poetry. The minstrel Taillefer, having begged the boon of William, suddenly spurred forward to within a few paces of the waiting Saxons, pausing, I conjectured, a few rods down the slope from where I sat. There he sang the song of Roland and the peers of Charlemagne, engaging meantime in single combats, until at length he fell under a lance-thrust. Says the "Roman de Rou":

"Taillefer, ki mult bien cantout,
Sor un cheval ki tost alout,
Devant li dus alout cantant
De Karlemaine e de Rollant,
E d'Oliver e des vassals
Ki morurent en Renchevals.
Sires, dist Taillefer, merci,
Jo vos ai lungement servi;
Otreiz mei, ke jo n'i faille,
Li primier colp de la bataille."

The battle now began with the utmost fierceness. Over the slopes there the trumpets rang, the tramp of the horses resounded hollow on the earth, the shields echoed struck by swords and maces. Like swarms of migrating wild-fowl, the feathered arrows of the archers sounded through the air, which they darkened by their number. The Normans shouted their war-cry, "God aid us!" The Saxons clamored in return, "Out, out, Holy Cross! God Almighty!" The "Roman de Rou" is here most pleasantly quaint:

"'Olicrosse,' sovent crioent;
E 'Godemite,' reclamoent;
'Olicrosse,' est en engleiz
Ke Sainte Croix est en franceiz,
E 'Godemite,' altretant
Com en franceiz Dex tot poissant."

The wicker-work, which with modern arms would be so feeble a barrier, was to the Normans a most formidable obstacle. From nine o'clock until noon there was no advantage on either side. Then, however, a troop of Bretons under Eustace, Count of Boulogne, which had been specially engaged, fell back before the Saxons in almost utter rout. In the low ground, his followers became involved in ditches and in the brook, and perished by the hundred. Utter defeat seemed to lie before the invaders. Bishop Odo of Bayeux, William's brother, with a white ecclesiastical dress sweeping about his stately figure, but wearing a hauberk as well and with a mace swinging at his wrist, dashed on a white horse into the confusion, crying, "Stand fast!" William, too, who had been supposed to be slain, flung his helmet from him, and, with head bare, stopped the flight. "I am here!" he cried. "Look at me. I live, and will conquer!" Throughout the afternoon the clang of the conflict was unabated. Somewhere toward four o'clock, it is probable, took place the event which was the beginning of the end. William, observing that the shafts of the archers, shot horizontally, stuck in the osiers and did little harm, ordered that they should be shot upward, that they might descend vertically upon the heads of the Saxons. Aloft flew the arrows. Harold, looking up unwarily, received one in his left eye. Blinded and crazed with pain, he drew it out, and leaned exhausted upon his shield. Just here the Normans practised a stratagem with results to them most fortunate. Their horsemen feigned a retreat in great confusion into the low ground, leaving their archers behind them. The Saxons, unrestrained now that Harold was wounded, rushed down the hill in disorderly pursuit—"like sand before the wind," is the graphic phrase of Matthew of Westminster. At a signal from William, the knights returned on the gallop and swept round them; then, fighting backward, Norman and Saxon entered the entrenchment together. The closing scenes are made sadly vivid in the old tales. The men of Kent who survived the levies of Essex and Sussex collected with the bleeding Harold at the foot of the gleaming standard. Covered with sweat and blood, they shouted cries of defiance that the Normans compared to the barking of dogs. But the knights came charging, William at the head fighting like a common man-at-arms. The sun had sunk below the level of the woods. Twenty Norman knights, devoting themselves to death or victory, made their way to the standard's foot. The blinded king struck wildly at his foes; but a blow on the helmet felled him, and the sword of a knight cut his thigh through to the bone. In the twilight the last resistance was beaten down, and a group of exhausted men stood with uncertain footing upon the heap of corpses. The standard of the dead Harold fell, and that of William took its place.

"Then the duke took off his armor, and the barons and knights came, when he had unstrung his shield, and took the helmet from his head and the hauberk from his back, and saw the heavy blows upon his shield and how his helmet was dinted in, and all greatly wondered and said: 'Such a baron never bestrode war-horse, nor dealt such blows, nor did such feats of arms; neither has there been on earth such a knight since Roland and Oliver.' And the duke stood meanwhile among them, of noble stature and mien, and rendered thanks to the King of Glory through whom he had the victory, and he ate and drank among the dead, and slept that night upon the field." William was fierce as the lions which he had chosen for his escutcheon; but there is a superb strength in the historic figure. He had begun to take on some superficial refinement and accomplishment, just as upon the steel of his armor were embossed some few lines of ornament—a fine type of the Norse barbarian, whose tumultuous forces were beginning to be steadied and calmed for the ruling of the world. No doubt he was a sad scourge to his new domain; and yet it is not slight praise which our infant history accords him, pleasantly lisping in the Anglo-Saxon chronicle: "Man mihte faran ofer his rice mid his bosme fullum goldes ungedered"—("One might go through his kingdom full of gold unharmed"); and a passing flush of genial poetry burns momentarily, for almost the only time, in the dry, meagre record, in the passage: "He loved the tall deer as if he were their father."

This is the story whose outline I read on the ridge, sitting where waited the Kentish vanguard for the Norman charge. I went slowly down the hill in the track of Eustace and his routed troops to the spot where they were massacred. Centuries after, in wet weather, the brook was believed to flow with a reddish tinge, remembering the ancient slaughter. That day its bed was nearly dry, and in it grew osiers, descendants, perhaps, of slips that were woven into Harold's entrenchment, as I pleased myself with fancying I might be a descendant from a tattooed ceorl of Kent that stood sheltered behind them. It must have been just here that Odo, the bishop, rode forward with his mace; and here that the Spanish charger pranced in the morning, and the eager barons burst out rapturously over their leader's beauty and manhood. The gray ruin of the abbey now lay opposite; among constructions of a more recent date, a broken well, an ivy-covered turret, a mouldering gable, pierced here and there with the rounded Norman arch. It was just there, where within the wall a remnant of the high altar yet remains, that the gems and gold of the Saxon standard flashed over the combat. That night there was scarcely a soul in sight. Lovely upon the trees, here and there yellow and scarlet, where the autumn was even then kindling, was the sunlight through the haze. The quiet fields sloped smoothly to the brook, welted down to the hill-sides by the long hedges, and bossy with oaks and elms. The old battle-field was indeed at peace. Riding back to London in the dusk, I found myself imagining that the rounding of the hills, the wide moor, the patches of woodland, might be somewhat as they were when out from all this country the faithful levies came gathering to Harold's side. Old oaks were in the fields, which possibly may even then have been standing, or whose parent acorns at least dropped from branches beneath whose shade, as the king rushed too hotly southward, tired footmen might have fallen out to rest their blistered feet.

NICOLAS TURGENEFF.

PARIS, Nov. 24, 1871.

ALL abolitionists in America ought to be acquainted with the name of Nicolas Turgeneff, who was the great apostle of the emancipation of the serfs in Russia. He died at the age of eighty-two years, only a few days ago, at Vert Bois, which was his country-house on the banks of the Seine, not far from Bougival. I have had the honor of knowing him for a number of years, and a better, more generous, and high-minded man I have never known in any country. He had all the cultivation of a gentleman and all the enthusiasm of a reformer. He was born in the Government of Moscow, and at a very early age one of his legs was half crushed in the door of a carriage. This accident prevented him from entering the military service, as most young Russian noblemen did at that time. He was educated for the diplomatic service, and entered when he was hardly more than twenty into the Council of State, composed of the men who formed the high administration of Russia. He was only twenty-five years old when, as Councillor of State, he was attached to the staff of Baron von Stein, the great Prussian minister of 1814; for Russia and Prussia were then in alliance against Napoleon, and the ministers of both countries followed their army and their sovereign; the Russian minister had Prussian attachés, and the Prussian minister Russian attachés. Turgeneff never spoke but with the greatest admiration of Stein, who had adopted him more as a friend than as a diplomatic adlatus, and who, while they were travelling with the allied armies, opened to him all the secrets of the policy by which he had regenerated Prussia after Jena. The land question and the emancipation of the Prussian peasantry were favorite topics of conversation, and it was under Stein's teachings that Turgeneff first conceived the bold idea of emancipating the millions of his own compatriots who seemed then doomed to perpetual slavery. He often narrated to me his journey through France, after the defeats of Napoleon. He went to the Congress of Châtillon, which lasted only a few days, and where the allied sovereigns made their last offer to Napoleon—a magnificent offer, considering the state of his fortunes then, but which his pride rejected. Stein and Turgeneff travelled together, and together they went from Châtillon to Paris in a post-chaise, in their uniforms, without being molested in any degree by the population. Stein had even refused to have an escort of a few Cossacks; such was the dejection of the French people then, and the horror which the name of Napoleon inspired in a country exhausted by ten years of incessant war. The entrance of the allied armies in Paris, if it was not an ovation, did not at any rate inspire the Parisians with feelings of horror or despair. The Russian Emperor, Alexander, behaved more like a liberator than a conqueror. Turgeneff often described to me the feelings of sympathy, of admiration, which France, even in her defeat, elicited from all the allied generals and diplomats. The prestige of France in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries had been such that they really felt in Paris, in 1814, very much as the barbarians must have felt in Rome.

Turgeneff left Paris for Vienna, where he remained during the famous Congress which gave laws to the whole of Europe, that have only lately been finally altered. From that time, he was actively engaged in questions of administrative and social reforms in his own country. He was the friend of those noblemen who had hoped to find in the generous Alexander an ally for the reforms which they were meditating in the Empire. But the Emperor, afraid of the contagion of revolutionary ideas, showed little disposition to amend anything in his own dominions; and as the Empire was absolute, these noblemen began to turn their minds to constitutional reforms as the only means of making social reforms. In this view Turgeneff never shared; he was convinced that in a state where there was nothing but the Emperor and the peasantry, with a nobility without political privileges and classified by the will of the Emperor himself, the Emperor must himself be the great reformer; the nobles were the slave-masters, and he did not expect them to proclaim the emancipation of the peasants. In his opinion, the emancipation of the serfs was to be an imperial act, an act of absolute power; and the constitutional reforms must follow it, not precede it. This difference of opinion did not save him from the accusation of complicity with the gentlemen who, in 1825, were accused of high treason, and who are known in Russia under the name of the Septembrists. Fortunately, when the so-called conspiracy of September was punished by the new Czar Nicolas, Turgeneff was quietly travelling in England, studying the manners and institutions of this cradle of constitutional government in Europe. He learned, if I remember right, at Edinburgh, that he had been condemned to death in contumaciam, and deprived of all his titles and functions, and that his estates were confiscated. His best friends, Orloff and Troubetskoi, were sent to the mines of Siberia. From that day he became a wanderer in Europe; he was an exile. He was for a time reduced from affluence almost to poverty; but the generosity of a brother saved him from misery. Alexander, his brother, had received his confiscated estates, and contrived, by ingenious devices and not without risks, to transmit gradually to Nicolas the value of the property which had been taken away from him. Being himself unmarried, a highly cultivated man, fond of society, of science, of literature, and taking no open part in politics, his journeys to Paris, and to all the capitals of Europe, made it easier for him to accomplish what he considered—and what certainly was—a sacred duty to his brother Nicolas.

During the long years of the reign of Nicolas, Turgeneff had no other consolations than those he found in his own family. He had married a daughter of the Marquese Viaris, who, while Napoleon was King of Italy, had been enrolled in the French army. The Viaris were an old Piedmontese family, and the Emperor was very fond of old names. After the fall of Napoleon, Viaris, who had for awhile been on the personal staff of the Emperor, lived at Geneva; and there Turgeneff made the acquaintance of his daughter, who was extremely beautiful. Their marriage was the happiest that can be imagined; and to his last day Turgeneff found a perpetual comfort in the devotion of his wife and of his children. He wrote a long work, in three volumes octavo, on his country, called "La Russie et les Russes," which is full of the most interesting information on a country still so little known even to Europeans; and a number of pamphlets at various times, which were always on some questions connected with the political or social development of Russia. The Crimean war was a great blow to him; he was passionately attached to his own country, and, though he had almost become a Frenchman, having lived so long in France, he did not conceal the pain which the defeat of the Russian arms caused him. He did not believe in the Ottoman Empire, or in the Palmerstonian policy; he looked with horror on the coup d'état of the 7th of December and on Napoleon III. Czar Nicolas, who had been unrelenting in his severity towards him, who even tried at one time to obtain his expulsion from France, ceased to be mentioned by him with the same bitter severity so soon as Sebastopol was taken. Turgeneff was convinced that the war had been forced upon him by England and by the new Emperor of the French, and that Nicolas had not wished to force it on Turkey and on Europe. The death of Nicolas began, however, a new era in his life. His son, the actual Emperor, became convinced of the necessity of a social reform; he forced the idea of the emancipation of the serfs on his own nobility, and carried this grand reform with an energy which will always leave him a great place in history. Turgeneff became, as it were, young again; he wrote article after article, pamphlet after pamphlet, on this great question—on the terms which ought to be made with the serfs on the land question. He was very anxious that the peasants should become not merely free, but land-owners, and he put forward various plans to this effect. His house, so long deserted by the Russians, who even in Paris were under the eyes of the police of St. Petersburg, was now filled with the greatest names of the Imperial Court. The young journalists of Moscow, the new administrators of the Empire, came to see the man who was a sort of patriarch of liberalism.

The most interesting trait of Turgeneff's character was that he had all the ardor and enthusiasm of a reformer, and that at the same time he was essentially an administrator and a statesman. He planned reforms in the administration of justice in Russia, not in a vague fashion, but entering into the most minute details. He was a political economist, he was not a revolutionist. He made a journey to Russia in 1857, and, after his long exile, he had the happiness to find a free country where he had only known slaves. The Emperor received him, and he was treated with all the deference he deserved. He visited the only estate which he still possessed, and carried out his own views on it, gave some land to all the peasants, and settled with them the terms of their new tenure. The last year of his life was sadly troubled by the war between France and Prussia. He had retired to London, and there he spent all his time in reading the newspapers as fast as they were sold in the streets. I see him still at his window, opening on Hyde Park, surrounded with a heap of papers, and looking as sad as he did during the Crimean war. He had a very tender and affectionate disposition, and he resented the sufferings of France more than many Frenchmen. He knew the Germans well, and prophesied to me that they would exact the full measure of revenge. When he returned to Paris and to his long-deserted house, his eldest son became dangerously ill. Then came the fearful days of the Commune. The Rue de Lille, where his hotel was, was set on fire almost from one end to the other; Turgeneff's son was too ill to be removed. Those who have visited the ruins of the Légion d'Honneur, of the Archives of the Cour des Comptes, of the Conseil d'Etat, of the Dépôt des Consignations, know that the Rue de Lille must, in those fatal days, have been a sea of flames. There was Nicolas Turgeneff, with his children, watching for the bombs which announced the Versaillais. These emotions were too great for a man of eighty-two years, robust as he was, for he seemed to be made of iron—he had all his hair, he could read without spectacles, he rode almost every day. After the Commune he returned to his country-place, sacked by the Germans. I walked a few days before his death amidst the stumps of his trees; I saw the remains of the famous abattis; we dined together on the anniversary of his birthday. Father Gazarin, once Prince Gazarin, one of his dearest friends, had come from his convent; and he proposed the health of Nicolas Turgeneff. Alas! a few days afterwards he was dead. He fell asleep in death. At midnight he was conversing with his family; at one, it was all over. I cannot better depict him than by saying that he had the simplicity of heart of a child, the tenderness of a woman, and the courage of a man. No mean idea could enter his mind; it was hermetically sealed to selfishness, to anything low and vulgar. He approached moral perfection as nearly as any man it has been given to me to know.

Correspondence.

MR. PEIRCE AND THE REALISTS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your far too flattering notice of my remarks upon mediæval realism and nominalism, you have attributed to me a degree of originality which is not my due. The common view that realism is a modified Platonism has already been condemned by the most thorough students, such as Prantl and Morin. The realists certainly held (as I have said) that universals really exist in external things. The only feature of the controversy which has appeared to me to need more emphasis than has hitherto been put upon it is that each party had its own peculiar ideas of what it is that is real, the realists assuming that reality belongs to what is present to us in true knowledge of any sort, the nominalists assuming that the absolutely external causes of perception are the only realities. This point of disagreement was never argued out, for the reason that the mental horizon of each party was too limited for it to comprehend what the conception of the other side was. It is a similar narrowness of thought which makes it so hard for many persons to understand one side or the other, at this day. C. S. Peirce.

Washington, D. C., Dec. 10, 1871.

"A PROTECTIONIST'S CHARITY."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: As my perceptive faculties are obtuse, I am obliged to refer to you for information in regard to a communication in your issue of Nov. 9, last.

Is "A. P. A." to be considered as in earnest, or as writing "sarcastical"? If the former, surely he is poorly versed in political economy, if he can afford no stronger proof of the beneficence of protection than is afforded by his admission that, by the present tariff, he is allowed to extort a certain per cent. from the needy builders of Chicago personally; even though his charitable thankfulness to our law-makers overflows in a return to all the sufferers generally of one-half of his ill-got gains. Reader.

Notes.

Some of our city readers may like to be informed of the free course of lectures at the University of the City of New York, now in progress at the University Chapel, Washington Square, on Thursday evenings at eight o'clock. Seats are reserved for ladies. Professors Henry and John W. Draper, Professor Stevenson, and Professor Coakley give scientific addresses, and there will be others on Homer, and Browning, on Sensation and Thought, on the Future of Society, on Journalism, etc., etc. The course ends April 4, 1872.——Messrs. J. E. Tilton & Co., of Boston, not having reconciled their difference with Messrs. J. R. Osgood & Co., have in press Tennyson's "Last Tournament," illustrated by Hammatt Billings, uniform with the same publishers' edition of "Enoch Arden."

— Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., 770 Broadway, have just published what, to doubtless a large number of readers, will be a most acceptable Christmas book: "Songs of the Spirit—Hymns of Praise and Prayer to God the Holy Ghost," edited by Bishop Odenheimer, D.D., and the Rev. Frederick M. Bird. This is every way a handsome book, most clearly printed on fine white paper. The editing, too, seems to us very carefully and thoroughly done; the selections show a generous catholicity in the making, and the prefatory notes contain a good deal of useful information and occasional discriminating criticism well and briefly expressed. We find also at Messrs. Randolph's a book which, we dare say, many of our readers may thank us for bringing to their notice, both on account of the beauty of the illustrations and the interest of the accompanying text—interesting as narrative and valuable, too, for its scientific record of personal observation. This is "The Coast of Norway from Christiania to Hammerfest," by Elijah Walton, author of "Flowers from the Upper Alps"; the descriptive text by F. G. Bonney, author of "The Alpine Region," etc. The illustrations are in chromo-lithography, and have the defects that as yet seem to be inseparable from this art, but their merits are very distinct and unusual, as though they may seem, at first sight, too highly colored, yet it is evident that the aim has been to make them truthful representations of scenery and phenomena of which few artists have endeavored to give us a notion. Gude is the only painter whose name we can recall who has treated with skill the scenery of Norway, and very few of his pictures have reached this country.

—The German mind takes naturally to monuments of departed worth, and does not confine its homage to native genius. To these qualities we owe not only statues and centennial celebrations, but such domestic souvenirs as the handsome volume called "Penates," of which Mr. L. W. Schmidt is the publisher, in connection with a Düsseldorf house. The household gods are Shakespeare, Goethe, Mozart, Schiller, Beethoven, Scott, Moore (who is here in the company of his betters), Holbein, Dürer; Thorwaldsen, Rauch, Rietschel (a group); Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn (another group). Really excellent lithographic portraits of these characters are surrounded by floral emblems generally pleasing in color and design, and preceded by a page of appropriate poetry or sentiment (in English) in ornate lettering. Sometimes the place and date of birth and death are added, or the titles of famous works. The binding is in keeping with the contents. We know no reason why gift-books of this sort should not become popular in this country.

—The Anglo-American Association is the name of a small body composed of Englishmen and of Americans resident in London, and was formed two or three years ago, we believe, under the auspices of Mr. Thomas Hughes, for the praiseworthy object of promoting a better understanding and more cordial relations between England and the United States. That any such body could do anything worth mention towards such an object, considering the vast number of points at which the two peoples come into contact, the multiplicity of the ties, both commercial, civil, and literary, which connect them, and the infinite variety of the ways in which they get their knowledge of each other, no candid observer ever believed. The one attempt made by the association to light up a dark place in Anglo-American relations—the monograph on the Fisheries question, which we noticed at length in these columns when it appeared—was not particularly brilliant, and was of no manner of use. Still, the aims of the organization were good, and for this reason, as well as because it furnished a certain number of kindly gentlemen with a vent for feelings of international brotherhood, were the citizens on both sides inclined to look on it with a friendly eye. Within a few weeks it has, however, got itself into trouble by undertaking to present Chicago with a public library, made up in part of contributions of their own works from English authors. This was at least a harmless project. It is true it exposed the promoters to some snubbing from sour persons like Carlyle and Disraeli, who either do not like American institutions, or are disturbed about international copyright; but then it might have gone on for a long while without attracting the notice of mankind. Mr. George W. Smalley, however, one of the American members, having come to the conclusion that, if he and the other Americans remained in the body while this book-begging was going on, it would in some grave manner compromise the American people, solemnly sent in his resignation, and called the attention of the two hemispheres to the act through the newspapers. The result is that Mr. Jenkins, the author of "Ginx's Baby," and other members, have attacked him for so doing, and the two have had a delightful and comely little "spat" in the Daily News, in which Jenkins was severe and Smalley was sarcastic. The affair is now over, but the honor of America has, though at the eleventh hour, been saved, and Chicago will probably have the library. The position of the Americans, that it would not be becoming for them to remain in the body while it was begging contributions from Englishmen towards an American testimonial, was sound enough; but, even if they had remained in it, nobody would have been sorry or ashamed, or in any manner damaged in mind, body, or estate, and—hardly anybody would have found them out.

—At this season of the year, the great picture market which exists in London assumes an activity which will increase until spring time, the sales becoming more and more important as they proceed. This year, however, there have been thrown early upon it two remarkable waifs: The Ripaldi Raphael, an unquestionable Raphael of the purest period of the artist, and the most Raphaelesque in the opinion of his warmest admirers. It was painted in his twenty-first year, for the nuns of St. Antony of Padua. It is part of a predella, and has belonged to the gallery of the King of Naples, by whom it was presented to the Duke of Ripaldi on the flight from Gaeta, when Garibaldi and the Piedmontese had put an end to the reign of Bomba figlio. It is in excellent condition, less repainted than most of Raphael's pictures, and is offered at $200,000 to the National Gallery, which, after its erratic and exceedingly extravagant indulgence in Dutch pictures, at an outlay of $70,000 this year, will hardly risk another heavy purchase. The other is a part of a series of Raphael's cartoons of the history of Scipio Africanus, colored by Giulio Romano, in similar manner to those so long at Hampton Court, which they resemble in treatment and size. They are about ten feet high by from ten to twenty-one feet long, and have been, like the Ripaldi Madonna, offered to the French Government, rescued from the Commune, and brought to London, where their owner, a Swiss gentleman who finds it necessary to realize on them, hoped to find a market. But the English Government, having its set of similar works, will hardly be more likely to purchase these than the Madonna. Is not here a chance for our new museum in New York? The character of these works is that which has made Raphael the master of modern painters, which has set the type of pictorial composition, and which, with most men who study the academic relations of line and grouping, has established the imperial canons of art. To the modern French classic school the works at Hampton Court were a source of inspiration; and those of the school of dessinateurs whom we now recognize as the great masters in that genre—Ingres, Delaroche, etc.—have studied the works of this period of Raphael's development as the finality of art. Without discussing now the relation of the schools, it remains certain that, in all that pertains to the teachable in composition and in design, these works would be a lesson in so-called high art which nothing but the Sistine Chapel could rival. They are said to be in almost perfect condition, as when they formed part of the great exhibition of Napoleon I., since when they have been in the hands of their present owner.

TWO HISTORICAL ESSAYISTS.*

No. I.—MR. FROUDE.

Mr. Froude and Mr. Freeman are the most eminent of living English historians. They have each published essays which are, to employ an expression of Mr. Froude's, "short studies on great subjects." As both these authors exhibit in their essays some of their most marked traits, the occasion is a convenient one for forming some estimate of the character of writers each of whom has attained, if not widespread popularity, yet certainly a position of influence in the literary world of modern England. Moreover, both Mr. Freeman and Mr. Froude, though belonging in many respects to different schools, and though in their whole view of historical writing in many points diametrically opposed to one another, yet have many common features clearly visible to critics, though probably scarcely discerned by either of the objects of criticism. Mr. Froude and Mr. Freeman each of them bear, though in a different manner, unmistakable traces of the influence exerted over them by the High Church movement. In Mr. Froude, this influence is perceptible at every turn. In Mr. Freeman, it is traceable rather in crotchets, such as a dislike to the term "the Reformation," than in any very serious bias exerted by it by way of either attraction or repulsion over his mind. Each of them, again, owing to the very influence to which we have referred, looks at society from a curiously ecclesiastical point of view. Mr. Froude, it is true, never loses an opportunity of reiterating the fact that he has "no hope from theologians, to whatever school they belong," and that "they, and all belonging to them, are given over to their own dreams, and they cling to them with a passion proportionate to the weakness of their arguments"; but he never gets clear of theological questions. Mr. Freeman, on the other hand, is not much given to speculation of any kind, but he attaches an amiable, if occasionally a somewhat amusing, importance to all the minutiæ of ecclesiastical antiquarianism, and, we suspect, would find it even harder to pardon Mr. Froude's errors as to the names of sees or the installation of bishops than his moral and immoral paradoxes as to the character of Henry or Elizabeth. This ecclesiastical bias is, in writers of history, not altogether an undesirable prejudice, as it leads them to pay attention to a side of history which formerly had an importance it has not now, and, it is to be hoped, will never have again. But in Mr. Froude's case, at any rate, it certainly warps his judgment when writing on modern topics, and is, in part, the cause of one of the gravest defects as well of Mr. Freeman as Mr. Froude. These writers have neither of them any interest in or any comprehension of the view of history which considers the growth of society to depend upon fixed laws or principles. This view, no doubt, has been the subject of gross exaggeration, and it is, to say the least, extremely doubtful whether a single principle has yet been ascertained which can even metaphorically be termed a historical law. Yet erroneous and premature as have been most of the theories already started, no man can believe that really great historians will not always attempt to deduce from past events the general principles on which their course has depended. Characteristically enough, both the writers under review utterly neglect the generalizations of political economy, which certainly throw light on some of the most perplexed enquiries as to human progress. Mr. Froude knows just enough of political economy to show that he misunderstands it, and is fully determined, if we may adapt to his case a dictum of an intelligent artisan, that, "if political economy be opposed to Mr. Froude, Mr. Froude will offer strenuous opposition to political economy." Mr. Freeman is happily under no temptation to defy political economy, for he does not appear ever to have heard that the science of political economy had an existence. His good sense, moreover, keeps him from propounding economical paradoxes, but he, no less than Mr. Froude, would gain much by a study of what may be called the economical side of history.

Both these writers, again, make up for their neglect of historical science by profound belief in that last resort of speculators in want of a theory —the influence of race. This belief in what we conceive Mr. Freeman would call Dutch and Mr. Froude Teutonic races, exhibits itself in each writer under very different forms. Mr. Freeman is incited by it to exhibit rather boisterous exhilaration in the fact of his being an Englishman and nothing but an Englishman; but he is not, as a general rule, so far as we know his writing, at all desirous to oppress races who have not the good fortune to be Dutch—indeed, Mr. Freeman would never oppress any one at all, unless it be Alsatians, who, in defiance of language, blood, and Mr. Freeman, wish to be French when he is kind enough to think they ought to wish to be Dutch. Mr. Froude, though he no doubt also never means to be an oppressor, certainly shows traces of a feeling that the best thing for Celts, Hindoos, and other non-Teutonic races is to be vigorously governed by energetic Teutons in a way which, say, to Celtic impatience, might seem like oppression. Add, lastly, that both Mr. Freeman and Mr. Froude, and this is one both of their merits and defects, were born controversialists, and only trained to be historians. Mr. Freeman succeeds much better than his companion in keeping controversy and history apart; still, they both must be considered as men who, even when writing history, are driven by irresistible impulse to assault the real or supposed errors of real or, in some cases, imaginary opponents Mr. Froude rages if he sniffs a political economist in the distance, and Mr. Freeman snorts for the battle at the merest suggestion that England owes anything to Roman influence.

We have purposely dwelt on some of the points in which these distinguished writers resemble each other; for it is just those characteristics which are common to men of the most different mould, because born under somewhat similar influences, which are at once of permanent importance, and also

* "Short Studies on Great Subjects. By J. A. Froude, M.A." London: Longmans. New York: Charles Scribner & Co.
"Historical Essays. By Edward A. Freeman." London and New York: Macmillan.

certain to elude general notice. But when the similarity between Mr. Freeman and Mr. Froude, resulting mainly from what we venture to call their unscientific view of history, combined with their love of controversy, is fully taken into account, the broad fact remains that they each represent a different class of minds, each treat history in a different manner, each owe their influence to different qualities, and each deserve and require separate criticism.

Let us first take Mr. Froude. His "Short Studies" deals with so many different topics, from Calvinism to the Eastern question, that it would be impossible in a series of articles, still less in the remainder of the present article, to discuss the various views and opinions contained in it. The best way, probably, to deal with the book is to consider one question which it forcibly suggests, and to which its pages, to some extent, supply an answer.

What is it which prevents Mr. Froude from exerting an influence either as a historian or a controversialist at all proportionate to his undoubted talents?

The truth of the allegation which this question obviously presupposes can hardly be denied by any one who recalls Mr. Froude's literary career. Known as the author of one or two fictions, which may, indeed, have been what Mr. Gladstone terms "questionable," but which were certainly full of power and interest, Mr. Froude, about fourteen or fifteen years ago, produced the two first volumes of his history. These were open to grave criticism, but they were read by many persons with enthusiasm, and they rightly excited very high expectations of the author's future achievements. No one, again, can doubt that, when, some year or two ago, the history was left off rather than finished, the world felt that these expectations had been doomed to disappointment. Moreover, Mr. Froude from the first was hailed by many persons not only as a great historian, but also as a sort of prophet, or, at any rate, as a propounder of striking theories. Few persons can now say that Mr. Froude's theories have made much mark on the world. What, then, is the cause of something which must fairly be termed failure, or, if not failure, at any rate a want of that success which the author's brilliant talents might have been expected to ensure?

The cause certainly is not any decline in literary talent. Whoever reads the essay on the condition of Protestantism will admit that the description of the evangelical prayer-meeting, where the congregation sung the melancholy hymn, of which the main conclusion, according to Mr. Froude, is that "doing ends in death," is at least as striking a picture as anything in the "Shadow of the Clouds" or in the wonderful account of the "Pilgrimage of Grace." Nor, again, can it be said that the views propounded by Mr. Froude are either wholly without worth or really opposed to the feeling of the day. No fair critic can deny that a volume of four hundred and odd pages, written by an able man, on many of the leading subjects of the day, and containing attacks on a great number of received opinions and received institutions, almost inevitably contains a great many remarks which are true and useful. Nor can any one who traces the course of recent English legislation, and other signs of popular feeling, doubt that there is a strong current of sentiment running dead against many of the approved political and economical doctrines which Mr. Froude assaults with a zeal which is hardly a zeal according to knowledge.

But, if his influence be not impeded either by defect of literary skill or by the essential unpopularity of his doctrines, wherein, again we ask, does the hindrance lie? A whole chorus of Saturday Reviewers and others are ready to reply that Mr. Froude's grossest fault, that which mars all other virtues, if he has them, is his inaccuracy. Now, we are certainly not going to do battle for the accuracy of a writer who has been frequently detected in errors, and who, even in these essays, seems to us, if we understand him rightly, to assert that Sunday-schools existed about the time of the Reformation. But, while fully admitting the importance of accuracy in history, we gravely doubt whether Mr. Froude's inaccuracies, great as some of them have been, made so much impression on the public mind as critics expected them to produce. The public, after all, feel what reviewers sometimes do not—that, though accuracy is good, a man may be a great writer, and even a great historian, who occasionally makes a slip about the installation of a bishop or the size of a diocese, or even about more important things. Inaccuracy, however, is one form of the fault which, more than any other, mars Mr. Froude's writings and lessens his influence. It is a fault very easy to perceive, but not by any means so easy to define, and may, perhaps, be best described as a want of judgment or due balance of mind. To this are, we suspect, to be attributed errors which unfriendly critics have sometimes ascribed to intellectual dishonesty. Of intellectual dishonesty, in the ordinary sense of the word, Mr. Froude is free. His picture, for example, of Henry VIII. is not, even taking his own showing of the facts, a fair or truthful picture, nor can we believe that his version of the facts is in all cases to be relied on. On the other hand, Mr. Froude has too frequently himself, whilst proceeding with his history, called attention to facts which did not square with his own theory to allow the supposition that he wilfully conceals the truth. He misstates facts not because he wishes to misstate them, but because he is essentially a rhetorician and not a historian. Whatever phase of thought or feeling his mind passes through, that he represents with considerable power, but he is constantly going through phases of sentiment, and seems to have neither the will nor the capacity to think on any given subject; still less has he any power of fairly realizing what are the arguments of an opponent with which, as a controversialist, he ought to deal.

Hence, his whole writings, and especially his controversial writings, have a pre-eminently sentimental, spasmodic, inconsequent character. Take, for instance, the article on "England's War." His theme is the decline of English power since the date "when the last shot had been fired at Waterloo," and "Great Britain was the first power in the world." Mr. Froude, after his manner, first assumes the fact of the decline, and then accounts for it. The causes to which he attributes it are, to sum them up briefly in the words of the school to which Mr. Froude belongs, the "shams of constitutional government." The effect of this eloquent and, in some parts, very ingenious essay is utterly ruined by the reader's being haunted by the enquiry which never suggests itself to Mr. Froude. The enquiry is simply this: How is it possible that a kind of government under which, in 1815, England rose to the highest power, should be itself the cause of England's sinking below contempt after 1815? We do not say there is no answer to this question, but it is one which lies on the very threshold of the enquiry, and the existence of which Mr. Froude never recognizes. How, again, is Mr. Froude's admiration for Calvin to be made consistent with his constant depreciation of dogmatic theology, or with the exaggerated prominence which he gives to the merely negative character of Protestantism? But, indeed, it were impossible even to state the numerous questions which Mr. Froude's essay suggests to which it is scarcely possible for any sensible man to find an answer. How, for instance, is it possible that a man of great cleverness, who knows history and knows the world, can really believe that, "as regards morality, it may be doubted whether inviting spirit-rappers to dinner, and allowing them to pretend to consult our dead relations, is in reality much more innocent" than burning witches? This question is puzzling enough, but there is an even more puzzling enquiry behind. How can it be that a man who certainly does not form too high an estimate of the world's truthfulness, who must, though not a lawyer, know something of law, and must, though not a great historian, know something of history, still seems to feel a mysterious faith in the preambles to statutes? On an implicit faith in preambles Mr. Froude attempted to base his views of history, and now, after more than fifteen years' historical labors, still looks with incomprehensible reverence on "the preamble of a Tudor statute" which "used to speak with reverence, real or pretended, of the law of God." The belief in preambles is certainly the last and strangest of all the phases of human faith, and is certainly a curious creed for a writer who, with all his defects, can, as in the essay on the "Prospects of Protestantism," speak with vigor and decision, and tell respectable English churchmen the truth, which they are always forgetting, that they must either condemn Rome or condemn the Reformation, and that "there would have been no such thing as the English Reformation except for those among us who did not believe in priests at all."

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.*

II.

We should say that Professor De Mille may safely allow himself this much of self-gratulation over his books for boys—that the boys will read them with interest. Whether he ought to think that he has done well to write them is another question, and one to which Professor De Mille's answer and ours would probably be different, though we have no very harsh condemnation to give them either. They appear to us to have for their principal merit the merit, such as it is, of giving a sort of expression to the inexpressible, break-neck boyishness of healthy boys. The expression is very much exaggerated, to be sure; the boys are athletic and adventurous to a degree that is morbid—as if boys who were born in some one of the British

* "Fire in the Woods. By Professor James De Mille." Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1872.
"Adrift on the Sea; or, The Children's Escape. By Emilia Marryatt Norris." New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. 1872.
"When I was a Little Girl. By the author of 'St. Olave's.'" New York: Macmillan & Co.
"Nine Years Old. By the author of 'St. Olave's.'" Illustrated by L. Frölich. New York: Macmillan & Co. 1872.
"The Fairy Book. The Best Popular Fairy Stories, selected and rendered anew By the author of 'John Halifax, Gentleman.'" Illustrated. New York: Macmillan & Co
"Chatterbox." 1871. New York: Pott, Young & Co.
"Little Folks. A Magazine for the Young." New York: American News Co.
"Children's Magazine." New York: Church Book Society.
"Little Folk Song. By Alexina B. White." New York: Hurd & Houghton.
"Jack Hazard and His Fortunes. By J. T. Trowbridge." Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co.

colonial possessions, and thus devoted by the fates to being more exclusively and fervidly members of the Alpine Club than it would have been necessary to be had they been born in the United Kingdom itself. The quantity of going over cataracts, and getting adrift in schooners, and escaping from quicksands, and fighting shovel-nose sharks, and camping on desolate islands and promontories, that is done by the members of the "B. O. W. C." would secure the approval of Mr. Whymper himself for any man—for an officer in the militia service of the Dominion of Canada. But the boys will not quarrel with the exaggeration. We wish it was more certain than we suppose it is that they will quarrel with the vulgarity of Mr. De Mille's Captain Corbets and Solomons and Pats and Grand Panjandrums and Jiggenses. We do not know, however, that "Lost in the Fog," "Among the Brigands," "The Fire in the Woods," and their companions are books that will do so much harm to the young reader by their falsity and low tone, as they will do him good by amusing him and by cultivating in him habits of adventure and of physical activity, in which American boys are perhaps somewhat lacking. Perhaps they are lacking; we doubt if their mothers would say so. The charge might probably be made with more truth against American youths who have passed the age of boyhood.

"Adrift on the Sea" is a little book which we are more than willing to commend. It is a story of the vacation of some children, who spend the summer at the seaside, and who, among other and smaller adventures, have the misfortune to "forget that it is Sunday," and to walk on the beach on that day, and afterwards play in a boat which drifts out to sea with them and carries them nearly to France. Not that it is a Sabbatarian book at all. The true cause of the mishap is that the eldest of the children, Arthur, who is twelve years old, has been for two years at a public school, has become very conceited, and imagines himself competent to do anything, let alone rowing a boat. This self-conceit—which has previously withstood the shock of the young gentleman's extreme illness after pipe-smoking that he had given himself out as able to do, and several other smaller shocks—is pretty thoroughly taken out of Arthur by the compulsory voyage in the Channel and the spectacle of the misery which privation of food inflicts upon his smaller brother, Georgie, who is represented as a boy who shows great singleness of purpose at meal times. The moral which the book inculcates is very well inculcated, we think, though we do not say that older persons than children of ten or twelve years might not think it too much obtruded. Still, every one may read it with some pleasure. Included in it, by the way, are two stories, one absurd one, with comical effects that doubtless will be appreciated in the nursery, and one about a sick boy who dreamed that he was taken up into heaven—which is extremely sentimental in its tone, but which may be of service at twilight in softening the hearts of bad children and diminishing the frequency of corporal punishment.

"Nine Years Old" also is a pleasant book which we think our readers might do well to buy. An aunt recalls for her nieces things which happened to her when she was nine years old and had two grandmothers, and certain faults to be cured of. Here, again, there is a little moralizing which will do nobody any harm, and doubtless will do the children good. There is also here and there a little of that sort of remark which shows that the utterer has lost some illusions—as, for instance, that one cannot always be young; that one would be happier if one could just have what one wanted, and the like. But as the children will disregard all this pensive philosophizing, and indeed not know that any philosophizing is going on, we need not expend spiritual energy in reprobating it as wholly out of place in literature for the young, a sin against art, and so forth. Some pretty pictures by Frölich add to the agreeableness of this pleasant little volume. The same author's "When I was a Little Girl" is a fresh, rambling, simple little book, just the thing for girls of ten years old or younger, about English country life and English school children, the farmyard, and dolls and playing games, and all that variety of gentle reminiscence with which good aunts and mothers amuse their small audience at twilight.

We find ourselves a little surprised at seeing such a book as a "Fairy Book" from such an author as Mrs. Craik. Perhaps there is no good reason why she should not write fairy stories, but from the delineation of moral and religious character to the rehabilitation of the Yellow Dwarf and Invisible Prince is certainly an unexpected step. Most of the venerable and highly respectable old stories are here, from "Cinderella" and "Beauty and the Beast" down to that immoral and detestable little fiction, "Red Riding Hood," which never has had anything to recommend it but the fact of its being a "classic." Mrs. Craik presents these veracious histories in a simple form, and without any sacrilegious adornment; and, as it will never do for a generation to arise and know them not, we can recommend the new version to parents of conservative minds.

The bound numbers of the English magazine for children, Chatterbox, make fully as attractive a volume as that of last year. Some of the pictures —and there is a large collection—are commonplace and badly drawn, though good enough to be a help in illustrating the stories; but, besides these, the number of fine prints got together, chiefly of animals, is alone worth the price of the book. They are so good as to call for a more enduring binding than the one they have received, which will not hold together a book of four hundred and twelve pages for more than a year, even in good children's hands. The reading matter of the book is adapted to children of any age and is of the pious kind. Still, many of the stories are interesting, and there is a fair quantity of sound and entertaining instruction.

Little Folks is likewise the year's number of an English magazine. It contains, within strong-looking backs, four hundred and sixteen pages, not so large as those of Chatterbox. The range of its collection of pictures seems to be mainly the same, although there are more insignificant ones, and fewer of the fine large cuts. The funny pictures did not strike us as very funny, while occasionally there is a positively disagreeable one, like "The Jack Tar" (p. 100). The literature of the book is, in part, contributed by young people from five to fourteen, pour encourager les autres in the art of composition. It is also secular in its treatment of subjects, and, so far as we have observed, contains no abnormal cases of virtue.

But for a specimen of an out-and-out Sunday-school work, the Children's Magazine (American) takes precedence of anything we have yet had this year. Whatever be the subject—a description of the Yosemite Valley, or an account of the excavations at Pompeii, or stories for the children—everything is made to point a laborious evangelical moral. A small child in one story wants to be told what "Samivel" said, and what it "meaned," which might remind the unregenerate more of one Mr. Weller than the little Samuel whom the Lord called. Boys also help poor people out of their private purses in a reckless way, and contract a regular habit of doing chores for them. For the rest, there are Sunday lessons, letters to "Our Bible Class," etc. The illustrations are poor.

We intend a compliment to the author of "Little Folk Songs" when we say she has been a heedful student of Mother Goose. There is quite a familiar ring about some of the little pieces, and they make one feel like beating time to them, though not like singing. The imitation runs a little too close in "Money," with its > "How shall I eat without any bread?

> How shall I sleep without any bed?"

which brings Tom Tucker vividly to mind. The marked merit of the book is in its precise adaptation to the needs and comprehension of a small child. We venture to assert that "The Bee's Honey," "Mistress Mouse," "Baby Pigs," "The Spider," "Buttons," "Stannie's Hiding," or "My Kitten" could not be read to a two or five-year-old audience without being rapturously encored. The strongly marked rhythm and simple ideas, set up in an easy row, attract the attention and fasten on the memory. There are longer pieces than these mentioned, all of which are more or less good, except perhaps "Rumble Grumble," which is rather unpleasant, and the "Toad in the Road," which may be amusing to parents, but is inadvisable to read to small boys with warlike propensities. "The Ant to the Grasshopper" is a happy instance of clear, compact writing. The whole book is so thoroughly cheerful and wholesome, and, where there is a moral to be drawn in any piece, it is done with such restraint and delicacy, that we think it may be as popular with the mothers as with the babes.

We were agreeably disappointed on taking up "Jack Hazard" to find that it was not a reprint of the estimable but dull "Jack Hazard" of former days, but a brand-new biography written by Mr. Trowbridge. This Jack was a profane little driver on the Erie Canal thirty years ago, and his history goes to show how a boy with character and pluck and latent conscience may rise by his own exertions and a few favoring circumstances from the very lowest kind of life to respect and honor. The principal favoring circumstance in Jack's fortune was his Newfoundland dog, Lion. The dog had been singed in a fire, and no one befriended him but Jack, to whom he ever after owed allegiance. If it wasn't for the author's plain intention, we should say that Lion was the hero of this history; it is certainly his adventures which lend it its chief interest. He is to "Jack Hazard" what the horse Don Fulano was to Winthrop's "John Brent"; and we think it a little odd, with Mr. Trowbridge's habit of winding up his dramatis personæ in a handsome way, that he has omitted to mention at the close what became of Lion. To be sure, there is a sequel hinted at, and that may contain the desired information. Mr. Trowbridge certainly has a knack at painting Yankees, and the proverbial "mean Yankee" suffers no abatement at his hands. The boys' talk is as comical as it is realistic; and the slang he puts into their mouths is a triumph of either invention or memory. There is in this book, as in all its predecessors, a curious looking towards dramatization which may or may not be conscious. Miss Wansey and Mr. Pipkin are just ready for the stage, with the regular farce repetitions of set phrases in their mouths, and with their utterly preposterous and illogical wedding at the fall of the curtain. Not that unlikely people do not frequently surprise us by marrying, but in a related story one requires some intelligible excuse for suddenly turning enemies into lovers. Jack's reform is, however, the point of the book which requires one more word. It is pretty fairly though liberally managed; that is, the process of sloughing off such a skin as he had is made to seem not a very difficult process. We are afraid a real canal-boy would have had more struggles, more slips backward, and been a little less of a Casabianca, keeping on picking red-root, while the Deacon had forgotten him, and the dinner-horn was blowing. Still, it is a cheerful fault, especially when the duty of analysis of hearts and heads is so fully performed in all the magazines for the young.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Abbott (E.), The Baby's Things; a Story in Verse	(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) $0 75
"Awful!" and Other Jingles	(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 25
Butler (Rev. W.), The Land of the Veda	(Carlton & Lanahan)
Cathcart (G. R.), Youth's Speaker	(Ivison, Blakeman & Co.)
Curtius (E.), History of Greece, Vol. II	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Douglas (Marian), Picture Poems for Young Folks	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Douglas (Amanda M.), Lucia: Her Problem	(Sheldon & Co.)
Du Chaillu (P.), The Country of the Dwarfs	(Harper & Bros.)
Edwards (Mrs. A.), Ought We to Visit Her?	(Sheldon & Co.)
Fish (D. W.), Arithmetical Examples	(Ivison, Blakeman & Co.)
Imogen, and Other Poems	(B. B. Russell)
Jepson (B.), Elementary Music Reader	(Chas. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Kendrick (Prof. A. C.), Our Poetical Favorites	(Sheldon & Co.)
Lawrence (W. B.), Disabilities of American Women Married Abroad	(Baker, Voorhis & Co.)
Morgan (J. A.), Macaronic Poetry Collected	(Hurd & Houghton) 2 75
Mulock (D. M.), Hannah; a Tale	(Harper & Bros.)

NEW YORK CHURCH BOOK STORE.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF THE LATE REV. DR. MAHAN. Edited by the Rev. J. H. Hopkins, jr. 3 vols. 8vo.

Vol. I. Church History.

Vol. II. Palmoni and Mystic Numbers.

Vol. III. Miscellaneous Writings.

Vol. I. will be ready about December 14. Price $4. The Subscription price for the set will be $10, payable, $3 on the delivery of Vol. I., $5 on delivery of Vol. II., and $2 on delivery of Vol. III.

THE RITUAL LAW OF THE CHURCH, with its Application to the Communion and Baptismal Offices. To which is added, "Notes upon Orders and the Articles." By Murray Hoffman, author of the "Law of the Church" and "Ecclesiastical Law in the State of New York." Price to subscribers, $3; to non-subscribers, $4. (In the Press.)

Persons wishing to avail themselves of the subscription prices of the above books should send their names and addresses at once to the Publishers.

NEW BOOKS.

HISTORICAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. By the Rev. G. Rawlinson, M.A. 18mo, cloth, 75 cents.

THE FOUR GOSPELS. Arranged in the form of an English Harmony from the Text of the Authorized Version. With Analysis and Four Maps. By the Rev. J. M. Fuller, M.A. Post 8vo, cloth, 75 cents.

COMMENTARY ON THE NEW TESTAMENT. Containing the Acts, Epistles, and Revelation, according to the Authorized Version. By various authors. With Map. Crown 8vo, cloth, red edges, $3.

MORAL DIFFICULTIES CONNECTED WITH THE BIBLE. Being the Boyle Lectures for 1871, preached in her Majesty's Chapel at Whitehall. By the Rev. J. A. Hessey, D.C.L. Post 8vo, cloth, 75 cents.

THE MINISTRY OF NATURE. By Rev. Hugh Macmillan. 12mo, cloth, $2.

NEW AND CHEAP EDITIONS.

THE PRINCIPLES OF DIVINE SERVICE. An Enquiry concerning the True Manner of Understanding and Using the Order for Morning and Evening Prayers, and for the Administration of the Holy Communion in the English Church. By the Rev. Philip Freeman. 2 vols. 8vo, $6.

AN EXPLANATION OF THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES. With an Epistle Dedicatory to the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D. By the Rt. Rev. A. P. Forbes, D.D., Bishop of Brechin. 8vo, cloth, $5.

LECTURES ON CHURCH DIFFICULTIES. By the Rev. J. M. Neale, M.A. With Introduction by the Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, M.A. 12mo, cloth, $2 50.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.,
Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

SONGS OF THE SPIRIT,
HYMNS OF PRAISE AND PRAYER TO GOD THE HOLY GHOST.
EDITED BY
Right. Rev. WM. HENRY ODENHEIMER, D.D.,
AND
Rev. FREDERICK M. BIRD.
650 pages small 4to, bound in cloth, gilt, $5.

The scope and spirit of the book are thoroughly catholic. All religious bodies and all schools of thought, which recognize the Deity of the Holy Ghost, are represented in it. The amount of material may surprise those who remember how little on this subject is found in ordinary Hymnals and Collections of Sacred Verse. The whole domain of hymnody has been drawn upon with no sparing hand. Few of the Hymns have been taken from other than original sources, and the text may be relied on as unaltered and unabridged in nearly or quite every case, except when the contrary is stated.

The book is elegantly printed on superfine paper, and is tastefully bound in cloth.

ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH & CO.,
770 Broadway, Corner Ninth Street, N. Y.
☞ Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price.

THE LAND OF THE VEDA.
PRICE $4.

Being Personal Reminiscences of India; Its People, Castes, Thugs, and Fakirs; Its Religions, Mythology, Principal Monuments, Palaces, and Mausoleums; together with the Incidents of the great Sepoy Rebellion, and its results to Christianity and Civilization; with a Map of India and Forty-two Illustrations. Also, Statistical Tables of Christian Missions, and a Glossary of Indian Terms used in the Work and in Missionary Correspondence. By Rev. William Butler, D.D.

This is a large 8vo of 550 pages, profusely and admirably illustrated, and in mechanical appearance exceedingly attractive. Indeed, the Publishers as well as the author have spared no pains to make the work all that can be desired. Dr. Butler's long residence in India, and his intimate acquaintance and harmonious relations with the governmental authorities there, gave him special facilities for extensive observation and study, and his work, therefore, comes to us with the freshness and value of original information and direct personal investigation. It abounds with historic facts and current incidents, and furnishes the public with a large amount of valuable information on the varied and interesting subjects of which it treats. The style is vivid throughout, and in many parts exceedingly picturesque and interesting.

CARLTON & LANAHAN,
805 Broadway, New York.

ON the 30th instant will be published, No. 36, December, 1871, completing Vol. 3,
THE AMERICAN BIBLIOPOLIST:
A Literary Register and Monthly Catalogue of Old and New Books, and Repository of Notes and Queries.

The new Number will contain, with other articles, New York City in 1661, the Story of an Old Map. Notes on the History of Fort George. International Copyright. Newspaper Patronage. The New Zealander. The Copyrights of "Hamlet" and "Paradise Lost." Poems of Rev. Stephen Duck. Boswell and the Keeper of Newgate. Dr. Johnson and Charles Dickens. George Borrow's Works. Origin of Racine's Comedy of "Les Plaideurs." Story of Lavater. Viscountess Keith, a Relic of the Last Century. The Koran. The London Book Season. The late Sir Roderick Murchison. Mr. Prescott's Library. The late Thomas Roscoe. The Signers. A Receipt for a "Poem in Dialect." Origin of Chambers's Journal. A Scene at Carlton House. "Gutted" Oysters. Anecdote of Goethe. The late Mr. Babbage. A Catalogue of Holiday Books. A Catalogue of a Choice Collection of Works relating to the Drama. Literary Gossip. Book Notices, etc., etc.

Subscription $1 per year. Cheap Edition, 50 cents.
☞ Send stamp for Specimen Number.
J. SABIN & SONS, 81 Nassau St., N. Y.

A NEW (LITERARY) DEPARTURE.
A Comic Christmas Novel will be Ready To-day:

THE WALKING DOLL; or, The Asters and Dis-Asters of Society. By Orpheus C. Kerr. Being a new and wholly original Eccentrically Humorous Romance of Society; a perfectly fresh and interesting Love Story; an Ingenious Comedy of Perplexing Errors; a piquant Literary and Social Satire; a Romantic Study of Passion and Fashion; of Characters whimsical, sentimental, eccentric, and farcical. 12mo, (about) 350 pp., cloth extra, $1 50.

Also,

SHORT POEMS FOR SHORT PEOPLE. By Edgar Fawcett. A Delightfully Humorous Christmas Volume for Young and Old. 16mo, (about) 120 pp., cloth gilt, $1.

Early orders solicited from the Trade.
FRANCIS B. FELT & CO., Publishers,
91 Mercer Street, New York.

A MOST ACCEPTABLE PRESENT.
DR. JOHN HALL'S
PAPERS FOR HOME READING.
By Rev. John Hall, D.D.,
Of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church.
1 elegant 12mo, with Portrait, $1 75.

N. B.—A few copies in choice calf and morocco bindings for Presents.

This popular book is now in its fourth thousand.

DODD & MEAD, Publishers,
762 Broadway, New York.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. Reprinted from THE NATION, and in some measure supplying the place of the first two volumes of the paper, now somewhat scarce. Price $1 50. Address, Publisher of THE NATION, Box 6732, N. Y.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF CAPTAIN JOHN Brown. Edited by Richard D. Webb. The best ever written. With photograph showing the face without the beard. Price $1 50. Address, Publisher of THE NATION, Box 6732, N. Y.

IMPORTANT NEW WORKS

JUST READY, or to be Issued by

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,

654 Broadway, New York.

I.

THE DESERT OF THE EXODUS.

Journeys on Foot in the Wilderness of the Forty Years' Wanderings, undertaken in connection with the Ordnance Survey of Sinai and the Palestine Exploration Fund.

By E. H. PALMER, M.A.,
Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.

With Maps and numerous Illustrations, from Photographs and Drawings taken on the Spot by the Sinai Survey Expedition and C. F. Tyrwhitt Drake.

2 volumes 8vo, cloth extra, $7 50.

Messrs. S., W. & Co. have imported an Edition of this very valuable contribution to Scripture History, and, in order to place it within reach of all interested readers, have reduced the published price of $14 to $7 50, from which no discount can be given.

II.

AN ELEGANT AND USEFUL GIFT-BOOK.

ALPINE PLANTS.

Figures and Descriptions of the most striking and beautiful of the Alpine Flowers.

Edited by DAVID WOOSTER, F.R.H.S.

Illustrated by 54 Plates exquisitely colored, and attractively bound in cloth, extra gilt and gilt edges, with Flower Panel in colors on the side; royal 8vo, $10 50.

III.

STONES OF THE TEMPLE;

Or, LESSONS FROM THE FABRIC AND FURNITURE OF THE CHURCH. By Walter Field, M.A., F.S.A. Crown 8vo, with numerous Illustrations. Cloth extra, gilt top, $3 75.

IV.

A JOURNEY TO THE CENTRE OF THE EARTH.

From the French of Jules Verne. With 52 full-page Illustrations by Rion. 12mo, attractive cloth, extra, $2 50.

V.

Eastlake's New Work (to be Ready Next Week):

A HISTORY OF THE GOTHIC REVIVAL.

An attempt to show how the Taste for Mediæval Architecture which lingered in England during the last Two Centuries has since been encouraged and developed. By Charles L. Eastlake, Author of "Hints on Household Taste." With nearly 50 fine Plates. 1 vol. quarto, cloth extra, gilt top, $13 50.

The above works sent, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,
654 Broadway, New York.

READY DECEMBER 15.

THE ARTIST EDITION

OF

TENNYSON'S NEW POEM,

THE LAST TOURNAMENT.

Illustrated by HAMMATT BILLINGS,

And uniform with the Artist Edition of "Enoch Arden." The designs by Mr. Billings are the best he has ever done.

J. E. TILTON & CO., BOSTON,

PUBLISHERS.

READY THIS WEEK BY

HURD & HOUGHTON, New York.

THE RIVERSIDE PRESS, Cambridge.

I.

FIRESIDE SCIENCE. A Series of Popular Scientific Essays upon Topics connected with Everyday Life. By James R. Nichols, M.D., Editor of Boston Journal of Chemistry. In 1 vol. 16mo, cloth, $1 50.

Some of the topics discussed are the metal to be used in Water-pipes, the Chemistry of a Hen's Egg, the Clothing we Wear, and Dr. Nichols's success in scientific farming has drawn from him some valuable notes and hints.

II.

THE METAPHORS OF ST. PAUL AND THE COMPANIONS OF ST. PAUL. By John S. Howson, D.D., Dean of Chester. Two volumes in one, with Illustrations, and an Introduction by Rev. Professor Hackett. 16mo, $1 25. (Published for American Tract Society.)

Dean Howson's great work, in conjunction with Dr. Conybeare, is sufficient guarantee for the value and excellence of this book.

NEXT WEEK:

CELIA THAXTER'S POEMS.

PIATT'S LANDMARKS, and new edition of his Western Windows.

RECENT BOOKS:

Morgan's Macaronic Poetry. $2 75.

Meline's Mary, Queen of Scots. $1 75.

Mrs. Richardson's Stories from Old English Poetry. $1 50.

Mrs. White's Little-Folk Songs. $1 25.

For sale by all Booksellers. Sent free of expense on receipt of advertised price by the Publisher.

THE BEST ENGLISH PERIODICALS.

THE LONDON QUARTERLY, EDINBURGH, WESTMINSTER, and BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEWS, and BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

Regularly and faithfully reprinted, at about one third the price of the originals.

TERMS.—Blackwood or any one Review, $4 a year; Blackwood and any one Review, $7; Blackwood and two Reviews, $10; Blackwood and three Reviews, $13; any three Reviews, $10; the four Reviews, $12; Blackwood and the four Reviews, $15.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE FOUR REVIEWS FOR OCTOBER.

THE LEONARD SCOTT PUBLISHING CO.,
140 Fulton Street, New York.

VALUABLE BOOKS

FOR

GIFTS AND LIBRARIES.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 WASHINGTON STREET,

BOSTON.

HAVE JUST ISSUED

A CATALOGUE OF BOOKS

COMPRISING

WORKS IN EVERY CLASS OF LITERATURE,

SELECTED FROM THEIR

LARGE AND EXTENSIVE STOCK.

☞ Sent free by mail to any address.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

RAPHAEL OF URBINO, AND HIS FATHER, GIOVANNI SANTI. By J. D. Passavant, formerly Director of the Museum at Frankfort. With Twenty Illustrations, by the permanent Woodbury process. Royal 8vo, full gilt, $12.

"Deserves, and will probably meet with, the highest attention of all lovers of art and of artists. . . . The elegant and refined finish of the photographs deserves the highest praise."—Boston Evening Traveller.

N.B.—The Illustrations to this volume are by a carbon process, and cannot possibly fade.

WINE: a Treatise on Its Origin, Nature, and Varieties. Being a Complete Manual of Viticulture and Œnology. By J. L. W. Thudichum, M.D., and Auguste Dupré, Ph.D. Medium 8vo, with many Illustrations, $9.

"A treatise almost unique for its usefulness either to the grower, the vender, or the consumer of wine."—Wine Trade Review.

NEURALGIA, and the Diseases which Resemble it. By Francis E. Anstie, M.D., M.R.C.P., Editor of the Practitioner. 8vo, $3 50.

ON THE USE OF THE OPHTHALMOSCOPE in Diseases of the Nervous System and of the Kidneys, also in certain other General Disorders. By Thomas Clifford Allbutt, M.A., M.D., Cantab, Physician to the Leeds General Infirmary, etc., etc. With Colored Plates. 8vo, $5.

EXPERIMENTAL MECHANICS. A Course of Lectures delivered at the Royal College of Science for Ireland. By R. S. Ball, M.A. With many beautiful Illustrations. Medium 8vo, $6.

THE MINISTRY OF NATURE. By the Rev. Hugh Macmillan, author of "Bible Teachings in Nature," etc. 12mo, cloth, $2.

THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS. By the Rev. F. D. Maurice, Professor of Casuistry and Moral Philosophy in the University of Cambridge. New and revised edition. 12mo, cloth, $2 50.

THE THEORY OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By W. Stanley Jevons, M.A., Professor of Logic and Political Economy in Owens College, Manchester. 8vo, $3 50.

"This new work on Political Economy is destined, if we mistake not, to exercise far greater influence on the study of the science than the author seems to imagine."—Manchester Examiner.

THOUGHTS ON LIFE SCIENCE. By Edward Thring, M.A. (Benjamin Place), Head-master of Uppingham School. New edition, revised and enlarged. 12mo, $2 50.

MR. PISISTRATUS BROWN, M.P., in the Highlands. Reprinted from the London Daily News, with additions. Illustrated. 12mo, $1 75.

PATTY. BY KATHERINE S. MACQUOID, author of "Rookstone," etc. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

CLARENDON PRESS PUBLICATIONS:

ELEMENTS OF ROMAN LAW. By Gaius. With a Translation and Commentary by E. Poste, M.A. 8vo, $6.

THE PHILOLOGY OF THE ENGLISH TONGUE. By John Earle, M.A., sometime Professor of Anglo-Saxon at Oxford. 12mo, $2.

"Every page attests Mr. Earle's thorough knowledge of English in all its stages, and of the living Teutonic languages."—Academy.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S Select Catalogue of Books for Christmas and the New Year, containing all their Illustrated Holiday and Juvenile Books, sent free to any address on application to 38 BLEECKER STREET, New York.

LEE & SHEPARD

PUBLISH THIS WEEK

A NEW NOVEL OF SOCIETY.

RUBY DUKE.

BY MRS. H. K. POTWIN.

12mo, Cloth, - - - - - - - - - $1 50

By the Author of "THE GOLD-HUNTERS."

THE WHALEMEN'S ADVENTURES IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS AND ON THE PACIFIC COAST. By W. H. Thomes, Author of "The Gold-Hunter's Adventures," "The Bushrangers," and "The Gold-Hunters in Europe." 12mo, Illustrated, Cloth, $1 50.

By Prof. JAMES DE MILLE.

AMONG THE BRIGANDS. Being the first volume of a new series, "The Young Dodge Club." 16mo, cloth, $1 50.

By ELIJAH KELLOGG.

THE CRUISE OF THE CASCO. 16mo. Illustrated. $1 25.

THE PLEASANT COVE SERIES.

3 vols. Illustrated. Per vol., $1 25.

1. Arthur Brown, the Young Captain.
2. The Young Deliverers.
3. The Cruise of the Casco.

By SOPHIE MAY.

AUNT MADGE'S STORY. 24mo. Illustrated. 75 cents.

LITTLE PRUDY'S FLYAWAY SERIES. 3 vols. Illustrated. Per vol., 75 cents.

1. Little Folks Astray.
2. Prudy Keeping House.
3. Aunt Madge's Story.

By PAUL COBDEN.

THE TURNING WHEEL. By Paul Cobden, Author of "Who Will Win?" "Going on a Mission," etc. 18mo. Illustrated. $1 25.

THE RECKONING SERIES.

3 vols. Ill. Per vol., $1 25.

1. Who Will Win?
2. Going on a Mission.
3. The Turning Wheel.

☞ Sold by all Booksellers and Newsdealers.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

LEE, SHEPARD & DILLINGHAM, New York.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW,

VOL. CXIV. 1872.

"If some scoffer were now to ask, 'Who reads an American essay?' we should have little difficulty in replying, that Boston produces at this moment one monthly and one quarterly magazine which are certainly equal to any two specimens of periodical literature of which London is the parent. . . . Let any man who doubts whether American essays finds many English readers endeavor to procure in England, either for love or money, a copy of last July's number of the 'North American Review'; nor let him forget also to enquire how many copies of the much-sought number have already been sold in London."—London Telegraph, 1871.

"The fact that, on the whole, the 'North American Review' has been kept abreast of its English contemporaries, being better than they fully as often as it has been worse, is greatly to the credit of our American men of letters. . . . It would be for the general good if the number of newspaper editors and newspaper readers who now see the 'North American' could be doubled and tripled; for in all the coutry there is hardly another source of sound scholarship and criticism in literature, and of careful thought on the questions that should occupy the politician, legislator, and sociologist."—The New York Nation, 1870.

Liberal inducements offered to the trade and to agents. The attention of all libraries and book-clubs is invited to the Review. For back numbers apply directly to the Publishers.

Terms, $6 a year. Single numbers, $1 50.

J. R. OSGOOD & CO., Publishers,

124 Tremont Street, Boston.

NEW BOOKS

JUST PUBLISHED BY

NOYES, HOLMES & COMPANY,

117 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

HUDSON'S REVISED EDITION OF SHAKESPEARE.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMPLETE WORKS, the text carefully restored according to the first editions. New revised edition. With Introduction, Notes (original and selected), and a Life of the Poet. By the Rev. Henry N. Hudson, A.M. Eleven vols. 16mo, with contents lettered on the back of each volume. Steel Portrait. Price, $15 for the set.

Also, an ILLUSTRATED EDITION of the same. Containing nearly Two Hundred Steel Engravings (in outline). Eleven vols., gilt top. Price $22 for the set, in neat box.

A REVISED EDITION OF SHURTLEFF'S HISTORY OF BOSTON.

A TOPOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL DESCRIPTION OF BOSTON. By Dr. Nathaniel B. Shurtleff. With ancient Maps and Plans. One vol. 8vo, 730 pp. Price $5. This valuable work, revised and corrected by the author, is now first offered to the trade and general public.

THE FOURTH GOSPEL. The Heart of Christ. By Rev. E. H. Sears, D.D. One vol. 12mo, 500 pp. Ready soon.

THE STORY OF GUTENBERG AND THE ART OF PRINTING. With numerous illustrations. An instructive and entertaining volume for all ages. New and handsome edition. Price $2.

EVERY DAY. A Book for Young Ladies. By the Author of "Katharine Morris," etc. 12mo. Price $1 50.

THE KNIGHTLY SOLDIER. A New and Revised Edition. By Rev. H. Clay Trumbull. Illustrated. Price $2.

Sold by all Booksellers.

NOW READY:

A NEW ILLUSTRATED EDITION

OF

TENNYSON'S POEMS.

COMPLETE.

Cloth extra, $1 75; cloth gilt, $2.

PUBLISHED BY

J. E. TILTON & CO., BOSTON.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, BAZAR,

$4 PER YEAR EACH.

$10 a Year for the Three.

$7 for any Two.

An Extra Copy of either gratis for every five Subscribers at $4 each in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE sent by mail on receipt of six cents in postage stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

JUST PUBLISHED.

HOMO VERSUS DARWIN.

A Judicial Examination of Statements recently published by Mr. Darwin regarding

"THE DESCENT OF MAN."

1 vol., 155 pages, with Illustrations, 12mo, cloth. Price $1.

 This book has proved highly popular in England, and will no doubt be equally popular with American readers.

THE ORGANIZATION OF LABOR,

In accordance with custom and the laws of the Decalogue; treating of the evils existing in the systems of Labor at the present time, and the means necessary to effect reform. Translated from the French of M. F. Le Play, author of "Des Ouvriers Européens," and "La Reforme Sociale," by G. Emerson, M.D., M.A.P.S. One vol., 418 pages, 12mo, cloth. Price $2.

CASSAGNAC'S

HISTORY OF THE WORKING AND BURGHER CLASSES.

BY M. ADOLPHE GRANIER DE CASSAGNAC.

Translated by Ben. E. Green. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

"This valuable work has been for some time out of print, and copies of it are exceedingly rare, therefore an American translation will be welcome."—Washington Chronicle.

"The work to the student of the labor problem is a treasure."—Trenton (N. J.) Gazette.

☞ For sale by Booksellers generally.

CLAXTON, REMSEN & HAFFELFINGER,

PUBLISHERS,

Nos. 819 and 821 Market Street, Philadelphia.

THE COMPREHENSIVE SPEAKER,

Designed for the Use of Schools, Academies, Lyceums, etc., carefully selected from the best authors, with notes by Henry T. Coates. Large 12mo, 672 pp., half bound, cloth sides, $1 75.

From the New York Daily Tribune.

"It contains a judicious selection of pieces from the best authors, omitting all of doubtful morality, of a sectarian or political character, and of transient literary value. Great care has been taken in the selection of extracts to give the genuine text of the author, without the errors in quotation and punctuation which are such a frequent blemish in this class of school-books. A large proportion of the contents are from American authors, furnishing the materials for a comparative survey of our native literature."

From the Philadelphia Press.

"On careful examination, we do not hesitate to characterize it as the best compilation of its class that has ever come under our note. The merits of this large and valued collection are numerous. Hackneyed pieces have been carefully excluded, and political and sectarian pieces are not to be found in its pages. There are, of course, some humorous passages, in prose and verse, but none that are immoral or vulgar."

From the Christian Union. (Henry Ward Beecher, Editor.)

"Of course the work of compiling such a book as this is involves difficulties which do not appear to the superficial critic. The enormous mass of available matter has to be winnowed with great care and judgment; the hackneyed extracts, which in the days of the old United States Speaker were declaimed until every boy knew them by heart from simply hearing them, must be avoided; and yet it will not do to omit many of those thrilling passages in the Reply to Hayne, the Declaration of Independence, and a hundred others. Mr. Coates has certainly done his task well and faithfully, and the introductory remarks which precede the body of the work are characterized by good sense, and are evidently the result of considerable thought and observation. The plan of the volume is a natural subdivision of the selections first into prose and poetry, and then into narrative, historical, forensic, etc., the design evidently being that a reading class shall not go through, as it were, from Genesis to Revelations, but shall, in the judgment of the teacher, read 'Mrs. Caudle on Lending Umbrellas' on a rainy afternoon, or the 'Impeachment of Warren Hastings' when the public is excited about official corruptions. The selections are good so far as we have examined them—and we have done so with considerable care—being taken from the best current literature, as well as from that which will always be regarded as classical where the English tongue is spoken."

Send for a Descriptive Circular.

Copies sent to teachers on receipt of one-half the retail price.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

822 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1871.

The Week.

THE President has sent in a message, accompanying the Report of the Civil Service Commission, announcing that he has adopted the rules recommended by it, and that they will go into effect on the first of January, and asking for an appropriation for the expenses of the permanent Advisory Board. The rules prescribe, as primary qualifications for appointments in the civil service, citizenship, knowledge of the English language, good character and health, and adequate age. The Advisory Board is to group the positions in each branch according to the character of the duties, and grade each group from the lowest to the highest, for the purpose of promotion within the group; and admission to the service shall always be, in the first instance, to the lowest grade of any group. All vacancies in the lowest grade of any group shall be filled by competitive examination of all persons who shall present themselves, after due public notice. The examiners shall then present the three candidates standing highest on the list, and from these the appointing power shall make its selection. All vacancies in grades above the lowest shall be filled by competitive examination from the members of the other grades of the same group. The remainder of this rule is as follows: "but if no such applicants are found competent, the appointment shall be upon an examination of all applicants, conducted in accordance with the provisions for admission to the lowest grade." All persons filling positions of trust, for whose fidelity another officer is responsible, must, however, have the approval of that officer. Postmasters drawing under $200 salary are to be appointed in the old way, but all persons appointed under these rules enter first on a probationary period of six months. The President appoints three examiners in each department, and they act under the supervision and regulations of the Advisory Board. Assessments on salaries for political purposes are strictly forbidden. The assistant secretaries of departments, Assistant Attorney-General, first Assistant Postmaster-General, Solicitor of the Treasury, Naval Solicitor, Solicitor of Internal Revenue, Examiner of Claims, the Treasurer of the United States, the Registrar of the Treasury, First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury, the Judges, District Attorneys, Private Secretary of the President, Ambassadors, and divers other officials of like grade, as well, of course, as all officers to whose appointment the advice and consent of the Senate are necessary, are excepted from the operation of the rules.

We can only say that both the report of the Commission and the adoption of the rules by the President must be regarded as a great triumph of a great reform, whatever doubts one may entertain about the goodness of the President's intentions. We should have been better pleased with it if actual officeholders had been subjected to the tests here prescribed; but, in default of this, it is not too much to ask for the issue of an order similar to that which Mr. Green issued in the City Hall the other day, warning officers that they are to withdraw from politics, and assuring them that their political opinions and abstinence from political "work" shall in no way affect their hold on their places. We must insist that this is a necessary supplement to the new rules.

The great fight over the proposal to revive the Retrenchment Committee in the Senate has ended, after long and acrimonious debate, in the appointment of a Committee of Investigation, with full power to send for persons and papers during the present session of Congress, but with the condition of the civil service withdrawn from the enquiry. This is, to a certain extent, a triumph for the independent Republicans, but the Administration Senators have managed the composition of the committee to suit themselves. In defiance of parliamentary usage, they have put on it none of those who originally pressed for the investigation, and have only put on one Democrat, Mr. Bayard of Delaware. This is pretty dexterous and barefaced; but the affair, nevertheless, even considered from the Conkling and Morton point of view, has not been well managed. The committee consists of Messrs. Buckingham, Pratt, Howe, Harlan, Stewart, Poole, and Bayard, and they are to enquire into the expenditures; what offices ought to be abolished, and what salaries reduced, if any; what improvements can be made in the system of accountability in the care and disbursement of public money; whether any money has been paid out illegally, or officers employed without authority of law or unnecessarily, and to what extent the expenses may or ought to be curtailed. What will be the nature of the report which such a committee will make we cannot better foreshadow than in the words of a well-informed correspondent, who says that the majority will declare "that the Administration is without spot or taint, and presents a spectacle of ability and purity without parallel in the history of the world"; while Messrs. Pratt and Bayard, the minority, will declare "that since the reign of Nero and Caligula there has been no such shameless corruption and nepotism." These statements will be supported by a printed volume of evidence containing from 500 to 1,000 pages, copious extracts from which will be read in the Senate Chamber, to an audience consisting of a dozen listless spectators in the gallery, and a group of Senators chatting and smoking in the lobby.

We have said the affair was not, even from the Conkling-Morton point of view, well managed, because they might have heartily supported Mr. Trumbull's first proposition for general investigation—in fact, have pretended to court investigation, and then have got their own men on the committee with one or two Democrats as they have now, and so managed by adjournments and taking voluminous testimony to drag the thing along till the end of the session, and then reveal nothing after all. In this way they would have shielded the Administration just as effectually as now, and have avoided the terribly damaging debate of last week. They would have saved some of their partisans out of doors, too, from committing some great blunders. The New York Times, for instance, would have been spared the serious indiscretion of trying on men like Trumbull and Schurz the style of treatment it has found so effective in dealing with knaves like Hall, and Connolly, and Tweed. We can assure it that it not only seriously injures its own influence—which, after all that has happened, we should be sorry to see diminished—but makes itself ridiculous when it threatens to "expose" a man like Mr. Trumbull or Mr. Schurz, while whitewashing saints like Mr. Conkling. Mr. Morton, in the meantime, continues to pound his desk with his fists, and maintain that our civil service is "better than that of any European country, more free from abuses, equal in integrity, and more efficient than any other," and, in short, "the best in the world." This reminds one of the minister in Berlin who maintains that the world is flat and the sun goes round it, and says the "philosophers may laugh as they please, but he is happy as a child." Statements like these are not the articulate utterances of a legislator, however, but the snortings of a war-horse. The gallant old steed who gives them off is not a sagacious animal of his kind, either—for, only three short years ago, he was neighing for the payment of the United States debt in greenbacks, and the issue of unlimited paper for this purpose.

There has been a good deal of fuss made during the last three or four weeks over the interference of the United States troops to preserve order, after the fire at Chicago, on the demand of the mayor, Governor Palmer of Illinois distinguishing himself by the earnestness of his protests against it, addressed both to the State Legislature and the Federal Government; and he has been supported in his remonstrances by several grave, able, and emphatic articles in the New York Tribune. It is not alleged that the conduct of the troops was not admirable; that their commanding officer, General Sheridan, was not discreet as well as energetic; and that the force did not render valuable assistance in the days of panic and despair succeeding the fire. The objection to its employment, as made by Governor Palmer and the Tribune, is that the assumption by the United States of the task of preserving order by military force in the States, except on the demand of the State authorities, is a violation of the spirit if not of the letter of the Constitution, and, worse than this, familiarizes the public mind with arbitrary processes, so that many an error, by the same example, may rush into the State. We have observed, however, that these protests have made very little impression on the public mind, and we think we can give the reasons. One is, that the Force Bill of the last session of Congress has so prepared the people for Federal interference, even in doubtful cases, that they pay no attention to the possible consequences of such a precedent as the use of regulars to keep order on the site of a burnt city. The other is, that finding in the Tribune nearly every week impassioned defences of the exercise by the President, himself a military man, or nothing if not military, of the discretionary power of suspending the habeas corpus in any State in which he thinks proper to suspend it, for any reasons which to his mind seem sufficient, they laugh and wink when they come to the articles which commend Governor Palmer for his manly defence of the outworks of constitutional liberty.

The Committee of Investigation of the Legislature of South Carolina has made a report on the financial condition of the State, which is creditable for its fulness and frankness, particularly as the majority are colored men, and as that body last year took the enormous sum of $583,651 for "legislative expenses," and fitted themselves out with furniture and upholstery to the amount of $91,500. Between October, 1870, and November, 1871, the carpet-baggers increased the State debt of $6,655,856 by over $9,000,000, and have nothing to show for it. The treasury is empty, the credit of the State completely gone, and the January interest will probably not be paid. Not only have enormous amounts of bonds been issued, nobody knows for what, but they have been issued without authority of law. The report of the committee arraigning Governor Scott and the worthy Niles G. Parker, the State treasurer, for fraudulent over-issues, has been adopted in the House, and it was immediately followed by resolutions that both of them be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. The resolutions were laid over under the rules. The impeachment ought, however, to be accompanied and followed by a common domestic prosecution for felony. Deposition from office by a "high court" for "high crimes" is all very well, but conviction by an ordinary criminal court of low crimes, and committal to an ordinary penitentiary, is what all our Ring thieves and peculators most need.

The Geneva Commission has begun its proceedings by electing Count Selopis, the Italian representative, as president. The "case" of the United States, as made up by Mr. Bancroft Davis, was presented, and contains a full recital of the facts, great and small, of what are known as the Alabama grievances, coupled with an equally full recital of all that the Government of the United States has thought or said about it. The story which was set afloat a few months ago, that this case was unsatisfactory to the counsel for the United States, Messrs. Cushing, Evarts, and Waite, was, let us add, a pure fabrication. The case forms a volume of 500 pages, and contains a French translation, and is accompanied by seven other volumes of papers and documents. It asks for compensation in a round sum for the loss of vessels and their cargoes; for the expense of pursuing the rebel privateers; for the loss sustained by the transfer of American ships to foreign flags, and increased cost of insurance; and for the prolongation of the war caused by the operations of these cruisers. In short, the case claims everything it is possible to claim, likely and unlikely. The total amount claimed for losses in vessels and cargoes caused by the depredations is in round numbers $19,000,000. This sum, or a sum sufficient in the estimation of the commission to cover all proved losses, with a reasonable margin for contingencies and doubtful cases, will, it is believed, be awarded, and the decision will probably be reached in the course of next summer.

The troubles of the New York Ring increase. The Grand Jury, which has been sitting for the last fortnight, has found indictments, and in some cases several indictments, against the principal thieves, beginning with Tweed. As many as fifteen have been proved against the wretched Connolly, and divers smaller rascals have been also visited in the same way. They are all being held to bail for trial at the General Sessions. Tweed has retained a great array of counsel, but his main reliance must be on the difficulty of getting a jury that will agree. The new Central Park Commissioners have got on the track of the great-souled Sweeny, and have detected that worthy in the perpetration of at least one job for which, even if it be not felony, he certainly ought to go to jail. In the meantime, there rages a most amusing discussion, in which Mr. Belmont, the banker, is said to be taking a prominent part on Hall's side, as to whether Hall has done anything even dishonorable. That the inventor of Mrs. Cunningham's "bogus baby" in the Burdell trial, and who, after ten years' service as District Attorney in this city, rose to be Mayor, should be held up to the world by sensible men as a deluded innocent, is perhaps one of the most singular incidents in the history of the Ring. Hall, for instance, not to go over the whole ground, was put by statute on a board of audit, to audit claims against the city. At the very first meeting, he moved a resolution that the whole business of auditing these claims be handed over to Tweed and Watson—who was killed last year, and who was what might be called the divider of the spoil—and the great frauds forthwith began. Now, about his share in this transaction Hall has told perhaps twenty falsehoods, we will not say lies, and if he was innocent, as his defenders would have us believe, we must believe either that he did not know what auditing meant, or that he did not, after several years' intimate intercourse, know the character of Tweed and Watson; or, in other words, that a man who had thoroughly succeeded in New York politics was a born natural. The story of the Ring would hardly have been complete without this sequel. On the theory on which Hall's champions are defending him, we should never discard a man's society or friendship unless we had actually seen him stealing, or forging, or had seen a bill found against him by a Grand Jury. In some cases, indeed, we should have to find some of our spoons in his pocket, and our shirts in his carpet-bag, before refusing to associate with him.

The wonderful ramifications of the Ring have been illustrated afresh during the present week. Three national banks have failed, mainly owing to their having been managed or controlled by members of the Ring, and to the inevitable loss of confidence entailed thereby. One of the three has been laboring for some time past under the effects of previous disaster, aggravated, it would seem, by too close relations with one of the Washington officials specially appointed to watch over the rectitude of its management. It shows courage and confidence on the part of the great majority of the banks to have allowed these three banks to suspend in a time of so much uneasiness and distrust, especially since one at least of them is reported to be amply solvent; and their action confirms the belief that the stronger financial institutions have for some time past been retracing their steps in the matter of expansion. The result is further shown in the improved aspect of the weekly bank returns, which, in spite of increased reserves, indicate a great decrease in loans. Money, in consequence, is necessarily scarce and dear; and although the stringency is probably aggravated at times by Wall Street cliques, it is not to be denied that it is mainly natural, that credit is everywhere being curtailed, and that there is a steady growth in the feeling of caution, not to say distrust, to which our financial institutions have long been strangers.

The Hartford Post has been publishing the lobby bills of the cities of New Haven and Hartford incurred during the past two years in the dispute over the State capital. New Haven, as was natural, disbursed the most, $39,051 74, against Hartford's $16,921 75, the aggregate being $55,973 49. These sums, if they seem small in comparison with the fees of a New York lobby, or the price necessary to induce an American minister to lend his name to a mining speculation, are, nevertheless, having been in the main corruptly employed, far too great to leave a good character to the Connecticut Legislature. The Post has been very earnest in exposing this evil, and it now prints the bills of the two cities side by side, with sad results to the character of professional lobbyists. Several of them went from advocating the cause of New Haven as a semi-capital to that of Hartford as a sole capital, and so appear in both lists; generally demanding the same or else advanced wages for thus turning their coats, but occasionally coming down from $400 to $300, or even from $300 to $100—for Hartford's scale of hire was lower than New Haven's. The heaviest single charge on the taxpayers was "Incidentals, $2,000"; and for their "services and expenses," on one side or other, lawyers, editors, legislators, railroad commissioners, a member of the State Board of Education (who only wanted the school geographies simplified), a United States collector, assessor, and bank inspector, received pay along with the obscure and disreputable crowd who form the rank and file of the lobby, but whose compensation frequently exceeded that of the most prominent attorneys.

The European money markets continue to improve in ease, the American Syndicate has satisfactorily completed its loan negotiations, our credit abroad is steadily improving both for national and railroad securities, and foreign exchange and gold in our own markets continue low or declining. The success of recent efforts in the direction of curbing the insolent and fraudulent Erie management, following so closely upon the Tammany failure, is encouraging European investors, and new combinations are reported from England aimed at a total disruption of the Erie power, which is a worse disgrace even than Tammany itself. There are also rumors of intended criminal proceedings against some of the Southern State bond swindlers; and, altogether, there is a decidedly healthy reaction in public sentiment on the subject of honesty in the management of financial, municipal, or State institutions.

Trade is dull. The holiday trade of the city is said to be light, and, in spite of unusual efforts on the part of the dealers, complaints are very general. There are an unusually large number of failures among the smaller tradesmen, clearly indicating the unsatisfactory condition of the working-classes; and it is a somewhat suggestive and painful contrast to read at the same time the statements of the great jewellers and dry-goods and fancy-goods dealers, that the costliest and most valuable articles continue to have the best sale. The wholesale trade is always dull at this season. Cotton has again advanced, though the full advance has not been maintained. The crop is now pretty generally admitted to be materially below four million bales, and undoubtedly justifies an advance over the low prices of the summer. But in the present uncertain condition of European affairs, the shrewdest observers do not believe in a continuance of the recent extraordinary rate of consumption. The advance in price has, however, been so great, that several old houses, which had believed in lower rates, have failed amid some little excitement. The cotton market has recently become as great a field for gambling operations as Wall Street, and threatens to absorb some of the more unscrupulous elements, who no longer find their opportunities in the dull dealings of the Stock Exchange.

The Prince of Wales has recovered, contrary to all expectation, and apparently in violation of the rules of the medical art. As a great many newspapers had published well-written obituary notices of him, accompanied by appropriate reflections suggested by his case on the vanity of earthly grandeur and the stern impartiality of Death, and had even treated his decease as likely to bring speedy ruin on the British monarchy, his restoration is not unnaturally exciting a good deal of indignation and even some suspicion. It is broadly hinted that he was, after all, only "playing possum," and that the Queen, and the royal family, and the Court physicians were aiding in the hoax, with the view of exciting sympathy among "the masses," who had made up their minds to have a republic without further delay, but, hearing he was so sick, determined to postpone it. Sir Charles Dilke in the meantime continues his great crusade, but the wind is likely to be taken out of his sails, for his followers have determined to strip off his title. The "British Federal Council of Internationals" held a meeting the other day in London, at which they were visited by a deputation of the "Land and Labor League," inviting them to join in preparation for a grand meeting in support of Sir Charles and his speeches and the establishment of a republic. It then appeared, however, that in that body Sir Charles must be spoken of as "Citizen Dilke," and that under this appellation he would, if he behaved well, be made "the first President of the British Republic"; but it also came out that the Internationals had by no means made up their minds that they wanted a republic, or at all events that they would be content with a republic simply. "It was a republic," one citizen remarked, "which shot Rossel." We make bold to say, however, that reducing Sir Charles to "Citizen" Dilke would be like killing the goose that laid the golden egg. It is his baronetcy that makes his republicanism so valuable. In the meantime, violent discussions, which have been long brewing, show themselves in the ranks of the Internationals in England, the English members being by no means ready for the assault on the monarchy, and the Continentals denouncing them as traitors. Even such advanced reformers as Bradlaugh and Odger are now among the "sore-heads."

Mr. Robert Lowe, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has come to the defence of the monarchy in a speech delivered before a Mechanics' Institute in the north of England. He criticised Sir Charles Dilke, and with a fair show of reason, for not beginning his attacks on the monarchy in the House of Commons, where there would have been some one to answer him who knew something about the facts, and he charged him with various misrepresentations, only one of which, however, he exposed, viz., that the Queen has paid no income tax. He says she has paid it, like all other debts and dues, regularly. He made one point, too, which is in some degree corroborative of the view which we took in the last Nation of the Republican movement in England, and that is, that politics is not a speculative or metaphysical, but a practical science—that every government has to be tested by its results; and tested in this way, and conceding that the great ends of government are peace, liberty, and security, the British monarchy must be admitted, especially when compared with the other governments of the world, to have worked well. The Internationals, however, as well as most other reformers of our day, are not concerned about peace, liberty, and security, but about social reorganization, and they have as yet seen nothing in the history of that form of government called republicanism to lead them to expect from it any better things for their purposes than from the monarchical. We infer, therefore, and with great assurance, that the Republican movement in England is one of the smallest, feeblest, and hollowest movements of the day; that the only strong movement of the day is the Labor movement, and that it is prepared to accept either a republic or a monarchy, provided it furthers its own ends.

THE CONFLICT IN THE SENATE.

THE conflict which has raged during the past week in Washington over Mr. Trumbull's proposal to revive the Committee on Retrenchment has been very interesting for various reasons, but most of all for the light it throws on some of the political tendencies of our day. As all our readers know, the question whether a president should be eligible for a second term has been from the very beginning one of the vexed questions of American politics, the arguments on both sides being numerous and weighty. In the early days of the government, before politics had become a trade, and the civil service a mere party machine, opinion inclined towards the doctrine of eligibility, and it triumphed not only in the Constitution, but in popular practice under the Constitution. Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson all served a second term. Since Jackson's time, however, the doctrine has, under the Presidential intrigues for renomination, and the prostitution of the civil service to the promotion of personal and party ends, gradually declined in popularity.

The Tribune, which has of late been preaching the one-term principle very strongly, showed, the other day, that it rose, thirty years ago, to the rank of a cardinal article in the Whig creed. It had secured a sufficiently strong hold on the popular mind to make it highly probable that nothing but the expiration of Mr. Lincoln's term in the midst of a bloody war would have sufficed to set it aside, even in his case. We have recently argued against the supposition that it would of itself furnish a complete remedy for the corruption and disorder in the civil service, and, apart from the question of civil-service reform, see many grave objections to the people's binding themselves by a constitutional amendment never, under any circumstances, to re-elect the actual occupant of the Presidential chair.

We are not now going to discuss this point over again. We wish simply to call attention to the fact that the friends of the present Administration are now not only fighting against "the one-term principle," but are going far beyond the most advanced position ever taken up by the old advocates of eligibility for re-election by putting forward, with great heat and fury, the presumption —we do not think we exaggerate in describing it in this way— that the President is entitled to re-election as a matter of course— that is, not simply may be re-elected, but has a claim to be re-elected prior to that of all other candidates, known or unknown, and a claim so plain and obvious that all discussion of it, even, is a mark of "treason to the party," and of sinister motives; and all this six months before the nominating convention meets. Now, we do not hesitate to say that we think the fact that General Grant comes before the public for a second term with the civil service unreformed in every particular, and that he has not hesitated in a single instance in which it appeared likely to serve the Administration to use the patronage for electioneering purposes—using it in one instance even to interfere with the election of senators; and that he has shown as great laxity in his appointments as any of his predecessors, not excepting Andrew Johnson; and that the civil service is now an enormous as well as a corrupt machine, which makes its power felt in every village in the Union—constitutes of itself a full and sufficient reason, if not for rejecting his claims to re-election peremptorily, at least subjecting them, before the convention meets, to the strictest scrutiny. No scrutiny on such an occasion can be too strict. The question, "What use have you made of the powers with which we have armed you?" is one which, when addressed to the head of a popular government, is always in order, and can in the nature of things never be impertinent, or ill-advised, or unseasonable; and all refusal to answer, or restlessness under investigation, or curious speculation as to the motives of the persons making it, raises, and ought to raise, a presumption of abuse of some sort or other. There is nothing the people cannot better afford to do than let the person into whose hands it has put this vast machine refuse to allow any authorized enquirer to look into its working. Nevertheless, Mr. Trumbull's proposal to revive a Committee of Enquiry —a lawful body, lawfully organized, to ask lawful questions about the public affairs—has been resisted, and almost successfully resisted, at Washington on two grounds—one, that it would be used to injure the President's chances of renomination, to which he is presumptively entitled; the other, that the proposer is a factious man, whose aims are not high. We do not mean anything personally disrespectful to the President or his friends when we say that these pleas are almost identical with those used by our Ring to ward off the examination of their accounts. What Hall and Connolly said was—first, that there was nothing wrong; secondly, that if there was anything wrong, they would set it right themselves; and, thirdly, that the motives of the would-be investigators were interested and low.

We shall probably be told that our objection to General Grant's renomination, based on the condition of the civil service, has no force, inasmuch as he is engaged in reforming it on the very eve of an election. But to this there is the obvious answer that, even if the occurrences of the last four years threw no doubt on his sincerity, the reform now on foot does not affect any person now in office. We have not seen the Commissioners' report, and may be mistaken on this point, but we believe we are not. The present incumbents hold their places without liability to examination, but with liability to arbitrary dismissal, and they are the result of four years' careful sifting of the service by experienced hands, so that a better disciplined or more devoted body of mercenaries has probably never gone into a canvass; and that they are going into the canvass, all reforms and promises of reform to the contrary notwithstanding, and that they will be used skilfully to fill the convention with "Grant delegates," no reasonable man really doubts. The reform will thus begin when there is nothing more to be gained by the abuse. We do not say that the fact that General Grant has not reformed the civil service, and that he has used it freely for electioneering purposes, and made most disreputable appointments, are conclusive reasons why he should not be renominated; but we do say that they are reasons why the question of renominating him should receive the fullest and freest discussion, and why every sort of light should be thrown on it, and why those of his creatures who seek to stifle enquiry by assailing the persons who propose it should be peremptorily silenced. But no such reasons are needed. The one reason why every administration should answer freely, with persons and papers, regarding every item of its conduct, is that it holds the purse and uses the force of a free people.

Apart from this general principle, however, there is reason enough in the history of General Grant's administration for a rigid enquiry. It has been marked by numerous and heavy frauds and defalcations. Postmasters, paymasters, collectors, assessors, Treasury clerks, and bank examiners have all been stealing, embezzling, and betraying their trusts on a great scale. It is only the other day that it was found necessary to count over the bonds and money in the Treasury at Washington to see whether the two clerks who had been detected as defaulters the previous week were the only ones. A short time before, another clerk had been found out helping a knavish Congressman to get payment for the sham claims of sham soldiers. A short time before that, it was found that a paymaster had made away with half a million; almost the same day it was found out that an assistant-postmaster had stolen one hundred and fifty thousand. Since then, a man whose business it is to keep the Government and the public informed of the condition of the National Banks is found to have been silent when he ought to have reported, and "to have been silent," as Grattan said, "for money." Moreover, all these facts come to light at a moment when the country is being literally desolated by Rings; when the treasuries of many States and many cities are discovered to be in the hands of thieves; when nearly everybody, high and low, is "on the make"; when our very ambassador at a foreign court is accused of selling, not his own poor name, for that would be nothing, but the dignity and trust with which a great nation had clothed him, to a board of speculators to enable them to secure the money of widows and orphans for a tumid mining venture.

Now, we do not blame the Administration for all this. It is in part the fault of the condition of the civil service, in part the fault of the times in which we live, and the social conditions by which we are surrounded. Some of these frauds, Paymaster Hodge's, for instance, might have occurred anywhere or under any system. But surely their occurrence shows that there is something wrong, and surely the success which has attended them, and the accidental way in which nearly all of them have been discovered, naturally and fairly suggest the inference that there are others just as bad which might be discovered, if search were made. The President himself admits that there is a great deal wrong by his attempting to reform the civil service. If that worked well, why reform it? And if it be not yet reformed, who shall doubt the right or duty of Congress to overhaul it from top to bottom? It will not do, to recur again to the example of our own Mayor Hall, to declare, when frauds are brought to the President's notice, that they do not exist, or, if they do exist, that he is not responsible for them, but, anyhow, will not have them investigated lest his enemies should discover something that might damage him.

The course for the public to pursue at this time is plain enough. Nobody has any right to object to General Grant's offering himself, or to others offering him, for re-election; nor can we find fault with them for putting forth the acts of his administration in as favorable a light as possible in support of his claims. They are things to be considered, and carefully considered. But, on the other hand, the people, and all parts or portions of the people, have a perfect right to discuss his claims fully, to consider well the propriety of re-electing him, and to do this with a complete immunity from all let or hindrance or incentive on the part of the Administration, and from all imputations on their honesty, and purity, and political soundness.

THE "CONDITION OF THE LABORER."

THERE is a good deal, of course, to be said in favor of Mr. Hoar's bill providing for the formation of a Commission to enquire into and report upon the condition of the laboring population of the United States, and the way and extent to which it is "affected by existing laws regulating commerce, finance, and currency." That such a Commission ought to form a permanent part of our administrative system, no thinking man doubts. That Congress should ever attempt one particle of legislation affecting directly or indirectly the industrial system of the country, without having before it such reports as such a Commission would furnish, is greatly to be regretted. But when one considers that we had such a Commissioner for three years, and that he published very valuable reports, and that the President dismissed him on the demand and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, because a certain class of manufacturers did not like his conclusions, and because the Secretary of the Treasury thought he could get all the information he needed about the industrial condition of the country by looking out of the car-windows as he travelled about, one does not feel very hopeful about the results of any fresh enquiry of the same nature. The reports of such a Commission are pretty sure to be distasteful to somebody, and that somebody is pretty sure to try to get it dismissed for not forming or expressing a different opinion, and, if the Administration has no more nerve or wisdom now than it had two years ago, we should simply be treated to another discreditable farce. Owing to the strength of the money-making spirit, and to the wide diffusion of the Sentimentalist view of society, it is getting to be very difficult to secure the services of a really honest and scientific investigator in any department of industry. If he draws inferences which conflict with the views of speculators, or of protected manufacturers, or manufacturers seeking protection, he is denounced as an enemy of the country, and unfit to receive its pay—as in the case of Mr. D. A. Wells, the State geologist of Missouri, who was abused in the Legislature and finally dismissed the other day, for saying there was no tin in St. Louis County. If, on the other hand, he maintains that the facts indicate the impossibility of mending certain matters by legislation which the Sentimentalists insist that nothing but legislation can mend, he is accused of having a "bad heart," and of being a selfish voluptuary, or being in league with selfish voluptuaries. Indeed, the "scientific man" who is just now most in favor with politicians (who are nearly all "on the make," to use the expressive slang of the City Hall) and with humanitarians is he who settles beforehand what the facts ought to be, and then finds them just where he wanted them and just what he wanted them. We trust, therefore, that if, as proposed, Congress should commit the appointment of this Commission to the President, he will avoid putting on it any man, no matter what his pretence to a knowledge of our industrial condition, who is directly aided in making money by any existing legislation, and also avoid putting anybody on it simply because he is a "good man." "Good men"—that is, men with "large hearts" and very indifferently stocked or very soft heads—are pretty sure to do mischief when they are allowed to meddle with the machinery of society. Their proper sphere is simply that of firemen, and the sole duty they can safely perform is keeping the steam up. We hope, also, that, when the Commission has made its report, the President will have the nerve to stand the criticism it calls forth, and not conclude, because it is distasteful to a large number of persons, that all reports are vanities, and that the true rule to follow in legislation is, after all, the rule of thumb.

There is one other point to which it is perhaps worth while to call the attention of gentlemen like Mr. Hoar, who are taking up the labor question as a specialty, and whose character and position are likely to give weight to what they say on it, and that is the facility with which their utterances may excite wild and unreasonable expectations among that immense body of laborers who know nothing about the machinery of society except that their own part in it is hard and toilsome. Mr. Hoar's assertion that "the general rules or administrative regulations of the International Association were adopted in October last, in London, by delegates comprehending the leading minds from all the civilized nations of the world," indicates, if correctly reported, either peculiar views as to what constitutes a "leading mind," or else a decided want of soberness in his own mode of approaching the labor problem. The "General Council," which may fairly be supposed to contain the élite of the Association, does not present the name of a single person possessing any claims whatever to intellectual pre-eminence; and we venture to assert that its meetings have not been attended by anybody who is, in any civilized nation, looked on as remarkable for either grace, wisdom, or understanding. Moreover, "the General Rules of the Association" contain nothing whatever that the feeblest minds which have ever taken up the labor problem are not capable of conceiving, and nothing which in the smallest degree contributes to its solution. Indeed, the statement of principles contained in their preamble and resolutions is simply a repetition of the vague and vapid generalities which may any day be heard from the half-dozen demagogues and worn-out agitators who have, in this country, recently made "labor reform" their hobby. Here it is, and we should greatly like to know for what Mr. Hoar, after having read it, finds himself indebted to "the leading minds" which composed it:

"CONSIDERING,

"That the emancipation of the working-classes must be conquered by the working-classes themselves; that the struggle for the emancipation of the working-classes means not a struggle for class privileges and monopolies, but for equal rights and duties, and the abolition of all class-rule;

"That the economical subjection of the man of labor to the monopolizer of the means of labor, that is, the sources of life, lies at the bottom of servitude in all its forms, of all social misery, mental degradation, and political dependence;

"That the economical emancipation of the working-classes is, therefore, the great end to which every political movement ought to be subordinate as a means;

"That all efforts aiming at that great end have hitherto failed from the want of solidarity between the manifold divisions of labor in each country, and from the absence of a fraternal bond of union between the working-classes of different countries;

"That the emancipation of labor is neither a local nor a national, but a social problem, embracing all countries in which modern society exists, and depending for its solution on the concurrence, practical and theoretical, of the most advanced countries;

"That the present revival of the working-classes in the most industrious countries of Europe, while it raises a new hope, gives solemn warning against a relapse into the old errors, and calls for the immediate combination of the still disconnected movements;

"FOR THESE REASONS—

"The International Workingmen's Association has been founded.

"IT DECLARES:

"That all societies and individuals adhering to it will acknowledge truth, justice, and morality as the basis of their conduct towards each other, and towards all men, without regard to color, creed, or nationality;

"That it acknowledges no rights without duties, no duties without rights."

Now, we think we are stating the experience of nearly every thoughtful and conscientious man, not connected with the agitating machinery of the labor question, when we say that no information of the smallest value as to what is meant by the phrases, "labor reform" or "emancipation of labor," is ever to be obtained from the speeches and resolutions of those who have the matter in charge; and yet, upon the meaning of these phrases, as used by these persons, the value of their exertions and their exact place in the estimation of the world must depend. That "the emancipation of the working-classes must be conquered by the working-classes themselves" may be true; but from what is labor to be "emancipated"? Who is "the monopolizer of the means of labor"? What is "the economical subjection of the man of labor"? What is "the economical emancipation of the working-classes" to which "every political movement is to be subordinated"? What is the special value of the acknowledgment by the members of the Association "of truth, justice, and morality as the basis of their conduct towards each other, and towards all men," as long as we do not know what they mean by "truth, justice, and morality," and as long as we do know that Simon de Montfort, Philip II., Robespierre, Jefferson Davis, and Tweed all professed to take truth, justice, and morality "as the basis of their conduct" towards all men? Finally, what do we care, or need we care, about anybody's admission that every right has its correlative duty, and every duty its correlative right, unless we know in what sense he uses the terms "right" and "duty"? Slave society had its system of morality, in which rights and duties figured as prominently as in any other society, but, somehow, a large proportion of its population were exposed under the law to frequent "larrupings" and daily robbery.

Now, we maintain that it is the duty of every politician—and especially of every politician whose words and character have weight—before either endorsing the International Association or launching himself into an agitation for the legislative amelioration of the laborer's condition, to form in his own mind a clear and distinct conception of the nature of the evils of the laborer's condition, and the precise character of the remedies he proposes for them, and to express this conception in a plan of reform put down in black and white, and not in vague commonplaces about "emancipation," and "servitude," and "subjection," and "progress," and "elevation," and "monopoly." We have had, heaven knows, declamation enough, and enough "preambles and resolutions" and "administrative regulations" for agitating associations. We desire now to know, once for all, what the "man of labor" seeks and what he wishes to have done with "the monopolist of the means of labor," and what he has in his mind when he discourses of "rights" and "duties." That the working-classes are discontented and ill off, everybody knows. What we wish to learn is the nature of those changes in the machinery of society by which it is proposed to put an end to their misery.

Undoubtedly, there are in legislation, in custom, in tradition, and, above all, in ignorance, great hindrances in the way of the mass of men in choosing their work, and in carrying its product to the general store, and in getting their fair reward for it, but these hindrances consist largely in restraints on individual freedom. By all means let us have them cleared away, and free play given to human faculties; but let those who see these restraints describe them accurately, and ask for their removal by name, and stop prating to us about "emancipation" in general. Above all things, let us have an end to all schemes for the regeneration of society which simply propose to substitute one set of "directors" for another. The world is sick, or ought to be, of plans like Louis Blanc's old one, of reorganizing industry on the basis of "giving to each according to his wants, and exacting of each according to his capacity." There is, and has to be, at the bottom of all these schemes a court or tribunal, made up of men, whose business it will be to determine what each person's wants are, and what his capacity is; and here you have at once the machinery of a tyranny as odious as the Inquisition and as blighting as the rule of Turkish pashas. In nearly every recent plan for the elevation of the laborer, one can, by a little scrutiny, discover some arrangement for "looking at the world as God looks at it," or, in other words, of setting those eminent philosophers and humanitarians, Brown and Smith, to administer "divine justice"—that is, to give everybody what Brown thinks his exact due, and get from everybody what Smith pronounces his precise duty, by the mere word of command; or, in other words, to do work which only the Creator is competent to do, and which, if it were desirable to have it done, we may be sure the Creator would have done long ago, without waiting for the formation of the International Association. If we are to have the nature of our labor and the extent of our income cut out for us by a Board of Control, pray what should we gain by having it composed of M. T. Boon, G. H. Buttery, Jules Johannard, and Walery Wroblewski, of the International, instead of A. T. Stewart, Moses Taylor, Tom Scott, and Jay Cooke? And if the possession and use of our accumulated wealth is now in bad hands, should we gain by handing it over every year to gentlemen who have thus far seldom succeeded in making a decent livelihood for themselves?

TABLE-TALK IN ENGLAND.

LONDON, December 1, 1871.

I FEAR that my present letter, if it is in any degree to reflect faithfully the condition of the ordinary English intellect, must be of a rather gossiping kind. No new topic attracts public attention, though a good many minor discussions of more or less interest are occupying (to use Lord Westbury's phrase) what we are pleased to call our minds. I will venture to refrain from any profound politico-philosophical discussion, and to ask your readers for once to imagine themselves placed at a London dinner-table, and to be listening to the conversation of a set of average guests. After the necessary tribute to the weather, which, during the last month, has out-Novembered the usual atrocities of an English November, they may be pretty sure that one subject will emerge above the confused hubbub of commonplaces. An animated discussion will take place as to the rights and wrongs of that endless trial which has just reached its fifty-fifth day, and which bids fair to have a run surpassing that of many successful plays. The opinions expressed will be of the most contradictory kind, half the company probably maintaining that the claimant to the Tichborne estates is obviously an impostor, and the other half maintaining as resolutely that he is establishing his identity beyond all cavil. It is a very pretty quarrel, on the rights of which I may not speak; though I will venture to say that it is generally remarked (I believe that the rumor is also contradicted) that the bonds upon which the claimant raised the necessary sinews of war have recently been rising in value. This controversy, however, is beyond my legitimate sphere, and I will only venture the confession that, idiotic as my conduct may be, I have wasted as much time in studying the aspects of the suit as would have sufficed for getting up the literature connected with Junius, with the Man in the Iron Mask, and half-a-dozen other so-called historical problems.

Probably, after a time, the conversation will change as the guests perceive it to be necessary to avoid so inflaming a topic, and the next question will most likely be the merits of Sir Charles Dilke. If a colonel, a conservative member of Parliament, or a royal chaplain should be of the party, I need not say that poor Sir Charles will be denounced in language such as an orthodox preacher would apply to Tom Paine, or such as Burke would have thought fit to characterize the French regicides. Indeed, as I have imagined the scene to be laid at a dinner-party, where people appear in dress-coats and white ties, I fear that the voice of condemnation will be pretty loud and unanimous. I ought to remark, in fairness, that, since I wrote last, Sir Charles has maintained that his language was misrepresented by the London papers, and that he did not found an argument for republicanism on the assertion that the Queen's salary was extravagant. However, his language was scarcely prudent on any showing, if he desires popularity with the tolerably well-dressed classes. The lower ranks of constituents seem to sympathize with him a good deal, and pass resolutions expressive of their approbation of his straightforward manliness, and so on. They have rather a more disagreeable mode occasionally of testifying their admiration, as most of the meetings, which he continues industriously to hold, result in something strongly resembling a free fight. Republicanism, indeed, in England, seems, if one may judge from such reports, to be in a state of rather boyish exhilaration. The discussions show more symptoms of sheer delight in a disturbance than of earnest revolutionary feeling. The most vivid account of any of the intended manifestations that I have seen describes how an orator, of more conservative tendencies than most of his audience, succeeded in making a great point by declaring that the main organ of republican principles in the country had only been kept alive by means of a raffle for a blanket. His declaration tricked the fancy of his hearers, who displayed, by a sort of good-humored laugh, noisy appreciation of the absurdity of the proceeding.

When Sir Charles Dilke has sufficiently exercised the talent for invective of the company, it is possible that conversation may turn upon the illness of the Prince of Wales. I hope that by the time this letter reaches you the illness may have taken a favorable turn, though we are not as yet relieved from all anxiety on the subject. If one may believe in the rather gushing eloquence of the Times, our anxiety must be keen indeed. That leader of respectable public opinion declares with abundant emphasis that we all rush every morning to the telegraph reports, and go about our business with spirits permanently elevated or depressed, in accordance with their favorable or unfavorable nature. I cannot say, to speak quite candidly, that I have observed this warmth of public feeling. Perhaps, if we may slightly modify Rochefoucauld, there is something not altogether unpleasing in the misfortunes of the most eminent public men. However that may be, there is, of course, a good deal of sympathy for the danger of a prince who, if he is not precisely a popular idol, is still fairly esteemed as princes go at the present day. Illogical as it may be, people are apt to assume that a royal personage in a fever feels a much greater pang than when a pauper dies. Everybody would be glad to hear that so highly-favored a career is not to be cut short prematurely; but it would not be right to say that we are in such an agony of suspense as is sometimes produced by the danger of a deeply-loved hero. And, somehow, it is rather odd to find a column devoted to the illness of the prince placed side by side with a column devoted to the disloyal eloquence of Sir C. Dilke and his supporters. As the conversation diverges from this topic, it may, perhaps, take a more general political turn. In that case, we may hear a discussion as to the reality of the Conservative reaction, which has been talked about any time these ten years. It is supposed to have been recently manifested in the return of Conservatives for Plymouth in place of the Liberal Sir R. Collier, who has been raised to the bench. Although certain local questions, and a dispute about the liquor trade, obscured the more general party issues, it cannot be denied that the election was indicative of divided counsels and diminished zeal on the part of Mr. Gladstone's supporters. The more recent election at Dover has resulted in the election of Sir G. Jessel, who has been appointed Solicitor-General, and who, as I may add in passing, is the first Jew who has ever occupied that distinguished position. The majority, however, was not great, and there were considerable secessions from both parties. The Conservative candidate was weak, and it is considered rather ungracious to oppose the re-election of a member whose seat has been vacated by appointment to office without some special reason. If the Conservative reaction is not strong at Dover, neither can it be said that the Liberal party showed any remarkable zeal. Probably the truth is that serious discontent with much of Mr. Gladstone's recent policy is combined, in the minds of many people, with an utter want of confidence in Mr. Disraeli, and thus the recent elections show rather a lukewarm loyalty to our accepted leaders than an absolute turn of the tide.

A quaint illustration of this feeling has been recently exhibited at the Scotch universities. It is the custom here, as you probably know, for the students to elect annually some distinguished man to the honorary post of Lord Rector. Mr. Mill, for example, Mr. Froude, and Mr. Carlyle have recently received that honor, and each of them delivered an able address on the occasion. In the present case, the Conservatives boast of having won a triumph. Sir W. Stirling Maxwell—a man whom Scotch students might properly delight to honor on many other grounds besides his Conservatism—was elected in preference to Sir Roundell Palmer at Edinburgh. Mr. Disraeli was elected by a very large majority over Mr. Ruskin at Glasgow, whilst Mr. Ruskin had a recompense by receiving the votes of the students at St. Andrews. It would be absurd to reckon these results as any serious indication of the popular feeling in Scotland. The students are for the most part very young men, and have the amiable enthusiasm of youth in favor of any one of great political or literary reputation. Even if the result really indicates that just now there is a Conservative tendency among these very excellent young men, it does not follow that any corresponding change is taking place in the country at large; and, after all, it is rather difficult to discover what precise meaning, political or otherwise, is to be attached to the fact that amongst a certain number of Scotchmen, of the average age of nineteen, Mr. Disraeli is preferred to Mr. Ruskin as the deliverer of an address. Mr. Disraeli's Conservatism is of a curious shade, and Mr. Ruskin is, I imagine, the one member of his party. Perhaps it is more worth noticing that Mr. Herbert Spencer would apparently have been elected at St. Andrews had he consented to stand. It is, at least, some proof that his reputation is spreading amongst the rising generation. Meanwhile, it is pleasant to look forward to Mr. Disraeli's appearance in the character of a distributer of good counsels to ingenuous youth.

This old-fashioned ceremony reminds me that an illustration has recently been given of the manners and customs of our English undergraduates which is not altogether so satisfactory. The young gentlemen at Oxford made so disgraceful an exhibition of themselves at the last commemoration here, that the University has found it desirable to give leave for that time-honored ceremony to be held in future in some place to which they could not have access. A good deal of indignation has been expressed at the mode in which the flower of our rising generation disgraced themselves at this species of annual saturnalia. They had behaved recently rather after the manner of a well-known assembly, influenced by Alexander the Coppersmith, only that, instead of crying out for two hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," they yelled for about the same space, "Turn out the man with the red tie," and thereby considerably interfered with the dignity of an academical celebration. The fact is, that discipline has been allowed to become rather undesirably relaxed at the universities, which has been partly the cause, though rather perhaps the consequence, of the recent rage for muscular excellence. The simple-minded youth who consider eminence in rowing and cricket to be the first duties of an English citizen are apt to be over-boyish in their manners as in their minds. This tendency, which, I think, has been too severely condemned, and which has certainly been caricatured in some recent writings, has, nevertheless, been undoubtedly carried to an absurd and pernicious excess, and the need of some reform is very generally felt. I see, however, no reason to doubt that the necessary remedies will be applied, for, whatever the faults of our universities, they are certainly endeavoring with praiseworthy earnestness to raise the general standard of learning, and are showing more activity than has been displayed in recent times. Now that the question of tests has been got out of the way, we have a prospect of some more important practical reforms; but as that is a large question, and one which will not be settled in a day, I shall seek for some future opportunity of saying a few words on the subject.

Correspondence.

THE HIGH PRICE OF WOOL.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The falling off in the wool product of Ohio does not help Mr. Edward Atkinson's argument. That result is traceable chiefly to two causes: 1. The Government demand for woollens during the war had the tendency to make sheep-growing profitable, and we came to the close of the war with a very large increase of sheep. But this was true only of sheep. The war caused an enormous waste of horses, mules, hogs, beef cattle, etc. Your paper stated that our stock of these animals, in 1865, was not more than seventy (70) per cent. of what it would have been under the operation of the ordinary law of increase. Beef remained very high, wool decreased in value, and the raising of cattle became more profitable than the raising of sheep. 2. The Solons who framed the present tariff put a duty on fine wools almost prohibitory, but they omitted to put a duty on sheep-skins, and the wool-growers of Australia, the Cape, and Buenos Ayres killed their sheep and sent us the skins with the wool on. From this source, a large proportion of our supply of fine wool was derived for two or three years. This defect in the bill was remedied last January, since when, and only since when, the American wool-grower has had the benefit of the heavy duty, and wools are higher now than at any time since the war closed.

In the meantime, our supply of beef cattle is much increased, and it is not hazarding much to say that sheep-culture will largely increase under the stimulus of the present high prices. Sheep may not be grown so largely as formerly in Ohio. An appeal to the statistics of any one State is unfair, there are so many conditions which govern it. For instance, it is affirmed that sheep cannot be grown to profit in the older States, where land is worth $100 per acre or more. But we are having now a large increase of sheep-culture in our outlying States and Territories; and the capacity of Texas, California, New Mexico, and Colorado is almost boundless.

WOOL DEALER.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 4, 1871.

[The publication of this letter has been unavoidably delayed. During the early history of New England, when the "noble red man" was somewhat more common than at present, it was a general habit with a large class of persons who were not accustomed to reason very correctly concerning the relation of cause and effect, to attribute every extraordinary or untoward circumstance to the influence of the "pesky Ingin." If a cow was lost in the forest, the "Ingin" had made way with it; if the season was unusually dry or wet, the "Ingin" had either been burning the swamps or forests, or else he had not; and the occurrence of epidemics or pestilences was even set down not unfrequently to the same personal agency. The "Ingin" was dark in his person and mysterious in his doings, and therefore his connection with whatever was difficult to account for was to some minds conclusive. Now, what the "Ingin" once was to the common people of New England, the tariff has, under the inspiration of Mr. H. C. Carey, become to the people of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania. Its increase, with them, is the source of all national good; its absence, the source of all national evil. Mr. Carey even goes so far as to teach that the potato-rot, the squash-bugs, the canker-worms, the plum-curculio, and the gnats which prey upon our early radishes are all indirectly attributable to the tariff; and that we may not be accused of misrepresentation, we quote verbatim from one of Mr. Carey's recent articles. Speaking of agricultural commodities, he says: "Disease tends to disappear as population grows and a market is created near at hand." In proof of this, Mr. Carey might have referred to the potato-rot in Ireland, the disease among the silk-worms of France, the cattle plague of Germany, or the rust in celeries, but he does not; and again he says: "The man who has a market at his door finds both blight and insects banished from his land;" which is another mode of saying that vine-worms, squash-bugs, curculio, oïdium, and rust in celery and wheat do not occur in the neighborhood of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, but do in the remote interiors, in California or on the prairies of Kansas, and would not occur anywhere if we always had a sufficient tariff to create an adequate home market.

It seems to us that our correspondent in Philadelphia, when he attributes the rise in the price of wool to the increase of duty on sheep-skins, must have been somewhat indoctrinated with this local theory; but that, if he will take a review of all the facts concerned, he will soon undeceive himself. What are the facts?

1. An increased duty on sheep-skins went into effect last January, but there was no rise in wool until midsummer.

2. It would seem to need no argument to prove that, if the rise in wool was confined to the United States, the cause must be local; but that, if the increase occurred all over the world, and commenced first in places outside of the United States, the cause was in no way local, but general. Now, the rise in wool commenced in Europe, has extended all over the world, and is experienced more fully to-day in Europe than it is in the United States. Our correspondent would have us believe that the increase of the duties on an importation of 20,000,000 pounds of fine wool on the skin into the United States has advanced the price of over one thousand millions of pounds of wool all over the world; the increase occurs, furthermore, some six months after the passage of the tariff in question, and notwithstanding the fact that as much fine wool has been imported since the increase of rate as there was for the corresponding months immediately previous to such increase. In short, the rise in wool which began in England in June and July last is clearly attributable to the following circumstance—that the demand for clothing, blankets, etc., consequent upon the Franco-German war swept the markets of Europe of certain descriptions of woollens, while French and German production was temporarily arrested. Wool did not rise until the conclusion of the war, and a demand to meet scarcity and renewed manufacturing in Europe was experienced. Concurrently with this increase of demand in Europe, the importations of wool from Buenos Ayres were almost wholly arrested by the prevalence of yellow fever in that port; and from the Cape of Good Hope, in a degree, by the stampede of laborers from the sheep-farms to the diamond diggings. The extreme drought of the summer of 1870 also resulted in a very great diminution of supply of the coarse wools from South Russia and adjacent countries. In the United States, the increase of price has been helped by the circumstance that the wool-clip of all the States east of the Mississippi for the year 1871 is estimated at from twenty to thirty per cent. less than it was the previous year; while the diminished consumption of manufacturers, which was comparatively small in 1870 by reason of the drought of that year, which prevented the mills from working, has been augmented this year to the extent of over thirty per cent. In the United States, up to the 1st of December, 1871, the increase in the imports of foreign wool were in excess of 40,000,000 pounds over the corresponding period of 1870, while the domestic consumption of wool in the same period is believed to be in excess of 55,000,000 pounds. That even this increase in domestic consumption of wool for manufacturing purposes is not due in any way to the tariff is conclusively proved by the fact that the wool manufacturing industry of England has experienced during the same time an equal or greater increase; the exports of manufactured woollens from Great Britain for the first ten months of 1871 having been 46,000,000 pounds, or 55 per cent. in excess of what it was during the first ten months of 1870, while the imports of foreign woollen manufactures into New York for the first ten months of 1871, in spite of the excessive tariff, amounted to $36,910,000, against $28,200,000 for the like period of 1870, a gain of 30 per cent.

We think, therefore, it would require something more than the proverbial acumen of a Philadelphia lawyer to trace out any legitimate connection between the increase of the duties on sheep-skins, and the movements during the past year in the prices of wool or the import and consumptions of woollens. Finally, in respect to Mr. Atkinson's statements, we have only this to say—that the staple argument used to justify the great increase of the duties on wool in 1866 was that the higher tariff would encourage domestic wool-growing, while the facts show that the number of sheep in the United States has been on the decrease ever since, and that the wool-clip of 1871 is the smallest we have had for many years.—ED. NATION.]

WAS IT "SERF" OR "CERF"?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the report of Mr. Wendell Phillips's lecture on the Labor Question, at Steinway Hall, on December 6, I find this passage: "It (modern civilization) is an encouraging advance from the time when a French noble came home from the west, 300 years ago, and warmed his feet, as the easiest way, in the blood of a peasant, without waiting for artificial fire," etc. This noble of the cold feet and his eviscerated peasant have stalked in company through literature altogether too long, and it is high time that they were finally disposed of. Was it not in the columns of the Nation that I some time ago saw exposed the ludicrous blunder through which "cerf" was converted into "serf," and the blood of a stag into that of a peasant? If this explanation was correct, the gentleman who discovered it, or who reproduced it, will certainly make an interesting contribution to the "Curiosities of Literature" if he will give a formal and final coup de grace to a ridiculous commonplace; let him tell Mr. Phillips and others where and with whom it originated, and whether in fraud or ignorance; who gave it currency; and, finally, who detected the counterfeit which half the world still continues to offer as good money.

Why should that noble have selected a peasant, when a pig would have served his turn twice as well?—I remain, etc.,

A. P. A.

[It has been thoroughly exposed in the Nation, and in many other places previously, but no exposure would prevent Mr. Phillips repeating it as often as it suited him.—ED. NATION.]

THE COMPOSITION OF THE GERMAN ARMIES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: During our late war, I remember that an account given in the Nation of the composition of the German armies raised the doubts of some readers whether the character of that army differed materially from that of all other soldiers. As a corroboration of what you then remarked, I beg to call your attention to some statistics recently made public by the Prussian Judiciary Department, in their official organ (Justizministerialblatt).

It appears that 2,571 members of the judiciary service, not professional soldiers, joined the Prussian army for the war. (This is exclusive of the contingents of Saxony, Mecklenburg, Brunswick, Hesse, and the southern states.) Of these 2,571 persons, 556 belonged to the judicial bench, 70 to the bar, 44 to the public prosecutions (Staatsanwaltschaft), 789 were "Referendare" (aspirants to judgeships, young men who, after having terminated their course of studies, and passed two examinations, are commissioned as assistant judges and secretaries), 885 secretaries, and 227 subordinate employees. Of these, 2,145 served in the ranks, 426 in the military administration, 948 were commissioned as officers, 41 as judge-advocates. 90 in all died in battle and from wounds (16 judges, 1 belonging to the public prosecutor's department, 12 assistant judges, 48 Referendare, 11 secretaries, 2 subordinate employees). Besides, 18 died from diseases. 383 have been decorated with the Iron Cross.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Johannes Rösing,
Consul-General of the German Empire.

2 Bowling Green, New York, Dec. 18, 1871.

Notes.

—Messrs. J. Sabin & Sons are about to publish a reproduction, by means of photo-lithography, of Du Bry's famous folio, "Hariot's Brief and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia, of the commodities, and of the nature and manners of the naturall inhabitants Discovered by the English Colony there seated by Sir Richard Greinuile, Knight, in the yeere 1585, at the special charge and direction of the Hon. Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, Lord Warden of the Stanneries, who therein hath been favoured and authorized by her Majestie and her letters patent: This fore book is made in English by Thomas Hariot, servant of the abovenamed Sir Walter, a member of the Colony, and there employed in discovering. Folio. Franckfort: Imprinted by Ihon Wechel, at Theodore Du Bry own cost and chardges, 1590."

"This edition," says Mr. Sabin's prospectus, "will be a reproduction, in exact fac-simile, of the rarest and most precious book relating to Virginia, and of which there are not more than half-a-dozen perfect copies in existence. These are in the British Museum and Bodleian libraries, and in the private collection of Mr. Lenox, Mr. Brown, Mr Christie-Miller, and Mr. George E. Mann. There is a very imperfect one in the library of Harvard College, and one wanting two leaves belonging to Sir Thomas Phillips. No complete copy in England is known to have been sold for less than £100 for the past hundred years, and we understand one has recently changed hands at double that sum, and probably will again, if the opportunity occurs. The last copy sold in this country brought $975. This reproduction has been executed by the newly-discovered process of photo-lithography. The imitation of the old-style type is perfect, and the seventy-six quaint and curious engravings by John White, the English painter, who, at the command of Queen Elizabeth, accompanied Sir Walter Raleigh in his famous expedition, are reproduced with marvellous accuracy."

—Another reprint, hardly less curious than "Hariot's Brief and True Report," is announced by Mr. J. W. Bouton, who will have ready for delivery in December "The Plays, Histories, and Novels of the ingenious Mrs. Aphra Behn. With Life and Memoir, 1724-35." The dramas will be contained in four volumes, the novels, etc., in two volumes. The six volumes are to be beautifully printed, and the portraits and plates of the now very scarce original edition are to be reproduced in fac-simile. It is very well that the works of Mrs. Aphra Behn should be reprinted, but, considering just what they are, it is also well that "only a small number of copies will be produced for subscribers." Leigh Hunt, in his entertaining miscellany, "Men, Women, and Books," gives us, in connection with some striking extracts from the ingenious lady's poems, the following estimate of her character and writings:

"Next comes Aphra herself, and we must say affects and makes us admire her beyond what we looked for. Her verses are natural and cordial, written in a masculine style, and yet womanly withal. If she had given us nothing but such poetry as this, she would have been as much admired and known among us all, to this day, as she consented to be among the rakes of her time. Her comedies, indeed, are alarming, and justly incurred the censure of Pope; though it is probable that a thoughtless good-humor made her pen run over, rather than real licentiousness, and that, although free enough in her life, she was not so 'extravagant and erring' as persons with less mind. It should be borne in mind by those who give an estimate of her character, that she passed her childhood among the planters of Surinam —no very good school for restraining or refining a lively temperament."

—The result of the sale of Mr. Alexander White's pictures which took place last week is, perhaps, worth noting. The prices brought were very high, and the gross receipts were over 91,000 dollars. As the Evening Mail, the only one of the city papers that published a full report of the sale, with the price of every picture, remarks, "this is beyond question the most successful picture sale ever held in this city"; and we should be glad if, with the Mail, we could attribute some of the high prices to a warm-hearted expression of sympathy for Mr. White on account of his business losses, but, with that explanation, what would become of the pictures that brought prices far below their merits? There were, as we said, very few poor pictures in the collection, but a more discriminating public would have made better distinctions than were made the other night. Some of the prices reached would have made people in Paris stare; these, for their bigness, 3,250 dollars shall we say, for any picture that Chaplin can paint; these, for their smallness; take the prices paid for the pictures by Zamacois, for example. It may be suspected that our wealthy picture-buyers, as a rule, have not got beyond a learned lesson of the mercantile value of certain names, have not sufficiently studied their decline and fall, nor trusted enough to the popular estimate. Everybody who has followed the trade side of art in this city, and in other great cities, too, knows very well that every now and then there is a rage for certain men's pictures—"they go off," to use the classic expression of the dealer, "like hot cakes;" sometimes, as in the case of Bougereau, for instance, the fortunate favorite cannot paint fast enough for the demand—but the result, in nine cases out of ten, is that he ends by painting too fast for the demand, and the public appetite is sated. There are many men who, once having hitched on to these stars, never know when to unhitch. In the end the profitable purchases are found to be those which have been founded on knowledge, taste, and judgment, not on fashion or the mere recommendation of dealers, as a rule the most ignorant of mankind with regard to the real value of works of art. To our thinking, the chief value of Mr. White's collection lay in its representative character, as a means of studying several important phases of art, and we expressed a wish, founded on this view of them, that they might be kept together and lodged in our new museum of the future. This was, of course, not a practicable wish, but it indicated our estimate of the collection. The art it represents is of a fashion that could not be permanent; it has nearly passed away with the time that made it, and Mr. White will have no follower who will try to bring together such another.

—The friendly biographer of the late John P. Kennedy—Mr. Henry T. Tuckerman—whose work we so lately reviewed, died suddenly on Sunday last, December 17, in his 59th year, of pneumonia. He was born in Boston, April 20, 1813, but was deprived of a college education in consequence of his delicate constitution, which he sought to strengthen by going abroad in 1833 and again in 1835. In these European experiences he attached himself especially to Italy and the Italians, and, first manifesting this predilection in his "Italian Sketch-Book" (1835), he ever after was distinguished for it, so much so that he is said to have received quite recently from the Italian Government a decoration conferring an order of nobility. Probably his foreign observation also led him to take a warm interest in art, to criticise the productions of American artists, and to write their biographies, for which he had unusual capacity, being fond of gossip, and having a fine memory. His "Artist Life, or Sketches of American Painters," published in 1847, was further carried out in 1867, by his "Book of the Artists," in reviewing which at the time we had occasion to say that its usefulness lay in its biographical more than in its critical portions, it being Mr. Tuckerman's good-natured belief that American art was as good as any nation's art, and that a painter was ex necessitate a blessing to his country, and therefore merited, in any mention of him and his works, much praise by way of encouragement. In literature, also, Mr. Tuckerman belonged pre-eminently to the genial and appreciative school of critics, who, as it happened, survived longer in New York than in his native city. He was the intimate and esteemed friend of Irving and the lesser lights of our Knickerbocker period, and for his personal amiability will doubtless be long remembered by his immediate friends and admirers. Kindness of heart, indeed, he had in a remarkable degree.

—Our readers not in the profession perhaps need to be told that it is the custom among journalists, on the establishment of a new paper, to give it a friendly notice. The new editor is probably an object of pity to such of his "brethren of the quill" as do not feel for him an unaffected indifference, or else a hearty disgust based upon his impudence in cutting into their circulation; but still the rule is to give him a cordial welcome, and wish his paper the success which it will no doubt merit. After the appearance of the second number, one shows him up in his true colors, both as a man and a politician, and exposes the want of enterprise which compels him to borrow from one's own columns, mistakes and all, items of news which our reporters sought with their accustomed energy and collected at a considerable expense. But the first number is almost invariably commended for its "neat dress," its well-filled department of local items, and its "spice," and is welcomed with the remark that there is plenty of room for a live paper in such and such a place, naming it, and that So-and-so, the conductor of the new journal, is a well-known newspaper-man and has had the required experience. "Almost invariably," we said, is this done; we think we should probably have said "invariably," if we had not recently seen this sample of the way of welcoming new-comers which is reported as in vogue among our fraternity in the West: "We are sorry to receive No. 1 of the Comanche County World. The World is badly printed, and has a sickly, poverty-stricken appearance. Mr. John Smith, its publisher, is an idiot, and 'the leading men' of Comanche County are 'responsible' for the foundation of this paper. They ought to be sent to the penitentiary. We trust that Mr. Smith will stop the publication of his paper and save his money." This can hardly be called justum bellum, we should say. Hostilities must set in; but in the general interest of the profession this kind of war-making is to be deprecated. So, too, is this, which may well enough go with the other, and which is in dead earnest. Mr. J. F. Meline having written a weighty—and here and there a little warm—reply to Mr. Froude's charges and arguments against Mary, Queen of Scots, Mr. Mitchell remarks that Mr. Meline's sympathy with Mary springs from creditable motives, while Mr. Froude's feeling is "an affected animosity springing from a mean desire to flatter the prevailing prejudice of the ruling faction, or from the still meaner desire to be made a baron," which last is certainly criticism of a queer sort.

—Mackenzie, Paternoster Row, has published, says the Builder, the first division of what will be, if well done, a useful book. This is "Examples of the Municipal, Commercial, and Street Architecture of France and Italy, from the Twelfth to the Fifteenth Century," drawn and measured by R. Anderson, architect, Edinburgh. More than one English architect has published his sketch-book of Continental travel; but, so far as our knowledge of them extends, though they contain many beautiful and many interesting things, they seldom give us what can be turned to practical account. Mr. Anderson's book promises something better. It is to contain records of town-halls, warehouses, shops, and dwelling-houses, and from so rich a mine there ought to come plenty of good metal. The drawings are to be made to a uniform scale—the plans 16 feet to the inch, the elevations 8 feet to the inch, and the details 2 feet to the inch. Sections of mouldings are to be given one-quarter full size. The first division, which is all that has as yet been published, contains specimens from Cluny, Cordes (Languedoc), Clermont, Montferrand, Siena, and Cremona. From France we hear of the following recent architectural and archæological publications: "Etudes sur la Construction de la Cathédrale de Troyes," by Léon Pigeotte; "Les Monumens Celtiques de l'Alsace," by Max de Ring; "Les Inscriptions Antiques de la Haute Savoie," by M. Véron.

—A pleasant article in a recent number of the Saturday Review has something to say about names and titles, especially such as authors have invented for their fictitious personages, and mentions with respect the nomenclature of Bunyan, Addison, Steele, Scott, Dickens, and Shakespeare. We are rather surprised that the writer has overlooked an author with whom it is not to be supposed he is unfamiliar, who, it has often struck us, is more than usually happy in this particular field of invention. We mean Thackeray, who has hardly a novel in which he does not well exemplify that excellence in the devising of names for fictitious personages which consists in giving them names at once plausibly resembling real names in ordinary use, and also expressive of the meaning desired to be conveyed. Bunyan's success—to take the case of a very successful nomenclature—is not of this double kind. Very effective indeed are his "Mr. By-Ends," "Mr. Greatheart," "My Lord Time-Server," "Mr. Timorous," "Mr. Much Afraid," "Master Worldly Wiseman," "Giant Despair, with his Castle Doubting," "Mr. Pickthank," "The Hill Difficulty," "The Slough of Despond," and "Vanity Fair." The praise of plausibility, however, is not given to such nomenclature, whatever higher praise belongs to it. Or take the dramatists, with their "Sir John Brute" for a low-minded, bullying man who misused his wife, and their "Mr. Surly," and "Mr. Lovegold," and "Mirabel," when a name is to be found for a surly man, and a miserly man, and a gay man of wit and fashion. Descriptive these names are, but certainly no more than Bunyan's are they plausible, like reality; and though they are to be permitted the playwright, because the stage must in many things be permitted to put very high heels on the cothurnus, to speak metaphorically, yet of the novelist or other writer who makes names for satirical or humorous purposes, a more delicate and less obvious descriptiveness or suggestiveness is rightly demanded. We do not say that Thackeray does not often appear to us to fail in this respect, for we think he often does; he had not admired Addison and Fielding, and the literature of their age, for nothing, as we all know when we enjoy his humor and fun and satire and kindliness and shrewd analysis; and among other things that remind us of his converse with the British Augustans are some of his names, which, as far as concerns the uniting of plausibility with descriptiveness, are not different from Addison's "Fanny Fickle" and "William Wiseacre," or Farquhar's "Lady Bountiful," or Fielding's "Mr. Heartfree."

—But some are a great deal better than these, and it is often remarkable how much of suggestion he will contrive to get into names that look pretty much as if they might be in the directory—where, to be sure, they would not be without some congenial company. Major Pendennis we believe it is that makes up a quarrel between two ladies who have fought each other for years, and apparently with rancor, if we may infer clapperclawing from their names: they were Lady Clapperton and her daughter, Lady Claudia. Then there is Lady Clara Pulleyn, the poor little chicken-hearted daughter of the Earl of Dorking, whose fate it is to marry Sir Barnes Newcome. The Newcomes themselves are newly come into the baronetage, and have plenty of poor relations below them, and good enemies and poor friends above them. Dr. Portman, the old-fashioned parson down at Fair Oaks, and the friend of Mrs. Pendennis and Laura, has a name reminding one of the days when portly old clerical gentlemen drank the wine of "our most ancient and most faithful ally," and died without the sight, or the thought for that matter, of Mr. Gladstone and light French wines. It is Sir Charles Mirabel, "always a theatrical man," as Major Pendennis explains to his nephew, who falls in love with The Fotheringay, Pen.'s old flame, and weds her. Gawler is the bitter and bilious lodging-house keeper whose gorge rises whenever he sees a new boarder at Miss Honeyman's house, across the way; and Miss Honeyman's brother is the Reverend Charles Honeyman, the popular and soothing preacher for ladies. Sergeant Rowland and Mr. Oliver, Q.C., are the opposing barristers in the suit in which Sir Barnes Newcome is libellant and big Belsize is co-respondent. Then there is Mademoiselle Petitot, the danseuse; and the eminent Scotch divine, Rev. Saunders McNitre; and Dr. Gulp, whose chariot stands before the door of Miss Molly Grubb; and that loose fish, Captain Raff, M.P., the honorable member for Epsom, who has to levant from his betting debts, and who is described as having retired from his seat just after the Goodwood races and "taken a mission to the Levant"; and Becky Crawley, née Sharp; and the Tredyddlum and Polwheedle Coppermine Company; and Coventry Island, to which one and another undesirable gentleman is sent as governor, and whence we get news, by H. M. S. Yellow Jack, that Sir Thomas Liverseege is dead of bilious fever; and Mrs. Slack Roper; and Lady Jane Sheepshanks, daughter of the Earl of Southdown, of Southdown and Trottermore Castle; young Goodwin Sands, Lord Tenterden's son; and Mr. Bows, the old fiddler; and the much maculate Lord Steyne; and the "horsey" Captain Glanders and Captain Skewball; and Dr. Birch "and his young friends" of Swishington; and Madame de la Cruchecassée; and General Sir George Tufto; and old Hawkshaw, who coughed so intolerably; and "that irreclaimable old bore, Jawkins"; and the Reverend Silas Hornblower, the evangelical missionary who was tattooed in the South Sea Islands; and Mr. Bowls, the butler; and Mr. Pestler, the apothecary, with his assistant, Mr. Linton; and old Colonel Livermore, "of the Bombay Army"; young Hooper, the wine merchant; Sir Thomas Coffin, a hanging judge; Colonel Gripley, who always seizes the newspapers at the club; Burke, Thurtell, and Hayes, of Thavies Inn, the legal gentlemen who managed Becky Sharpe's case against the insurance company when she demanded the amount of Jos. Sedley's policy after nursing him through the illness which resulted in his death; "that horrid Grindley the dentist"; young Lord Cubley, who is brought home from abroad to Fitzurse Castle; Mrs. Rougemont, the actress; Tiler and Feltham, the hatters; and many more. There are still others of Thackeray's names, not meant to be expressive of any particular trait or circumstance, but used as names are used in real life, which might, we think, be praised for a general expressiveness and appropriateness; as, for example, Beatrix, for the wilful beauty in "Esmond." But this is a region where, decidedly, tastes differ, and may be allowed to differ; and, moreover, the subject is too wide for consideration here, and a long essay might be given to each of its branches.

—We learn from the Academy that an artistic curiosity of great value has lately come to light in Vienna. It is a complete set of wooden chessmen, richly carved and full of character, by no less a master than Dürer. The work is in perfect preservation, and its genuineness, according to the Augsburg Gazette, can scarcely be doubted, as it has been for centuries in the possession of the same family which, though of late resident in Austria, came originally from Nuremberg, and possessed, besides this work, a large oil portrait by Lucas Cranach of a city notable, their relative.

— The Florentine journal, Nuova Italia, notes with pleasure that a street in London has been named after Dante. It asserts, says Nature, that this is the first time any public place or thoroughfare out of Italy has been so named. The "Dante Road" is the stretch of wide road between Newington Butts and Westminster Bridge. Dr. Barlow, the Dantophilist, who formerly owned the ground occupied by the new road, petitioned the Commissioners of Public Works to name it after Dante, and they have obligingly consented. But would it not have been as well to have honored first Dante's great English contemporary, Chaucer, who, so far as we know, has no memorial in brass or marble in England? Over his monument in Westminster there is, indeed, a memorial stained-glass window, on which we may be sure that Chaucer, with his fine sense of color and his exquisite feeling in architecture, would not look with any pleasure; but the monument itself is without statue or inscription. Indeed, an American visitor to the Abbey about ten years ago was enabled to supplement the shilling exacted by the verger for telling his tale, by the item of the whereabouts of Chaucer's burial-place. In default of other monument there is, however, the "Chaucer Society." Is there a "Dante Society" in Italy?

TWO HISTORICAL ESSAYISTS.*

No. II.—MR. FREEMAN.

"We undertook in a former essay," writes Mr. Freeman, "to show that Louis Napoleon Bonaparte was not the successor of Charles the Great. We now assert with equal confidence that Francis Joseph of Lorraine is just as little a successor of the Saxon Ottos or the Swabian Fredericks." This sentence is highly characteristic of Mr. Freeman, for it shows that he himself considers the main object of a long historical essay on "The Franks and the Gauls" to be the exposure of false claims put forward by Louis Napoleon, and the main aim of a most interesting essay on "Frederick the First, King of Italy" to be the exposure of equally false claims put forward in behalf of the Emperor of Austria; and Mr. Freeman is perfectly right in his own estimate of his "Historical Essays," for though he is (what Mr. Froude is not) a genuine historian, he, like Mr. Froude, is a born controversialist, and throughout his recent volume, filled though it is with valuable historical matter, appears in a controversial character. We shall therefore consider Mr. Freeman in this article chiefly as what may be termed an historical controversialist—that is, as an author who, though writing history, and good history, writes it for the sake of enforcing certain views or opinions. It is quite true that to some of Mr. Freeman's great merits justice cannot be rendered when he is viewed as a sort of intellectual pugilist, ready to hold the ring against all comers in behalf of certain theories, but it is also true that he has, as a controversialist, some very strong points which do not admit of being fully exhibited in his greater historical works.

Mr. Freeman's great merit and, we must add, great peculiarity is that he carries on controversy, whether he is discussing the right of foxes to live or of Edward the First to invade Scotland, by means of direct tangible arguments, which are not always convincing, but can at least always be either attended to or distinctly controverted. If, as pleaders tell us, "when one man asserts and another denies, then issue is said to be joined," Mr. Freeman is one of those rare but satisfactory writers with whom, if one can do nothing else, one can always join issue. Some of our readers, indeed, may think it strange that we term the fact of Mr. Freeman conducting his controversies by means of argument not only a merit, but a peculiarity; but we are fully justified in the use of this term, for controversy nowadays is carried on not by the use of definite reasons on one side or the other, but by more or less concealed appeals to sympathy or sentiment. Take, for example, Dr. Newman's "Apologia," or his even more interesting novel, "Loss and Gain." No one will dispute that these books stand, each in their way, among the most brilliant controversial writings which the present age has produced; but the author himself would hardly deny that they are not, and are not meant to be, argumentative treatises, assigning the reasons why a rational man should become a Roman Catholic. They are avowedly not statements of the arguments which bring intellectual conviction, but elaborate descriptions and indirect vindications of the feelings which actually lead an Anglican to join the Church of Rome. Take again the mode in which Carlyle, Froude, or Ruskin deals with political economy. To assert that these writers argued against economical doctrines would be to insult their understandings, for it is certain that both Mr. Carlyle and Mr. Froude know what an argument is, and deliberately assault political economists not by force of reasoning, but by appeals to the feelings. Now, for producing immediate results, we fully believe that what may be termed sentimental controversy is a far more effective weapon than argumentative controversy. Mr. Carlyle, for instance, has done more to discredit political economists by constantly terming them "professors of the dismal science," than he could have effected by the most elaborate argument against the positions of Malthus or Ricardo. We, therefore, by no means wonder that sentimental rhetoric should be more usually employed in controversy than reasoning, but our full conviction that in America, no less than in England, sentimentality is gradually undermining love of truth, makes us distrust all writers, whatever their eminence, who appeal to feeling rather than reason, and inclines us to feel especial respect for an author who, like Mr. Freeman, may have prejudices enough, but invariably defends them not by declamation or rhetorical subtleties, but by the use of the best arguments which he can find.

Let any one take, as an example of Mr. Freeman's method, his essay on the "Relations between the Crowns of England and Scotland." We ourselves feel considerable difficulty in admitting all his conclusions, and find it difficult to believe that Edward the First, and even Edward the First's lawyers, could have given the extremely interesting and learned account of English claims on Scotland on which Mr. Freeman bases his moral defence of Edward's policy. We should like, for instance, to know from Mr. Freeman whether he thinks Edward would have known what was meant by an English Emperor, or Bretwoldd. Still, though we doubt the absolute soundness of Mr. Freeman's arguments, we cannot believe that the most bigoted Scotchman could read the essay without feeling it to be a piece of manly, sensible argument, quite different in character from the sort of rhetorical logic with which Mr. Froude justifies Henry's murders or Mr. Carlyle glorifies Cromwell's massacres; and though Mr. Freeman may lose some popular applause by his strict adherence to solid argument, he has his reward. We may not think that Edward knew all the facts which Mr. Freeman adduces in his defence, but it is impossible to read Mr. Freeman's version of the case without feeling that Edward had fair grounds which would have satisfied most statesmen for pushing what seemed to him valid claims. Indeed, Mr. Freeman, in his desire to argue fairly, scarcely seems to us to urge all that could be said in Edward's behalf. The intensely legal character of Edward's mind, as well as the legal character of the age, must have made it impossible for him or his counsellors to distinguish between claims defensible by the rules of special pleading and claims defensible by the rules of statesmanlike morality. The difficulty which Burke felt in drawing up "an indictment against a whole nation" is one which could never have occurred to an age whose highest morality was summed up in the king's motto, Pactum serva. Moreover, the grounds of expediency to be urged in favor of Edward's policy are at least as strong as those which have satisfied the consciences of statesmen in more civilized ages. Edward's scrupulosity might compare favorably enough with the scrupulosity of Bismarck or Bismarck's Emperor.

It is Mr. Freeman's great merit to rely on the power of argument in an age which delights in sentiment. It is also his great merit that he scarcely ever writes on any subject to which he has not devoted careful study; but neither of these virtues would have enabled him to fight the successful battles which he has fought against all historical wrong-doers, down from the heinous criminals who think Charlemagne was a Frenchman to the petty offenders who persist in using the term "Anglo-Saxon," unless he had possessed another peculiar quality. This quality is a faculty for repetition. Men of equal ability with Mr. Freeman, when once they have propounded their doctrines to an unheeding world, often feel it an absolutely unbearable task to repeat what they have already said until they have attracted the attention of what Austin calls "the vast confederacy of fools." Not so Mr. Freeman. In season and out of season, in book, in pamphlet, in review, in newspaper, he repeats and reiterates the truths of which he has seized hold. That Englishmen always have been Englishmen; that the Franks were not Gauls; that St. Thomas was never called A' Becket; that Louis Napoleon was a tyrant; that, for some reason to us unknown, it is a proud thing to be a Teuton and a discreditable thing to be a Celt; that Alsace used to be called "Elsass," and shall, thanks to Mr. Freeman and Prince Bismarck, be so called again; that "diocese" should not be spelt "diocess"—are propositions which, whether important or unimportant, true or untrue, Mr. Freeman and Mr. Freeman's friends force upon the attention of an ignorant and weary world. Mr. Freeman, in short, is a man who wields a sort of intellectual hammer, and who (as children say) "hammers and hammers and hammers" until he has forced his point upon even the most unwilling hearers. Now, we confess ourselves to a considerable admiration for the body of hammerers as long as the points which they hammer at are really good points; and, on the whole, on the questions for which Mr. Freeman fights, whether they be little or great, he is generally, so far as we can judge, on the side of truth and justice, and is almost entirely free from that delight in savage energy and high-handed oppression which marks the minor literary men of the present day. Mr. Freeman, indeed, gains a good deal by not only being a humane man and a just man, but also an antiquarian. Coming to the study of history from the study of antiquities, he has seized more clearly than any other historical writer of the day the all-important truth that the investigation of history is, call it by whatever names you will, merely the investigation into evidence, and that the duty of a historian is not to say fine things about the philosophy of history, but to investigate into the evidence of the facts on which such philosophy, if worth the paper on which it is expounded, must rest. This truth lies at the very foundation of historical research. Its importance vindicates the stress which Mr. Freeman lays upon minute accuracy, and to have seized this truth and held fast to it in the midst of an unbelieving world, is Mr. Freeman's great claim to the reputation which he already possesses, and which will, we conceive, ultimately increase on both sides the Atlantic.

* "Historical Essays. By Edward A. Freeman, M.A., Hon. D.C.L., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford." New York: Macmillan. 1871.

Mr. Freeman owes much to his antiquarianism; but a man's strong point is almost always his weak point, and Mr. Freeman is no exception to this rule. As an antiquarian, he fully realizes the importance of small details and minute accuracy; but he constantly fails to see that small things are small, and that a historian, or even an historical controversialist, ought to have some other virtues than accuracy in order to sustain his part. The essay, for instance, on St. Thomas of Canterbury is one of the best parts of Mr. Freeman's book. It gives, certainly, much curious information, and contains, also, an estimate of Thomas which is not only just, but much more subtle than Mr. Freeman's estimates of character often are. The dictum that the saint's conversion, "though perfectly sincere, was still artificial—his saintship never sate quite easily upon him—with the zeal of a new convert he overdid matters," paints not only the character of Thomas, but of a large number of religious men who are at bottom secular-minded. But this admirable essay is defaced by defects which constantly mar the author's works. He expends an infinity of trouble to show that the Saint was never called A' Becket. No doubt Mr. Freeman is right. His error is to think that it matters much whether we call the archbishop A' Becket or Thomas. Mr. Freeman again justly criticises writers who judge of Thomas with reference to the controversies between Catholics and Protestants. But though here again Mr. Freeman is technically in the right, he appears to us himself to have fallen into an error. No doubt, in judging the moral character of the archbishop and the king, it is a fatal error to judge as Protestants or as Roman Catholics; but, on the other hand, it is impossible in forming our estimate of the men of the Middle Ages to shut out of view the tendencies of the principles which they advocated. If Protestantism is right, it is impossible not to sympathize with men who unconsciously acted upon the view of life of which Protestantism is the outcome. If Protestantism be a mistake, it is impossible not to sympathize with men like Thomas who opposed this error in its earliest form. Mr. Freeman would, perhaps, say that he is an historian of the Middle Ages, and has nothing to do with Protestantism or any view of life or history. What we maintain is, that Mr. Freeman's great defect lies in the fact that he strives, and strives in vain, to avoid all general views of history. You cannot do this for the simple reason that such views are in many cases the expression of truths, and the mere attempt to do it dwarfs a historian into an antiquary. Mr. Freeman has done much to make history accurate. One cannot but hope that he will ultimately shake off the trammels of antiquarianism, and do something to make history philosophic. Meanwhile, his "Historical Essays" will do much to dispel vulgar errors, and so prepare the way for a true and philosophic view of history.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.*

III.

"STORIES FROM OLD ENGLISH POETRY" is a title which has so good a sound that people who read old English poetry or people who, without being poetry readers, know the story of Perdita and Hermione, of Miranda, Ferdinand, and Prospero, of Cordelia and Lear, of Griselda, of Macbeth, of Orlando, and old Adam and Rosalind, may easily come to this book of Mrs. Richardson's expecting more of pleasure than it will give them. Something of the kind happened in our case, we think, and perhaps made us form a lower opinion of the work than we otherwise might. Reconsidering the matter, we believe that while we cannot commend it much, we need not discommend it altogether. Its principal positive fault appears to be that there is rather too full and strong a dose of love and love-making to fit it particularly well for the children, though perhaps it may be grateful to the palates of persons who are at that stage of life called hobbledehoyism, or, in girls, "where the brook and river meet," as Mr. Longfellow says, "womanhood and childhood sweet." "Campaspe and the Painter," for example, is sweet. Alexander having ordered the captive Campaspe into court for inspection, that unlearned Theban, paying no attention to "the dignified" Aristotle, nor to Hephæstion, the wise counsellor, nor much to Alexander himself, gives her eyes and heart to another personage; "the beauty of his attitude, the full white throat which his silken tunic left half bare, the short curling rings of hair on his well-poised head, the eyes that shone with the light of genius, all made him more resemble the god Apollo, to the eyes of the simple maiden, than any earth-born man." This was Apelles. Campaspe, on her part, inspires an equal flame in the painter's heart: "Ah! Campaspe," he soliloquizes, "beautiful Campaspe! Would that thou knewest how dear thou hast become to me! So dear that to part with thy picture were worse than death, unless I could have thyself in exchange." Just at this point he is startled by Campaspe's entrance. "The sight of the maiden almost dazzled his eyes and took away his breath. The color in her cheeks was deepened into a richer carnation than he had ever seen them wear. Her eyes overflowed with a look at once so tender and appealing that the glance sank deep into his heart." As Strappan (Strephon), the Port Royal negro, said to Mr. Sumner: "Arter you lub you lub, you know, boss. You can't broke lub. Man hab to be bery smart for broke lub. He can't move lus dan you burn him. Hab to kill all two arter he lub 'fo' you broke lub." This truth Alexander also discovered: "And you, Campaspe," says the angered monarch, "turning to where she sat tremblingly watching the interview, Do you love Apelles? The maiden turned red and pale by turns. But looking at Apelles, who stood gazing at her as if his soul's fate hung on her answer, she said in a clear voice, I love Apelles."

A good deal of this kind of matter and manner the adult reader finds in Mrs. Richardson's book—more than he will find edifying; and we mistrust its capacity for edifying the boys and girls. Why, for instance, need the story of Cordelia and Lear, as told for children, have Edmund in it at all, or any of the loves of Goneril and Regan? We see no need at all. Not that Mrs. Richardson dwells at all on them, but she might better have kept them out. We like better the method of Charles and Mary Lamb in telling, say, the story of "As You Like It." We have not their book within reach, and it is a good many years since we read their version of "As You Like It," so we may be much mistaken in setting down our impression of it as the impression which was meant to be got. But if our memory serves us, their version differs from Mrs. Richardson's in this, that in hers there is too much of Rosalind, and Orlando, and Phœbe, while from theirs the childish reader gets a vivid impression of the goodness of the good duke, the faithfulness of Adam, the generosity of Orlando to his brother when he saves him from the serpent and the lion, the sincerity of Oliver's repentance, and that of the wicked duke, the happiness of the ending, and the pity of it that so delightful a life in the woods should ever come to an end. This difference in the impression produced by the two versions is all in favor of the Lambs and all against Mrs. Richardson and several other writers of literature for children who display to them the workings of the passion of love. Of course, in children's literature, as in any other, the princess may be in love with the prince, and Florizell, after he has rescued Snowwhite, may be allowed to marry, and live happy ever after; but while recognition of the obvious facts of life, of childhood's experience—children, too, having their loves and likings—is all in order, and right, and pretty, it is quite another thing to address or to cultivate the passions which underlie this social scheme into which, to be sure, children are born, but which they are to learn a part at a time. If Mrs. Richardson had kept this principle in view when she was selecting the stories she intended to narrate, she would have left out several of those before us. Of minor faults the book has a number. For example, children should not be taught nowadays that Shakespeare was "not popular in his own time," as the phrase goes; and there is, now and again, a little shakiness about our author's grammar and diction. Doubtless it is not saying too much to say that a collection of stories that have pleased all nations of men since the infancy of the world will be found agreeable reading by the boys of to-day, and we feel safe in recommending

* "Stories from Old English Poetry. By Abby Sage Richardson." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1871.
"The Fables of Pilpay. Revised Edition." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1872.
"American Wonderland. By Richard Meade Bache." Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1871.
"Picture Poems for Young Folks. By Marian Douglas. With Illustrations." Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co. 1872.
"The Country of the Dwarfs. By Paul Du Chaillu." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1872.
"A Tale of a Nest. By the author of 'Aunt Annie's Stories.' With Illustrations by Mrs. Hartland." New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. London: Seeley, Jackson & Halliday.
"The Judge's Pets. By E. Johnson. Illustrated by E. B. Bensell." New York: Hurd & Houghton.
"A Christmas Cake in Four Quarters. By Lady Barker, author of 'Stories About.'" London and New York: Macmillan & Co.
"Five Happy Children. Third of the Rosedale Books. By Mrs. D. P. Sanford, author of 'Under the Skylight, and Other Stories for Christmas.'" New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.
"The Cousin from India. A Book for Girls. By Georgiana M. Craik. With Illustrations." New York: Harper & Brothers.
"Moonshine. Fairy Stories by E. H. Knatchbull-Hugessen, M.P., author of 'Stories for My Children,' etc. Illustrated by William Brunton." London and New York: Macmillan & Co.

to parents who meditate giving away some books this work, and next to look at Messrs. Hurd & Houghton's edition of "The Fables of Pilpay." It is embellished with woodcuts of the fashion of 1813, pleasantly quaint, but spirited, and such as will momentarily renew the youth of some of the elderly purchasers of the volumes, and will show the children of to-day the sort of pictures that were made for their young grandfathers.

The three living poets who stand first in the popular regard of the English-speaking world have given us a volume apiece of poetry within the year, but we believe we are not afraid of saying that "Balaustion's Adventure," and "The Divine Tragedy," and "The Last Tournament," all together, might be exchanged without loss for Marian Douglas's little volume of verses for children, "Picture Poems for Young Folks." They are not all for young folks, however. As is apt to happen in such cases, some of them, which are about children, indeed, are about them rather than for them, and are not so much for them as for older persons. Some of them express, better than anything else, the belief, more or less prevalent among writers for children, that a main use of children is to afford opportunity for the lavishing of affectionate endearments upon them. They are made playthings. But doubtless the child, in its capacity of consumer of literature, may better be conceived of differently, though, perhaps, the mistake is not a serious one, or perhaps not a mistake at all, so long as the literature for children is really literature for an auditor partly made up of mother as well as child. Still, we do not see why these, for instance, which follow, are not stanzas that should be excluded from so pretty a collection of verses for the young as "Picture Poems" certainly is:

"Is the yellow-bird dead?
Lay your dear little head
Close, close to my heart, and weep, precious one, there,
While your beautiful hair
On my bosom lies bright as a sun-lighted cloud.
No, you need not keep still;
You may sob at your will;
There is some little comfort in crying aloud.

But the days they will come,
When your grief must be dumb;
Grown women, like me, must take care how we cry;
You will learn by-and-by
'Tis a womanly art to hide pain out of sight,
To look round with a smile,
Tho' your heart ache the while,
And to keep back your tears till you've blown out the light."

The first of these stanzas is one that we had in mind when we spoke of verses better as expressing affectionate goodness than for any other reason, while the second requires, we think, suppression. Unless, indeed, we permit so fond a friend of the children to be once in a while injudicious in speech before them. As we have quoted some verses that show Miss Douglas's book in a light not so favorable as it deserves, we will quote a little piece that is, perhaps, above her usual level of success, but still not so much above as the "Crying Aloud" is below it. It is called "Naming the Baby":

"You have birds in a cage, and you've beautiful flowers,
But you haven't at your house what we have at ours;
'Tis the prettiest thing that you ever did see,
Just as dear and as precious as precious can be;
'Tis my own baby sister, just seven days old,
And too little for any but grown folks to hold.
Oh! I know you would love her; she's fresh as a rose,
And she has such a queer, tiny bit of a nose,
And the dearest and loveliest pink little toes,
Which, I tell mother, seem only made to be kissed;
And she keeps her wee hand doubled up in a fist.
She is quite without hair, but she's beautiful eyes,
She always looks pretty, except when she cries.
And what name we shall give her there's no one can tell,
For my father says Sarah, and mother likes Belle;
And my great-uncle John—he's an old-fashioned man—
Wants her named for his wife that is dead, Mary Ann.
But the name I have chosen the darling to call
Is a name that is prettier far than them all;
And to give it to baby my heart is quite set—
It is Violet Martha Rose Stella Marzette."

This seems to us very successful, being good as portraiture and poetry, and as sure to please the little girl who shall read it as the little girl who figures in it is sure to please everybody. Very good, too, are "Little Molly," "Chicken Little's Duty," "Kitty," "The Cherry Pie," "The White Kitten," "If You Please," "The Garden Thief," and the one beginning:

"Among the thistles on the hill
In tears sat Little Sorrow."

Once in a while one wishes for a shade more of care on Miss Douglas's part to preserve the usually admirable simplicity and unliterary lifelikeness of her style. It is, for instance, a question why she should on the third page take "wintry," with its suggestion of the secondary meaning of the word, in place of the directer "winter." And the lines above quoted,

"While your beautiful hair
On my bosom lies bright as a sun-lighted cloud,"

are far from her better way of expressing herself. But in general, Miss Douglas merits gratitude for the pleasure which she gives, both by what she says and by her way of saying it, and we do our readers a favor in calling their attention to her book.

"In the Country of the Dwarfs" we have M. Paul Du Chaillu again, quite the same Paul that we have previously seen landing on the coast of Equatorial Africa, amid cries of "Chally, Chally," from negro tribes and transports of general joy. As formerly, Paul sets out magnificently equipped, to find the head-waters of the Nile, and whatever science, the courage which is known to the enemies of France, undying energy—the energy of demons—can do against fate is done; but, as formerly, the head-waters are not reached. A Commi man of Chally's escort unfortunately kills an Ashango man, the Ashangos attack the expeditionary force, and although Chally and the others fight like lions, they are compelled to abandon all their books, instruments, observations, and collections, and retrace their steps to the sea-coast. We rather think, however, that this "Country of the Dwarfs" is another of M. Du Chaillu's books made over and adapted to the juvenile mind, and is not a record of a second attempt; but, as we cannot say that we have kept track of our traveller of late years, we do not pretend to settle the question. The boys will find themselves amused, and though their companion's opinion of himself need not be taken without any allowance, they will find themselves, when with M. Du Chaillu, not in bad company.

"A Tale of a Nest" is a nice little story, particularly for the purpose intended, which was to divert a little girl about seven years old from excessive reading of fairy tales. It describes the marriage of a couple of young chaffinches, their nest-building, and their trials and joys in bringing up their first family. The character of each kind of bird—for most of the other common English birds are introduced—is delineated in the dialogues, and their most observable habits make the events of the narrative. It is not a bad field for imaginative children to exercise their wits in, and in the more literal sort it is well to create a kind of personal interest in dumb things, which, in its turn, makes sympathy and gentleness. The least satisfactory point of such stories is in dealing with the frequent harrowing slaughters obliged to take place among the fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters of these families, that are represented as having human affections and human capabilities of suffering. Of course, there must be an immense discrepancy somewhere, the effect of which might be either to unduly excite or to harden the child, according to its bent in the beginning. It is possible that this caution may be overnice, but we do not speak without experience of the need of it. Here is a bit to illustrate the kind of difficulty alluded to. The mother chaffinch is quite frantic over the loss of her eldest son, just carried off by a hawk. The brothers and sisters crowd around their parents all trembling and horrified:

"'Father,' enquired the younger brother timidly, 'has the hawk eaten him up by this time, do you think?' And the mother answers, 'You will kill me, children!'"

For the rest, the language of the book is rather in advance of the ideas, and some useless episodes must be called padding.

Of all the small children who carry about an unceasing demand for "another story," we should think the most unappeasable might receive a temporary quietus by reading or having read to him "The Judge's Pets." The sensations with which we laid down this book were that we had always been reading "The Judge's Pets," and that there never were so many pets before, or so many things happening to so many pets. The volume is a small one, yet the amount of mild statistics it contains seems surprising. There is an even flow of innocent facts from beginning to end that gives an adult a profound sense of satiety. This effect is partly produced by the lack of a good chronological order. A pet dies or is disposed of, and you think you have got through with him, when he turns up again a few pages on to play a fresh trick. The children grow up pretty steadily—there are six of them, and they are included among the pets—but even they have relapses into younger periods. The minute details of each anecdote, and the occasional repetitiousness which weary the grown reader, will probably be the very opposite of distasteful to a child, however. "The mother brought him everything he could possibly need, to put into his new trunk, because she wished him to have all the clothes he would want till he came home again." And then follows an inventory of George's boarding-school outfit. There is also mention made of a fawn which "was of a beautiful fawn color." Still, these are small defects, and, overlooking the trivialness of the manner, there is really much to praise. As a book about animals, it is gentle and humane enough to be read in Mr. Bergh's own nursery, if he has one. It is not a good, stupid book either, but has some fresh and lively stories in it. In short, it would be a good Christmas present for a little boy—much better than a drum.

It would doubtless be a marvel to any young person from the age of four upwards, how any one, having read a volume of Lady Barker's delightful stories, could ever refer to it with anything but unbounded praise and gratitude. Indeed, a story-teller with her advantages does not often appear before the public. The first and greatest of these, it must be said, is in the material she has to draw upon. She has passed her life in England, Jamaica, the East Indies, and New Zealand, and in all these places she has enjoyed the opportunities of a good social position, for seeing whatever might be seen by a lady. In the East, she travelled with an army of 10,000 on a tour of inspection, from Lucknow to the Punjaub. This episode furnished some good matter for "Stories About," and the present volume gives still further interesting accounts of it. About New Zealand we have sheep stories, and about Jamaica a description of a "Johnny Canoe"—a curious festival among the negroes—and other out-of-the-way things. The plan of the book—not easily guessed from its title—is to describe a Christmas spent in each of the four quarters of the globe just mentioned; not the Christmases characteristic of those places particularly, but four special occasions of which the author was part. After the interest of what she has to communicate, Lady Barker's narratives possess the merits of vivacity, simplicity, good-breeding, and humorousness. Her sympathies with hunters and animals—exhibited not so strongly in this book as the one of last year, however—will make her popular with boys to a degree not common with lady story-tellers. The only stories with which she fails to succeed are the ones repeated at second-hand. Of these the most notable is the ghost story at the beginning. The plan of it is so easily discernible as to need no assurance that it is a true story. There is not the first smack of horror about it; while the working-up is exaggerated, and the characters all so weak as to awaken no interest.

Although there is an occasional sad history in the book, it is pleasant to see that it is not disfigured by any genuine story of horror, such as the murdering of the child in Jamaica, by putting it into an anthill, which almost spoiled the admirable volume of last year. On the whole, Lady Barker's tales must be judged a great success. Parents may readily approve, while the children will be absorbed admirers of them. The compliment paid to America is so heartily as well as gracefully done that it must certainly do its part towards increasing the affectionate international regard between young English and American readers.

The "Five Happy Children" are from seven years of age down to a baby of a few months. Exactly what age the reader of their doings is expected to be it is not so easy to say. The story is all told in one or two-syllable words, the one-syllable being generally simple, and the double ones divided by a hyphen. It would seem as if a child with intelligence enough to read so far would demand a little more pabulum for his pains. To be delighted with the exceedingly tame events that make up the life of Rose, Ned, and the rest, one would have to imagine him quite without any interest in his own daily life, or else cut off from every magazine, from the Nursery upwards, and from the countless better books that flood the public every Christmas. But if, intellectually, the story is beneath the notice of a five-year-old, morally it is a dozen or more years beyond him. At what age do children plead to be allowed to go to church twice a day, and are only restrained from "pouting" thereat because they feel that such a course would be wicked? And when is it that they pray to the Lord Jesus to help them bear the pain of having their teeth out, in remembrance of the sufferings of the early Christian martyrs, and rebuke the little girl who says she wishes they could have gone to her dentist who gives laughing-gas?

The publishers preface their series of "Books for Girls, by the Author of 'John Halifax, Gentleman,' and Others," with that author's "Address" to the public, in which she speaks of the great want felt for books peculiarly for girls, "that can give them, at the most impressible age, a true impression of what life is and what it may be made." We presume that this intention, therefore, is to be borne in mind by each writer who contributes to the series, and the success in carrying it out taken into account by the reader. The cousin from India is a little girl of nine years old or so, who, having been entirely left to the care of Indian servants, has grown up to her present age in a state of complete moral darkness; she is an adept in deceit and malicious mischief. At the opening of the story, she comes to live with her English cousins, three simple-minded, purely-brought-up children, about her own age. Effie is a very clever child, the English children only moderately bright. The course of the story shows the growth of the bad influence over the good, until it is checked by a dreadful accident, followed by the death of one of the little boys. As a story to enchain the attention and cause torrents of tears to fall from the eyes of little girls with any kind of sensibility, it is completely successful; it is full of invention and interest, and the good and the bad are painted in such strong colors that what to detest and what to commend is never left in doubt. So far, so good. When one comes to the faults, they are found to be equally strong, and are, to our mind, these: (1) It is not a credible story of any children; (2) it is not a child's book at all. For the first, although bad children do often obtain a singular influence over good ones, they do not acquire it instantaneously or with such impossible ease as attended this case. The Leighton children are devotedly attached to their mother, who is their companion and confidante, yet they never tell her anything of the monstrous pranks of their new cousin, even in the beginning; nor is her attention arrested by such unusual circumstances as the breaking of a whole set of valuable china or the setting fire to the drawing-room curtains. She is said to be a good mother, but she appears either a culpably indifferent or else a very stupid one. The second defect, however, is the more important one. The "Cousin from India" is, in spite of its childish incidents and characters, treated in the style of a full-grown novel. There are telling "scenes," well-known devices for working on the feelings, no end of "passion" and "passionate" grief and words and thoughts; "great eyes," "great gasps," "great sobs," etc.

The moral progress of the story is made by simple statements at necessary points. The sentimental progress is developed and elaborated with an artist's care. How it was that Effie's reform was begun by Davie's death, which affected her heart through her imagination, can perhaps be understood by parents; but what possible light is shed on the simple matters of sinfulness and repentance and amendment to the minds of children by this tragical process is hard to see. To illustrate what we mean, the description of Effie in grief is very thorough; how she sobbed "in her passionate, blind way," and how she went to lonely rooms, and, in general, how she bore herself. At this crisis her good aunt seeks her and speaks "good and wise words to her," which at last reach the obdurate heart. "I think I should spoil these wise and true words if I were to try to write them down," then observes Miss Craik, as if her duty was done; and we agree with her. Her forte is in painting appearances, and not in pointing out the unseen courses of moral and spiritual regeneration and growth.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's preface to his "Moonshine" this year roars even more gently than that for "Crackers for Christmas" last year. At that time he protested against being called upon to portray ogres as "living upon strawberries and cream," or being any other than their well-known hideous and terrible selves; still he promised to be as careful about making any one's hair stand on end as the positive needs of the story would allow. Now, he confesses, in rather an injured tone, that the reviews have still been hard on him, and reluctantly implies that he will try to improve. We readily count ourselves among the "dull" people who considered the improvement called for, and, admitting all the progress which has been made in the present volume, still think that there is room for more in the same direction. "Robin-a-Bobbin-a-Bilberry Ben" is, perhaps, as moderate an ogre story as a real ogre-lover would consent to make, there being in it none of the disgusting descriptions of fattening children, punching them in the sides to see how much flesh they were gaining, etc., that we were treated to in "Crackers for Christmas," and rather more humor, such as it is; but we should not be sorry to see the Ogre pass at once and for ever out of juvenile literature. Mr. Hugessen insists that he possesses an allegorical value, which, though true enough when John Bunyan had him in hand, is a feeble excuse for painting a hideous monster in the most revolting details, and bringing him to grief by magical incantations instead of somebody's bravery, moral or physical. There is a curious struggle at the end of each of Mr. Hugessen's stories to extract some kind of moral or religious pointing from the preceding wild and ingenious mixture of elves, speaking animals, dwarfs, etc., which contrasts oddly with the reckless determination visible throughout the whole narrative, up to its final paragraph, to tell an old-fashioned, genuine, out-and-out fairy story, in spite of what any one may say. The horrible dwarf Grindmash, who has been destroying the rabbits of the beautiful Fern Fairy's dominions, is finally brought to his knees and begs her for giveness. The lovely fairy orders a score of rabbits to beat him with nettles. This they do until he is almost dead, when she packs him off" with bitter and insulting words," and he goes alone to doctor his wounds. After that every thing prospers in the domain of the Fern Fairy. "Cruelty and oppression she abhors, whether exercised on man or beast. . . . So, if you want to be helped by the dear Fern Fairy, be loving and innocent and kind and gentle to each other and the animals which are about you. Ay, and you have a better reason than this to make you gentle and kind. We need not wonder and question whether there are fairies or not; we know there is one great Holy Being," etc., etc. This is, perhaps, not quite so delightfully inconsequent as the ending to one of his last year's most hideous ogre stories, which is worth giving as an illustration of the curious streak of sentimentality—we had almost said superstition—which seems to find a safety in holding up the cross to exorcise the spirits he has called up: "And if you want to know any more, you must go down to the shore yourselves and ask the mermaids. Perhaps they will answer you in their sweet and tender strains, and tell you all you want to know. Perhaps not. But anyhow, you will hear the murmur of the waves as they break for ever and for ever upon that lonely shore; and if you stand close down by them, and look out over the sea, and think and listen, and try to understand what they say, you will learn and know that they are ever speaking of the might of Him who made both him and you, and remind you that Time is creeping on and on," etc., etc. In the present volume, "The Wizard of Bockhanger" is a fine old story, which may be praised without cavil; "Potter's Gift" and "Mulligatawny" are entertaining and funny, while "The Boy and the Birds" turns out so gently as hardly to seem like our author's. Mr. Hugessen knows how to be so interesting that it is to be hoped that the reviews will scold him into still further refinement; not abandoning his precious old-fashioned properties, which the children would think a spoiling of good fun quite as much as he, but substituting a little more valor for so much magic, and giving up altogether the gross and coarse details of the bloody parts of the stories. To ask him to write for boys and not be bloody at all, would, perhaps, be equivalent to asking him to cease to be an English story-teller.

The History of the Parochial Chapelry of Goosnargh, in the County of Lancaster. By Henry Fishwick, F.H.S. (Manchester: C. Simms & Co. London; Trübner & Co. 1871. Square 8vo, pp. 239.)—Goosnargh, a word equivalent to Goose-field, is the name of a township in Kirkham, five miles northeast of Preston on the Ribble, and, being in Lancashire, is necessarily but a few miles inland from the Irish Sea. Our readers may more easily understand that it is some twenty miles north of Liverpool. The book is in many respects a counterpart of our own town histories, being a collection of small matters uninteresting to all but the inhabitants, and yet worthy of preservation as contributing material for the history of the nation. What will surprise Americans, perhaps, is the fact that the records preserved are of little greater age than our own. Leaving out the scanty notices gleaned from general records, the parish books are of late date. Thus the records of the twenty-four sworn men begin in 1634, the churchwardens' list in 1607, the parish registers in 1639. Of course much attention is given to genealogy, the pedigrees being those of Bushell, Rigby, Caterall, Fishwick, Hesketh, Midgeall, Whittingham, Parker, Singleton, Newsam, and a few less important ones. It will be noticed that most of these are names not familiar to our ears; and, in fact, Goosnargh cannot claim any very distinguished sons. The most interesting fact we notice is that in this parish the custom of appointing "sworn men" has continued to the present time. The author states that "select vestries" are still common in England, but this body is quite different from them. The twenty-four men "levied rates, looked to the repairs of the church, and everything belonging to it." They had the general management of bequests to the poor, and all affairs of the school. In fact, they act as the delegates of the parish, and seem to have all the powers belonging to their constituents. They hold office for life, and the corporation fills all vacancies. They have always been holders of lands in the parish, or even eldest sons of land-proprietors. A revival in England of such a form of town government, with a greater freedom of election, might close some of the vexed questions of the day.

The Household Book of Songs: For Four Voices. Collected and arranged by Francis C. Bowman and Charles A. Dana. (New York: D. Appleton & Co.)—The only fault we can find with this book is its title. "A Household Book of Songs" would have described it precisely; the definite article promises too much. It would not be possible in so small a compass as that of a convenient book for the music-rack (which the present volume is) to get in a hundredth part of the "Songs of Sentiment," "Songs of Nature," "Folk Songs," etc., etc., which any one tolerably familiar with musical literature would be able to name off-hand. It cannot, therefore, be regarded at all as a companion volume to Mr. Dana's "Household Book of Poetry," which was an eminently representative work. But, as far as it goes, the selections are made with excellent judgment and fine taste. The arrangements of the songs we have tried are very simple and satisfactory. Any family or circle of friends that contains a quartet (two male and two female voices), unless they are so musical as to know everything, cannot but be pleased in adding this collection to their repertory.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books on the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Abbott (J.), Gentle Measures in the Management of the Young	(Harper & Bros.)
Cole (Maj. W. L.), California, swd	(New York)
Dickinson (Ellen E.), Emmanuel, and Other Stories	(T. Whittaker & Co.) $1 25
Dillon (J. B.), Historical Evidence of the Origin and Nature of the U. S. Government	(New York)
Duyckinck (E. A.), The Poets of the Nineteenth Century	(Harper & Bros.)
Eggleston (E.), The Hoosier School-Master	(Orange Judd & Co.) 1 25
Forster (J.), The Life of Charles Dickens, Vol. I.	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Ganter (F. S.), Man: a Poem, swd	(New Orleans) 1 00
Hamilton (Gail), Woman's Worth and Worthlessness	(Harper & Bros.)
Longfellow (H. W.), The Divine Tragedy	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
New Year's Autograph Album, swd	(M. W. Sparks)
Odenheimer (Rev. W. H.) and Bird (F. M.), Songs of the Spirit	(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)
Parr (Louisa), John Thompson, Blockhead	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Salad for the Solitary and the Social	(De Witt C. Lent & Co.)
Schroedter (Allwina), Penates	(L. W. Schmidt)
Swinton (Prof. W.), Condensed School History of the U. S.	(Ivison, Blakeman & Co.)
" Word-Analysis	" "
Saunders (K.), The Haunted Crust, etc.	(Geo. Routledge & Sons)
Stephens (Mrs. Ann S.), A Noble Woman: a Tale.	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Tennyson (A.), The Last Tournament	(J. E. Tilton & Co.)
Townsend (G. A.), The Mormon Trials at Salt Lake City, swd	(Am. News Co.)
The Coin Book	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
The Story without an End	(Chas. S. Francis)
The Musical Treasure	(O. Ditson & Co.)
Taine (H.), History of English Literature, Vol. II.	(Holt & Williams) 5 00
Tissandier (G.), The Wonders of Water	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Two Legends of the Christ-Child, swd	(De Witt C. Lent & Co.)
Wood (Rev. J. G.), Insects at Home	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)

BEAUTIFUL GIFT-BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

THE CENTURY OF QUEENS, with Sketches, of some Princes of Literature and Art. 4to, cloth gilt, $6; French morocco, $10; Turkey morocco, $12.

POEMS OF MEMORY AND HOPE: Being a choice selection from the Poems of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, with beautiful illustrations by Hennessy and Thwaites. Cloth, full gilt side and gilt edge, $3 50; morocco, $6 50.

BROWNING, ELIZABETH BARRETT, POETICAL WORKS OF. Complete in 1 volume 8vo. Illustrated by Eytinge, Hennessy, Thwaites, and Bush. Cloth plain, $5; cloth gilt, $6; half calf, $7 50; morocco, $10.

FESTUS: A Poem. By Philip James Bailey. Illustrated with eleven fine full-page steel engravings by Hammatt Billings. 8vo, cloth, plain, $5; cloth gilt, $6; half calf, $7 50; morocco, $10.

ROCHEFOUCAULD'S MAXIMS AND MORAL REFLECTIONS. Red Line edition. 18mo, cloth, red edge, $1 25.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent post-paid on receipt of published price.

JAMES MILLER, Publisher,
647 Broadway, New York.

PRESIDENT PORTER'S NEW BOOK.

PUBLISHED TO-DAY:

THE SCIENCES OF NATURE
VERSUS THE SCIENCE OF MAN.

A Plea for the Science of Man.

BY NOAH PORTER, D.D., LL.D.,
President of Yale College. 1 vol. 12mo, $1.

This most able and interesting volume reverses to some extent the arguments of Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, and others, and will not fail to command attention as an important contribution to the current scientific discussion.

DODD & MEAD, Publishers,
762 Broadway, New York.

SLAVE SONGS OF THE UNITED STATES

A Unique Collection of Original Melodies—words and music—obtained among the Negroes of the South; preceded by an account of these Songs, and an Essay on the Negro Dialect, as observed at Port Royal. By Prof. W. F. Allen, of the University of Wisconsin. Cloth, 8vo, price $1 50.

Sent post paid on receipt of price. Address
Publisher of "THE NATION,"
Box 6732, New York City.

The Second Edition of Taine's "English Literature" is in rapid preparation.

2 VOLS. ROYAL 8VO, $10.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,
NEW YORK

TO BOOK-BUYERS.—Now Ready, a Catalogue of Rare, Curious, and Useful Books, particularly rich in the Drama, Burnsiana, Byronana, Shakespeariana, and Miscellaneous Literature, just imported.

Send stamp to
GEORGE TAWSE,
YE OLDE BOOK STORE,
735 Broadway, New York.

AUTHORS, LECTURERS, ETC.—An experienced Stenographer desires occasional evening employment, as an Amanuensis. Terms moderate. Address Stenographer, P. O. Box 1633, New York City.

WANTED.—By the Publishers of the NATION, Nos. 54 and 61 of Vol. II., for which twenty cents each will be paid if sent in within a week; also Nos. 288 and 291 of Vol. XII., for which fifteen cents will be paid.

LEE & SHEPARD

PUBLISH THIS WEEK

By OLIVER OPTIC.

BIVOUAC AND BATTLE; or, The Struggles of a Soldier. 16mo, illustrated, $1 25.

THE ONWARD AND UPWARD SERIES. 4 vols. (boxed). Per vol, $1 25.

OLIVER OPTIC'S ALMANAC for Boys and Girls, 1872. Containing besides Calendar, Diaries, and useful information regarding the Seasons, etc., a Christmas Story by Oliver Optic, entitled "Golden Christmas; or, The Seven Sleepers of Cheat Street," with twelve illustrations. A Thanksgiving Story by Elijah Kellogg, entitled "How Miss Nancy Grant Bent Her Twiggs." A Tableau Entertainment by George E. Baker, entitled "The Seven Ages," with twelve illustrations. Also twelve full-page illustrations, etc., etc., the whole forming one of the most original, unique, and attractive books for the Young People ever published. 30 cents.

OLIVER OPTIC'S MAGAZINE. Vols. 9 and 10, 1871. Containing two Serial Stories by Oliver Optic; two Serial Stories by Elijah Kellogg; one Serial Story by Sophie May; Stories, Sketches, Dialogues, Declamations, Puzzles, Rebuses, etc. 832 pp., with numerous full-page illustrations. Handsomely bound in cloth, 2 vols. in one, $3 50.

By ELIJAH KELLOGG.

THE SOPHOMORES OF RADCLIFFE; or, James Trafton and his Bosom Friends. 16mo, illustrated, $1 25.

By SOPHIE MAY.

THE DOCTOR'S DAUGHTER. A Story of Girlhood. (Reprinted from "Oliver Optic's Magazine.") 16mo. Twelve illustrations. $1 50.

SINGULAR CREATURES: being Studies and Stories from the Domestic Zoology of our Parish. By Mrs. George Cupples, Author of "Driven to Sea," etc. 16mo, illustrated, cloth, $1 25.

☞ Sold by all Booksellers and Newsdealers.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

LEE, SHEPARD & DILLINGHAM, New York.

THE COMPREHENSIVE SPEAKER,

Designed for the Use of Schools, Academies, Lyceums, etc., carefully selected from the best authors, with notes by Henry T. Coates. Large 12mo, 672 pp., half bound, cloth sides, $1 75.

From the New York Daily Tribune.

"It contains a judicious selection of pieces from the best authors, omitting all of doubtful morality, of a sectarian or political character, and of transient literary value. Great care has been taken in the selection of extracts to give the genuine text of the author, without the errors in quotation and punctuation which are such a frequent blemish in this class of school-books. A large proportion of the contents are from American authors, furnishing the materials for a comparative survey of our native literature."

From the Christian Union. (Henry Ward Beecher, Editor.)

"Of course the work of compiling such a book as this is involves difficulties which do not appear to the superficial critic. The enormous mass of available matter has to be winnowed with great care and judgment; the hackneyed extracts, which in the days of the old United States Speaker were declaimed until every boy knew them by heart from simply hearing them, must be avoided; and yet it will not do to omit many of those thrilling passages in the Reply to Hayne, the Declaration of Independence, and a hundred others. Mr. Coates has certainly done his task well and faithfully, and the introductory remarks which precede the body of the work are characterized by good sense, and are evidently the result of considerable thought and observation. The plan of the volume is a natural subdivision of the selections first into prose and poetry, and then into narrative, historical, forensic, etc., the design evidently being that a reading class shall not go through, as it were, from Genesis to Revelations, but shall, in the judgment of the teacher, read 'Mrs. Caudle on Lending Umbrellas' on a rainy afternoon, or the 'Impeachment of Warren Hastings' when the public is excited about official corruptions. The selections are good so far as we have examined them—and we have done so with considerable care—being taken from the best current literature, as well as from that which will always be regarded as classical where the English tongue is spoken."

Send for a Descriptive Circular.

Copies sent to teachers on receipt of one-half the retail price.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,
822 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

PROSPECTUS OF A PRIVATELY PRINTED ISSUE

OF THE WORKS OF THE

DRAMATISTS OF THE RESTORATION,

TO BE EDITED BY

JAMES MAIDMENT AND W. H. LOGAN, ESQS.

It is proposed to issue, for private circulation only, in post 8vo, to range with Pickering's editions of Webster, Peele, Marlow, etc., a series of those Dramatists, for the most part writers of Comedy, who flourished after the extinction of the Commonwealth.

There will be six volumes issued annually, at intervals of two months, commencing January, 1872.

The paper and typography will be unexceptionable.

As the text of most of these authors has, in later editions, been either imperfectly or corruptly dealt with, the several plays will now be presented in an unmutilated form, and will be carefully collated with the earliest and the best editions.

Biographical Notices and brief Notes will accompany the works of each author.

The series has been entrusted to the joint Editorial care of James Maidment and W. H. Logan, Esquires, and will commence with the dramatic works of Sir William Davenant, whose excellence—known chiefly through the medium of a solitary play preserved in Dodsley's collection—is at the present date unrecognized, the cumbrous size of the volume containing his writings making it a sealed book to all but poetic and dramatic antiquarians. His plays, which sparkle with wit, and evince great skill in the construction of the plots, will form the three first volumes. As the reviver of the Drama after its long neglect during the Commonwealth, it is believed that it would be difficult to find a more appropriate author for the commencement of the series.

The hitherto uncollected works of John Crowne, the author of Sir Courtly Nice, and other clever comedies, also forming three volumes, will complete the first year's issue.

It is confidently expected that the encouragement given to this undertaking will be sufficient to warrant the Publication, during subsequent years, of the works of Killegrew, Shadwell, Chas. Johnson, Wilson, Etherege, Centlivre, Wycherley, Sedley, Lacy, Congreve, Farquhar, and others, several of which have never before appeared in a collected form.

The issue to Subscribers of the first volume of Davenant will take place in January, 1872, and Subscribers will be understood to continue from year to year, unless they signify otherwise. The impression will be limited:

Small paper, crown 8vo, - - - - - - -	$4 00
Large paper, demy 8vo, - - - - - - -	7 00
Whatman's paper, demy 8vo, - - - - -	12 00

4 copies on vellum (two of which are already subscribed for.)

EDINBURGH: WILLIAM PATERSON.

NEW YORK: J. W. BOUTON.

Subscribers' Names received and copies supplied on day of publication by

J. W. BOUTON, BOOKSELLER,
706 Broadway, New York.

☞ A liberal discount to the trade.

NOW COMPLETE.

THE CENTENARY EDITION

OF

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS

OF

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

In 25 Vols., Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price $37 50.

THIS ATTRACTIVE EDITION OF THE WAVERLEY has been published as a Commemoration of the Hundredth Anniversary of Sir Walter Scott's Birthday. It claims to be the only complete edition, containing the author's manuscript notes and corrections, the works having been carefully compared with Scott's interleaved copy, and from this source annotations of considerable interest having been obtained, which had not before been published. Some minor notes of an explanatory kind have been introduced, while a special Glossary has been added to such of the Novels as require it, and each volume contains a special Index.

It is printed in very clear and legible type (especially cast for the purpose) upon white wove paper of superior quality; is well bound in maroon cloth, extra, and handy in size. Vol. I. ("Waverley") has a portrait of the author, and each volume contains Vignettes and a Frontispiece.

Published by

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,
110 Washington Street, Boston

In Preparation, uniform with the Centenary Waverley:

SCOTT'S POETICAL WORKS, 2 Vols.
LOCKHART'S LIFE OF SCOTT, 2 Vols.

SMITH'S BIBLE DICTIONARY

A GOOD illustration of the improvement which an English work sometimes passes through when undertaken by an American publisher is found in Hurd & Houghton's reprint of Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible." They put the work into the hands of Prof. H. B. Hackett, the eminent scholar, and of Dr. Ezra Abbot of Harvard College Library, a literary microscopist of singular patience. They took the English edition, together with its confusing supplements and its condensations, with the new matter, and omitting nothing, whether of text or illustration, set the whole material in new and more excellent order, called in the assistance of twenty-six of the best American scholars, added 500 pages of new matter not in one lump, but in a large number of important addenda to existing articles, enlarged the number of illustrations and maps, brought in the results of the most recent explorations, corrected a large number of vexatious typographical errors and errors of reference, and finally added an index, covering more than fourteen four-columned pages, of passages of Scripture illustrated. This index alone at once renders the American edition unmistakably superior to the English as a book of reference, and no one who has compared the two sets of books can hesitate a moment about awarding the palm to the American edition, which is one of the really valuable books offered this season.

PRICES AND STYLES.

In brown cloth, strongly bound, the set,	- -	$26 00
In full sheep,	" - -	30 00
In half-morocco,	" - -	35 00
In half-calf, extra,	" - -	36 00
In full calf,	" - -	48 00

HURD & HOUGHTON,
13 Astor Place, New York;

THE RIVERSIDE PRESS,
Cambridge, Mass.

COCOA FOR INVALIDS.—Nutritious and digestive pancreative cocoa. Specially prepared for sufferers from indigestion, debility, and pulmonary complaints, is highly nutritious, easily digested and palatable, and adapted for the most delicate stomach. Sold in tins from 1s. 6d. by all chemists and Italian warehousemen, and by the manufacturers, Savory & Moore, 143 New Bond Street, London, W.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1871.

The Week.

THE Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune has "interviewed" Senator Schurz with regard to "the conspiracy" which the Times professed to have discovered between him and Messrs. Trumbull and Fenton, and which it has revealed to the world under the designation of the "Schurz-Fenton Trick," having for its object the defamation of the President, under the guise of an enquiry into abuses. Mr. Schurz says that he knew nothing of Mr. Trumbull's motion till it was made, a statement which we believe Mr. Trumbull would corroborate. Moreover, we can also say with confidence that nobody was more surprised than Mr. Trumbull at the stir his motion produced. He had no idea that the place where he put his finger was so tender, nor had he any idea that the public at large would be so much roused by the yells of the patient, and would insist so eagerly on having him stripped, examined, and radically treated. Our assertion last week, that the reason why the Administration Senators were so seriously alarmed by the motion was their fear that it would damage the President's prospect of renomination, has been confirmed fully by an article in Harper's Weekly, written in his defence. In short, the President has assumed, in the eyes of his supporters, the attributes of an "heir presumptive," and anything which clouds his prospects they treat as treason. Nothing could be more simple-minded, too, than the way in which they treat hostility to his renomination as disqualifying a Senator even for the task of enquiring into his management of the government, just as if the Committee of Seventy were, owing to their previous suspicions of Connolly and Hall, disqualified from examination of the city accounts.

The report of the Civil-Service Commissioners has been given to the public since our last issue, and is a very candid and thorough discussion of the whole subject. Of course there was, after all that has been said on the matter during the last four or five years, little or nothing very new to be urged in favor of the reform. The actual contact of the Commission with the difficulties of the question, and the consciousness that something would probably come of their labors, have given their observations a pointedness which is easier felt than described, and have enabled them to throw useful light on some of the suggestions which have come before the public from various quarters. For instance, Mr. Cox's proposal, which, we believe, Mr. Trumbull has since adopted, that the postmasters should be elected, they met with the objection that it would be almost impossible to determine a postmaster's constituency with sufficient accuracy to ensure real responsibility and supervision. As we supposed, the report leaves the present office-holders untouched. They are to remain as they are, untested in any way, but subject to the power of arbitrary removal; and they have been, as we pointed out last week, selected carefully by Tom Murphy and his like, with reference, in the vast majority of cases, solely to their electioneering capacity or political influence. The new rules forbid the practice of levying assessments on their salaries for political purposes, but with this exception the civil service will continue for the present—at all events, till after the next Presidential election—precisely what it has been in times past; and unless the President has greatly changed since he dismissed all office-holders in Missouri who supported Schurz and Gratz Brown, and put Tom Murphy into the Custom-house (according to Tom's own confession, as we can prove) to "run it" for the benefit of the party, it will be used to secure his renomination, just as in this State it was used to secure the control of the last convention for "the friends of the Administration," under Murphy's auspices. Now, we do not hesitate to express our earnest conviction that no reform in the civil service can ever be made permanent which does not clearly involve self-sacrifice on the part o the administration which carries it out—that is, no reform made by the Republicans which does not deprive them of the use of the civil service for party purposes will be respected by the Democrats when they come into power. If General Grant is aided in procuring his re-election by a corrupt civil service, his successor will assuredly not accept the legacy of a reformed service at his hands, and the whole reform will wear the appearance of a dextrous and successful effort to ride two horses.

The remedy is, either to take away the power of arbitrary removal, to which, as we have said, there are in the present state of the public mind and of party usages serious objections, or to apply the reform at once to actual incumbents as well as to prospective candidates. Of course, modifications would have to be made in applying the system of examinations to men who have served long and well, but a great and beneficial and much-needed weeding-out could be accomplished without inflicting any hardship on competent persons, and without deranging the service. This should be accompanied, too, by a general order, such as Mr. Green issued in the City Hall, warning officials that their duties were ministerial and not political, and that as long as they perform them faithfully they shall not be vexed or pursued or in any manner damaged on account of their political opinions. Without some such action as this, it will be useless to try to persuade those who really care about civil-service reform and have worked for it that the President sincerely desires it. Harper's Weekly insists that he does, but, while entertaining the highest respect for the opinions of that journal, we would ask it seriously whether it can really expect people to accept either General Grant's assertions or its own as outweighing the President's course with regard to the civil service during the last three years. It is useless, for instance, to tell us that he was "overborne by the system" when he made the sweep in Missouri or appointed Murphy collector. If he, a civil-service reformer, could be forced into doing these things, how can the public be got to believe that he will have the strength to carry out the great reform the Commission has sketched out for him, and the execution of which it declares to rest solely in his discretion? Shall we be seriously told that the heart which quailed when Murphy charged will not quail when the whole tribe of Murphys rise against the new régime?

Mr. Hoar's bill, providing for the appointment of a Commission to investigate the condition of the laborer, has passed the House, and will doubtless pass the Senate, and, as might have been expected, Mr. Hoar is in receipt of a large number of letters from persons anxious to serve on the Commission. There is probably no position of the kind which has so many attractions both for the struggling politician and for the philanthropist with a hobby. We may mention, for the information of those whom it may concern, that Mr. D. A. Wells—whom the omission of an "and," by the bye, made us last week speak of as the State Geologist of Missouri—has written, and is now engaged in the delivery, of a lecture on "Labor," to which we have listened within a few weeks, for which we advise the new Commission to call on Mr. Wells at the earliest possible moment. It is not in the least likely that the Commission itself will produce anything nearly so valuable in the nature of an examination of the conditions of the labor problem, and of the hindrances, in legislation or in the state of the currency or taxation, to the laborer's receiving his just reward. Nobody in the country is in possession of a tithe of Mr. Wells's information on this subject, and few, if any, have such skill in the arrangement of facts and the extraction from them of solid instruction.

The Committee of Seventy have drafted a new charter, which they will submit to the Legislature, not for adoption so much as suggestion. It boldly adopts the theory that the Mayor, if made very powerful, would re-elect himself, so it leaves him considerable power of removal, but only little power of appointment. It creates a legislature consisting of a board of forty-five aldermen, nine to be elected from each senatorial district, and by the cumulative variety of minority representation—that is, each voter may vote for nine candidates, or concentrate his nine votes on one, so that it will be possible in every district for a well-managed minority to secure representation at all events. The board is to have complete legislative powers, including the voting of the taxes, a provision which is an immense improvement on the present system of having them voted at Albany, and would, if adopted, do a good deal to purify the State Legislature. The suggestion recently made in the Nation, that all municipal acts, proceedings, and transactions should be published in a municipal record, and all payments to city papers for advertising be done away with, also finds a place in the draft. This is more useful than it seems on the surface; for, without meaning to charge any paper in particular with actual corruption, except the Ring organ, the Star, which pocketed nearly $300,000 of the stolen money, there is no doubt that the city advertising did, if not corrupt, at least silence many papers with regard to city abuses, and made all of them more cautious and reticent than they would otherwise have been in denouncing them. We ought, in saying this, to do tardy justice to the youngest journal of prominence in the city, the Evening Mail, by adding that, considering the temptations which the Ring was ready to offer to all papers, and which, in the case of young papers, of course were peculiarly strong, the part which this one took in the fight against the Ring was remarkably creditable.

The administrative portion of the city government is divided between ten departments, of which the Public Works, Parks, Docks, Charities and Correction, and Finance have five Commissioners each. The arrangement of the others is not settled. Of these five Commissioners the Mayor appoints one and the Aldermen the others. He may remove his own peremptorily, the others for cause, and the Aldermen may remove their own four, but not less than four, peremptorily. When the Mayor removes any aldermanic Commissioner, or the Aldermen remove their own, they also fill the vacant places. It is probably here that the weak point of the new system will be discovered, as it is here the log-rolling and bargaining will take place. This government of departments by five persons will necessarily greatly weaken responsibility, and make it almost impossible to bring any shortcoming home to anybody in particular. But the framers of a charter have to choose between this and so concentrating power as to enable one man to set the whole community at defiance, and sell nominations, as Fernando Wood is believed to have done. Five Commissioners, it is safe to say, are too many, and annual elections, which the Committee recommend, would be a great mistake. It is not possible for the best men of the city either to go through the labor of selecting candidates once a year or even to form a correct judgment about the merits of men in office. Few men have time to show their capacity in any place of trust, in which they are called upon to deal with an innumerable multitude of details, between April of one year and April of the next. Two years is as often as non-professional politicians ought to be called on to set the electoral machine in motion. The professional ones would, of course, like to have elections once a month, and to have life here and hereafter passed in making up "slates" and "attending to one's political duties." They delight in "political duties," but they are the only duties they care about.

Owing to various technical objections on the part of the defence, the Ku-klux trials in South Carolina have made slow progress, and but one case has actually reached a hearing and a decision. This was the case of Robert Hayes Mitchell, charged with complicity in the murder of one Jim Williams, a black man, or, in the language of the act, with conspiring and combining to deprive him, as a citizen, of the right of suffrage. The jury consisted of two white men and ten mulattoes of more than average intelligence, and Mitchell had for his counsel Mr. Reverdy Johnson and ex-Attorney-General Stanbery, who seem, however, to have been quite staggered by the weight of testimony establishing the existence of the Ku-klux order and its political purpose; so much so that Mr. Johnson felt obliged to denounce warmly the atrocities contemplated by it, and perpetrated by the associates of his client, and both counsel confined themselves to proving Williams's bad character, Mitchell's subordinate part in killing him, and the absence of a political motive in this special instance of Ku-kluxery. It was, however, such a defense as neither of them could have much enjoyed making, and probably they were neither of them surprised nor outraged by the verdict of guilty which followed their efforts. The Columbia correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette furnishes another reason for supposing that what Webster would have called their "performing a disagreeable duty" has been more than commonly irksome to these eminent advocates. After remarking that "no exception to the general rule of treatment of Yankees has been made in their favor" at Columbia, he continues:

> "They have been here three weeks; they are both gentlemen of respectability, and probably of decency; they are both Democrats (a mark of decency, etc.); they came here to defend 'our best citizens' from Federal tyranny; but they are both Yankees, and they have not yet been invited to the house of any native citizen, nor have they taken a meal at any other place than their hotel, except at the house of Mr. Chamberlain, the carpet-bag Attorney-General and Government counsel in the Ku-klux cases."

It appears that Mr. Schenck, on learning how his course with regard to the Emma Mine was considered, applied to the State Department for advice, and, on Mr. Fish's recommendation, but without any censure, resigned his directorship. It has been discovered, in his defence, that the Duke of Saldanha, when Portuguese ambassador at London, allowed his name to be used in bringing out a Lisbon tramway scheme on the London market. All that can be said about this is that the Duke did wrong; that he is a notorious old "operator" and adventurer, and no model for American diplomatists. The Tribune elevates him, for the purposes of Schenck's defence, to the rank of "one of the most illustrious of Continental statesmen," which is nearly as strong as the prospectus of the Emma Mine; but we object to the now time-honored fashion of defending American abuses by pointing out the commission of a similar abuse, sometime within two hundred years, by some rascal or set of rascals in the Old World. It is, for instance, no longer a sufficient answer to a charge of bribery against an American legislator that in Walpole's time English members of Parliament were bought up wholesale. The fact that the Americans are more of a business people than the Portuguese, or than any Europeans, renders it all the more necessary that our ministers should not go abroad as the agents of speculators, with their desk full of prospectuses and "reports." We are glad Mr. Schenck has resigned his directorship, but we wish he had done so before he received anything for the use of his name, and before the stock of the company was all sold. We would warn English investors, too, that that "monthly dividend" of the Emma Mine which sounds so attractive is not to be relied on for the support of a family.

General Boynton, the Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, has taken the trouble to disinter from the files of the Globe the history of this retrenchment committee over which the battle of last week was fought, and it puts the henchmen of the Administration in a more embarrassing position than ever. It appears that this committee on retrenchment, for which Mr. Trumbull moved, is not a new committee, but an old committee organized so long ago as 1866, and revived regularly by every Congress since. It appears, moreover, that among its most ardent supporters were Messrs. Edmunds and Sherman, and, worse than all, that the duties assigned to it by Mr. Trumbull's motion, and the terms in which they were assigned to it, are all but identical with those of the resolution of 1866. When that resolution was so amended as to extend the enquiry to the condition of the civil service, Mr. Edmunds accepted the amendment, asking simply for an enlargement of the committee; and this is what the organs of the Administration have the assurance to talk of as a trick. It may be well to renominate General Grant, and it may be, as Harper's Weekly says, that two-thirds of the Republican party desire his renomination, but the question cannot be settled until the Convention meets. In the interval, it is everybody's right, and indeed everybody's duty, to discuss him and his Administration, not less, but more freely and fully than heretofore; and so far from the doors being shut on those who are now opposed to his renomination, it is they who, if there be any difference of right in the matter, are best entitled to all the information that can be furnished.

The Cuban difficulty has clearly entered on a new phase, in that it has become manifest that Spain has not only not been successful so far in quelling the insurrection, but that she does not control even the "loyal" population. In short, she does not govern the island, nor any part of it. The volunteers hold it, and the Spanish troops occupy the position of an auxiliary force. This would be a sufficiently perplexing state of things if the volunteers were a disciplined force, which they are not. The course of a foreign government dealing with a friendly power engaged in the suppression of an insurrection is plain enough. It can wait as long as it pleases for the insurrection to be put down, without compromising its dignity or waiving any of its rights; but, when the government so engaged shows itself to be unable, even in that portion of the territory peaceably occupied by its troops, and in which its authority is not disputed, to fulfil its international obligations, there is not the same room left for discretion. If Havana belongs to Spain, and is garrisoned by Spanish soldiers, there must be somebody in it capable of answering for Spain to other powers; and, if there be not, somebody has to be found. At present there is not. The loyal end of the island is in the hands of forty thousand unruly volunteers, and forty thousand unruly volunteers are a body unknown to international law. Our Government cannot treat with such a body, nor call it to account, nor get redress from it. It can do nothing with it but disperse or disarm it. The questions whether it will do this, and when it will do it, are questions of convenience simply; and the existence of such a state of facts does not by any means make war imminent, but it is a state of facts which calls for an entirely different attitude from that called for by a protracted insurrection.

Business in all branches has been dull during the past week, and prices, with one or two exceptions, have materially declined. Breadstuffs continue to fall, the supplies being large and sent to market freely, while the European demand has declined. Meats have also started on a fresh decline, the hog supply being large and holders eager to sell. Groceries are firm, especially coffee, which is now higher than it has been for years, owing to the short crop in the Brazils and the increased consumption of the present year. Speculation is invading the grocery market since the decay of Wall Street, and "coffee rings" and "tea rings" are the order of the day. Cotton is firm, and has advanced, although last week, for the first time since the heavy receipts began, the weekly arrivals exceeded those of the corresponding week of last year. The consumption of cotton at the present time is enormous, and it is very doubtful whether it can continue at this rate; from the great Oriental markets there already come reports of glut and overstocking. But here everything is buoyant, and the belief in a short crop is not affected by the temporary increase in receipts. Real estate is nominally firm, but very dull; dealers report unusually large amounts of property offered for sale, but without much yielding on the part of holders.

In Wall Street, money has continued scarce and high; but stocks are active and advancing. A so-called "bull campaign" has been agreed upon by the great leaders of the manipulating fraternity, and neither the public indisposition to participate in their schemes, nor the scarcity of money, nor the uneasiness of the banks, appears to be able to influence them. It is unfortunately true that the whole conservatism of the banks appears to be directed against the commercial and mercantile community, who find accommodation of every description extremely difficult to obtain, while the great Wall Street gamblers appear to control unlimited sums, although they have to pay somewhat higher rates for it. There is nothing new in relation to the great onslaught on Erie. Gold has touched 108⅜, the lowest point since June, 1862, and silver is now but a nominal premium above par in currency.

The republican agitation in England seems to gain in fervor if not in extent. The monarchy has on its side, in the large towns at least, a large body of persons who do not, on some subjects, believe in the value of free discussion, and they attack the republican meetings, which nearly all end in a free fight. Besides the fight at Bolton, at which a republican was killed by a brickbat thrown in at the window, an attempt on Sir Charles's part to lecture at Derby resulted in another fight, by which the meeting was broken up. Besides Mr. Auberon Herbert—who is the son and brother of a peer—and Sir Charles Dilke, another member of Parliament, Mr. Charles Seely, Jr., has come out as a republican. The principal other republican champion is Mr. Odger, who is distinguished in the labor movement; but he has had a terrible encounter with Mr. Osborne, another prominent labor reformer, at a meeting of the "London democrats." This body appears to be short of money, $35 being due to a printer and $75 to somebody else for "getting up a demonstration," and there are no funds to pay them. This led to an open contention between the two democratic chiefs, Osborne treating Odger as a sham republican who never would get a republic and was not in earnest in seeking it, and they thereupon abused each other roundly, accusing each other of greed, selfishness, and the receipt of money for which they made no return—in short, of several monarchical vices.

The movement against the House of Lords seems to gain in force also. A conference on the subject has been held at Birmingham, at which the tide of opinion seemed to run mainly against the hereditary principle and the presence of the bishops in the Upper House; but there was no sign of favor for a single chamber. Sir Charles Dilke lectured in the evening, his discourse ending as usual in a free fight. He opposed life peerages as a mere mitigation, and only a slight one, of the evils of hereditary legislation, on the ground that men of real ability would not accept them, and that those who did would be looked down on by the hereditary peers. A nose-pulling case, Bostonians will be interested to hear, has arisen out of the republican movement—Alderman Carter, a member of Parliament, who took the tickets at one of the Dilke meetings, having been charged by Mr. Mallinson, an architect, with "tweaking" his nose. The magistrate found the alderman guilty of an assault, but of an insignificant character, and dismissed the case.

The accounts from France are anything but encouraging. The tendency of the opinion of the country at large seems to have been of late towards the acceptance of the Republic, as having the great merit, whatever its defects, of actually existing. But this appears to have made the majority of the Assembly, which has just met again, more reactionary in its temper and high-handed in its policy than ever before. In the new organization, the Left had been denied almost all representation among the vice-presidents and secretaries and in the committees. The executions at Satory have produced great irritation in Paris, and rendered the idea of going back there more unpopular than ever with the Conservatives, although the necessity for going back is every day more apparent. Thiers seems anxious to throw the blame of them on the Commission of Pardons, though he knows well that such offences as Rossel's could not be pardoned and the discipline of the army maintained; and then, to the ordinary uncertainties of the future is added the uncertainty caused by his advanced age. In short, the probability of prolonging the present situation seems much smaller than it was three months ago. Should either of the two factions seek to precipitate the crisis, that crisis can only consist in an appeal to the army; and of the sentiments of the French army, as at present constituted, nobody seems to know much, but it is safe to conclude that it is not Republican, much less Reddish. Our Paris correspondent gives an interesting account of another "leading mind" of the Commune, whose career closely resembles Rochefort's.

ROYALTY AND REPUBLICANISM IN EUROPE.

WHAT are the pleas of republicanism in Europe? And, above all, what are the sins—past, present, or potential—of European royalty? This latter term is so vague and comprehensive, that we must begin by making some distinctions, since almost all the possible phases of decline through which royalty must pass may be said to co-exist in Europe, from its all but perfect type personified in the Russian autocrat to the phantom royalty of England, Belgium, and Italy. Now, it is a fact that there are no republicans in Russia, and even men like Putin and Bakunin, who go to Geneva and become citizens of the "Universal Republic," do not urge the immediate proclamation of the republic in Russia. In Germany, too, where the struggle for constitutional liberty is still far from being terminated, the number of professed republicans is remarkably small. But in those countries where the prerogatives of the sovereign have been reduced to what may be called a minimum, since they have reached the level of those allowed to the chief magistrate in a republic—where liberty is greatest, and where the rights of individual citizens are most freely asserted and most scrupulously respected, the republicans are sufficiently strong to form political parties, and to threaten the institutions to which they owe their impunity. In other words, European republicanism grows in the inverse ratio of autocratic tyranny; its reaction against personal tyranny is weakest where that tyranny is greatest; it is strongest where the traces of personal government are evanescent. And as this would be a reductio ad absurdum which we cannot accept, our syllogism can become true only by the assumption that it is no longer monarchical oppression, but some other feature of monarchy, which modern republicanism reacts against, and that if it cannot strike royalty in the name of liberty and morality, its grievance must be an intellectual one. And in this intellectual strength lies its political weakness. It can no longer stir the heart as Masaniello did, or Garibaldi. There are no wrongs to avenge, though there are follies to expose, and mistakes to correct. The cry of liberty falls flat when raised against those who are no longer enemies of liberty. And thus all purely republican agitation, when separated from socialism, can wield no other weapons than those of criticism. With these it has discovered that royalty, though no longer tyrannical, is something worse than harmless—a superfluity. But this is only a thesis, and no cry. It is easy to knock down an enemy, but how can you shake off a bore? Many men, who would enjoy the former exploit, would shrink from the latter, which implies, if nothing worse, a breach of decorum or a breach of the peace. It was easier to expel Isabella of Spain or the King of Naples than it would be to get rid of a respectable worthy like the King of Saxony. And, as a matter of fact, crowned profligates and crowned despots have rarely been attacked by the republicans or in the name of the republic, but have been expelled only to make room for better sovereigns. Even the Mazzinians, if not Mazzini himself, accepted Victor Emanuel as universal heir of the Italian thrones, and the relief they felt was so great that they never thought of agitating for the republic.

Before we admit (what can hardly be denied) that royalty, when properly disarmed and constitutionalized, becomes a superfluity, we will examine its residual attributes, such as are still allowed to belong to it in the freest monarchies of Europe. These attributes are the veto, the right of legislative initiative, the right of declaring war and of making peace, and, lastly, its hereditary character. The first two a constitutional king has in common with the President of the United States, and of the third he can make as little use as if he were a President-elect, unless the funds are granted by the nation. How troublesome the exercise of similar rights can become under circumstances, Americans know fully as well as Europeans, and English republicans feel so strongly on this point, that they would object as much to a president-elect as to an hereditary sovereign. Mr. Conway, who addressed the London Republican Club, at the Hall of Science, on the 13th of November, tried to show that the evils "resulting to a nation from having a president" were about as great as those resulting from having "a ghost of a king," and in his dread of any personal headship, he was even "opposed to the principle of State legislatures in America," and wished to see all these pointed State pyramids merged into one large truncated pyramid, tapering off into nothing worse than "a commission with a sort of prime minister." We grant that it is dangerous to leave such weapons as the veto in the hands of any single man. The Roman tribunes, who first wielded it, were at least two, and sometimes ten. But since all these considerations concern republics as well as monarchies, they need not be urged in the name of the republic as republic, and the desired reforms may be obtained by way of amendments to the constitution in every free country. Even kings have been, and can at any time be, legally stripped of their various prerogatives without bloodshed or revolution. The only attribute of royalty which distinguishes even the most powerless king from a president, and of which it could not be stripped without ceasing to be royalty, is, besides its name, its hereditary character. The Pope-kings and the kings of Poland, though elected kings, were real kings, but only because they were not constitutional kings in the modern sense of the term.

Suppose, then, that we had found the modern idea of royalty, the model king with none but citizen's rights, of whom nothing could be predicated except that he was his father's son, that he enjoyed a salary called the civil list, and that he was the recognized head of society. Politically, such a personage would certainly be superfluous, but would he be worse than superfluous?

According to his three predicates, he could be objected to on three grounds: intellectually, on the ground of common sense; financially, on the ground of economy; and morally, on socialistic grounds. The financial argument recently proffered in England by Sir Charles Dilke, though sound and apparently irresistible, is not likely to tell. It could have weight only with a nation that was neither wealthy nor pleasure-loving. Even in semi-bankrupt Italy the people (workmen and all) would not grudge the funds for the erection of a royal ball-room in the Quirinal, if Sella were less stingy; and as long as cities are ready to waste a hundred thousand francs for one night's illumination, while the lamp of education wants feeding and trimming, all specious denunciation of a frugal king's expenditure would be simply a waste of breath.

Less weighty even than the financial is the social argument. Royalty is, no doubt, a superstition, as Garibaldi and many before him have called it; and, what is worse, it is a superstition of the upper classes alone, in this sense, that they excuse their own weakness for royalty by assuming it to be a superstition of the lower classes, whom, they think, it would be cruel to deprive of it. The recent discovery that the people had, long since, outgrown this superstition, would have been a painful surprise to the upper classes but for their remarkable power of "not seeing" unwelcome things. Nor can it be denied that human majesty, whether in the garb of royalty, or wealth, or titles, or cocked hats, has often captivated even democratic hearts, and occasionally this weakness crops up where one leasts expects it. A Liberal Italian paper, quite recently, found fault with two ministers of the crown for going into a Roman restaurant, and sitting down to dine with people who were likely to speak disrespectfully of their last measures. But all these sentiments belong to a sphere lying beyond the reach and competency of political agitation. Society, with all its follies, cannot be regulated by legislation. Even its inequalities, which, in a free country, are never anything but school-classes, through which every one who can may pass, are the result of that very principle of liberty which has made of individual freedom the supreme law of modern society. And that is the reason why socialism is as antagonistic to individual freedom as it is antagonistic to the freedom of trade and of competition. But on these points many people seem to have confused ideas, and idiotic Europeans still express astonishment when they hear New Englanders talk of the "classes" of Boston society, as if various Republicans were bound to associate with each other regardless of tastes, affinities, or culture.

The only really vulnerable point of modern royalty is, strange to say, its so-called legitimacy. A good king is king not because he is good, but because he is the son of his father. He is a physical accident, and, if royalty were not politically harmless, common-sense might well object to such an institution. Nor is legitimacy what the term implies, there being no monarchy on earth where the continuity of succession has not been broken by revolution or by conquest; and if the plebiscitary right were to correct or supplant the so-called divine right, it would have consistently to be enforced on the death of each sovereign. Royalty would then become elective, and soon cease to be royalty.

What, then, is to be done with this institution? To substitute, more or less gradually, the plébiscite for the right of lineal succession, would certainly be the gentlest way of bringing about the self-extinction of royalty. Even convents are suppressed not by the expulsion of the monks, but by the exclusion of novices. But the proceeding is too slow to please a militant political party. Nor is it likely to find favor with conservative people. For it must be admitted that the sovereign people can be as troublesome and as foolish as any king of the old school; and there are men, even in America, who think that the belief in universal suffrage, unrestricted by any educational or domicile test, is as much a superstition as royalty ever was—not, indeed, in the same innocent sense as royalty, or lord mayor's shows, or national guards, but in the far more pregnant sense in which protectionism, trial by jury, and the pretended "national horror" of secret voting or of compulsory education have, at times, been qualified as popular superstitions.

In fact, it is not enough for rational men to cry Delenda est when they have to deal with anything simply superfluous. A mason does not pull down a house, or clear away the rubbish either, without having counted the cost; and it behooves the republicans of Europe, if not content with gradual action, to consider how much blood, money, and misery it would cost to rid the world of such sovereigns as Queen Victoria or Victor Emanuel (such being the only ones objected to). Signor Crispi, one of the republican leaders in Italy, after making this calculation, came to the strange conclusion (which he was honest enough to state in public) that royalty could, in exceptional cases, be of some use to a nation, and that the Italians, in their present condition, might say of monarchy what the French say of the republic, "It unites us"; and might say of the republic what the French most justly say of monarchy, "It divides us."

This is an important admission. But, as it refers to exceptional cases only, it does not invalidate the general maxim that sovereigns are superfluous in proportion to their loyalty to the constitution. It only shows that republican leaders need not, and ought not to, cease being practical statesmen. To be successful, or, rather, to hasten their success, they should endeavor to gain over a greater number of educated men, which they could easily do by merely abstaining from rant and hollow declamation. The line of action which European republicans should follow is clear and broad. Let them begin by attacking and combating the principle of hereditary rights where it is apt to work real mischief, not where it is a powerless emblem. Let them agitate for the reform or suppression of the British House of Lords; and let them, above all, endeavor to prevent any relapse into monarchy when chance or revolution has brought on an interregnum.

A POLITICAL FINANCIER.

THE approaching election by the Legislature of Ohio, to fill a vacancy in the representation of that State in the Senate of the United States for a term of six years, commencing March 4, 1873, possesses more than ordinary interest, for the reason that, in case of the re-election of the present senator, Mr. John Sherman, the principal candidate, he will in all probability be continued in the office of chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate—a place of great importance to the whole country, and demanding of its occupant the highest qualifications in respect to integrity, statesmanship, and financial knowledge and experience. Mr. Sherman's friends, in advocating his re election, allege that he possesses these qualifications in a pre-eminent degree, and that, therefore, no other candidate from the Republican party in the State should be allowed to enter the lists in opposition. To make a claim, however, is one thing; to support it by evidence is quite another; and with a view of seeing how far the claims in this case are supported by evidence, we propose to enquire a little into Mr. Sherman's history.

Mr. Sherman entered the Senate in 1861, after having previously served four terms in the House, and was re-elected in 1867. He is now, consequently, at the close of his second term. An examination of his earlier senatorial record, as contained in the pages of the Congressional Globe, fails to show anything which does not bear the stamp of mediocrity; and during the inception and consummation of the financial measures consequent upon the war, he does not appear to have said or proposed anything which the future historian of the period will consider as of the slightest importance. After the war, his career becomes more significant.

It will be remembered that the so-called "greenback swindle," or the project of paying off the Government funded debt in depreciated currency, was first prominently promulgated by Mr. Pendleton in Ohio, in the State campaign of 1867; and although at first denounced by the Republican leaders in the State generally, it proved exceedingly popular with the masses, and before the close of the year may be said to have nearly carried the public sentiment of the State, without distinction of party. In the outset, Mr. Sherman, in common with other Republican leaders, did not hesitate to characterize the whole project, in the plainest language, as a crime; but as the summer's experience made it probable that the popular current throughout the State was setting in the other direction and with Mr. Pendleton, he took a politician's and not a statesman's view of the subject, and soon arrived at essentially different conclusions. The second session of the Fortieth Congress assembled in December, 1867, and, on the 17th of that month, Mr. Sherman obtained the consent of his committee to submit a bill and report in reference to the refunding of the debt at a lower rate of interest than six per cent., in which, without committing the Finance Committee of the Senate to his doctrine, he, nevertheless, repeated all the Pendletonian arguments in favor of paying the bonds in legal tender at their current or some prior rate of depreciation. In fact, the whole report was evidently designed to rouse a fear in the mind of the public creditor that Congress would ultimately accept the greenback doctrine, and thus, for fear of having his debt repudiated, induce him to exchange his six per cent. Five-Twenty bonds for a new Five per cent. which Mr. Sherman's bill proposed to create. The implied and ill-concealed threat contained in the report and bill was, however, a little too much for the Senate and the general sentiment, and so the bill was speedily recommitted; but early in January a substitute was reported, with the threat omitted. What Mr. Sherman, however, could not force the Senate and his Committee to recognize officially, he did his best to promulgate and strengthen personally, and in a speech of some two hours' length in the Senate, on the 27th of February, 1868, he threw his whole weight into an argument in favor of paying the bonds in greenbacks. As a specimen of his language, we quote the following from a report of this speech in the Congressional Globe for 1867–8, pp. 180–189: "I say that equity and justice are amply satisfied if we redeem the bonds at the end of five years in the same kind of money, of the same intrinsic value, as it bore at the time they were issued." He then proposed to offer the holders of the Five-Twenty bonds his new Five per cents, and said (p. 184): "We will give each of you at your option this form of security in exchange for that which you now have: if you accept this offer by the 1st of November next, we will give you certain exemptions; if not, you stand upon your existing right, and all questions affecting it shall be postponed until the next session of Congress." Near the close of this same speech he further said: "The bill does not provide for a rejection of this offer; but, I repeat, if it is rejected, I will not hesitate to vote to redeem maturing bonds in the currency in existence when they were issued and with which they were purchased."

This foolish and unwarranted attack upon the credit and good faith of the country—we say "unwarranted" because Mr. Fessenden, Mr. Edmunds, and others in the course of the debate showed that, although Mr. Sherman was chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, he had no clear idea or correct knowledge of the terms on which the Five-Twenties were issued and disposed of; and "foolish" because, as we shall show, Mr. Sherman had subsequently to eat his own words publicly—created profound astonishment and disgust throughout the country. Gold, which early in December was 133, rose on the reporting of Mr. Sherman's bill to 137, and in February, on the delivery of his speech, to 144, and did not again recede from the point at which the rise commenced in December, 1867, until nearly a year afterwards, or until November, 1868. The flow of bonds for investment to Europe was also arrested; and a return movement—especially from Germany—seemed likely to take place to such an extent that serious financial disturbances were anticipated.

Looking over the files of some of the leading Republican papers of that time, we find that the New York Evening Post expressed itself as follows:

"We may safely assert that no action yet taken by any politician, either Democratic or Republican, has inflicted such serious injury upon the credit of the United States, or rendered more certain and necessary a reorganization of political parties, as soon as the exigencies of reconstruction shall render such changes possible."

The New York Times of January 30, 1868, commenting on the first report, used this language:

"The moment it became known that the Committee intended to present such a report, there was a general apprehension in financial circles that it would depress the value of Government securities. It was a day of general rejoicing among the bears."

Mr. Chittenden, who was the Registrar of the Treasury at the time the Five-Twenties were issued, under the signature of "Adirondack," also expressed himself, in respect to Mr. Sherman's report, in the New York Times as follows: "If any body but the Senate Finance Committee had grouped together such a mass of wrong assertions, so ingeniously deceptive, and, withal, by the assumption of these false premises, putting such a powerful argument into the mouths of repudiators, I should be warranted in characterizing it as a wicked attempt to mislead the country by the statement of facts known to be untrue." So much for Mr. Sherman's integrity, statesmanship, and financial sagacity, at a time when the exigencies of the country demanded the best exertions of all true men to save her from the shame, the humiliation, and the disgrace of repudiating the debt she incurred in defending her own life, and in protecting the liberties of her children.

The current of public sentiment, however, soon changed. The Chicago Convention struck a deadly blow at all this specious and disguised repudiation, and the success of the Republican party in November, 1868, sealed the fate of "Pendletonianism." This made another somersault on the part of the honorable Senator necessary, and, eight days after Congress assembled again, that is, December 16, 1868, he made haste to report from the Finance Committee the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate, etc.

"That neither public policy, nor the good faith of the nation, will allow the redemption of the Five-Twenty bonds until the United States shall perform its primary duty of paying its notes in coin, or making them equivalent thereto; and that measures should be adopted by Congress to secure the resumption of specie payments at as early a day as practicable."

It is interesting to observe that, the same day, Senator Morton (who had joined Mr. Sherman on the greenback escapade) made an elaborate speech in favor of an early resumption of specie payments. It is still more interesting to consider, in honorable contrast with the career of these two men, the course of Senator Fessenden. During the debate on Sherman's Funding Bill, Mr. Fessenden said:

"I have no doubt we are bound by every principle of honor, as expressed upon the paper, and as connected with the contemporaneous exposition of the thing itself, to pay the principal of every bond we have issued in coin. That is my judgment, and I do not think I shall change it; and so positive am I that that was the understanding of everybody in the community, that, even if there were a narrow chance of escape by a technical construction of the paper itself, I should deem myself dishonored as a member of this body if I should take the first step in any direction that would look like paying or attempting to pay our obligations of that description in paper."—Globe, July 13, 1868, p. 3994.

On the 27th of February, just one year from the day that Mr. Sherman made his repudiation speech, he voted for Schenck's bill to strengthen public credit—which expressly declared that the Five-Twenty bonds were payable, principal and interest, in coin.

Again, Mr. Sherman's recent record in respect to the tariff is not of a character which savors of either honesty or statesmanship, or one in respect to which either he or his friends have reason to be proud. Thus, on the assembling of the present Congress, in March last, the House passed resolutions removing the duties from salt and coal by a two-thirds vote. The resolutions went to the Senate, and were so simple and unmistakable in phraseology and meaning, and referred to subjects so familiar, that it would seem as if there could be no objection to submitting them at once to consideration and a vote. But this would not suit Senator Sherman. He knew that there was soon to be a senatorial election in Ohio, and that, if he permitted these resolutions to come to a vote, he would be compelled to show his hand one way or the other, and so run the risk of incurring the opposition of either the revenue reformers or the protectionists. He therefore determined to attempt to ride two horses, and he succeeded as well as could be expected; for the resolutions were referred, on his motion, to the Finance Committee. He refused, although earnestly pressed by Senator Trumbull and others, to report them back; and in their place introduced resolutions authorizing the Senate Committee to sit during the recess, and consider the subject. The pettifogging character of the whole proceeding becomes evident when it is considered that the Senate Committee had a right to consider and enquire at any time, without specific authorization—and, in fact, is instituted for this specific purpose; that the subjects to be enquired about have been considered again and again by the Committee; that there is on file in the committee-room all the information necessary for the formation of an opinion; and, finally, that the Committee, in spite of its authorization, did not meet until a few days before the present session of Congress, never had a quorum present, and, as was expected, did nothing, and had nothing ready on the reassembling of the Senate. As a trick for appearing to do something, and yet ensuring that nothing should be done, it was ungenerous, but almost too transparent, and reminds one not a little of the old man in the "Nonsense Verses",

"Who said, how
Shall I flee from this terrible cow?
I will sit on this stile, and continue to smile,
And soften the heart of this cow."

How much Senator Sherman needs to enquire into the subject of finance may be also inferred from an assertion made by him in a speech in Ohio, in the fall of 1870, "that he was unable to recognize any difference between a tariff for revenue and a tariff for protection"; although, as Ex-Commissioner Wells remarked in his North American Review article, "the Senator at that very time could not name an article in the tariff, on which the duties had been levied mainly with a view to protection, in respect to which there had not been not only a resulting loss to the Treasury, but a heavy burden of taxation entailed upon the people." And again, in addressing the Chamber of Commerce in Cincinnati, after the adjournment of Congress last spring, he remarked that undoubtedly the tariff needed some amendment, and that he proposed during the summer and fall to give the subject consideration; which bit of wisdom, coming from the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, would be equivalent to a schoolmaster saying to his patrons that, inasmuch as they had selected him to teach their children to read and write, he would begin to take into consideration the expediency of learning to read and write himself.

In the recent debate in the Senate on Mr. Trumbull's resolution for a committee of investigation, we also find Senator Sherman just where every man that has watched his political career would expect to find him, namely, superserviceable in preventing anything from being done which does not conform to the narrowest rule of party expediency; and practising a discourtesy of which no other Senator was guilty, in reviving an old and wholly obsolete rule, not heard of in debate for years, to prevent Mr. Trumbull from speaking, and so hinder the truth in respect to corruption from coming before the public. In short, an examination of his public career shows him to be nothingmore nor less than one of those politicians whose elevation to high office has for the last quarter of a century tended to debase the whole tone of American politics. We trust, therefore, that, for the sake of the Republican party, and for the interests of financial reform, civil-service reform, and general progress, the rumor that the Ohio Legislature will relegate Mr. Sherman to private life, and select from out of the numerous other candidates some man of greater capacity to represent them in the Senate, may not be unfounded.

POLITICAL PROSPECTS.

WASHINGTON, December 21, 1871.

THE impressions received upon revisiting Washington, after an absence of seven months, most of which were spent abroad, may, perhaps, prove interesting to readers of the Nation. The Administration party has unquestionably gained strength during the summer, both by reason of positive achievement and the abandonment of schemes of aggression in the West Indies. The Alabama Treaty has justly brought great credit upon the men who negotiated it, and the promise given by the President to inaugurate a reform of the civil service will further increase public confidence. Moreover, as the time for holding the National Republican Convention has approached, there has been a visible tightening of the bonds of party. I could mention several members of Congress from the West who were ready to play the part of rebellious captains last spring, and who are now dutifully serving in the ranks. There are, however, a few men, who best represent the intellect, the culture, and the liberalism of the Republican party, who are exceedingly distrustful of professions of desire for reform coming from a President who dismissed Mr. D. A. Wells, who forced ex-Secretary Cox from the Cabinet, who appointed Sickles Minister to Spain, and who used the power of Federal patronage against Carl Schurz and Gratz Brown in Missouri. I myself, however, think that, notwithstanding his affiliations with the Morton and Cameron school of politicians, the President is at present sincere in his expressed intention to carry out the plans of the civil-service Commissioners as regards future appointments to office. In this he shows political sagacity, for the public offices are now filled with men who can be depended upon to work for his renomination, while by his adoption of the recommendations of the Commissioners he bids high for the support of civil-service reformers. Promises to make no appointments to office from improper motives after the first of January will not satisfy thorough-going reformers, to be sure; but the influence of even such promises upon the country will be considerable. It is very clear that the Administration party intend to lighten their ship during her passage through the maelstrom of the Presidential election by throwing over the deck-load of abuses. "I should not be surprised," said a leader of reform in the Senate to me, "to see Grant become a revenue reformer before spring."

The truth about Grant's character I believe to be this: he likes the fun of being President, and it matters little to one whose knowledge of the principles of government is crude, and whose opinions are consequently ill-defined and loosely held, whether there is a protective or a free-trade tariff; whether Sickles is Minister to Spain or some one else, so long as Grant inhabits the White House and has its stables well filled. Such a man cannot and does not satisfy the American people; but when, dissatisfied, we try to find a better man, we meet with great difficulties. As Mr. Montgomery Blair has well said, there is a compress at work keeping Grant in the Presidential chair. It is, of course, the Democratic party. I believe it to be the conviction of all practical politicians in Washington that Grant is certain of his renomination and of his re-election, in the event of a Democratic nomination, no matter how good a one. But I am equally persuaded that all this confidence would speedily vanish should the Democrats adopt the Missouri policy. The question of the hour is, Will they do it? I came to Washington to get light upon this question, and I find the feeling among the wisest of the Democratic leaders to be that it is possible that their party may consent to die, provided some sort of resurrection and a future life is guaranteed. In other words, they say: We may consent to form an alliance with liberal Republicans, but we will not agree to stand aside and allow them to do as they please without consulting us. There is another set of Democratic politicians, who are well represented by the Cincinnati Enquirer, who, being "war-horses," talk about nailing the Democratic banner to the mast, and who discountenance any alliance with Republicans as necessarily involving a surrender of what they are pleased to call their principles. This folly is, I believe, sufficiently luminous to be seen of all men. While professing to stand up for their own opinions, they are, in reality, refusing to adopt the only possible plan of action by which their triumph can be made even probable. There is wisdom enough still in the Democratic party to secure the prevalence of a policy of alliance, provided there are allies to be had. The Missouri Republicans, who elected Gratz Brown against the power of the Administration, still control the politics of the State, and are understood to be ready and anxious for an alliance. The Illinois Republicans are not Grant men, and prefer and would vote in the Republican National Convention for any other candidate who might show sufficient strength to be considered a rival of Grant. And many of them would leave the party, I am convinced, if the Missouri policy should be adopted by the Democrats. In Ohio there is also much angry dislike of Grant; and I doubt whether the State could be depended on to go for him, should his opponent be Gratz Brown, Senator Trumbull, or Judge Davis. In Wisconsin, the Republicans are even more rebellious. I am informed there is clearly plenty of material for a new political combination, but there is a sad want of leaders. The Missouri men alone have burnt their ships. From what I see and hear, the conviction is forced upon me that there will be no lead given by men like Trumbull voluntarily. They may be forced by the Administration party into opposition, but they will go reluctantly and timidly.

If we are to have a new party, it will grow out of the debates in Congress this winter. Although, at this moment, nothing of importance separates the Liberal Republicans and Anti-Bourbon Democrats, and, while I have heard men representing both say to each other, "It would not take us long to write a platform upon which we both could stand," still the bonds of party remain. And upon the party-standing of Congressmen their renominations depend. As things are now, say they, we are sure of our future, but where should we be if new combinations come about? Men in Congress of the opposite parties have got to get used to each other's society, to go through the letters often in company, to confer with each other in caucuses against a common enemy. What question is likely to arise that can force reluctant members into each other's arms? There is but one, viz.: the question of free-trade versus protection. If this is vigorously pressed, Kelley and Randall will go through letters together, and Trumbull and Thurman will become allies. The Republicans of the West and the Democrats of the East will be found acting in concert. Grant must take sides, and no commission can be formed to bridge over the torrent of invectives which Kelley and Maynard are likely to pour upon Burchard and Finkelnburg. Revenue reformers may prove strong enough to persuade the facile Grant to have no opinion of his own, and to know only that of the people; but I doubt it. The protectionists are powerful in the Senate, and the States of Pennsylvania and Michigan are Grant States. Some compromise is sure to be offered by the Administration, but it will satisfy neither side.

COMMUNIST MANNERS.

PARIS, December 8, 1871.

JUSTICE, says Horace, often comes slowly "pede claudo." It is a great pity. The executions which took place in Paris during the terrible week when our soldiers took the capital street by street, by the light of the monuments set on fire, filled every heart with awe, but did not awaken any feeling of shame or remorse. The policy afterwards adopted in sentencing the Communists has been just exposed to much criticism. The responsible leaders of the sedition, the members of the Commune, have not been treated with sufficient severity, while thousands of unfortunate workingmen, who were led by ignorance, folly, and misery into the ranks of the Commune, have been condemned to transportation; while M. Rane, a member of the Commune, is allowed to go free, and is even a member of the Municipal Council of Paris, many innocent men, taken among the Communists, are still awaiting sentence in the prisons of Versailles and on the hulks of Brest. There ought to be morality in punishment, otherwise punishment loses all its social value. We do not punish men for the wicked pleasure of seeing them suffer, but in order that the multitude may see a relation between crime and chastisement. If the relation is lost—if there is no measure between guilt and punishment, the minds of the people only become more confused. Hundreds of young radicals are encouraged by the leniency shown towards M. Rane and others. It would have been easy for the Council of War to condemn all the members of the Commune on some particular point—let us say, for instance, for what the military court calls embouchage, that is, for enticing the soldiers of the regular army to abandon their ranks and to serve under another flag. After the 10th of March, the Commune made a proclamation, in which high pay was offered to all the soldiers forgotten and abandoned in Paris. This was clearly a case of embouchage. And the punishment of this crime in the French law is death. It would have been easy to commute a sentence rendered against every member of the Commune, according to the conduct of each individual member.

So far, only two members of the Commune have been condemned to death —Ferré, the assassin of the hostages, and Rossel, the General of the Commune for a few weeks. Even the Reds have not attempted to defend the memory of Ferré, but the radical papers are attempting to throw a sort of halo around Rossel—a young, intelligent officer of the Engineers, who professed that he espoused the cause of the Commune, moved by a patriotic rage. He tried, during the siege of Metz, to excite a military conspiracy against Bazaine, but found no support among his comrades; General Changarnier, to whom he offered the command of the army, spoke to him as a father does to an angry child, and dismissed him with a few kind words. After the capitulation he escaped, and offered his services to Gambetta. It is difficult to understand why, being so furious against the Prussians and so anxious to fight, he allowed himself to spend a few months in the camps of Nevers, where he was almost lost. Gambetta would undoubtedly have given him more active service if he had insisted upon it. We find him afterwards in Paris as a general of the Commune, fighting against his friends and comrades. He attempted to enforce some order in the ranks of the Communists; he had one poor fellow shot under his own eyes who refused to fight against the Versaillais. His orders were of the most stringent, even of the most cruel character. Every effort was made after his condemnation to obtain his pardon; but it was impossible to pardon him. The French army would have felt insulted if he had been. After all, a soldier must understand that, if he deserts his flag, he has no mercy to expect. Rossel employed the last days of his life in writing various letters to his friends and relatives. There is a radical paper called the Constitution which calls these pages "the testament of an elect—a sublime leaf of the eternal bible written by the race of Adam with its own blood." Gambetta's paper, the French Republic, speaks of Rossel as of a martyr in a holy cause. The Republicans do not yet understand that they lose all chance of converting the French people to their ideas so long as they allow themselves to be considered as systematic revolutionists.

The Communists who publish a paper in London called the Qui Vive? do all they can to keep the French bourgeoisie in a state of mortal terror. I wonder if the equivalent of Vermesch, the editor of the Qui Vive? could be found in England or America? He is a type which can only be found in the Paris boulevard—a man still young, well educated, without any political convictions, fond of pleasure, who began his career by writing frivolous articles in the Figaro about the scandals of the day, the last duel, the last piece of Alexander Dumas, junior, the demi-monde, etc., spending his evening at the theatre and his nights at the Café Anglais or the gambling-table. When the siege of Paris began, frivolity ceased to be the order of the day. Vermesch adopted the republican tone of austerity; his only object was to write a paper which should bring as much money as possible. When the Commune triumphed, he published the Père Duchêne, which was so successful among the populace that Vermesch had, I hear, a net profit of a thousand francs a day. The Père Duchêne was a servile imitation of a paper published under the same name during the Terror, written in the coarsest and the foulest language, with an obscene oath in almost every line. I have several copies before me; even the type of the old revolutionary paper was imitated, and the ideal Republic, with the Phrygian cap and the niveau of equality in hand, was reproduced at the head of it. In these numbers Vermesch recommends the murder of the hostages, the burning of the monuments, the pillage of the houses of all noted royalists, etc. As soon as the Commune was in danger, Vermesch fled, and now he publishes the Qui Vive? for the Communists of Leicester Square. He informs the French bourgeoisie that the Commune was too tender, too generous, but that the next revolution will be unmerciful. "We will," says he, "cut off all your heads, even if they be covered with white hair." This is another extract: "We have been merciful to these frightened rascals. We will be so no more. Between them and us there will be an eternal war; speak no more of contempt, speak no more of prisons—death! O slaughtering heroes! the time will soon come when you will be slaughtered! There will be no more question then of burning these bicoques" (these bicoques, which means good-for-nothing houses, are the Tuileries, the Hôtel de Ville, etc.) "or of shooting in an obscure corner a few abject spies, a few ignoble Jesuits. Oh no! then, bourgeoisie, you will die! Then we will evoke Marat, whose eye follows us in the dark: for thou alone, Marat, wast right:

"'Pour que le peuple touche
A ce port qui s'enfuit toujours,
Il nous faut au grand jour la justice farouche,
Sans haines comme sans amours,
Dont l'effrayante voix, plus haut que la tempête,
Parle dans sa sincérité,
Et dont la main tranquille au ciel lève la tête
De Prudhomme décapité!'"

Prudhomme is the type of the French middle class, created by Henri Monnier in his curious "Signes Populaires"; it is a type as well known as that of John Bull in England. Prudhomme is a pompous, stupid fellow, fond of fine phrases, always bent on "giving a lesson" to the men in power, but very timid in revolutionary times. He is the man to whom his comrades of the National Guard offer a sword of honor, and who makes the answer, now become proverbial: "This sword is the finest day of my life; I will always keep it, comrades, and always use it to protect the laws, and, if need be, to attack them."

You see what fate the Père Duchêne promised to our Parisian bourgeoisie, though it was, to a certain extent, by its folly and weakness an accomplice of the Commune. If I have cited these few verses, it was to show to you that Vermesch is a poet, and not quite without merit. He has published several poems in which there is real talent; and this is just what I beg you to notice. Vermesch and the men of his class are not ignorant fanatics, nor sectarians, they are cold-blooded charlatans; they serve one cause just as they would another. Is there in the whole American Republic a single republican of this type, a man who tells the people to kill the rich, to burn their houses, to confiscate their property? In France, unfortunately, Vermesch is only one of a numerous class who, under the name of the Republic, are merely egotist leaders of a social war. There is no marked limit between Vermesch and Ranc, once a member of the commune. Ranc is the friend and associate of Gambetta; Gambetta was the colleague of some of M. Thiers's actual ministers; and thus it is that the Republican party is actually a kind of monster, with M. Thiers for its monarchical head, and the long, enormously broad tail of communalist socialism. Who can wonder if, as a nation, France sees this monster with dread, and almost with horror? "Desinit in piscem mulier formosa superne." Most eyes are only fixed on this awful tail; all the life of the body seems to have gone to it and to its horrid excrescences—men like Ferré, like Vermesch, like that other man, Maroteau, who has a kind of morbid genius, and wrote one of the most extraordinary papers published under the Commune; he is only twenty years old, and has been condemned to death, but will probably be allowed to die from consumption, as he is very ill in prison. It is to me a problem how men like Maroteau and Vermesch can take their pens and write on virgin paper the horrible lines they have written. The demon of vanity, I suppose, is in them; they must, they will attract the world's notice; they would rather die the death of a criminal than die ignored. Their life is a long orgie; they are morally drunken; they are maniacs of revolution. Those among you in America who wish success to the French republic, ought to remember that the old Latin countries have to deal with men and with ideas which you have hardly any knowledge of. The only men in France who would be good citizens under a republic are those who desire for the present a constitutional monarchy.

Notes.

THE editors of the American Naturalist announce that, with the commencement of their new volume, they will make the department of microscopy a special feature of the magazine, placing it under the charge of Dr. R. H. Ward, of Troy, and making it a medium of communication for investigators, teachers, and instrument-makers. The December number already gives some idea of what this department will be, and has besides a very varied table of contents—the beginning of a scientific account of the Mammoth Cave and its inhabitants, a paper on the long-crested jay, and another on a singing-mouse from Florida. This last merits the attention of musically-disposed readers, who will here find (perhaps for the first time) a notation of the melodies of this species of songsters. The writer states that on one occasion his little prima donna sang for nine minutes together without pause or cessation.

—One who signs himself "Not a Public-spirited Philadelphian, but a Nervous New Englander," after paying a deserved compliment to the modesty of Philadelphians, and another to the well-known collections of birds and of crania in the museum of their Academy of Natural Sciences, writes us as follows: "The final fact, to which the foregoing is only preparatory (by way of getting the good-will of the audience), may imply a lack of self-esteem. This matchless collection is in a building totally inadequate in size, and, what is worse, which is without any pretensions to being fire-proof. And yet the appeal for funds to erect a commodious and fire-proof building meets with so feeble a response that the mathematical probabilities are very great that fire will consume the whole before a fit building is provided for it." We should say that the friends of the University of Pennsylvania might do worse than assist in overcoming this indifferenee.

—We apprehend that there can be no difference of opinion as to the propriety of devoting the surplus of the indemnity paid us by China a dozen years ago—which no Administration has been disposed to pocket, and which the Chinese Government declines to take back—to found an American college in China. Indeed, had there been time in this eventful period to consider what disposition should be made of the $400,000, we might already have seen it applied to this useful purpose, according to the original suggestion of Dr. S. Wells Williams, the well-known author of the "Middle Kingdom." Mr. W. P. Jones, late U. S. Consul in China, who is now seeking to revive the project, states, from his experience and observations for six years at Macao, Amoy, and Canton, that "the prejudice to our political and commercial relations with the Chinese suffered for the want of suitable interpreters, works incalculable mischief and injury both to themselves and to us. . . . He has firm faith in the slow but steady progress of China in the adoption of American and European inventions and ideas, and feels confident that the proposed institution would effect the most beneficial results, and prove one of the wisest acts of diplomacy this government can perform."

—Our notice, last week, of the late Mr. Tuckerman was necessarily more brief than we could have wished to make it, and we need offer no excuse for further remarks on an American man of letters who, without being prominent, was well known for more years than the present generation of readers can remember. He received his education and attained his majority at a period in our literary history when the United States could hardly afford a man such education and culture in letters as should prepare him for any very good literary work, unless he possessed talent of a high order, or had in him native force of genius. High talent, however, or force of genius Mr. Tuckerman had not; and though his earlier productions gave him a name which, twenty-five years ago, was not inconsiderable among his contemporaries, it is, like many other American literary names once bright, now faded. This decadence, however, though of necessity, and right, and rather to be a little sighed over than really regretted, should not prevent our remembering the obligations with which we of to-day are bound to those American workers in literature of whom Mr. Tuckerman was one; who without too much encouragement from their surroundings—and with a sort of encouragement, when they got any, that perhaps was less stimulative than gratifying—promoted, so far as they could, the interest of art and of elegant letters in this country. It is because they smoothed the road somewhat that we walk with a more assured step, if we do so walk, as compared with them. They, at all events, made some of our mistakes for us, and saved us the need of making them. That he helped to promote the interest of literature and art among his countrymen constitutes, we suppose, Mr. Tuckerman's principal claim to remembrance; or, if this claim be postponed to any other, it may probably come next to that founded upon his industrious collecting of historical, biographical, and literary facts in various fields—as, for instance, when he compiled a somewhat curious book made up of the judgments passed upon this country by European tourists, or when he got together the biographical details for his work on American painting. It is now not much worth while, and indeed for some years has not been worth while, to point out that Mr. Tuckerman's other claims to remembrance are but slight. His poetry, elaborated with care, does not call for other remark than that it was like much of the verse made by men of fair ability and literary habits. His criticism of pictures and artists is somewhat voluminous; but only such of it is received with assent by competent judges of art as has been received by everybody from other sources, and has been long established; for much more than this he is not looked to, and less than this is not often found in him. As to his literary criticisms, the case with them is not far different. Often they have a great deal of such correctness as may be had when one repeats echo-like, but with diminished distinctness of articulation, what has long been said; often they attain correctness by leaving discrimination unattempted and seeking the safety of general terms, to the disregarding of anything like definiteness; and often they are mistaken. But whether they are wrong or whether they are right, a vapidity that makes it of not much consequence whether they are wrong or right is their characteristic quality. They seem to give evidence of a kind disposition, of rather sluggish sympathies and susceptibilities, of small acumen, of small comprehensiveness of thought or strength of reasoning, of that sincere fondness for books and bookishness which, as we have remarked above, to have felt and to have acted upon was, at one period in our history, to have done a public service of some importance. When thinking of the exaggerated praises that we find set down against the names of some of our earlier writers, and the too much distinction which the pursuit of literature seems to have conferred in their time, we are apt to forget that this happened only in certain circles, and that there were other circles vastly more numerous and vastly larger where the reward of much devotion to literature was mainly contempt and wonderment. The exaggerated reputations at which we smile could only have been obtained in a community which as a whole held literary pursuits not in exaggerated esteem, but in little or none. And Doctor Griswold's laudations are not so good evidence that literary fame was eagerly bestowed in the America of his day as that it was little sought or cared for at all. Next to nobody troubled himself with the notion that fame or anything else was in that way to be got. Something Mr. Tuckerman did to bring this state of things to an end.

—The proceedings of the American Oriental Society at New Haven in October appear in the usual abstract for the information of the public, and embrace thirteen communications of a high character, by Professors Hadley and Whitney, President Woolsey, Mr. Addison Van Name, a number of missionaries, and others. Mr. Ezra Abbot's paper is a criticism of Archbishop Trench's distinction (laid down in his "Synonyms of the New Testament") between αἰτέω and ἐρωτάω, and arrives at the conclusion, in which it will be safe to rest, that the former word "is generally to ask for something which one wishes to receive, something to be given or granted, rarely for something to be done"; the latter word, on the contrary, "is generally to request or beseech a person to do something, rarely to give something." This distinction is established by the construction which follows these verbs—in the one case an accusative of the object asked for; in the other, an infinitive or a subjunctive clause. The Rev. J. T. Gracey describes a commentary on the Bible, by Syud Ahmed Khan, printed by the author in two volumes in 1862 and 1865, at his private press in Ghazeepore and Allyghur, India. The text, in double columns, is in Hindustani and English; and the work is a liberal recognition of what is common in Christian and Mohammedan scripture and belief. The following extract is from "Remarks on the Relation of the Chinese and Mongolian Languages," by Rev. John T. Gulick:

"The conception which determined the classification of the points of the compass was originally the same in Chinese, Tibetan, and Mongolian, although in modern Chinese its primitive form has been greatly modified and obscured. In these languages the south is always mentioned before the north, and, in ancient Chinese and Mongolian, the west before the east. We further find, in Mongolian, that the word south means 'in front,' for north, 'behind,' for west, 'to the right,' for east, 'to the left.' In the other languages, some of the points are named in the same way. The character which in Chinese stands for north is composed of two men turned back to back, and originally meant 'to turn the back upon' or 'behind.'" In the compass, the index is placed upon the south point of the needle. In at least one passage of the ancient classics, Mr. Gulick had found the word right used for 'west.' In languages of other families, the points of the compass are sometimes named upon the same principle, but another point is usually assumed to be in front. Thus, in Hebrew, the words before, behind, right, and left are used, but the east is in front. With us, in giving the points of the compass in their order, the north is conceived to be faced. The Hawaiians front toward the west, and call north 'right' and south 'left.'"

—A good children's book—a very much better one than its external appearance indicates, for it has a cheap look—is Mr. Richard Meade Bache's "American Wonderland," of which we accidentally omitted to make notice last week. Mr. Bache had the good thought to go to the stores of legends which may be found scattered through the works that treat of our Aborigines, and thence he has brought many stories which he has done into English, and which almost all readers, no matter how well versed in folk-lore, will find of a fresh and pleasant taste. He promises more of them, and is to have the assistance of Mr. D. G. Brinton, the well-known author of "The Myths of the New World." We should think—considering the conservatism of children, and the somewhat conventionalized character of the wonderland with which, for some generations now, the children have been familiar—that it might be advisable to prefix to the next edition of this "American Wonderland," or the next volume of similar legends, a few words that would make the youthful reader a little more at home in the unaccustomed scene, by giving him some information as to the customs and beliefs of the Indians. It would not, for instance, destroy the charm of such a legend as "The Road to Paradise," if the boy were told of the Indian's custom of burying with his dead the implements of the chase which are to be of use to him in the happy hunting-grounds. And a vocabulary of the strange Indian words, so accented as to show the right pronunciation, would be of service, as ignorance on this point detracts so much from the pleasure of reading about fictitious persons and places. We may remark here, in view of the new edition which we suppose to be certain to come, that a story like that of "Mishosha" would be the better of a little pruning at the beginning, where there is matter that might as well have been omitted. The author allows himself some liberties with his originals, as it is not primarily his intention to show precisely what Indian legends are; he is making a story-book for children, and not a work for scholars, and his omissions and additions, and omissions to omit, must be tried by other tests than scholars could apply. One story, very like Hans Andersen in incidents, and, perhaps, made still more like him by direct imitation of his manner on the part of the compiler, we had intended to quote, it is so good. "The Boy Who Snared the Sun" is the name of it. But it is not particularly characteristic of the volume, which is of a fresh flavor, and our space admonishes us to refer the reader to the book itself, where, by the bye—we must make room to say—he will find, amid much else that is good, the striking effect of the apparition of two associated ghosts, bringing home to the beholders, as one ghost cannot, the fact of other worlds, other interests, and other laws. The spectacle of the social communion, to call it so, between the two, so separated as they are from human fellowship, and in the midst of human beings all around them, is very effective upon the imagination.

—Mr. Thomas Hughes has written a letter to the London Daily News in which he states that the Anglo-American Association, having no space large enough to store the material that is coming in or promised by British authors, publishers, and learned societies, in response to the committee's appeal for books for the Chicago Free Library, application has been made to the Crystal Palace Company, and the board of directors of that company have willingly given the necessary space. Mr. Hughes suggests that, as the Queen has set the good example of giving her autograph on the title-page of her books, all authors will do well to do the same. And further, as the library will contain books old and new in all departments of literature, donations in money will be employed in the purchase of rare books not otherwise obtainable, and in payment of the necessary expenses. Such donations may be forwarded to Sir John Rose (of Norton, Rose & Co., No. 1 Bartholomew Lane, E. C.), who has kindly consented to act as treasurer. The honorary secretaries, Messrs. A. H. Burgess and F. W. Chesson, will answer any enquiries addressed to them at No. 1 Adam Street, Adelphi. We find elsewhere that the Early English Text Society has promised a complete set of its publications.

—We are now in possession of enough particulars of the fire at Warwick Castle to make it possible to judge pretty accurately how great our losses are by that calamity. The fire was discovered at about one o'clock on Sunday morning, December 3, by one of the servants, who roused two of the footmen. The alarm-bell was rung, and messengers went off for help to Leamington, Coventry, and Kenilworth. Engines and firemen were soon on the spot, but the whole of the east wing was destroyed before they arrived. Serious as the destruction proved, it might have been complete had it not been for the courage and presence-of-mind of William Everton, one of the footmen. Preparations were being made at the castle for the Christmas hunting-party, and the Earl had sent down 50,000 cartridges, which were stored in the gun-room. The whole of this dangerous material was carried out of the house by this brave fellow, and put where it could not be reached by the flames. Fortunately for the public, the fire began in the east wing in the private apartments of the family; and before the flames had reached the great hall, which separated these from the state apartments, all the pictures, furniture, and tapestries which they contained had been removed out of danger. The celebrated baronial hall, sixty feet long by forty feet wide, and twenty-six feet high, would seem to have been entirely destroyed. Nothing but charred wood and ashes remains of the old oak panelling with which the walls were covered, or of the fine roof constructed in 1851, from the designs of Mr. Poynter. The wainscot was hung with antlers of deer, and with ancient armor, valuable either from its workmanship or from its having belonged to famous people. Indeed, to perhaps the majority of those who visited Warwick Castle, the old arms and armor were the chief attraction. The originals from which Colonel Colt borrowed his "invention" of the revolver, and from which the inventors of the mitrailleuse and the breech-loaders borrowed theirs, were the objects of greater interest to many than were the noble roof, the carved wainscot, gleaming with the mirror-like polish of many years, the floor of Venice marble, or the lovely view from the deep bay-window and its balcony. We are led to suppose that this most interesting and valuable collection shared the fate of the room that held it, but it is possible it may have been saved, for we read that there was time to save a portion of the contents of the new dining-room, which, we believe, lay between the great hall and the rooms in which the fire started. As for the state apartments—the red drawing-room, the gilt drawing-room, the cedar drawing-room, the state bedroom, and the state dressing-room—they were saved, as it would appear, by the thickness of the stone wall that separated the red drawing-room, the first of the suite, from the great hall. When it was perceived that the destruction of the great hall could not be stayed, and when the flames were already seen through the chinks of the thick oaken doors that separated it from the red room, the people began to carry out of the state apartments everything of value that could be moved. Some of the pictures were set in the panels of the walls, and secured by ornamented beadings or mouldings. These had to be torn or cut out if they were to be saved at all, and it is to be feared that they must have suffered by the operation. The fine tapestry that covered the walls of the state bedroom was torn away from its fastenings, and the bedstead, with its beautiful hangings and coverings, which was once Queen Anne's, and was given to the grandfather of the present Earl by George III., was carried off piecemeal. Some of the furniture was too heavy to be moved, but the marble and mosaic tops of tables were taken off and all the smaller pieces were removed. Much of the furniture in these apartments was of great beauty and rarity, and we can only hope that it has not been irreparably damaged in the saving. The pictures that made the chief glory of Warwick are, as far as we can learn, nearly all unharmed. The Rubenses, Rembrandts, Salvators, Carraccis, the portraits by Zacchero, Lely, and Kneller were saved, and also the portrait of Henry VIII., once famous as a Holbein, yet, though no longer believed to be one, a fine picture by whomever painted. The famous portrait of Charles I. and his armor-bearer, by Vandyke, is safe, and, though no express mention is made of it, we will hope that the equally famous and, to our thinking, far more beautiful picture by the same master, "The Children of Charles I.," was also rescued.

—To those persons who find Kaulbach as tiresome as we do, with his overmuch academic learning and his overmuch posing and make-believe, and who yet would like to have one of Goethe's famous works with illustrative pictures, we commend the new edition of the "Hermann and Dorothea," with eight photographs by Franz Hanfstängl, after pictures by Arthur Freiherr von Ramberg. These are really beautiful pictures, full of sweet, tender, fresh, and unaffected nature, and ought to give pleasure to all who know and love the poem whose qualities they perfectly reflect in being what we have declared them to be. Placed alongside of Kaulbach's illustrations to the same poem, they make that much overrated artist's work seem more theatrical and stiff than ever.

THE LAST TOURNAMENT.*

"The Last Tournament" belongs to Mr. Tennyson's series of "Idylls of the King," in which its proper place is just after "Pelleas and Ettarre" and just before the better known idyll called "Guinevere." It is, perhaps, most noticeable not for itself, but as giving increased emphasis to the moral element in the poem of which it forms a part, and bringing into fuller light the author's purpose of giving to the mediæval story still more of moral symbolism than was given to it by Mapes—or whoever it was that first gave a religiously and morally didactic quality to legends originally not so endowed to any great extent, and which, after Mapes's time, in the hands of Sir Thomas Malory and his readers, as well as in later times nearer our own, certainly exercised their charm on the fancy and imagination far more than on the ethical or spiritual part of men's natures.

The story of this latest idyll is not long. Sir Tristram is the hero, being the victor in the last tournament held at Camelot before the discovery of Guinevere's infidelity, and the coming of the train of ills that followed Lancelot's departure across the seas for Benwicke, the war between him and Arthur, the treason of Modred, the great destruction of the knights of the Round Table, and the incoming of the heathen. Arthur and Lancelot riding, one gloomy day of wind and rain, beneath a great wall of winding rock, hear the wail of a child from an eagle's nest high up the crag. Lancelot, climbing, rescues the child, which has about its neck a carcanet of rubies. The Nestling, as the child is called, is given to the Queen, who tries to rear it, but it dies, and she returns the necklace to the King, saying:

> "Take thou the jewels of this dead innocence,
> And make them, an thou wilt, a tourney-prize.
>
> Perchance—who knows?—the purest of thy knights
> May win them for the purest of my maids."

Pure knight or pure maid, however, it is now hard to find in Arthur's court, whence truth, honor, courtesy, chastity, obedience, have long departed, leaving no more than their shadows behind. Everything is tainted, and all things forebode the time of dissolution. The knights are making ready for the day of jousting.

> "But on the hither side of that loud morn
> Into the hall staggered, his visage ribbed
> From ear to ear with dog-whip weals, his nose
> Bridge-broken, one eye out, and one hand off,
> And one with shattered fingers dangling lame,

*"The Last Tournament. By Alfred Tennyson, D.C.L." Boston: James R. Osgood & Co., and J. E. Tilton & Co.

A churl, to whom indignantly the King,
'My churl, for whom Christ died, what evil beast
Hath drawn his claws athwart thy face? or fiend?
Man was it who marred Heaven's image in thee thus?'

"Then, sputtering through the hedge of splintered teeth,
Yet strangers to the tongue, and with blunt stump
Pitch-blackened sawing the air, said the maimed churl,
'He took them and he drave them to his tower—
Some hold he was a table knight of thine—
A hundred goodly ones—the Red Knight he—
Lord, I was tending swine, and the Red Knight
Brake in upon me and drave them to his tower;
And when I called upon thy name as one
That doest right by gentle and by churl,
Maimed me and mauled, and would have outright slain,
Save that he sware me to a message, saying,'" etc.

The message is to the effect that the Red Knight has founded a Round Table in the North; that the knights who sit about it are all adulterers, like King Arthur's own, but are truer knights, since they profess to be none other than they are; that his tower, like Arthur's court, is full of harlots, who are, however, not hypocrites; and that Excalibur shall be broken. Upon this, Arthur commands Lancelot to sit as arbitrator of the tournament, while he breaks up the robber's den:

"Thereto Sir Lancelot answered, 'It is well:
Yet better if the King abide, and leave
The leading of his younger knights to me.'

Then Arthur rose, and Lancelot followed him,
And while they stood without the doors, the King
Turned to him, saying, 'Is it then so well?'"

For, as it seems to him, he sees the foot loiter that is bidden go; he sees the glance that is but "half-loyal to command," "a manner somewhat fallen from reverence," "a manhood ever less and lower." He goes forth, however, and the Red Knight, surprised at an orgie, is slain, and his hold is burned; but in the attack, the young knights whom Arthur has with him to teach them knightly war show bloody ferocity instead of magnanimous valor, massacring men asleep and shrieking women,

"And in the heart of Arthur pain was lord," for now with each new event the air grows fuller of dreary portent.

Lancelot, meantime, sits umpire at the last tournament—which is

"By these in earnest, those in mockery, called The Tournament of the Dead Innocence"

—and he adjudges the prize to Sir Tristram, but not without a momentary wild desire, when he sees Tristram's strength, and remembers how they two had fought, and Sir Tristram had held his own, to descend into the lists himself, and shake

"The burthen off his heart in one full shock
With Tristram even to death. . . ."

And not without wrath and shame at the cowardice of some of the knights, the lawlessness of others, and the discourtesy of the victor—who will grace no lady as queen of love and beauty, but puts up the rubies, saying,

"Fair damsels—each to him who worships each
Sole Queen of Beauty and of Love—behold
This day my Queen of Beauty is not here."

With these rude words, riding away, Tristram seeks Isolt, his mistress, King Mark's wife, musing as he goes through the autumn woods, wondering if Isolt knows of his marriage with Isolt of Brittany, and meditating its concealment from her. He finds her at Tintagil, and there a somewhat stormy interview takes place between the two, for Tristram makes some attempts to deceive his mistress as to his marriage, of which, however, she is informed. The scene is, for the most part, sufficiently labored and ineffective—though, certainly, it has not the curious forceless forcibleness of the account, above quoted, of the maimed and mauled swineherd, nor of the description of the Red Knight's extirpation; but it ends with some not expected dramatic power. Tristram, after some reflections on the folly of his vows to Arthur, and on the lightness of vows of love—as to which last he makes a song of a lugubrious sort of lightness, perhaps well adapted to the nature of the sentiment—and after some asseverations of his indifference to his wife, and the ardency of his passion for his mistress, succeeds in soothing Isolt, throws the rubies about her neck, and is embracing her, when,

"Behind him rose a shadow and a shriek,
'Mark's way,' said Mark, and clove him through the brain."

The rest of the scene is dreamy—though we do not know that it is incongruously so—and without fire; and there is a touch of surprise when Mark enters to such purpose.

We have said that "The Last Tournament" has the merit of making still more obvious, if that were necessary, Mr. Tennyson's idea of the poem to be fashioned out of the cycle of romance in which, so long ago as in his boyhood, he was working, and which has furnished his mature powers with their principal task. A fair and noble fabric—shattered in consequence of disloyalty to high ideals, and of the inability of the unpurged eye to recognize their beauty—this would seem to be what Mr. Tennyson, after he had passed the period of "The Lady of Shalott" and "Morte d'Arthur," set himself to show us in the later Arthurian poems—these "Idylls of the King." Hence, perhaps, it is that they are idylls "of the King," and that to Arthur the poet assigns the place of hero, though unquestionably, if we consider the relative poetic value of the various personages created by the makers of the Arthurian poetry, it is to the conception of Lancelot that the first, and by far the first, place must be assigned. It is the king, however, who embodies best Mr. Tennyson's leading thought, which is rather of a moral than poetical quality, though assuredly not devoid of poetry. Another lesson we may suppose the poet to have had in his mind besides this of the ruin that may be wrought by some moral weakness in noble natures, and the ignobleness of low natures—the lesson, namely, that such ruin wrought by companions in the struggle is never a reason for not contending to the end, and never a cause of final and hopeless defeat. Here, by the way, is perhaps the justification of giving, as the true end of the epic, "The Passing of Arthur," with its island valley of Avilion where Arthur's hurts shall be healed, and whence, still living, he is yet to come again, and to fulfil the design once baffled. But, perhaps, if the first of these lessons is well set forth, if we are made to see in his defeats the invincible Arthur, the second lesson we may be considered to have been learned when the first was taught us. Except it be for the inculcation of this second lesson, or for the romantic effect of the incident itself—of the mystic barge, the weeping queens, and the island valley—one would be inclined to think that the idyll called "Guinevere" might be taken as the proper conclusion of the epic into which Mr. Tennyson has wrought the old legends. In that idyll we have the guilt of Guinevere and Lancelot made manifest; the beloved wife and the trusted friend, the lily and rose of chivalry, are proved defiled and cankered, and chivalry the false worship of a false divinity; the fellowship of the Round Table, faith, loyalty, and valor failing, falls apart; the king who has wrought so long to rear the strong fabric of honor, and order, and law amidst the chaos of heathenish rapine and license sees now that the evil times have come that are to make all his labors vain, and, conscious of his betrayal and of the crumbling realm, he summons his remaining knights to a hopeless field, and goes from the queen to his last battle, forgiving her, indeed, as a man, but as a king and the guardian of the people and the state condemning her with the same inexorableness and clear justice with which he will meet the other traitor, Modred, in arms. In "Guinevere," then, the Arthur of this latest rendering of the legendary romance would seem to accomplish his destiny. There the perfect knight, the royal statesman, the warrior of Christ against the heathen, finds knighthood corrupted in man, chastity gone from woman, the realm rent within by treasonous feuds, and ready to receive its last stroke from the hordes of the pagans without. When he turns from the too late repentant queen at Almesbury, and moves dimly away towards the great battle in the West against those of his own household, Mr. Tennyson's Arthur, as it seems to us, fitly disappears into the darkness of a world too deep in darkness to be illumined by the "pure severity of perfect light" which he would have shed upon it had it been ready for the light. But probably this objection of ours as to the catastrophe of the "Idylls of the King" has its root in our general objection—more or less indefensible or defensible, and which we do not defend here—to the way in which Mr. Tennyson has dealt with the old romances. But whatever inimitable charm these have lost in his hands, the praise belongs to him of having revived for this generation and some generations to come, in a finished and beautiful work, adorned with poetry of his own, and breathing, too, the aroma of old-time poetry and impossible and captivating romance, an assemblage of beautiful and noble characters, the knowledge of whom is a sensible enlargement of the poetical horizon of most readers, and of strictly moral and mental horizons as well.

As for the merit of "The Last Tournament," considered apart from the merit of the poem in its place in the series of idylls, we believe we need say little. Those who have read the others of the series know already the kind of pleasure that may be got from this one; those who have not may doubtless better begin with some of the others, and indeed with the first. Perhaps most readers familiar with the idylls in general may feel themselves, in reading "The Last Tournament," a little tired of what they once very well liked, or never very well liked, as the case may be. But though a work should be by necessity of its nature not perfect, it does not follow that it is not better completed than incomplete, and we think most readers of "The Last Tournament" will agree that the poem helps to complete "The Idylls of the King." No one now will miss seeing that, as the action progresses, all things in Arthur's realm draw onwards towards doom and ruin. Such as saw it before will be too little thankful, perhaps, for Sir Tristram, Sir Dagonet, Mark, and the maimed churl, and the young knights who "sworded" the Red Knight's garrison.

THE KING OF THE BEGGARS.*

Of the curious little book named below, written by Robert Goadby, there exist, we believe, but two copies in this country which are accessible to the public—one in the Library of Congress, and the other in the Philadelphia Library. Another short life of Carew, called "The Accomplished Vagabond, or Compleat Mumper," published at Oxford in 1745, is rarer still. The new edition, just published in London, is not an exact reprint of either of these works, but is in various ways changed, and in some respects is the fullest account we have of the eccentric Bampfylde-Moore Carew. The book, whatever it may seem, is not another "Robinson Crusoe," but is, in most of the details, substantially true. The hero was twice transported to Maryland; and his adventures in America, with his descriptions of Philadelphia and other towns, and of the manners and life of the epoch, are interesting to us of the present day.

Bampfylde-Moore Carew, who was born in July, 1693, was the son of a clergyman in Devonshire, and descended from and connected with some of the oldest and most respectable families in England. As a boy he went to school at Tiverton, where he was much addicted to all kinds of sport and exercise, and especially to hunting with a pack of hounds, of which he and his schoolfellows had control. The neighboring farmers and gentlemen having made complaint of the damage their crops had suffered in one of these hunts, four or five of the young fellows, of whom Carew was one, from fear of punishment, joined a band of gypsies whom they met and got merry with. After being once initiated into vagabond life, no persuasion or suffering could induce Carew to leave it until after more than forty years of this existence, when he became worn-out and old, and settled down on a little property that had been left him. Of his schoolfellows who became gypsies with him, some soon returned to their families, while others devoted themselves, either entirely or at intervals, to the life of vagabonds and mendicants. It was a curious taste, and it throws no little light on the state of English society of that period, to find gentlemen, like Lord Weymouth, for instance, loving occasionally to disguise themselves and study the characters of their neighbors and friends by coming to their doors in rags for charity, and looking on each successful imposition as an act of prowess. Carew, by his skill in disguising and counterfeiting, soon acquired a great reputation, and was a welcome guest at many houses where he occasionally threw off his rags and lived for a few days as a gentleman. His family position contributed also to raise him above the common herd of beggars, and he was frequently urged by his acquaintances to see how often he could impose on them and on their friends. Not every one, however, regarded him in this favorable light, and some, either from personal feeling at being imposed on, or from a real hatred of this system of false mendicancy, caused him to be frequently arrested, and twice transported and sold as a slave.

Among the beggars themselves Carew was in high regard from the very successful tricks he had performed, and the numerous cheats he had devised, and when their chief died they elected Carew as their head or king. It seems that the beggars of this time—whether gypsies or not is uncertain—had banded together for the purpose of carrying on an organized system of imposture and deception, and as such submitted themselves to the absolute will of a sovereign whom they had freely elected. The former king—the predecessor of Carew—while on his death-bed, delivered himself of some maxims and advice to his people, put into his mouth of course by Mr. Goadby, which well explain the arts of professional beggars. He urges them, among other things, to observe carefully the persons they are about to attack; to judge as much as possible of their characters, and to tell them those stories which will be most likely to influence their compassionate feelings. The perusal, not only of this address, but of the whole account of the imposture of Carew, would be of service to many of us who are too apt to indulge in indiscriminate charity—a charity which is mostly either excessive good-nature, or a desire to rid one's self of a disagreeable object.

Carew's first visit to America was in consequence of a sentence of the Court of Quarter Sessions at Exeter, which condemned him to be transported to Maryland for seven years. After an eleven weeks' voyage from Falmouth, the vessel cast anchor in Mile's River, in Talbot County, and the captain fired a gun as a signal to the planters that the convicts had arrived, when a notice was immediately posted of the day of sale. The convicts were ordered on deck, a large bowl of punch was made, and the planters eagerly flocked on board. The able-bodied, and especially the mechanics, were quickly bought up, but Carew could find no purchaser. The next day he was taken ashore to be shown about, but while the captain was making merry with certain planters in a tavern, he managed to escape to the woods, with a pocketful of biscuit. He had reckoned without his host, for he met four timbermen, who stopped him, in hopes of the usual reward of five pounds, and, as he had no pass, conveyed him to the New Town jail. Here he met some old acquaintances, sea-captains from England, who would willingly have bought him out, but he refused to be freed by their generosity, and was redelivered to his captain. His escapade only secured him a severe flogging, hard work, and an iron collar riveted around his neck. Again he escaped, and after many adventures in the woods with wild beasts came to a tribe of friendly Indians, of whom he recounts many curious details. After being treated with great hospitality by their chief, who filed off his collar with his own hands, and made him a bosom friend, he got away and reached Newcastle, where he fell in with the Quakers. He was helped on by them to Chester, where Mr. Whitefield was preaching, whom he made one of the victims of his imposition.

With Philadelphia Carew was very much pleased, and his biographer gives a long description of its plan and advantages. Among other things, he says: "Several creeks run into the city out of the two rivers, and there is no city in Holland that is so naturally accommodated with fine and commodious canals as this might easily be. The quay is beautiful, about two hundred feet square, to which a ship of five hundred tons may lay her broadside; and as these surprising advantages have already rendered it one of the best trading towns in the British Empire out of Europe, so in all probability it will continue to increase in commerce, riches, and buildings, till for number and magnificence it will have no equal in America, where the French have not, nor are likely to have, anything like it." Through Burlington, Perth Amboy, and Elizabeth Town Carew proceeded to the then small town of New York, containing about 1,100 houses and 7,000 inhabitants, contrasting strongly in appearance with Philadelphia. "He was surprised at the sight of a great number of gibbets, with blacks hanging upon them; but, upon enquiring, he found the negroes had not long before entered into a conspiracy for burning the whole city; however, the plot being timely discovered, great numbers were executed and hung up to terrify others." "The inhabitants of the Dutch extraction," he says, "make a very considerable part of the town, but most of them speaking English, one may suppose they went pretty much to the great church, especially all those that are or hope to be in offices."

After travelling through Long Island, Carew took a ship at New London for England, and accomplished his threat of getting back to Exeter two months before the captain who took him out, though he narrowly escaped being impressed into the navy when he was within sight of shore. His return was hailed with joy by his quondam friends and patrons, who would hardly believe that he had ever really been transported. He took to his old tricks again, and after a series of adventures in Russia, Sweden, Germany, and France, was sent once more to America, but this time illegally and arbitrarily, being kidnapped by the owner of the vessel which had first carried him, who felt defrauded at the loss of his purchase-money, Carew having escaped before he was sold. No sooner landed, however, than he again ran away, and, after many days' wanderings in the woods, caught a horse that was grazing in a pasture and swam on it over the Delaware. He made his way, often being befriended by the same people as before, to Boston. This city is described at some length by Carew's biographer. A remark about the number of printing-presses and booksellers' shops, with the statement that "at New York there is but one bookseller's shop, and none at all in Virginia, Maryland, Carolina, Barbadoes, or any of the Sugar-Islands," occasions a very naïve note by the latest editor. He gravely states: "It is proper to remark that these and other computations do not apply to the present time." Carew was soon home again from Boston, and the merchant who had sent him off to America was so amused at being again outwitted, that he was the first to head a subscription for him. Carew's impressions of travel, or, perhaps, the mere remarks of his biographer, are no more just than many that have been printed since; but they are interesting as showing what was known and thought of us in England a hundred and fifty years ago. The little book is written in a lively and amusing style, and its perusal will help to pass profitably and pleasantly a leisure hour. As it belongs in a certain sense to the class Americana, we recommend it to all collectors of such books, as being more likely to be read and remembered by them than the rest of the contents of that section of their libraries.

* "An Apology for the Life of Bampfylde-Moore Carew." London. 1749. 8vo, pp. 149.

"The Adventures of Bampfylde-Moore Carew, King of the Mendicants." A new and revised edition. London: William Tegg. 1871.

TWO BOOKS ON THE PARIS COMMUNE.*

Mr. Leighton, as he tells us, had, early in June last, been making notes and sketches of the Paris catastrophe, without the least idea what to do with them, when a friend bought a brochure, entitled "Bataille des Sept Jours," and gave it to him with the words, "Voilà le texte de vos croquis." "Hence this volume," which the author likens to a French château to which he has "added a second story and wings." Thus, it is far from being an original narrative of the events it sketches, or a collection of notes penned under momentary impressions. In spite of this, however, it has all the freshness of such a narrative and such notes, owing, probably, to the vivid remembrances of the writer, and to a good use made of the journals and other prints of the time. We have, therefore, no hesitation in recommending it to all those who, not satisfied with the fragmentary information presented to them on the subject in the papers this side of the Atlantic, wish for something like a connected panorama of the strange scenes in Paris under the late Commune, as they might have been observed by an impartial observer not devoid of feeling and humor. And that it offers such a cursory but faithful view of things within the walls of revolted and besieged Paris is the only merit of Mr. Leighton's book; for it is neither a real history of the Commune based on personal knowledge and research, nor even a fragmentary study on the subject, such as might have been executed at the date of the author's writing, with the aid of materials already collected and published. Mr. Leighton makes the reader share with him the impression left on his mind by the fleeting appearances of seventy-three days of crazy commotion, foolish delusions, anxiety, terror, destruction, and bloodshed; but imparts hardly any more knowledge than could have been gathered in the streets at the very time of the occurrences. The notes, mostly taken from journals which he attaches to his diary-like chapters, are of very slight value, often disfigured by mistakes, and so hastily added that they occasionally contradict the text. Nor are the various appendixes—embracing, among other things, a "Chronology of the Commune," and special notices of Rochefort, Gambon, Lullier, Protot, Jourde, Ferré, and Urbain—of any real historical importance. In spite of the "chronology" presented to the reader, the author's own chronology is defective, as may be seen, for instance, from the confusion of dates concerning the operations of the 2d, 3d, and 4th of April. Altogether, Mr. Leighton seems to have had more concern for his illustrations than for his text; and of the former, which are very numerous, for the humorous portion more than for the serious, which we decidedly prefer. The text consists chiefly of light talk in a pleasantly humorous way, of which, however, a kind of polemical wrangling with the men of the Commune constitutes too large a portion. The following is, perhaps, a fair specimen of the latter:

* "Paris under the Commune; or, The Seventy-three Days of the Second Siege. With numerous Illustrations, Sketches taken on the spot, and Portraits (from the original photographs). By John Leighton, F.S.A., etc." London: Bradbury, Evans & Co.; New York: Scribner, Welford & Co. 1871.

"The Rise and Fall of the Paris Commune in 1871: with a full account of the Bombardment, Capture, and Burning of the City. By W. Pembroke Fetridge, Editor of 'Harper's Guide-book to Europe and the East,' 'Harper's Phrase-book,' etc." Illustrated with a Map of Paris and Portraits from original photographs. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1871.

"Ah! you do not only make us tremble and weep, you make us laugh too. What is this miserable parody of universal suffrage? What is this farce of the will of the people being represented by a half-a-dozen electors? . . . What are right and justice to you? Let us reign, let us govern, let us decree, let us triumph. All is contained in that. Rogeard pleases us, so we'll have Rogeard. If the people won't have Rogeard, so much the worse for the people. Beautiful! admirable! But why don't you speak out your mind frankly? There were some honest brigands (par pari refertur) in the Roman States who were, perhaps, no better than you are, but at least they made no pretension of being otherwise than lawless, and followed their calling of brigands without hypocrisy. . . . The time of illusions is past; you need not be so careful to keep your masks on; we have seen your faces. We have had the carnival of the Commune, and now Ash-Wednesday is come. You disguised yourselves cunningly, messieurs; you routed out from the old cupboards and corners of history the cast-off revolutionary rags of the men of '93; and, sticking some ornaments of the present fashion upon them—waistcoats à la Commune and hats à la Fédération—you dressed yourselves up in them, and then struck attitudes. People perceived, it is true, that the clothes were made for giants, were too wide for you pigmies; they hung round your figures like collapsed balloons; but you, cunning that you were, you said, 'We have been wasted by persecution.' And when, at the very beginning, some stains of blood were seen upon your old disguises, 'Pay no attention,' said you, 'it is only the red flag we have in our pockets that is sticking out.' . . . Down with your mask, I tell you! Come, false Danton, be Rigault again, and let Sérailler's face come out from behind that Saint-Just mask he has on. You, Napoléon Gaillard, though you are a shoemaker, you are not even a Simon. Drop the Robespierre, Rogeard! Off with the trappings borrowed from the dark, grand days! Be mean, small, and ridiculous—be yourselves; we shall all be a great deal more at our ease when you are despicable and we are despising you again."

Mr. Fetridge's book is written in an entirely different vein and style. He has very little inclination to discourse about the Commune in the tone of a humorist, or in any way to amuse his reader. He expresses his unqualified abhorrence of the subject of his work in very brief and very dry terms, and fills his pages with very long but equally dry narratives of the insurrection and siege, as well as with proclamations, bulletins, and similar public documents of the period. These documents, collectively, form the most valuable portion of the whole, though the very minute accounts of the fighting around Paris—based, it is true, on fugitive reports, which cannot be considered adequate materials for genuine history—have, above all similar publications touching the same events which have come under our notice, the merit of completeness. The author claims, also, the merit of accuracy, and we must acknowledge that he has at least made an attempt at being accurate. A close examination, however, shows that it was but a feeble attempt. His account of the fighting on the first days of April is as little correct as Mr. Leighton's. His pages are, besides, disfigured by a vast number of falsely printed names. Thus, the names of the members of the Central Committee, which on page 48 are correctly given as Billioray, Ed. Moreau, Mortier, Gouhier, Géresme, and Pougerot, are changed on page 45 into Bilhoray, Edouard, Moreau, Martier, Gushier, Geresme, and Pougerat. The French accents are almost as often omitted as given. A more essential defect is the omission of a rational introduction to the history of the fatal 18th of March, in lieu of which we have a few remarks at the opening on the wickedness of "the ruthless desperadoes of Paris," as well as on "the overthrow of the Imperial dynasty, September 4, 1870, by a greater coup d'état than that practised by the Emperor," and—in extenso—Prince Napoleon's letter to Jules Favre, dated May, 1871. On the whole, however, Mr. Fetridge's book is well worth reading.

The personal details of the two books are of equally insignificant value, both in regard to the fate and the character of most of the prominent actors in the bloody drama of the Commune. We cannot refrain, however, from copying, as characteristic both of the man and the movement, the following order by Cluseret, a kind of Catonian Marius, who is said to have declared, "I don't want to take one life unnecessarily; but if, at the last moment, I should be called on to kill ten thousand people, I would rather make arrangements for killing fifteen thousand, in order to be on the safe side, than run the risk of not killing the ten thousand," and whom both writers agree in representing as the vilest of revolutionary wretches:

"The Minister of War to the National Guard:

"Citoyens: I notice with fear that, forgetful of our modest origin, the ridiculous mania for trimmings, embroidery, and shoulder-knots has begun to take hold on you.

"To work! You have for the first time accomplished a revolution by, and for, labor.

"Let us not forget our origin; and, above all, do not let us be ashamed of it. Workmen we were! Workmen let us remain!

"In the name of virtue against vice, of duty against abuse, of austerity against corruption, we have triumphed; let us not forget the fact.

"Let us be, above all, men of honor and duty; we shall then found an austere republic, the only one that has, or can have, a reason for its existence. . . ."

RECENT REPUBLICATIONS.

We have so recently and so fully expressed our opinion of Jowett's "Plato," that in mentioning the new edition of it, in four volumes octavo, which Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. have made for this market, we need only speak of the printer's and binder's share in it. Costing half as much as the elegant English edition, these volumes are still handsome enough for a library, and have, for readers, the advantage of being smaller and less heavy to handle. The paper is thin, but takes a clear impression from type which, in the Introduction to each dialogue, is of the same size as this now under the reader's eye, and in the body of the text is a size larger. We are glad that a work of such a high character has thus been brought considerably nearer the means of those who are capable of appreciating both Plato and his translator. Messrs. Scribner & Co. also publish a condensed edition of President Noah Porter's work, "On the Human Intellect," making it, we should judge, much more fit to be used as a text-book, and also more likely to secure a reading from the non-student public. Its title in this form is "Elements of Intellectual Science." Scribner, Welford & Co. continue the regular issue of the marvellously cheap edition of Carlyle's works, which, begun with the "Sartor Resartus" and the "French Revolution," now embraces also the "Life of John Sterling" and, in two volumes, "Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches." The success of this republication, remarkable as it has been, is merited by every circumstance connected with its editing and manufacture.

In similar brown cloth covers, stamped with black, Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. issue their "Handy Volume" edition of Dickens's works, with which, in paper covers, the public was already familiar as the "Plum-pudding Edition." It is cheap and compact, but we fear we cannot recommend it to weak eyes, or, for that matter, to strong ones, especially of growing boys and girls. The same house also reprint Darwin's "Journal of Researches, etc., during the Voyage of H. M. S. Beagle Round the World," a work which bears such a relation to the present doctrines of its author, as well as to future investigations, that its republication after more than thirty years may still be considered timely. Within a few years, Dr. Habel has visited the Galapagos Islands, discovering new species, and now Prof. Agassiz is following in the track of the Beagle. Apart from its scientific value, however, this narrative will always rank among the foremost books of travel for popular reading.

Messrs. Harper & Bros. publish an edition that will compare favorably with the original of "The Earth," by M. Elisée Reclus, whose recent appearance among the Communists and sentence to transportation have excited a painful interest in him and his works. Mr. Kingsley's "Christmas in the West Indies," and Dr. Smith's "Student's History of the Middle Ages," are also reprinted by the Harpers. The latter, as the preface points out, is not an abridgment, being rather a revised edition, of Hallam, incorporating those corrections and changes of view which the author himself refrained from inserting in the text, though he frankly acknowledged them elsewhere. Dr. Smith has added notes and sundry documents famous in English history.

Hawthorne's "American Note Books"—two volumes in one—continue the illustrated library edition of this author's works, issued by Messrs. J. R. Osgood & Co., who also publish a second edition, with some corrections and additions, of the excellent little work on the marine animals of Massachusetts Bay (Radiates), by Elizabeth C. and Alexander Agassiz, called "Seaside Studies in Natural History." The essays in "Chapters in Erie," published by the same house, appeared in great part as they stand in the North American Review during the last five years, and are all except one—that on the Legal Tender Act—from the pens of Messrs. Henry Adams and C. F. Adams, Jr., and of that one Mr. Francis A. Walker, formerly of the Census Bureau, and now of the Indian Affairs, was part author. Except the essay on Captain John Smith, of Virginia, which is an enquiry into the veracity of that gentleman, based on the little work of Mr. Charles Deane, they all discuss our railroad system or our financial system; for the elaborate articles on "Bank of England Restriction" and "British Finance in 1816," which we commend cordially to the careful perusal of all "financiers," in Congress or out, are mainly valuable for the light they throw on some of the leading problems of our financial situation. Mr. C. F. Adams's "Chapters in Erie," giving an account of the great Drew-Fisk-Vanderbilt fight for the possession of the railroad, "The Erie Raid," telling the story of Fisk's operations against the Albany & Susquehanna road, and the "New York Gold Conspiracy," by Mr. Henry Adams, giving the history of the crisis of "Black Friday," are known to all our readers for their perspicuous explanation of the most curious intrigues and rascalities with which the tribunals of a civilized community were ever called on to deal. Taken in connection with the articles on our "Railroad System," they not only furnish a deal of information and suggestion which must prove of great value in the railroad legislation of our own day, but they are likely to have considerable historical value, as probably the only comprehensible description of "the transition period," in the application of capital to great enterprises, and in the growth of the art of transportation.

As this year has witnessed the completion of the first step towards annexing the Bluenoses to their Yankee neighbors—the building of the International Railway—there is a peculiar propriety in reprinting Haliburton's "Sam Slick" (New York: Hurd & Houghton). No one on this side the border can possibly read the book with the same feelings which it excited at the time of its first appearance—the sensitiveness at its delineation of Yankee character, or enjoyment of its castigation of the people of the Provinces, or even amusement at the Clockmaker's stories and quaint language. We have, since then, made much more thorough and serious studies of Americanisms, and developed a much subtler humor, and have so far cultivated the critical faculty as to be able to judge "Sam Slick" by a literary instead of by a political or national standard. What Nova Scotians thought of us thirty-odd years ago was of considerably more consequence than it is now, and we can therefore, at the present time, say without suspicion of prejudice or wounded vanity, that Sam Slick is as artificial a character as his own clocks, and a very imperfect artistic creation; but we can also say that Haliburton did not overdraw the "logyness" (to use a fit Americanism) of his countrymen, and that he wisely admonished them of the measures necessary to be adopted if they wished to emulate the progress of their American cousins. Viewed in the light of the event to which we first alluded, the following passages are creditable to the Judge's foresight as well as insight:

> "The only thing that will either make or save Halifax is a railroad across the country to the Bay of Fundy.
>
> "'It will do to talk of,' says one. 'You'll see it some day,' says another. 'Yes,' says a third, 'it will come, but we are too young yet'" (p. 91).
>
> "I confess I have more faith in this humble but eccentric Clockmaker than in any other man I have met with in this Province. I therefore pronounce, 'There will be a railroad'" (p. 93).

Messrs. Hurd & Houghton are also the publishers of a complete and beautifully printed series of Hans Christian Andersen's writings, including his Autobiography, brought down to date. From Messrs. Holt & Williams we have Spielhagen's "Problematic Characters" and "Through Night to Light," in handy volumes, and Aytoun & Martin's "Poems and Ballads of Goethe," which the publishers have added to their Library of Foreign Poetry. From C. C. Chatfield & Co.: "Half Hours with Modern Scientists," a collection of addresses and essays by Huxley, Tyndall, Cope, and others, on the subjects with which these investigators are identified, including the physical basis of life, the hypothesis of evolution, and the scientific use of the imagination.

It is not every work that has reached its nineteenth edition which we could therefore assume to have been worth printing, but the late Mr. John Wilson's "Treatise on English Punctuation" (New York: Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.) owes its success to merits which have never been disputed. In fact, if it is not the only book in the language which treats solely of punctuation, it is by all odds the most thorough, learned, and authoritative, having the great advantage of being composed by a practical printer as well as a scholar and a grammarian. There appears to be something constitutional in punctuation as in spelling, and on some persons instruction in these branches is nearly wasted; but the fault is, after all, chiefly with the teachers, and it is to Mr. Wilson's treatise that they must turn for self-instruction.

A work also unique, though in another field, and indispensable to all who take an interest in politics, is McPherson's "Political History of the United States during the Period of Reconstruction" (Washington: Philp & Solomons), which embraces a classified summary of the legislation of the three last Congresses (1865–70), with much additional matter. With the same author's "Political History of the Rebellion," it forms a complete review of the political aims, struggles, and development of the people of this country during the most eventful decade in its history, and these two volumes will probably always remain the most convenient and best-stocked works of reference for journalist, statesman, student, or private citizen.

Mr. Geo. A. Townsend's remarkable letters from Utah to the Cincinnati Commercial have been collected in the form of a square pamphlet, printed on good paper, of which the American News Co. are the publishers. The reading of this correspondence will enlighten any one, not possessed of special information on the subject in hand, in regard to the motives and character of the present "Mormon Trials at Salt Lake City." We have already expressed our conviction that if Mr. Townsend's statements cannot be controverted (and we have not yet seen them publicly invalidated), there is little cause for congratulation and much for shame in the mode of putting down polygamy which we are now witnessing. Mr. Townsend is no friend to the system, of course; but neither is he friendly to judges with a "mission." His letters will be found entertaining and highly graphic. The passages on pp. 21–23, relating to the Emma Mine, ought to have a special interest for the apologists of Minister Schenck.

Illustrated Holiday Books.—"Raphael of Urbino" (London and New York: Macmillan & Co.) purports to be a translation of such parts of Passavant's great work "as are likely to interest the general reader." No name of translator appears. It would, perhaps, not be fair to judge the book as a standard and serious treatise—as a real life of Raphael, based upon Passavant's, if not strictly a translation of it. It has rather the air of a gift-book, although the retention of some at least of the tables and lists given in the German original would seem to be intended to recommend it to students. It is as a gift-book that we treat it here, and as such we find it rather a better one than ordinary, because of the comparatively high value of the illustrations. It is true that there are clearer and brighter-looking permanent photographs from engravings than some of these; but the pictures are tolerably successful even in this respect, and they are well selected as to subject and as to engraver from among Raphael's works.

We hold that it is very desirable to become familiar with the subject and disposition of important works of art. The engravings by Volpato from the large demilunes at the Vatican, the Disputa, the Parnassus, the School of Athens, however little they may give of the real virtue and beauty of the original frescoes, are capable of showing what sort of thing the original frescoes are; and documentary and historical knowledge of these most famous and important works is by itself desirable, and may lead to something more. Undoubtedly these photographs are a long way from being as intelligible and as interesting as the prints from which they are taken; but these Volpatos are costly, fetching from ten to thirty pounds apiece in England, and are not often to be seen in America. This kind of knowledge, too—knowledge as to "fact and date," subject of picture and general arrangement, is the kind of knowledge that can be used in conversation; and a gift-book that can promote intelligent talk on any subject is so far worth giving.

It is a pity that photographs cannot be made to lie flat, without warping their mounts. French books are sometimes better in this respect; but we do not remember an English book containing photographs that is fit to bind, the pictures are so irrepressible in them all. This is a serious injury to the appearance as well as to the convenience of the book before us.

"The Mighty Works of Our Lord Jesus" (New York: Pott, Young & Co.) is a small book, containing only eighty pages of text, and comparatively low priced, so that it is well calculated to supply the want of those who wish to give away an illustrated book of religious meditations. The text is made up of extracts from sermons and the like, and a few short poems or extracts from poems of sacred subject, whether hymns like Doddridge's well-known masterpiece, or didactic narratives like Mrs. Sigourney's contribution. The illustrations are not very good photographs from engravings, etchings, and lithographs. It is unnecessary to particularize in regard to these: most of them are very familiar to all dwellers in towns. Though a fine original of the Rembrandt etching, "Christ healing the sick," is a thing rarely seen, and its cost beyond most purses, yet photography has familiarized the community with its general character. Nor is there any one of these illustrations which we think will be more novel to people generally than the above-mentioned one. To describe a book of this class is to criticise it, and the title of the book before us is, perhaps, sufficiently descriptive by itself. Those who want such a gift-book will understand what this one is.

Mr. Bryant's neat piece of versified meditation upon a hillside spring, "The Story of a Fountain" (New York: D. Appleton & Co.), has never seemed to us very stimulating poetry. A poem of this sort invites illustration, however. Every lot in the catalogue may be represented pictorially, first a wolf, and then a bear, and then an assortment of red Indians; a sportsman, a "plumed soldier," two "blue-eyed girls," a "sage"; to each lot a proper landscape background can be furnished, and the poem of a hundred lines or thereabouts finds itself an illustrated book of fifty pages. It is hard to read aloud when one has to turn a page at every second or third line of the verse; we have tried it, and have found it so. No doubt the poem is in a trying position, thus made to do duty as a running title to a scrap-book of pictures, and would read better if printed consecutively on two pages, and headed by a single one of these many engravings—shall we say by Mr. Fenn's clearing, on page 42? That one we think as good as any of them. The illustrations generally are not pleasing; they may have been pretty once, and some of them doubtless were, as, for instance, in the first sketches, whether they were on the block or on accidental pieces of paper. Wood engravers are underpaid, and are often hurried; printers of woodcuts are generally unskilled; the exigencies of book manufacture too often cause failure where comparative success was within easy reach. We criticise no artist's work in this case; no person who looks at this book will fail to see that the pictures as they stand are singularly unsuccessful.

Wear and Tear; or, Hints for the Overworked. By S. Weir Mitchell, M.D. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.)—This little tract, of fifty-nine pages, which has just reached a third edition, contains an admirable description of the evils of our American rapid way of living, and it ought to be placed in the hands of every teacher and of every hard worker. The warning against overworking schoolboys and, worse still, school-girls, is strongly put, but not a bit too strong for a system of education which justifies a doctor in speaking of the health of our girls in these emphatic words: "If the mothers of a people are sickly and weak, the sad inheritance falls upon their offspring. How many in each score of young girls are fit to be healthy wives and mothers, or, in fact, to be wives and mothers at all? Multitudes of them are merely pretty to look at, or not that: their destiny is the shawl and the sofa, neuralgia, weak backs, and the varied forms of hysteria, that domestic demon which has produced untold discomfort in many a household." On this text Dr. Mitchell preaches a sermon, brief, pithy, and to the purpose. The other heads of his earnest appeal to the people, for more leisure and harder play, may well be left to the parties interested, for the cure is largely in their own hands. What he tells us of the peculiar characteristics of our climate, and the mischievous habits of life here, which make mental work more exhausting than in Europe, opens a wide field of discussion, and suggests warnings and instruction which deserve a separate and larger treatment, that we hope yet to see from Dr. Mitchell's hands. What was wittily said of another Philadelphia book, that it was "too broad, but not long enough," may, in another sense, be said of Dr. Mitchell's tractate. It covers a broad field, for it includes maternity, education, and intellectual work of every kind; but it is brought within its narrow limits by such terseness of statement that every word is full of meaning, and every line teaches a lesson too important to be neglected.

Johann Reuchlin, sein Leben und seine Werke (The Life and Works of John Reuchlin). By Dr. Ludwig Geiger. (Leipsic: Duncker & Humblot. 1871.)—Those of our readers who are sufficiently familiar with the German language will know, without an explanation on our part—which the English translation of the title seems to render necessary—that the book before us contains only the life and remarks on the works of the great humanist, but not also his works themselves. And this biography alone, with the introduction to it, consists of no less than five hundred octavo pages. Nor is it the only comprehensive work devoted to the memory of Reuchlin by German literary historians of our century, not to speak of similar products of biographical research by writers less remote from the age of the admired scholar, the rival of Erasmus and precursor in more than one field of Melanchthon and Luther. Gehres, Gabler, Meyerhoff, Erhard, and Lamey have, within the last six decades, published lives of Reuchlin. And yet Dr. Geiger—by the bye, a son of the veteran Jewish reformer and critic, Dr. Abraham Geiger, now of Berlin—has been able, by dint of most diligent research, to elicit entirely new points of interest from his many-sided subject—for Reuchlin's life and activity belonged to as various countries and spheres as were the domains and ages of literature embraced by his scholarship—and to make his book both attractive to the general student of history and instructive to the philologist and antiquarian. A very judicious division of his copious matter between the text and the notes has made the one and the other possible. That Reuchlin's great struggle in opposition to the proposed burning of all Hebrew books, with the exception of the Bible, occupies a prominent place in the narrative, need hardly be told. The comprehensive erudition of the young author is displayed on almost every page; his style is plain; but we think he will have to sacrifice much of his fondness for small critical details before attaining a standing among literary historians adequate to his learning and zeal.

A Grammar of the Latin Language, from Plautus to Suetonius. By Henry John Roby. Part I. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1871.)—In this book Mr. Roby strikes out so boldly and vigorously that it is hard to speak of it within circumscribed limits. We remark briefly on the scope and intention of the work, that the author disclaims at the outset any attempt to twist the natural arrangement of the facts so as to make it suitable for persons who are learning the language and cannot be trusted to find their own way. "There are plenty of other books for that purpose." The first volume—the second, containing the Syntax, is promised soon—is divided into the usual grammatical categories. But inside of these categories many novelties are to be found. In "The Doctrine of Inflexions" we have the old Aristotelian division into nouns and verbs; adverbs, prepositions, and conjunctions are subordinated as being original parts of nouns and verbs. The Third Book on "Word Formation" contains most valuable lists of Latin words arranged according to their endings.

This grammar is a credit to English scholarship, and a refreshing contrast to the "Public School Latin Primer." It shows on every page extensive and thoughtful reading, much acuteness, and great modesty. Considering the amount of material, there are few inconsistencies and oversights. We regret that the author has not discussed the obscure and interesting question of the length of vowels in syllables long by position. In the Prosody, p. 90 (c), the word pŏl is omitted, as also monosyllables in m, such as dum, nam, num, etc. Obvious misprints, such as coenaturio, humeo, quadrigæ, ὄζεω, νομός, foedos (for faedos), postūmus, γλνκός, lurŏr, adolescentulus and adolescens, πάτηρ, intelligentia, negligentia, and negligere cannot mislead the readers for whom the book is intended. But is Neptunus (p. 308) equivalent to νιπτόμενος, or more closely related to νέω, navis, nare? On p. 301, Cicero's "Orator" is quoted for "De Oratore." By an odd blunder, on p. 164, Scipiadas is called an "accusative plural, Sons of Scipio," instead of a nominative singular.

Overland: A Novel. By J. W. De Forest. (New York: Sheldon & Co.)—It cannot be denied that this is an interesting novel. It gives us a succession of incidents, all of which are well told and probable enough to disarm criticism until the book is finished. It is a love story, in which dangers from Indians, treacherous Mexicans, and starvation take the place of the ordinary jealousies and timid doubts that usually torment the hero and heroine. Instead of a mesh of social intrigues, we have an old-fashioned villain in the story, Coronado, and the scene of the novel is well chosen for his crimes; in civilized parts he would only be a sharper, in the Far West he is grand in his wickedness. He bribes a bully to kill the rather stupid virtuous hero; he sets tribes of Indians in ambush, and manages very well all the melodramatic machinery of the novel. Nor is this ever overdone. None of the incidents are impossible, and all in their place seem very probable. Many of the descriptions are admirable. They are, indeed, the best part of the novel, and their merit far outweighs the rest of the story. All the love-tale sinks into insignificance in comparison with, for example, the account of the voyage of Thurstan through the cañon, or of the shipwreck at the end of the book. One is reminded of what is sometimes seen at the theatre, when a play is brought out with great splendor, new dresses, "gorgeous scenery and new effects," and is itself only a very ordinary piece of love-making after all. It would be very unfair not to acknowledge that Mr. De Forest has done something much better than scene-painting in this book, but still it is easy to see that in this, as in most cases, the novelist feels it necessary to make the young man and young woman enamored, whatever tale he may be telling. A novel is surer to have a wedding than nine-tenths of the flirtations we see around us. But is it impossible for an interesting tale of adventure to be written without a love-story? Would Robinson Crusoe have been as interesting if Friday had been a woman? Moreover, one who is chased by Indians, under peril of death at every moment, has hardly thought left for a civilized courtship. But, however the question may be settled in general, in this case the love-tale does not add to the merit of the story.

The author's style is peculiar, and might even be called "jerky." It is not attractive. For example, page 4: "Now for the remarkable woman. Sturdy and prominent old character, obviously. Forty-seven years old, or thereabouts; lots of curling iron-gray hair twisted about her round forehead; a few wrinkles, and not all of the newest," etc. In spite of its defects, however, the novel is entertaining, and valuable for its excellent descriptions of Western scenery. The reader might very easily do worse than spend an evening over it.

* Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books on the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Bacon (Rev. T. S.), Christian Children, swd	(M. H. Mallory & Co.)
Hampton (Gen. W.), Life and Character of R. E. Lee, swd	(John Murphy & Co.)
Howells (W. D.), Their Wedding Journey	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)
Hughes (T.), Alfred the Great	(Macmillan & Co.)
Jevons (W. S.), The Theory of Political Economy	(Macmillan & Co.) 3 50
Lord Bantam	(Geo. Routledge & Sons)
Marcy (R. B.), Border Reminiscences	(Harper & Bros.)
Merry Maple Leaves	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)

The handsomest, and one of the best and most entertaining of monthlies.

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE.

AN ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY OF

POPULAR LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

JUST READY.

THE JANUARY NUMBER.

Specially suited to the Holidays. With numerous Illustrations. Commencing the New Volume.

CONTENTS:

1. Scrambles Among the Alps. A Series of Graphic Sketches. By Edward Whymper. Part V. Profusely illustrated.
2. Christmas Carol. By Millie W. Carpenter.
3. Shadows of a Christmas Fire. A Story. By L. Clarke Davis.
4. Our New Port Storm-Signals. By Prof. T. B. Maury. With Illustrations.
5. Aytoun. A charming New Serial Tale. Part I.
6. Types of Castilian Vagrancy. By David G. Adee.
7. Brown's Christmas Bundle. A Story. By W. Mackay Laffan.
8. A Dog of Flanders. A Story of Noel. By Ouida. Illustrated.
9. The Herald's Cry. A Poem. By Constance F. Woolson.
10. A Russian Family Wolf-Hunt. By Vera Goetz.
11. In Good Time. A Poem. By Charlotte F. Bates.
12. The Coming Woman. By Prentice Mulford.
13. Our Monthly Gossip. Extracts from Forster's Life of Dickens, etc.
14. Literature of the Day.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

With the number for January, LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE enters upon a new volume. The number of pages is increased, enabling the conductors to furnish an additional amount of popular reading in the best and most emphatic sense. The contributions now on hand or specially engaged embrace an unusually attractive List of Tales, Narratives, and Descriptive Sketches by well-known authors; together with a variety of able and interesting articles on the Important Questions of the day. In addition to the shorter articles by well-known writers, the following attractive Serial Works will be published during the year:

A POWERFUL AND ABSORBING NEW STORY.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD, LL.D.,

Author of "Alec Forbes," "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," etc.

(To be commenced in the Number for March.)

ALSO, A CHARMING NEW NOVEL,

AYTOUN,

By a talented American Author. (Commenced in the present number.)

Mr. Edward Whymper's Exquisitely Illustrated Work,

SCRAMBLES AMONG THE ALPS,

which has already been begun, will be continued from month to month until completed.

A large amount of space will be devoted to "Our Monthly Gossip," which will be enriched with short and lively articles on persons of note, incidents of the day, and other novel or amusing topics.

Illustrations designed by distinguished artists and engraved in the highest style will accompany each number.

☞ For sale by all Periodical Dealers.

TERMS.—Yearly Subscription, $4. Single number, 35 cents. Liberal Clubbing Rates. Specimen Number mailed, postage paid, to any address, on receipt of 25 cts.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

THE COMPREHENSIVE SPEAKER,

Designed for the Use of Schools, Academies, Lyceums, etc., carefully selected from the best authors, with notes by Henry T. Coates. Large 12mo, 672 pp., half bound, cloth sides, $1 75.

From the New York Daily Tribune.

"It contains a judicious selection of pieces from the best authors, omitting all of doubtful morality, of a sectarian or political character, and of transient literary value. Great care has been taken in the selection of extracts to give the genuine text of the author, without the errors in quotation and punctuation which are such a frequent blemish in this class of school-books. A large proportion of the contents are from American authors, furnishing the materials for a comparative survey of our native literature."

From the Christian Union. (Henry Ward Beecher, Editor.)

"Of course the work of compiling such a book as this is involves difficulties which do not appear to the superficial critic. The enormous mass of available matter has to be winnowed with great care and judgment; the hackneyed extracts, which in the days of the old United States Speaker were declaimed until every boy knew them by heart from simply hearing them, must be avoided; and yet it will not do to omit many of those thrilling passages in the Reply to Hayne, the Declaration of Independence, and a hundred others. Mr. Coates has certainly done his task well and faithfully, and the introductory remarks which precede the body of the work are characterized by good sense, and are evidently the result of considerable thought and observation. The plan of the volume is a natural subdivision of the selections first into prose and poetry, and then into narrative, historical, forensic, etc., the design evidently being that a reading class shall not go through, as it were, from Genesis to Revelations, but shall, in the judgment of the teacher, read 'Mrs. Caudle on Lending Umbrellas' on a rainy afternoon, or the 'Impeachment of Warren Hastings' when the public is excited about official corruptions. The selections are good so far as we have examined them—and we have done so with considerable care—being taken from the best current literature, as well as from that which will always be regarded as classical where the English tongue is spoken."

Send for a Descriptive Circular.

Copies sent to teachers on receipt of one-half the retail price.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,
822 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

NOW READY.
A New and Handsome edition of the WORKS OF HENRY FIELDING.

The best edition of the Works of Fielding (with an Essay on his Life and Genius, by Thomas Murphy) has lately been so much in request, coupled with a scarcity of the Work, that the publication of a new and elegant edition of the productions of this distinguished Novelist is much rather the result of a public demand than the experiment of a Publisher. The Edition now published is superior to Murphy's, not only in the elegance of its typography and other mechanical properties of paper, style, etc., but as being most carefully revised and edited by Dr. James P. Browne, of Edinburgh. It will rank in all respects with the best modern editions of English Authors. A fine, handsome book, in 10 8vo vols., in the following styles: Half-morocco, Roxburghe style. Half-morocco extra. Half-calf extra. Tree-calf, gilt edges. Polished calf, gilt tops. J. SABIN & SONS, 84 Nassau Street, New York; 22 Buckingham Street, Strand, London.

LARGE PAPER EDITIONS, UNCUT.

GRIM'S MICHAEL ANGELO. Photographic Illustrations, $30.

PALFREY'S NEW ENGLAND. $20.

LIFE OF SAMUEL ADAMS. $30.

SPEDDING'S BACON. $100.

In good condition, fresh, scarcely opened. Address, L. P., Office of "THE NATION," 5 Beekman Street.

A LIBRARY OF EDUCATION,

FROM THE

BEST WRITERS OF ALL COUNTRIES.

Vol. I.—LOCKE'S THOUGHTS ON EDUcation.

Vol. II.—LOCKE'S ESSAYS ON STUDY and Reading; Milton's Epistle on Education, with Lives of Locke and Milton.

Vol. III.—HORACE MANN'S PAPERS ON the Study of Physiology in Schools.

Vol. IV.—SCOTTISH UNIVERSITY ADdresses: (1) Mill, on Literary and Scientific Education; (2) Froude, on Hand-work before Head-work; (3) Carlyle, on the Choice of Books.

Vol. V.—THE BIBLE IN THE PUBLIC Schools—the Opinions of Individuals and of the Press, with Judicial Decisions.

Vol. VI.—THE BIBLE IN THE PUBLIC Schools, Part II., containing the Addresses of A. D. Mayo and Thomas Vickers, of Cincinnati.

Other Volumes, in preparation, will be duly announced. It is our design to make Complete and Standard Editions of the works of Educational Writers of eminence, and reduce the cost to a minimum. We have adopted a model, very successful in France, which puts the products of the best minds within the reach of all.

The Price—Twenty-five Cents a vol., post-paid.

J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO.,
14 Bond Street, New York.

VALUABLE BOOKS

FOR

GIFTS AND LIBRARIES.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,
110 WASHINGTON STREET,
BOSTON.

HAVE JUST ISSUED

A CATALOGUE OF BOOKS

COMPRISING

WORKS IN EVERY CLASS OF LITERATURE,

SELECTED FROM THEIR

LARGE AND EXTENSIVE STOCK.

☞ Sent free by mail to any address.

TO BOOK-BUYERS.—Now Ready, a Catalogue of Rare, Curious, and Useful Books, particularly rich in the Drama, Burnsiana, Byronana, Shakespeariana, and Miscellaneous Literature, just imported.

Send stamp to

GEORGE TAWSE,
YE OLDE BOOKE STORE,
735 Broadway, New York.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

133 NASSAU STREET,

Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

INDEX TO VOLUME XIII.

JULY TO DECEMBER, 1871.

The Week.

AT HOME.

Adams, J. Q., interviewed as to the "new departure," 33, endorses the "passive policy," 361—Attorney-General Akerman on constitutionality of civil-service legislation, 170—Grand Duke Alexis arrived, 230—Alaska monopolists, 330.

Bowen, Hon. C. C., pardoned for bigamy, 1, 17—Hon. G. S. Boutwell, difficulty with Gen. Pleasonton, 17, 33, 81, Cincinnati defence of his policy, 213, dealings with the Syndicate to be overhauled, 345, Treasury report, 361, 362—Gov. Gratz Brown interviewed as to the "new departure," 33—Hon. B. F. Butler nominates himself Governor of Massachusetts, 33, 81, 82, first gun at Springfield, 137, second fie at Worcester, 153, frightens the Republicans, 186, beaten at the Convention, 217, speech on the Washington Treaty, 281—Battle of Boyne and what it did for Ireland, 34—"Builded better than they knew" theory of constitutional interpretation, 34—Speaker Blaine not so rich as painted, 154—Judge Barnard's injunction against Connolly, 169—Judge Barrett nominated for Supreme Court, 265—Judge Bond's court in North Carolina, 266—Gen. Barlow's resignation voluntary, 282—Gov. Bullock of Georgia resigns, 298—Brooklyn Ring frauds, 313—Secretary Belknap's system of inspection, 362.

Cameron, Hon. Simon, nominated for Vice-President, 1—Coreans attacked by Commodore Rogers, 1, 35, 122—Civil Service Commission in session, 1, meets with constitutional difficulties, 33, encouraged by Attorney-General, 265, report, 393, 409—California Democrats accept the "new departure," 2, State carried by Republicans, 170—Connolly's accounts, 49, public debt statements, 81, put under injunction, refuses to resign, 169, appoints A. H. Green deputy, 185—Charleston election carried by Conservatives, 82—Cincinnati Sunday question, 82, corruption in county officers, 313—Dr. Carnochan's extortions, 97—Senator Conkling's letter to Mr. Griswold, 154, criticised by B. F. Mudgett, 170, stump speech, 250, on civil-service reform, 266—Hon. Caleb Cushing appointed counsel for U. S. at Geneva, 186—Chicago burnt, 233, 249, assistance from State, 266, effect on business, 313—Chas. O'Conor retained to prosecute the Ring, 250, 265, declines nomination to the Assembly, 281—O. V. Catto indignation meeting in Philadelphia, 266—Geo. T. Curtis denies the State's right to sue the Ring, 281—Hon. B. R. Curtis appointed counsel for U. S. at Geneva, 281—Geo. Wm. Curtis addresses the Cabinet on civil-service reform, 314—Catacazy-Fish difficulty, 361—Connecticut lobby, 393—Committee of Seventy's Charter, 409.

Congress (XLIId, 2d session): meets; Committee of Ways and Means, 361; Sumner's bill to abolish internal revenue bureau, Trumbull's Retrenchment Committee (Senate), 377, 410; Cox's copyright bill (House), 378; Committee of Investigation appointed (Senate), 393; Hoar's bill for a Labor Commission passed (House), 409.

Daly, Judge, nominated for the Common Pleas, 265.

Evangelist (N. Y.) apologizes for the Ring, 18—Eastern Railroad accident, 137—Evans embezzlement in Pennsylvania, 153, 154, 234, criminal charge dismissed, 282—Elections in Connecticut, Ohio, and Pennsylvania carried by Republicans, 235, in New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Wisconsin, etc., 297—W. M. Evarts appointed counsel for U. S. at Geneva, 281.

Financial review of the week, 2, 18, 50, 51, 67, 83, 98, 99, 138, 154, 155, 187, 233, 249, 314, 331, 346, 379, 394, 395, 411—Foley, J., suit against the city authorities, 153, 169—Forest fires in the Northwest, 249—Fenian raid on Red River country, 259—Thos. C. Fields a Tammany embezzler, 297—Secretary Fish resigns, 377.

German Democratic revolt against Tammany, 137—Gold combinations on Wall Street, 187—Geneva Commission meets, 394.

Hoffman, Gov., ignorant of Mayor Hall's intentions, 34, 49, appealed to by Committee of Seventy, 250—Mayor Hall's reply to the Times's exposures, 49, 50, 65, 97, asks Connolly to resign, 169, removes him, 185, indicted for misdemeanor, 218, culpability, 329—Health Officer's extortions at the port of New York, 97—"H. B. B." and the Republican programme, 98—Harper's Weekly and a Massachusetts Republican, 171—Major Hodges, a defaulting paymaster, 185, sentence, 235—Haggerty the voucher thief, 201—T. W. Higginson rebukes Wendell Phillips, 202—Horton case, 266—Judge Hilton resigns, 329—Hartford Post on the capital lobby, 395.

Independent on Butler's speech at Philadelphia, 282—International Society and the Chicago fire, 298.

Jewell, Hon. Harvey, withdraws from gubernatorial contest in Mass., 186.

Ku-klux Congressional Committee report, 65—Ku-klux trials in North and South Carolina, 266, 282, 297, 410—Kentucky State election, 82—J. H. Keyser assigns his property to the Committee of Seventy, 234.

Louisiana finances, 65, 121, 122, Republican divisions over the Convention, 121—Louisville Commercial on the punishment of defaulters, 235.

Massachusetts Supreme Court on women justices, and on trades-union intimidation, 21, gubernatorial struggle, 17, 33, 81, 82, 186, 202, 217—Labor and Prohibitory Conventions, 234, election carried by Republicans, 297—Senator Morton on the civil service, 121, 393—B. F. Mudgett on Senator Conkling, 170—Tom Murphy's record, 170, 186, 201, 217, dismissal insisted on, 218, 234, not purified, 281, resigns, 329—Maine carried by Republicans, 170—W. M. Meredith appointed Consul for U. S. at Geneva, 186—Mormon trials in Utah, 282, 298.

New York City debt, 81, meeting to protest against the Ring frauds, 137, 153, Republicans quarrelling, 186, 249, State Republican Convention, 217, Democratic Convention, opposition delegates from N. Y. City, 218, Tweed triumphant, 233—North Carolina convention defeated, 82, 138—J. W. Norton, assistant postmaster in N. Y., a defaulter, 185.

Ohio Republican prospects, 17, 221—Orange riot in N. Y., 17, 18, 33, 34—Ottendorfer, R., speech against Tammany frauds, 153.

Phillips, Wendell, on the objects of the Commune, 19—Commissioner Pleasonton removed, 81—Political prospects, 121, 169—President Grant working for a renomination, 169—Message, 361, 377, nepotism denied, 377, adopts civil-service regulations, 393—Philadelphia politics, 201, 202, city treasurer's defalcation, 313, Penn. R. R. and N. J. R. R. consolidation, 265—Niles G. Parker declines investigation, 82, antecedents, 314, debt statements, 345, 346, accused of fraud by the legislature, 394—Gov. Palmer and the military at Chicago, 393.

Roberts, Marshall O., explains his endorsement of Connolly, 65—Ring in Court, 169, 218, breaking up, 329, grand jury indictments; bank failures, 394—Rochester Convention managed by Tweed, 233.

Staten Island Ferry-boat explosion, 66—Southern elections, 82—Sunday question in Cincinnati, 82—Hon. Carl Schurz's speech in Chicago, 98, in Nashville, 219, lecture on civil-service reform, 345, interviewed in regard to his conspiracy with Trumbull, 409—N. Y. Staats Zeitung against the Ring, 137—Senators Sumner and Wilson oppose Butler, 186—South Carolina bonds declining, 297, 313, 314, 330, practices of the Ring, 345, 346, 378, report of legislative committee, 394—Hon. R. C. Schenck and the Emma Mine, 345, 377, 410—Mrs. E. C. Stanton's defence of Woodhull, 378.

Treasury statement for June, 2, report, 361, 362—N. Y. Times comes to blows with Tribune on free love, 18, publishes secret city accounts, 49, breaks the ring, 169, apologizes for Murphy, 217, more squabbling with Tribune, 249, acquits Grant of nepotism, 377, on professional jealousy, 377, threatens Schurz and Trumbull with exposure, 393, 409—Tweed Army Company and Allen Army Company, 97—Tweed defies arrest, 201, 218, controls Rochester Convention, 233, plunder discovered, 265, bank account overhauled, 281, elected senator, 297, arrested for felony, 394—Treaty of Washington arbitrators, 138, U. S. counsel, 281—Rev. Kinsley Twining answers Dr. Marvin, 186—Tribune's exposure of Murphy, 201, 282, defence of Mr. Schenck, 377—Texas under the carpet-baggers, 219, carried by Democrats, 234—S. J. Tilden exposes Tweed's bank account, 281—Tammany defeated at the polls, 297.

Viaduct railway in N. Y., 50—Vouchers stolen from Connolly, 201.

World on irish history, 34—Elizur Wright on constitutional interpretation, 34—Workingmen's National party and platform, 66—Westfield explosion, 66—World disturbed by suggestion of a vigilance committee, 153, by a Federal official's defalcation, 186—A. D. White attacked by the Tribune, 267—Woman's Suffrage test case in District of Columbia, 313, in Wyoming Territory, 378.

Young, Brigham, moving southward, 298.

Zabriskie, Chancellor, decision on railroad consolidation, 265.

ABROAD.

[See also Special Correspondence.]

GREAT BRITAIN:—English sympathizers with the Commune, 2, 19—Treaty of Washington ratified, 3—Army bill defeated in Lords; Ballot bill carried in Commons, 35—Crown abolishes purchase of commissions, 51—Censure of ministry by the Lords, 67—Newcastle-on-Tyne iron-workers' strike, 202, 219—Co-operative success at Oldham, 299—Pall Mall Gazette on speculation in England, 362—Illness of the Prince of Wales, 378, recovery, 395—Robert Lowe's reply to Sir Chas. Dilke, 395—Republican agitation, 411.

FRANCE:—Commune endorsed by International Association, 2—Success of loan; indemnity payments; elections carried by Republicans; Louis Blanc and A. Dumas, fils, 3—Analysis of the electoral vote; Comte de Chambord retires from France; free-traders calling for an income-tax, 9—Increasing strength of Thiers; Gambetta interviewed; E. de Pressensé's reminiscences of the Commune; finances, 35—Relations towards Italy discussed, 51—Gambetta's reappearance and influence, 67—German evacuation of Paris forts; loyalty of French army; Thiers' troubles in the Assembly; retirement of Jules Favre, 83—Rivet's proposition to prolong Thiers' term; Paris Municipal Council asks for return of the seat of government, 99—Thiers' term and salary; new army bill; trial of the Communists, and order of events after the capitulation of Paris, 123—Assembly debates on disbanding the National Guard and prolonging the Executive, 139—Executive prolonged subject to the Assembly; Communists sentenced, 155—Versailles to remain the capital, 171—Prorogation of Assembly; Committee of Control ad interim appointed; customs treaty with Germany; disarming of National Guard, 187—Jules Favre scandal; Thiers' message to the Assembly; evacuation of Departments, 203, 219—Elections for Conseils Généraux; Alsace-Lorraine treaty; Rochefort's sentence; the protectionist tussle between Thiers and Bismarck, 235—Alsace-Lorraine treaty concluded, 251, 267—Elections for Councils-General, 267—Paris labor deranged by the war; sale of Imperial old clothes; Benedetti's defence of his diplomacy, 283—Chas. Périer appointed Minister of the Interior, 299—Thiers the trustee of the Republic, 315—Commercial treaty with England and its results; execution of Communists, 346, 363—Assembly convenes; martial law in provinces held by Germans, 363—Thiers and Rossel; President's message; disorder in the Assembly, 379.

GERMANY:—Dr. Döllinger favors lay representation, 3—Hanover does not celebrate victory with the rest of the Empire; Ultramontane celebrations of 25th anniversary of Pius IX., 19—Alsatians giving trouble, 51, reasons of discontent, 67—Ultramontanes in trouble; Catholic and Evangelical departments of Ministry of Worship and instruction merged, 99—Objects of the Imperial meeting at Gastein, 123—Anti-infallibility movement gaining strength, 139—Bismarck and Beust meet at Gastein, 155—Defensive Alliance with Austria, 171—Baravian cabinet snubs the Ultramontane clergy, 203—Berlin Government locking up gold; second session of Reichstag; Alsace-Lorraine treaty concluded, 251—Emperor's address to the Reichstag, 282—War budget passed, 299—Benedetti exposed by Bismarck, 314—Constitution of the Grand Duchy of Mecklenburg, 363.

AUSTRIA:—Hohenwart's efforts towards federalism, 83—Alliance with Germany, 139, meeting of Emperors William and Joseph at Ischl, 155, at Salzburg, 171—Mixed result of elections in the provinces, 219—German protest against Slavonic tendencies of the Emperor, 251, 267—Resignation of the Hohenwart ministry, 283—Kellersperg ministry formed, resignation of Beust, 299, 347, Beust succeeded by Andrássy, 315—Popular elections ordered in Bohemia, 331—Kellersperg Cabinet succeeded by Auersperg's, 347.

RUSSIA:—Educational movement, 67.

SWITZERLAND:—Fifth Annual Congress of International League of Peace and Liberty at Lausanne, 251.

ITALY:—Rome entered by Victor Emanuel, 3, followed by the ambassadors; reception of Syndic of Turin, 51—Pope's reproaches of the Jesuits, 99—Parliament meets in Rome; decadence of Florence; difference between Mazzini and Garibaldi in regard to the Internationals, 347.

SPAIN:—Republicans allied with the Internationals, 315—Malcampo ministry defeated in Cortes; proposed tax on foreign creditors of the Government, 331.

CUBA:—Execution of medical students, 362, anarchy, 411.

BRAZIL:—Emancipation act passed, 298.

PERSIA:—Famine, 315.

Literary Notes.

Announcements, 25, 40, 57, 72, 89, 104, 128, 142, 176, 193, 209, 228, 240, 258, 273, 289, 321, 337, 353, 368, 386, 401—Adolphus's (John) biography, 10—Afanasieff, Alexander, deceased, 239—Allen, Dr. Nathan, address at Princeton, Mass., 355—Aphra Behn's works, 401—Arnold, Matthew, essays in Cornhill, 26—Alaska and its tribes, 144—Anglo-American Association and the Chicago Library, 386—American Philological Association meeting, 72—Architectural Works, 402—Art Journals for October, 274—Anthropological Institute and Journal of N. Y., 368—Auroras periodical, 322—American Law Review on Geo. Ticknor Curtis, 25—American Oriental Society, 417.

Babbage, Chas., deceased, 307—Beaussire, Emile, on the law-abiding Parisians under the Commune, 105—Beekman, J. W., Centenary address, 369—Benndorf's "Greek and Sicilian Painted Vases," 356—Bentley, Richard, deceased, 229—Berkeley's philosophy, 355—Blake's designs, 241—Büchner's reply to his assailants, 308—Belgium, rights of foreigners in, 210—Berlin's growth, 194—Brazilian abolition legislation, 210—Boston Charity Building, 355; Public Library's 19th report, 90—Battle of Dorking, 9—Baptist Quarterly on the Bible and school question, 58—Bache's "American Wonderland," 417.

Chanzy, Gen., on the Second Army of the Loire, 178—Chaucer cruces solved, 241—Cherbuliez's "Revenge of Joseph Noirel," 274—Chesneau, M. Ernest, on N. Y. art collection, 333—Coquerel, Athanase, in America, 142—Curtis, Geo. Ticknor, ridiculed by American Law Review, 25—Chicago, libraries destroyed by fire, 258, fire phenomena, 322, Chicago Legal News redivivus, 273—Connecticut and New York boundaries, 228—Canadian education for women, 259—Chinese Government's attitude towards missionaries, 275—Corea, American naval photography in, 143—Commune as defended by the General Council of the International Workingmen's Association, 27, decrees and reports, 53, Communist types, 309—Catholic movements in Germany and Switzerland, 242—Cholera nests in India, 89—Census statistics, 240—Clerical impostor, 177—Catena Classicorum, 41—Cornhill Magazine on flying-machines, 274—Chinese-American college, 417—Chicago Free Library, 418.

Dante street, London, 403—Darwin and Chauncey Wright, 289—Dickens's works in penny issues, 241—Droop on minority representation, 73—Dürer, A., carved chessman, 402—Dutch estimate of the German war, 129—Dublin University's examinations in state medicines, 40—Dorking, Battle of, pamphlets in refutation, 129.

Erckmann-Chatrian lectured by Julian Schmidt, 210—Evelyn as host of Peter the Great, 369—Ewing, Thomas, deceased, 290—English publications, 58, 105, 129, 193, 273, 338—Early English Text Society, 9—1870 as a religious anniversary year, 290.

Faidherbe, Gen., falsehoods exposed by Gen. Von Goeben, 178—Favre's "Rome and the French Republic," 356, 370—Frère, John Hookham, Works of, 369—Frenchman's natural pet animal, 73; French press shutting out foreign criticism, 229; French and Italian journals in U. S., 209, Franco-Russian war, works on, 129, 177; French fine art publications, 290—Female education in Canada, 259—Flemish orthographic changes, 58—Franking privilege and threatening letters, 307—Flying-machines, 274.

Garfield's (Gen.) eulogy of Gen. Thomas, 57, 58—Garrick described by a German contemporary, 143, 144—Gauss's "Theoria Motus Corporum Coelesticum," 368—Gautier, Théophile, on the Venus of Milo's adventures, 177—Greatbatch, Miss E., prouciency in studies, 73—German navy during the war, 8; German War Literature, 90; German acquisition of mineral territory from France, 274.

Hariot's Brief and True Report, 401—Hotten's List of Emigrants to America, 73—Howells, W. D., and Henry, James, jr., in October Atlantic, 228—Hindu sympathy with Germany, 91—Hermann and Dorothea illustrated by Freiherr, 418.

Ideville's Diary, 369—Italian precautions against Communistic ideas, 59—Italian library statistics, 90; Italian public morality, 194—Ireland, religious denominations in, 177—Irish People on mobs, 128—Inns-of-Court products in England, 74—Im Neuen Reich, 290.

Jacquemart's etchings, 337—Johnston, Alex. Keith, deceased, 74—Journalistic amenities, 401.

Kellogg, A. N., purveyor for country newspapers, 258—King and Hague's Mining Atlas, 57.

Lacroix's "Manners, etc., of the Middle Age," 356—Landor's "Gebir," 322—Lilly and Shakespeare, 163—Luther's "Here I stand," 144—Lyman and Howe family gatherings, 162—Leicester, Mass., centennial jubilee, 240—Lisbon earthquake and English aid, 307—Luxembourg and Vosges etymologies, 164—London national theatre, 274—Lobby corruption in Connecticut, 259—Ligue de l'Enseignement, 194—Latin pronunciation, 355.

Macé, Jean, on popular education, 194—Mahan, Prof. D. H., deceased, 193—Mansel, Dean H. L., deceased, 90—Marvin, Rev. Dr., rebuked by Rev. Mr. Twining, 177—May, Rev. S. J., deceased—Méritens, Baron de, on relations with China, 339—Murchison, Sir Roderick, deceased, 208—Mentana monument at Rome, 357—Methodist Church property in the South, 337—Metric system in England and Germany, 105—Minority Representation pamphlets, 73—Muscular exertion, 369—Mounted designs, 241—Macmillan on American charities, 355—Moniteur des Architectes, 309—Microscopic department of American Naturalist, 416.

Napoleon Saint's-day, 194—Nast's designs in Harper's Weekly, 104—N. Y. Museum of Art, 337—Norway Coast of, 386—National University movement in U. S., 228.

Overland Monthly to be illustrated, 162.

Palikao and the Empress's necklace, 338—Peirce, Chas L., review of Berkeley, 355; Peirce's Logarithms, 307—Peter the Great in England, 369—Pope, the, declines temporal sovereignty, 356, 370—Porter, Prof. N., elected president of Yale, 42—inauguration, 259—Portuguese literature and criticism, 144—Paris Police Archives saved, 58; Paris press under the Commune, 106—Prehistoric discoveries in Germany and Switzerland, 144—Princeton, Mass., 385—Prison literature, 128—"People" versus "Volk," 228—Penates, 386—Postal-telegraph in England, 130—Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, 416.

Ranke's Origin of Seven Years' War, 90—Raphaels in the market, 387—Ripalda Madonna, 387—Roger L'Estrange's Observator, 307—Roman municipal improvements, 145—Russian reforms in education, 27, 67, encroachments in Asia, 323—"Runaway" in Romeo and Juliet, 8—Revue des Deux Mondes, 274, under the Commune, 42, 43, 106.

Sainte-Beuve, Nouveaux Lundis, 259, death, intimacy with Princess Mathilde, 260—Schlesinger, Dr. L., on the history of the Germans in Bohemia, 338—Schouler's political reminiscences in Boston Journal, 176—Schubert and his works, 356—Schwabe Gallery for Fallen Heroes, 273—Schwarz, Mme. Sophie Marie, 40—Scott centennial in Edinburgh, 163, 164—Scribner, Chas., deceased, 142—Secchi, Father, in trouble, 74—Shakespeare in Venice, 322, sonnets translated by Gilderminster, 322, Euphuism, 163—Sheppard's "Shut up in Paris," 323—Smalley, G. W., and the Anglo-American Association, 386—Smith's "Student's Hallam," 193—Stoffel, Baron, new edition of his Military Reports, 129—Stubb's "Documents Illustrative of English History," 194—Saints' relics, fraudulent Roman trade in 74—Serf and cerf, 73—Songs of the Spirit, 386—Saturday Review on the nomenclature of fiction, 402.

Thackeray's nomenclature, 402; Thackeray, Miss, new novel by, 368—Thomas, Gen. Geo. H., eulogy by Gen. Garfield, 57, 58—Thomson, Sir Wm., theory of life on the earth, 210—Thompson, Rev. Dr. J. P., goes abroad, 337—Toombs's rhetoric ridiculed at the South, 8—Townsend, Geo. Alfred, a graphic writer, 240—Trumbull, J. H., on mistaken notions of Algonkin grammar, and the study of American languages, 41—Tuckerman, Henry Theodore, deceased, 401, 417—Twining, Rev. Kinsley, to Rev. Dr. Marvin, 177—Tylor's "Primitive Civilization," 26—Treaty of Washington denounced by English petitioners, 42—Tidal wave hoax, 209—Tobacco scrapbook, 308.

University judges in Germany, 242.

Von Goeben and Gen. Faidherbe, 178—Venus of Milo during the siege of Paris, 177—Vases of Greece and Italy, 356—"Volk" and "People," 228.

White, Alexander, collection of paintings, 368, 401—Whitmore's Ancestral Tablets, 162—Woolsey, President, farewell address at Yale, 258, Woolsey Fund, 42—Warwick Castle on fire, 418.

Editorial and Miscellaneous Articles.

Anglo-Saxon Judge, - - - - - 52
Another "New Departure," - - - 252
Basis of All Reform, - - - - - 365
Bohemianism in French Politics, - 287
"Boss's" Dominions, - - - - - 236
Bottom of the Great City Difficulty, - 157
Butler Canvass, Lessons of the, - - 221
Butler's "First Gun," - - - - - 140
Charter Should Provide, What the New (N. Y.), - - - - - - - - 380
Cherbuliez, Victor, - - - - - 7
China, Our Duty as regards, - - - 101
Christians and Thieves, - - - - 286
Civil Service Reform Constitutional? Is, - - - - - - - - - 68
Civil Service Reform in the Party Platforms, - - - - - - - 220
Colleges, - - - - - - - - - 5
Confederate Bondholders, - - - 253
Diplomacy and Stocks, - - - - 345
Duxbury, Some Recent Proceedings in, - - - - - - - - - 126
England, Labor Movement in, - - - 284
England, Republicanism in, - - - 331
Episcopal Church, Crisis in the Protestant, - - - - - - - - 222
Erie, Latest Decision in, - - - - 85
Famous Field, A, - - - - - - 333
Gladstone's Unpopularity, - - - 190
Hastings, Battle of, - - - - - 333
Imprisonment for Debt, - - - - 317
Indian Bureau, Recent Change in, - 100
International Copyright, - - - 301
Irish and the Riots, - - - - - 36
Laborer, Condition of the, - - - 397
Labor Movement in England, - - - 284
Land Question, the Great, - - - 20
Minority Representation, - - - 69
Municipal Cæsarism, - - - - 205
Municipal Government, - - - - 188
Municipal Reform, Prospect of, - - 84
Municipal Responsibility, - - - 333
Murphy's Case, Collector, - - - 270
Newspaper Fights, - - - - - - 350
North Carolina and a New Constitution, - - - - - - - - - 37
Notoriety, - - - - - - - - 38
Papacy, The New, - - - - - - 140
Political Prospect, - - - - - 332
Political Watering-Place, - - - 171
President and the Renomination, - 172
Political Financier, A, - - - - 412
Press and the Knaves, - - - - 269
"Radicals" and "Conservatives," - 21
Railroad Axioms, - - - - - - 53
Republicans to Consider, Things for all, - - - - - - - - - 204
"Revenue Reform" Mystery, - - - 349
Rich Men in City Politics, - - - 316
Ring, Rising against the, - - - - 300
Royalty and Republicanism in Europe, - - - - - - - - 413
Science and Human Brotherhood, - 268
Scott's Birthday, - - - - - - 103
Senate, Conflict in the, - - - - 396
Sherman, Joan, - - - - - - - 412
Southern View of the Southern Problem, - - - - - - - - - 4
South, The, - - - - - - - - 364
Syndicate, The, - - - - - - - 124
Treasury View of the Finances, - - 157
Underwood, Judge, and Woman Suffrage, - - - - - - - - - 285
War-cloud in Europe, New, - - - 173
"What Are You Going to Do about It?" - - - - - - - - - 195
Who Killed the Ring? - - - - - 334
Woolsey, President, - - - - - 6

Occasional Correspondence.

Barings and the Treasury Department, - - - - - - - - - 208
Boutwell and the Nation, - - - 160
Boutwell and the New Loan, - - - 176
Brackett, Col. A. G., - - - - 89, 128
Charles Reade's Last Plot, - - - 57
Cheney Controversy Again, - - - 8
Cheney, Last Word for Mr., - - - 24
Chicago Academy of Sciences, - - 367
Coal Production, - - - - - - 88
Correction, A, - - - - - - - 89
Englishman at Court, Old-Time, - - 127
Garfield, Gen., Note from, - - - 128
German Armies, Composition of, - - 401
Great Fire, The, - - - - - - 354
Imprisonment in Civil Actions, - - 367
Kennicott, John and Robert, - - 321, 367
Louisiana Politics and the Federal Army's Interference, - - - - 161
McKean's (Judge) Court vs. the Mormons, - - - - - - - - 354
Milton's Views on Church Government, 161
Mormon vs. U. S. Government, - 325, 354
North Carolina Convention, - - - 71
Peirce, Mr., and the Realists, - - 386
Protectionist's Charity, - - - - 306, 386
President and the Civil Service, - - 104
Prohibitionists, - - - - - - - 57
Railroad Axioms, - - - - - - 89
"Runaways" Again, - - - - - 40
Science and Alcohol, - - - - - 39
South and West Despondent, - - - 127
Sugar and Coffee, Reduction of Duty on, - - - - - - - 239, 257, 258
Was it "Serf" or "Cerf"? - - - - 400
Wool, High Price of, - - - - - 399

Special Correspondence.

Domestic—Quebec, - - - - - 206, 223
Worcester, Scenes among the Butterites, - - - 225
Niagara - - - - - 238, 254
Chicago in distress, - - 302
Washington: Political Prospects, - - - - 415
England— - - - - - - 207, 319
Brougham; Grote; the Ballot in Ireland, - - - 22
Parliamentary Filibustering; Two Poets, - - - 55
Mercantile Claims under the Treaty of Washington; Mr. Russell Gurney, - 191
The Military Manœuvres, - 255
The International Exhibition - - - - - 271
Conservative Tactics, - - 288
Gladstone at Greenwich, - 352
An English Water color Exhibition, - - - - 366
Table-talk in England, - 398
France—Paris, and France, - - - 23
The Army; The Loan; The Elections, - - - - 56
Chambord's Manifesto; Duc de Chartres, - - - - 86
The Centralization of M. Thiers; Gambetta, - - 126
The Prolongation of the Executive, - - - - - 139
The Personal Government of Thiers, - - - - 192
A Neutral President; the Army, - - - - - 227
France in European Diplomacy, - - - - - 256
Political Apathy, - - - 305
A General Council in Session, - - - - - 320
Taxation in France, - - 353
Nicolai Turgeneff, - - 385
Communist Manners, - - 415
Germany — German Austria; Alsace; Peace Celebrations, - - 87

Literature.

Austen, Jane, Early Writings of, - - 164
Balaustion's Adventure, - - - - 178
Behind the Bars, - - - - - - 371
Berkeley, Life and Works of Bishop, 59
Border Town, A, - - - - - - 130
Bounty, Mutineers of the, - - - 165
Children's Books,
Supplement (No. 336), - - - 383, 404
Cholera, Notes on, - - - - - 229
City of God, - - - - - - - 357
Coming Race, The, - - - - - 133
Coolie, The, - - - - - - - 131
Dallas, Alexander James, - - - 179
Earth, The, - - - - - - - 134
Forsyth's Novels and Novelists of the Eighteenth Century, - - - - 27
Greeley as a Farmer, - - - - 108
Henry Brougham, - - - - - 43, 260
International Law, Recent Works on, - 339
Jefferson, Thomas, - - - - - 309
Kamtchatka, - - - - - - - 145
Kapp's Frederic the Great, - - - 106
King of the Beggars, - - - - 426
Kingsley in the West Indies, - - - 60
Lanfrey's Napoleon I., - - - - 194
Last Tournament, - - - - - 418
Laveleye's Prussia and Austria, - - 92
London, Misery of, - - - - - 62
Magazines for July, 29, August, 77, September, 147, October, 211, November, 294, December, - - - - 358
Maine Regiment in the War, - - - 213
Maine's Village Communities, - - 370
Mary, Queen of Scots, and Mr. Froude, 323
Masson's Life of John Milton, - - 91
Miller's Songs of the Sierras, - - 196
Minnesota and Consumptive Patients, 93
Mitford's Tales of Old Japan, - - 245
North American Review for July, 75, October, - - - - - - 292
Nebulous Proceedings, - - - - - 277
Paris Commune, Two Books on the, - 420
Patterson's Magyars, - - - - - 181
Pauperism in England, - - - - - 10
Play for Manhood, - - - - - - 244
Poet Redivivus, A, - - - - - - 146
Poetry, Fall Books of, - - - - - 341
Popularized Science, - - - - - 197
Recent Republications, - - - - - 421
Revision of the U. S. Statutes, - - 291
Russia, Two Books on, - - - - - 75
Siberian Adventure, - - - - - 310
Stimulants, - - - - - - - - 28
Stowe's, Mrs., Last Novel, - - - 324
Suburban Home Grounds, - - - - 275
Terrible Temptation, - - - - - 107
Two Historical Essayists, - - - 387, 403
U. S Government, Recent Works on the, - - - - - - - - - 242
Woolman's Journal, - - - - - - 44
Young, Charles Mayne, Memoir of, - 45

Books.

[The Italics indicate the Shorter Notices, for which also consult the Notes.]

American Association for Advancement of Science, Proceedings of, - 277
Annual Register, - - - - - - - 13
Art. Philosophy of (Taine), - - - 343
At Last, - - - - - - - - - 60
Austen, Jane, Memoir of, - - - - 164
Balaustion's Adventure, - - - - - 178
Bankrupt Law (Gazzam's), Treatise on, 94
Behind the Bars, - - - - - - - 371
Behind the Veil, - - - - - - - 278
Berkeley, Bishop, Works of, - - - 59
Book of the East (Stoddard), - - - 341
Books for Girls, - - - - - - - 181
Bounty, Mutineers of the, - - - - 165
Brougham, Lord, Life and Times of, 43, 260
Butterflies and Moths, British, - - 198
Cameos from English History, - - - 278
Carew, Bampfylde-Moore, Life of, - - 420
Children's Books,
Supplement (No. 336), - - - 388, 404
Cholera (Peters's), Notes on the Origin of, - - - - - - - - - 229
City of God, - - - - - - - - 357
Coming Race, The, - - - - - - 133
Commune, Paris under the, - - - 420
Rise and Fall of the, - - 420
Concordance to the Christian Year, - 14
Conservative Reformation and its Theology, The, - - - - - - - 312
Constitution of U. S., History and Analysis of, - - - - - - - 242
Coolie, The, - - - - - - - - 131
Cuba, My Winter in, - - - - - 343
Dallas, A. J., Life and Writings of, - 179
Daughter of an Egyptian King, - - 14
Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson, - 309
Dorking, Battle of, - - - - - 11
Droit International Codifié (Bluntschli), - - - - - - - - 339
Droit International, Commentaire sur les Eléments du (Lawrence), - - 339
Earth, The, - - - - - - - - 134
East and West Poems (Bret Harte), - 341
Education Sentimentale, - - - - 95
Elections in U. S., Law of, - - - 247
England, History of, - - - - - 311
Episodes in an Obscure Life, - - - 62
Federal Government and its Officers, - 242
First Maine Regiment, History of the, 213
Fragments of Science (Tyndall's), - 197
Friedrich der Grosse und die Vereinigten Staaten, - - - - - 106
From Fourteen to Fourscore, - - - 13
Gold and Name, - - - - - - - 96
Goosnargh, History of, - - - - 407
Greek (Boise's and Leighton's), First Lessons in, - - - - - - 95
Historical Essays (Freeman's), - - 403
Historical Questions, - - - - - 261
Historical Reader (Anderson's), - - 14
Household Book of Songs, - - - 407
Institutes of Medicine (Payne's), - - 96
Illustrated Holiday Books, - - - 422
Island Neighbors, - - - - - - 262
Japan, Tales of Old, - - - - - 245
Journey Round My Room, - - - - 327
Kennedy, Life of J. P., - - - - 325
Last Knight, - - - - - - - - 278
Last Tournament, - - - - - - 418
Latin Grammar (Roby's), - - - - 423
Law (Washburn's), Lectures on the Study and Practice of, - - - 277
Light Science for Leisure Hours, - - 197
Little Sunshine's Holiday, - - - 132
London, Hand-book to the Charities of, - - - - - - - - - 62
Lost Despatch, - - - - - - - 262
Magyars, The, - - - - - - - - 181
Maryland, Doings in, - - - - - 372
Mary, Queen of Scots, - - - - - 323
Miller, Hugh, Life and Letters of, - - 47
Milton, Joan, Life of, - - - - - 91
Minnesota as a Home for Invalids, - 93
Modes of Origin of Lowest Organisms (Bastian's), - - - - - - 46
Mount Desert, Rambles in, - - - 135
Mouvement Socialiste, Le, - - - - 107
Musings over the Christian Year, - - 14
My Wife and I, - - - - - - - 324
My Witness (Winter), - - - - - 341
Napoleon I., History of, - - - - - 194
National Peace Jubilee, History of, - 372
Novels and Novelists of the Eighteenth Century, - - - - - - 27
Opium and the Opium Appetite, - - - 28
Overland, - - - - - - - - - 423
Paris during the Siege, Inside, - - 149
Pauperism (Fawcett's), - - - - - 10
Pentateuch, Key to, - - - - - - 150
Peoria, History of, - - - - - - 148
Pink and White Tyranny, - - - - 94
Pioneer Biography, - - - - - - 167
Pioneers and Founders, - - - - - 149
Play-ground of Europe, - - - - - 244
Prusse, La, et l'Autriche depuis Sadowa, - - - - - - - - - 92
Psalms, The (Conant's), - - - - - 12
Pupil of the Legion of Honor, - - - 247
Quatrains de Khèyam, - - - - - - 146
Reindeer, Dogs, and Snow-Shoes, - - 310
Reminiscences of Fifty Years, - - - 214
Republications, - - - - - - - 421
Reuchlin, Leben und Werke, - - - - 423
Rhododendron and American Plants, - 79
Riesser's (Gabriel) Life, - - - - 246
Roadmaster's Assistant, - - - - - 150
Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyam, - - - 146
Russia in 1870, - - - - - - - 75
Russian, Historical Narratives from the, - - - - - - - - - 75
Rye, History of, - - - - - - - 130
Shoemaker's Village, - - - - - 182
Short Studies on Great Subjects (Froude's), - - - - - - - - 387
Sierras, Songs of the, - - - - - 196
Spruner's Hand-Atlas, - - - - - 326
Suburban Home Grounds, - - - - 275
Synonyms Discriminated, - - - - 342
Ten Great Religions, - - - - - 109
Tent-Life in Siberia, - - - - - 145
Terrible Temptation, - - - - - 107
Two College Friends, - - - - - 389
U. S. Statutes, Revision of, - - - 291
Village Communities in the East and West, - - - - - - - - 370
Virginia, Journal of a Young Lady of, - - - - - - - - - 230
Wake-Robin, - - - - - - - - 79
War and the Weather, - - - - - 326
Wear and Tear, - - - - - - - 423
What I Know of Farming, - - - - 108
Who is Responsible for the War? - - 12
Why Did He Not Die? - - - - - 63
Woolman, John, Journal of, - - - 44
Young, Charles Mayne, Memoir of, - 45
Young Mechanic, - - - - - - 198
Zanita, - - - - - - - - - 326

Books of the Week.

14, 31, 47, 63, 79, 96, 135, 150, 182, 198, 230, 247, 262, 296, 327, 343, 360, 373, 390, 407.

Fine Arts.

Music: Mrs. Charles Moulton's Concerts, - - - - - - - - 279

ERRATA.

Page 66, column 1, line 16. For "$9,000,000," read "$900,000."

Page 79, column 1, line 6. For "J. R. Osgood & Co." read "Hurd & Houghton." Line 4 from bottom: for "C. S. Rand" read "E. S. Rand."

Page 110, column 2, line 17. For "postulating our" read "portraying an."

Page 180, column 1, line 17. For "poetical" read "political."

Page, 371, column 1, line 11. For "Mill" read "Maine." Line 15: for "alluvial" read "allodial."

Page 397, column 1, line 4 from bottom. Insert "and" before "the State geologist."

REGISTER OF BOOKS RECEIVED DURING THE HALF YEAR.

Theology, Metaphysics, and Ethics.

Abbot (E.). Literature of the Doctrine of a Future Life.....(W. J. Widdleton) $2 00
Adams (Rev. W.), Regeneration in Baptism.....(M. H. Mallory & Co) 2 50
Antidote to "The Gates Ajar," swd.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.) 25
Augustine (St.), Works: The City of God, 2 vols.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 6 00
Bacon (Rev. T. S.), Christian Children, swd.....(M. H. Mallory & Co.)
Beecher (Rev. H. W.), The Life of Jesus, the Christ.....(J. B. Ford & Co.) 3 50
Brown (J. B.), Misread Passages of Scripture, 2d series.....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Chamberlayne (Rev. I.), Saving Faith: Its Rationale..... " "
Collyer (Robert), The Life that Now Is.....(H. B. Fuller)
Connelly (Rev. P.), Terms of Reunion with Rome.....(London)
The Italian Reform Movement in the Church of Rome, swd... (Florence)
Constable (H.), Duration and Nature of Future Punishment, swd..... (C. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Cook (F. C.), The Holy Bible [and Speaker's Commentary], Vol I., Part I., Genesis—Exodus.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Cornell (J. H.), The Introit—Psalms for Sundays and Holy-Days..(Pott & Amery) $1 50
David (C. G.), A Positivist Primer.....(David Wesley & Co.)
Demonstration in Honor of the 25th Anniversary of Pius IX.....(J. Murphy & Co.)
Dunn (H.), The Study of the Bible.....(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 1 50
Dunn (Rev. L. R.), The Mission of the Spirit.....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Fitch (Rev. E. T.), Sermons Preached at Yale College.....(Judd & White)
Folsom (N. S.), The Four Gospels, 2d ed.....(A. Williams & Co.)
Formby (Rev. H.), Pictorial Bible and Church-History Stories...(Cath. Pub. Soc.)
Fowle (T. W.), The Character of Christ, swd.....(Hurd & Houghton) 15
Gardiner (Rev. F.), Harmony of the Four Gospels in English..(Warren F. Draper) 2 50
Harmony of the Four Gospels in Greek.... " " 2 50
The Life of Our Lord in the Words of the Gospels. " 1 00
Giberne (Agnes), The Day-Star.....(Pott & Amery) 1 25
Gilbert (Rev. D.), The Love of Jesus.....(John Murphy & Co.) 50
Gray (Rev. E. P.), The Apostolic Treasury, swd.....(Libby & Swett)
Hodge (Rev. C.), Systematic Theology.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Hopkins (Rev. M.), The Law of Love and Love as a Law, 3d ed. " " 1 75
Hutton (R. H.), The Incarnation and Principles of Evidence.....(Pott & Amery) 60

Register of Books Received.

Hudson (C. F.), Critical Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament, 2d ed.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Huntington (Rev. W. R.), The Church Idea, 2d ed.....(Hurd & Houghton) $1 25
Jowett (B.), Dialogues of Plato, 4 vols.....(Charles Scribner & Co.) 12 00
Lebon (H.), The Holy Communion.....(John Murphy & Co.) 1 00
Letter to an Alarmed Friend, swd.....(Pott, Young & Co.) 05
Lord (J.), Prophetic Imperialism.....(Hurd & Houghton)
Mansel (Prof. H. L.), Metaphysics.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Mediation: The Function of Thought.....(Warren F. Draper) 1 25
Modern Scepticism.....(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 2 25
Mudge (Rev. Z. A.), Footprints of Roger Williams.....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Owen (R. D.), The Debatable Land between this World and the Next.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Pond (Rev. E.), The Apocalypse Explained.....(Hoyt, Fogg & Breed) 1 50
Porter (Prof. N.), Elements of Intellectual Science.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Pressensé (Rev. E. de), Jesus Christ: His Life and Work....(Carlton & Lanahan) 1 50
The Early Years of Christianity.....(Chas. Scribner & Co) 1 75
Proceedings of the Free Religious Association, swd.....(Boston) 35
Sermons by the Paulists, Vol. VI.....(Catholic Pub. House)
Stiebeling (Dr. G.T.), Naturwissenschafte gegen Philosophie, swd.(L. W. Schmidt)
Taine (H.), On Intelligence.....(Holt & Williams) 5 00
The Four Gospels in One.....(R. A. Campbell)
The Mighty Works of Jesus Christ: Illustrated.....(Pott, Young & Co.)
Thomson (Rev. J. P.), Home Worship.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.)
Tyng (Rev. S. H.), The Rich Kinsman.....(Prot. Epis. Soc.) 1 00
Ueberweg (Dr. F.), History of Philosophy, Vol. I.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Walden (Rev. T.), Our English Bible and its Ancestors.....(Porter & Coates)
Weiss (Rev. J.), American Religion.....(Roberts Brothers)
Whedon (D. D.), Commentary on the New Testament, Vol. III. (Carlton & Lanahan)
Wilson (Bishop), Expository Lectures on Colossians.....(Prot. Epis. Soc.) 1 00
Woolsey (Rev. T. D.), Two Sermons Preached at Yale College.(C.C.Chatfield & Co.)

Poetry.

Aldornere: a Pennsylvanian Idyll.....(John Penington & Son)
"Awful!" and Other Jingles.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 25
Aytoun (W. E.) and Martin (T.), Poems and Ballads of Goethe (Holt & Williams).. 1 50
Birch (C. M.), Reveries of Song.....(Bell & Daldy) 75
Browning (R.), Balaustion's Adventure.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Bryant (W. C.), Homer's Odyssey, translated, Vol. I..... " " 5 00
Poems.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
The Song of the Fountain: Illustrated..... "
Bulwer-Lytton (Sir E.), King Arthur: a Poem.....(Harper & Bros)
Butler (W. A.), Poems.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 2 00
Channing (W. E.), The Wanderer: a Poem..... " 1 25
Duyckinck (E. A.), The Poets of the Nineteenth Century.....(Harper & Brothers)
Everything Serene: Verses, swd.....(American News Co.) 25
Ganter (F. S.), Man: a Poem, swd.....(New Orleans) 1 00
Gardner (Celia E.), Stolen Waters: a Poem.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Glenn (Jessie), Poems.....(Bannan & Ramsey)
Grün (A.), The Last Knight.....(Hurd & Houghton)
Harte (B.), East and West Poems.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.)
Holcombe (Dr. W.), Southern Voices: Poems.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Imogen, and Other Poems.....(B. B. Russell)
John Jerningham's Journal.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 75
Kendrick (Prof. A. C.), Our Poetical Favorites.....(Sheldon & Co.)
Lazarus (Emma), Admetus: a Poem.....(Hurd & Houghton) 2 00
Lee (A. T.), Army Ballads and Other Poems.....
Longfellow (H. W.), The Divine Tragedy.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Mac-Henry (G.), Time and Eternity: a Poem.....(A. L. Bancroft & Co.)
Markham (C. R.), Ollanta: An Ancient Ynca Drama.....(Trübner & Co.) 75
Meredith (O.), Lucile, and Other Poems, swd.....(Jas. R. Osgood & Co.) 50
Miller (C. H.), Songs of the Sierras.....(Roberts Bros.) 1 50
Morgan (J. A.), Macaronic Poetry Collected.....(Hurd & Houghton) 2 75
Odenheimer (Rev. W. H) and Bird (F. M.), Songs of the Spirit.....(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)
Palgrave (F. T.), Lyrical Poems.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 75
Songs of the Heart.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Stoddard (R. H.), The Book of the East, and Other Poems....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Tennyson (A.), The Last Tournament..... " " 1 52
" " " .....(J. E. Tilton & Co.)
Washburn (J. B.), Yo-Semite: a Poem, swd.....(A. Roman & Co.)
Watson (J. W.), Beautiful Snow, and other Poems.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 2 00
Winter (W.), My Witness: Poetry.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 25

Political and Social Subjects.

Adams (C. F., jr., and H.), Chapters in Erie, and Other Essays.(J. R. Osgood & Co.) $2 00
Ames (P. W.), Speeches of Fisher Ames, 1789-1796.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Beecher (C. E.), Woman's Profession as Mother and Educator....(George Maclean)
Dillon (J. B.), Historical Evidence of the Origin and Nature of the U. S. Government.....(New York)
Eberhardt (M.), Die Rechtstellung des Weibes innerhalb der Ehe, swd.....(Meininger & Schick)
Elder (Dr. W.), Questions of the Day, Economic and Social.....(H. C. Baird) 3 00
Emerson (Dr. G.), Le Play's Organization of Labor(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
George (H.), Our Land and Land Policy, swd.....(San Francisco)
Gillet (R. H.), The Federal Government.....(Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.)
Greeley (H. G.), Letters from Texas, swd.....(New York)
Hamilton (Gail), Woman's Worth and Worthlessness.....(Harper & Bros.)
Heinzen (K.), Der Deutsche Editoren-Kongress zu Cincinnati, swd.....(Boston)
What is Real Democracy? swd.....(Indianapolis)
Hopkins (E. A.), Relationes Comerciales entre la República Argentina y la de Bolivia, swd.....(Buenos Ayres)
Jevons (W. S.), The Theory of Political Economy.....(Macmillan & Co.) 3 50
Johnson (Rev. S.), Labor Parties and Labor Reform, swd.....(Boston)
Lord Bantam.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons)
Löwenthal (Dr. E. J.), Die Bedeutung des Deutsch-Französischen Krieges, swd.....(L. W. Schmidt)
McPherson (E.), Political History of the U. S., 1865-1870.....(Philp & Solomons)
Nast (T.), Miss Columbia's Public School, swd.....(F. B. Felt & Co.)
Paez (R.), Ambas Américas: Contrastes.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Pim (Hon. J.), Ireland and the Imperial Parliament, swd.....(Dublin)
Ruskin (J.), Fors Clavigera.....(John Wiley & Son) 1 00
Societyism and its Evils, swd.....(Sheldon & Co.)
The Coming Race; or, The New Utopia.....(Francis B. Felt & Co.)
The Second Armada, swd.....(Porter & Coates)
Townsend (G. A.), The Mormon Trials at Salt Lake City, swd....(Am. News Co.)
Watertown (G.), Hibernia: Showing How Pat Rules America.(American News Co.) 50
What Happened after the Battle of Dorking, swd.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 25
Wright (H. B.), A Practical Treatise on Labor.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.)

History, Biography, Geography, Travels, etc.

Abbott (J. S. C.), History of Frederic the Great.....(Harper & Bros.)
History of Louis Philippe..... " "
Abelous (L.), Gustavus Adolphus.....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Andersen (H. C.), Pictures of Travel.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 75
Beekman (J. W.), Centenary Address, N. Y. Hospital, swd.....(New York)
Biographical Sketch of Mother Margaret Mary Hallahan.....(Cath. Pub. Society)
Boyd (M.), Reminiscences of Fifty Years.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Brockett (Dr. L. P.), Paris Under the Commune, swd.....(H. S. Goodspeed & Co.) 75
Brockman (R.), The Land of Lorne.....(F. B. Felt & Co.) 2 00
Bush (R. G.), Reindeer, Dogs, and Snow Shoes.....(Harper & Bros.)
Butler (Rev. W.), The Land of the Veda.....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Carlyle (T.), French Revolution, Vols. 2 and 3.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 0 90
Life of John Sterling.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 90
Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches..... " " 90
Celebration of the 150th Anniversary of Leicester, Mass., swd.....(Cambridge)
Cole (Maj. W. L.), California, swd.....(New York)
Curtius (E.), History of Greece, Vol. II.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Da Costa (B. F.), Rambles in Mount Desert.....(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)
The Moabite Stone..... " "
Dewey (Mary E.), Life and Letters of Catharine M. Sedgwick....(Harper & Bros.)
Egli (J. J.), Nomina Geographica. Part 2, swd.....(B. Westermann & Co.)
Essex Institute Historical Collections, Vol. XI., Part 1, swd.....(Salem)
Fetridge (W. P.), Rise and Fall of the Paris Commune.....(Harper & Bros.)
Fishwick (H.), History of the Parochial Chapelry of Goosnargh...(Trübner & Co.) $3 00
Forster (J.), The Life of Charles Dickens, Vol. I.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Forsyth (W.), Novels and Novelists of the 18th Century.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Four Years at Yale.....(C. C. Chatfield & Co.) 2 50
Freeman (E. A.), Historical Essays.....(Macmillan & Co.) 4 00
Froude (J. A.), Short Studies on Great Subjects, 2d Series.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Gilmore (P. S.), History of the National Peace Jubilee.....(Lee & Shepard) 5 00
Gould (Maj. J. M.), History of the First—Tenth—Twenty-ninth Maine Regiment..(Stephen Berry) 5 00
Hampton (Gen. W.), Life and Character of R. E. Lee, swd...(John Murphy & Co.)
Hay (J.), Castilian Days.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 2 00
Hawthorne (N.), American Note Books..... " " 1 25
Headley (J. T.), Mountain Adventures.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Helps (A.), Life of Hernando Cortes.....(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 2 00
Howe (F.), The True Site of Calvary.....(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 1 00
Hughes (T.), Alfred the Great.....(Macmillan & Co.)
Hutchinson (C. C.), Resources of Kansas, swd.....(Topeka)
Illustrirte Kriegs-Chronik.....(B. Westermann & Co.)
Inside Paris during the Siege.....(Macmillan & Co.) 2 00
Jay (W. M. L.), My Winter in Cuba.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Journal of a Young Lady of Virginia, 1782.....(John Murphy & Co.)
Julian (Hon. G. W.), Speeches on Political Questions.....(Hurd & Houghton) 3 00
Kingsley (Rev. C.), At Last: A Christmas in the West Indies...(Macmillan & Co.) 2 00
" " " " .....(Harper & Bros.)
Labberton (R. H.), Historical Atlas.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 3 50
Historical Questions..... " " " 1 75
Leighton (J.), Paris Under the Commune.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Life of the Rev. Mother Julia.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.) 1 50
Life and Times of Henry, Lord Brougham, Vol. II.....(Harper & Bros.)
Lossing (B. J.), History of England.....(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 2 50
Mackenzie (R. S.), Life of Sir Walter Scott.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 2 00
Marcy (R. B.), Border Reminiscences.....(Harper & Bros.)
McVickar (Rev. W. A.), Life of Rev. John McVickar, S.T.D...(Hurd & Houghton) 2 00
Meline (J. F.), Mary, Queen of Scots..... " " 1 75
Neill (E. D.), Memoir of Rev. Patrick Copland, swd.....(Charles Scribner & Co.) 50
Palestine Exploration Society, First Statement, swd.....(New York)
Palgrave (F. T.), Life of Sir Walter Scott.....(Porter & Coates)
Passavant (J. D.), Raphael of Urbino, and his Father.....(Macmillan & Co.) 12 00
Prentiss (Rev. G. L.), Discourse in Memory of Thos. Harvey Skinner, D.D., swd (A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 50
Proctor (Edna D.), A Russian Journey.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Randolph (Sarah N.), The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson.....(Harper & Bros.)
Schouler (W.), A History of Massachusetts in the Civil War...(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Spillan (Dr. D.), Livy's History of Rome, translated, 2 vols.....(Harper & Bros.)
Smith (P.), Ancient History of the East.....(" ")
Taylor (B.), Illustrated Library of Travel, etc.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
The Great Fires in Chicago and the West, swd.....(J. W. Goodspeed) 50
Tuckerman (H. T.), Life of John Pendleton Kennedy.....(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 2 00
Tyndall (Prof. J.), Hours of Exercise in the Alps.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Yonge (C. M.), Cameos from English History, 2d series.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50

Fiction.

Alcott (Miss L. M.), Morning Glories, and Other Stories....(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Almost Faultless, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 60
Ames (Mrs. M. C.), Eirene: a Woman's Right, swd.....(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 75
Anne Furness, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 75
Behind the Veil, swd.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 75
Benoni Blake, M.D.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 1 75
Black (W.), A Daughter of Heth, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 50
College Library: Julian Home; Eric; St. Winifred's, 3 vols.....(M. Doolady) 5 00
Collins (M.), Marquis and Merchant, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 50
Craik (Georgiana M.), The Cousin from India: a Girls' Book.....(Harper & Bros.)
David Lloyd's Last Will, swd.....(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 75
De Forest (J. W.), Overland.....(Sheldon & Co.)
Dickens (C.), Martin Chuzzlewit, Nicholas Nickleby, Old Curiosity Shop and American Notes, Our Mutual Friend, Pickwick Papers..(D. Appleton & Co.)
Dickinson (Ellen E.), Emmanuel, and Other Stories.....(F. Whittaker & Co.) 1 25
Disraeli (B.), Tancred, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 50
Douglas (Amanda M.), Lucia: Her Problem.....(Sheldon & Co.)
Douglas (Matilda), Doings in Maryland.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Dumas (A.), Edmond Dantes, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 75
Louise La Vallière, swd..... " " 1 00
The Iron Mask, swd..... " " 1 00
Droz (G.), Around a Spring, swd.....(Holt & Williams) 75
Edwards (Mrs. A.), Ought We to Visit Her?.....(Sheldon & Co.)
Eggleston (E.), The Hoosier School-Master.....(Orange Judd & Co.) 1 25
Enault (L.), The Pupil of the Legion of Honor.....(Porter & Coates)
Christine, swd.....(J. S. Redfield) 50
Erckmann-Chatrian (MM.), The Invasion of France in 1814...(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Farjeon (B. L.), Joshua Marvel.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 2 00
" " .....(Harper & Bros.) 40
Gardner (Mrs. H. C.), A King's Daughter, and other Tales....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Garrett (Ruth and Edward), The Quiet Miss Godolphin....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Gibbon (C.), For Lack of Gold, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 50
Haliburton (T. C.), Sam Slick, the Clockmaker.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 25
Harris (Mrs. S. S.), Richard Vandermarck.....(Charles Scribner & Co.) 1 50
Hawthorne (N.), English Note-Books.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 2 00
House of the Seven Gables, and the Snow Image. " " 2 00
Mosses from an Old Manse..... " " 2 00
Scarlet Letter, and Blithedale Romance, 1 vol. " " 2 00
Twice Told Tales..... " " 2 00
Holt (Emily S.), Isoult Barry of Wynscote.....(T. Whittaker & Co.)
Howells (W. D.), Their Wedding Journey.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.)
James Gordon's Wife: a Novel, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 50
James (Marian), The Diamond on the Hearth, swd..... " " 50
Lever (C.), Con Cregan, swd., Davenport Dunn, swd., Horace Templeton, swd., Kate O'Donohue, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)
Lindsay Lee and his Friends.....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Loring (F. W.), Two College Friends.....(A. K. Loring) 1 00
Lowly Ways: Diary of a Poor Young Lady.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
McCarthy (J.), Lady Judith.....(Sheldon & Co.)
MacDonald (G.), The Portent.....(A. K. Loring)
Mackenzie (Mrs. A. S.), Aureola; or, The Black Sheep.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
Macquoid (Katharine S.), Patty.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 75
Rookstone.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Magill (Mary T.), Women, or Chronicles of the Late War.....(Turnbull Bros.) 1 75
Marryat (Florence), Her Lord and Master, swd..... " " 50
The Prey of the Gods.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 25
" " " swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 30
Melville (G. J. W.), The Gladiators, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 60
Moore (Mrs. J. F.), Losses and Gains.....(Henry Hoyt)
Morton House, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 1 00
Müller (O.), Charlotte Ackerman.....(Porter & Coates)
Mulock (D. M.), Agatha's Husband, Hannah, swd., Little Sunshine's Holiday, Olive.....(Harper & Bros.)

Register of Books Received.

Newby (Mrs. C. J.), Kate Kennedy, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Co.) $0 50
Parr (Louisa), John Thompson, Blockhead.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Perch (P.), Dukesborough Tales.....(Turnbull Brothers) 1 50
Prentiss (E.), Aunt Jane's Hero.....(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 1 50
Reade (C.), A Terrible Temptation, swd.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 50
" " .....(Harper & Bros.)
Reynolds (G. W. M.), Mysteries of the Court of London..(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 00
Richardson (Mrs. A. S.), Stories from Old English Poetry.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Roe (A. S.), Resolution.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.) 1 50
Sand (Mme.), A Rolling Stone, swd.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 50
Cesarine Dietrich..... " " 1 50
Handsome Lawrence, swd..... " " 50
Monsieur Antoine, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 75
The Last Aldini, swd..... " " 1 00
Fanchon, the Cricket..... " "
Saunders (Katherine), Gideon's Rock.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
The Haunted Crust, etc.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons)
Schwartz (Marie S.), The Wife of a Vain Man, swd.....(Lee & Shepard) 1 00
Six Months Hence, swd.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 75
Smith (Julia P.), Brazen Gates.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Spielhagen (F.), Problematic Characters.....(Holt & Williams) 1 50
Through Night to Light..... " " 1 50
Spofford (Mrs. H. S.), New England Legends.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 00
Stephens (Mrs. Ann S.), A Noble Woman.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Palaces and Prisons..... " " 1 50
Stowe (Mrs. H. B.), My Wife and I.....(J. B. Ford & Co.) 1 75
Tautphœus (Baroness), Cyrilla, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 75
The Cliffards of Clyffe.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
The Curate and the Rector.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 1 75
The Home at Heatherbrae.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
The Island Neighbors: a Novel of American Life, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 75
The Member from Paris.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 25
The Prisoners of St. Lazare.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
The Sower's Reward, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 25
Trollope (T. A.), Durnton Abbey, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 50
Wallace (Mrs. E. D.), Strife.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 1 75
Walworth (M. T.), Delaplaine.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.) 1 75
Wells (Prof. W.), The Heroine of the White Nile.....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Whitney (Mrs. A. D. T.), Real Folks.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Zerub Throop's Experiment.....(A. K. Loring)
Wilford (Florence), Vivia, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 50
Williams (L. A.), The Lost Despatch, swd.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 50
Won—not Wooed, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 50
Wood (Mrs. H.), Dene Hollow.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Yelverton (Thérèse), Zanita: a Tale of the Yo-Semite.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50

Juvenile Literature.

Abbott (J.), August and Elvie.....(Dodd & Mead) 1 50
Abbott (E.), The Baby's Things; a Story in Verse.....(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 75
A Tale of a Nest.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.) 1 50
Bache (R. M.), American Wonderland.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
Barker (Lady), A Christmas Cake in Four Quarters.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50
Chatterbox for 1871.....(Pott, Young & Co.) 1 50
De Kroyft (Mrs. S. H.), Little Jakey.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Djaz (Mrs. A. M.), William Henry and His Friends.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Douglas (Marian), Picture Poems for Young Folks..... " " 1 50
Du Chaillu (P.), The Country of the Dwarfs.....(Harper & Bros.)
Elliott (J. W.), National Nursery Rhymes.....(Novello, Ewer & Co.)
Hale (Rev. E. E.), How to Do It.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Harrison (Jennie), The Old Back Room.....(Dodd & Mead) 1 50
Hood (T.), Puss and Robin; and their Friends Kitty & Bob.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50
Household Tales and Fairy Stories.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons)
Johnson (E.), The Judge's Pets.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 25
Kingsley (H.), The Lost Child.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50
Knatchbull-Hugessen (E. H.), Moonshine; Fairy Stories..... " " 1 50
Lee (M. and C.), Rosamond Fane.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.) 1 50
Little Folks, Vol. I.....(American News Co.)
Morris (Rev. F. O.), Dogs and their Doings.....(Harper & Bros.)
Mother Goose set to Music.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Nine Years Old.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50
Norris (Emilia M.), Adrift on the Sea.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.) 1 00
Our Country Home.....(Pott, Young & Co.)
Rogers (W. H.), Cat and Mouse, swd., Sugar Bread, The Naughty Boys of Corcutt, Ice Peter.....(Sampson Low, Son & Marston)
Sanford (Mrs. D. P.), Five Happy Children.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.) 1 50
The Children's Magazine, Vol. I.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
The Merrie Heart; Nursery Rhymes.....(Robert Turner)
The Story without an End.....(Chas. S. Francis)
Trowbridge (J. T.), Jack Hazard and His Fortunes.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Two Legends of the Christ-Child, swd.....(De Witt C. Lent & Co.)
Ward (Mrs. F. M.), The Vagabond.....(T. Whittaker & Co.)
Claude Spencer; and Waddles..... " "
Weeks (Mrs. H. C.), Four, and What They Did.....(Hurd & Houghton)
White (Alexina B.), Little-Folk Songs..... " " 1 25
Yonge (Miss C. M.), Little Lucy's Wonderful Globe.....(Macmillan & Co.) 2 00

Education.

Abbott (J.), Gentle Measures in the Management of the Young...(Harper & Bros.)
Anderson (J. J.), The Historical Reader.....(Clark & Maynard) 1 80
Bartholomew (W. N.), Teacher's Guide in Drawing.(Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.)
Bascom (Prof. J.), Æsthetics; or, The Science of Beauty..... " " "
Brooks (E.), The Normal Algebra.....(Sower, Barnes & Potts)
Cathcart (G. R.), Youth's Speaker.....(Ivison, Blakeman & Co.)
Coates (H. T.), The Comprehensive Speaker.....(Porter & Coates)
Collins (C. W.), Sophocles.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 00
Collins (W. L.), Cicero..... " "
Combe (Dr. A.), The Management of Infancy.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Comfort (Prof. G. F.), Manual of German Conversation.....(Harper & Bros.)
Corneille (P.), Le Cid, 2d ed., swd.....(Holt & Williams)
Crosby (Pro. A.), Grammar of the Greek Language, 44th ed.....(Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.)
Dindorf (W.), Sophocles.....(Harper & Bros.)
Fish (D. W.), Arithmetical Examples.....(Ivison, Blakeman & Co.)
Goodwin (Prof. W. W.) and Allen (J. H.), Greek Reader.....(Ginn Bros.) 2 00
Gross (M.), Languages and Popular Education, swd.....(E. Steiger)
Hamilton (Dr. J. H.), Parker's Exercises in English Composition.....(Oakley, Mason & Co.) 1 00
Holbrook (A.), School Management.....(Josiah Holbrook & Co.)
Hudson (Rev. N.), Plays of Shakespeare, for the Use of Schools.....(Ginn Brothers) 2 50
Jelliffe (W. M.), Good Selections in Prose and Poetry. (J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.) 2 00
Jononnot (J.) and Hewes (S. E.), School-House..... " "
Leighton (R. F.), Greek Lessons.....(Ginn Bros.)
Lodeman (A.), German Conversation Tables, bds.....(Holt & Williams) 40
Lyell (Sir C.), The Student's Elements of Geology.....(Harper & Bros.)
Martin (Prof. B. N.), Choice Specimens of American Literature....(Sheldon & Co.)
Nicholson (H. A.), Text-Book of Geology.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Text-Book of Zoology..... " "
Potter (H. L. D.), Manual of Reading.....(Harper & Bros.)
Racine (J.), Athalie, 2d ed. swd.....(Holt & Williams)
Roby (H. J.), Grammar of the Latin Language.....(Macmillan & Co.) 2 50
Rolfe (W. J.), Shakespeare's Tempest.....(Harper & Bros.)
Smith (W.), Hallam's Middle Ages, Student's ed..... " "
Swinton (Prof. W.), Condensed School History of the U. S.(Ivison, Blakeman & Co.)
Word-Analysis..... " "
Underwood (F. H.), Hand-Book of English Literature.....(Lee & Shepard)
Waddell (Prof. W. H.), Latin Grammar for Beginners.....(Harper & Bros.)

Science and Technics.

Agassiz (Elizabeth C. and Alex.), Seaside Studies in Natural History, 2d ed.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.)
Ball (Prof. R. S.), Experimental Mechanics.....(Macmillan & Co.) $6 00
Beard (Dr. G. M.), Eating and Drinking, swd.....(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 50
Stimulants and Narcotics, swd..... " " 1 50
Brightly (F. C.), Leading Cases on the Law of Elections.....(Kay & Bro.)
Chambers (Dr. T. K.), Restorative Medicine.....(Henry C. Lea)
Cocke (W. A.), Common and Civil Law Practice in U. S. Courts.....(Baker, Voorhis & Co.) 4 00
Curtis (G. T.), The American Conveyancer, 2d ed.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Darwin (C.), Researches in Natural History and Geology.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Half-Hours with Modern Scientists.....(C. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Hartwig (G.), The Subterranean World.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 8 50
Henson (W. S.), Modern Astronomy.....(Newark)
Hinton (J.), Health and its Conditions.....(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 1 50
Holbrook (Dr. M. L.), Parturition without Pain.....(Wood & Holbrook)
Hunter (Dr. J. B.), Review of Darwin's Theory, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Lawrence (W. B.), Disabilities of American Women Married Abroad.....(Baker, Voorhis & Co.)
Morgan (L. H.), Systems of Consanguinity and Affinity of the Human Family.....(Smithsonian Institution)
Mount Washington in Winter.....(Chick & Andrews) 1 50
Packard (Dr. A. S., jr.), Record of American Entomology, for 1870, swd....(Salem)
Peirce (Prof. J. M.), Tables of Logarithmic and Trigonometric Functions.....(Ginn Bros.)
Peters (Dr. J. C.), Notes on Asiatic Cholera, 2d ed.....(D. Van Nostrand)
Powers (E.), Artificial Production of Rain.....(S. C. Griggs & Co.)
Proctor (R. A.), Light Science for Leisure Hours.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Professors Huxley, Roscoe, Huggins, Dawkins, and Ward, Science Lectures for the People, swd.....(D. Van Nostrand)
Professors Roscoe, Alcock, Jevons, Morgan, Science Lectures for the people.....(D. Van Nostrand)
Professors Williamson, Carpenter, Green, Lockyer, Science Lectures for the People, swd.....(D. Van Nostrand)
Pynchon (Prof. T. R.), The Chemical Forces.....(Taintor Bros.)
Ram (J.), Science of Legal Judgment.....(Baker, Voorhis & Co.) 3 00
Reclus (E.), The Earth.....(Harper & Bros.)
Seymour (S.), Review of the Theory of Narrow Gauges, swd....(D. Van Nostrand)
Tandon (M.), The Wonders of the Sea.....(Robert Turner)
Tyndall (Prof. J.), Light and Electricity.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Walker (W. B.), Cyclical Deluges..... " "
Wallace (A. R.), Action of Natural Selection on Man, swd..... " "
Washburn (Prof. E.), Lectures on the Study and Practice of the Law.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Wood (Rev. J. G.), Insects at Home.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)

Periodicals.

Bastian (A.) and Hartmann (R.), Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. II., Nos. 4, 5 6...(L. W. Schmidt)
Catholic Family Almanac, swd.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.) 25
Dodd & Mead's Sunday-School Annual, for 1871, swd.....(Dodd & Mead)
Holtzendorff (F. von), Jahrbuch für Gesetzgebung, Verwaltung und Rechtspflege des Deutschen Reichs, Part I., swd.....(Leipzig)
Im neuen Reich, swd.....(L. W. Schmidt)
Josh Billings's Farmer's Allminax for 1872, swd.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Journal of the Anthropological Institute of New York, Vol. I., No. 1, swd..(B. Westermann & Co.) 50
Littell's Living Age, Vol. CX.....(Littell & Gay)
Nast's Illustrated Almanac, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 30
The Workshop, swd.....(E. Steiger) 40
Zeitschrift für Erdkunde, Vol. VI., No. 3, swd.....(L. W. Schmidt)

Miscellaneous.

American Tour of Messrs. Brown, Jones, and Robinson.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Appleton's Hand-Book of American Travel, Western Tour..... " "
Atlas accompanying Vol. III. on Mining Industry, U. S. Geol. Explor. 40th Par...(Washington)
Atwood (D. T.), Country and Suburban Houses.....(Orange Judd & Co.) 1 50
Bowman (F. C.) and Dana (C. A.), Household Book of Songs for Four Voices.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Colange (L.), The National Encyclopædia, No. 1, swd.....(F. B. Felt & Co.) 40
Cornelius (Mrs.), The Young Housekeeper's Friend.(Thompson, Bigelow & Brown) 1 50
Davis (A. J.), Mental Disorders.....(American News Co.)
De Maistre (X.), Journey Round My Room.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
De Vere (Prof. M. S.), Americanisms.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Downing (C.), Selected Fruits.....(John Wiley & Son)
Emerson (L. O.), National Chorus Book.....(O. Ditson & Co.)
and Tilden (W. S.), The Hour of Singing..... " Emerson's Singing School..... "
Fables of Pilpay.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Fetridge (W. P.), Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe....(Harper & Bros.)
Gardner (F. B.), The Carriage Painter's Illustrated Manual.....(S. R. Wells) 1 00
Grün (A.), The Last Knight.....(Hurd & Houghton) 2 50
Guide for Travellers by Railway, Stage, and Steamboat, in the Pacific States, swd.(A. L. Bancroft & Co.)
Haswell (C. H.), Book-keeping by Double Entry.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 60
Higginson (T. W.), Atlantic Essays.....(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 2 00
Houses not Made with Hands.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.
Huntington (W. S.), Roadmaster's Assistant.....(A. N. Kellogg)
Hutchings (J. M.), Scenes of Wonder and Curiosity in California. (A. Roman & Co.) 3 00
Jepson (B.), Elementary Music Reader.....(Chas. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Kelly (J.), American Catalogue of Books, 1866—1871. Vol. II.....(J. Wiley & Son)
Lear (E.), Nonsense Songs, Stories, Botany, and Alphabets.....(Jas. R. Osgood & Co.)
Leeds (L.), Treatise on Ventilation, 2d ed.....(J. Wiley & Son)
Life of Jefferson S. Batkins.....(A. K. Loring)
Menke (Dr. T.), Spruner's Hand-Atlas für die Geschichte des Mittelalters und der Neueren Zeit, Part I., swd.....(B. Westermann & Co.) 1 60
Merry Maple Leaves.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Monteith (A. H.), French, German, etc., without a Master.(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 2 00
New Map of Central California.....(A. L. Bancroft & Co.)
New Year's Autograph Album, swd.....(M. W. Sparks)
Norton (C. L.), American Sea-Side Resorts.....(Taintor Bros. & Co.)
Pendleton (Mrs. H.), The Parent's Guide, 2d ed.....(S. R. Wells) 1 50
Poor (H. V.), Manual of the Railroads of the U. S. for 1871-72.(H. V. & H. W. Poor)
Rockwell (Rev. C.), Catskill Mountains and Vicinity.....(Taintor Bros. & Co.)
Salad for the Solitary and the Social.....(De Witt C. Lent & Co.)
Schroedter (Allwina), Penates.....(L. W. Schmidt)
Spencer (H.), Philosophy of Style.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Taine (H.), Art in Greece.....(Holt & Williams) 1 25
History of English Literature, 2 Vols..... " " 10 00
The Coin Book.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
The Fall of Man; or, The Loves of the Gorillas, swd.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
The Musical Treasure.....(O. Ditson & Co.)
Tissandier (G.), The Wonders of Water.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Tourist's Guide. Around San Francisco Bay.....(A. L. Bancroft & Co.)
Tourist's Guide. Around San Francisco Bay, South..... " "
Transactions of the American Philological Association, swd.....(Hartford)
Traveller's Guide to the City of New York, swd.....(J. S. Redfield) 25
United States Patent Law.....(Munn & Co.)
Valedictory Poem and Oration, Yale College, 1871, swd.....(C. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Warren (T. R.), Shooting, Boating, and Fishing for Young Sportsmen.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Wilson (J.), Treatise on English Punctuation, 19th ed.(Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.)
Wood (Lieut. O. E.), West Point Scrap-Book.....(D. Van Nostrand)
Zell's Descriptive Hand-Atlas of the World, swd.....(T. Ellwood Zell) 50